Montale, Eugenio (1896– ). Italian poet. His verse expresses a deeply pessimistic view of man and nature and is strongly reminiscent of the work of Leopardi. Ossi di Seppe (1925), Le Occasioni (1949), and La Bufera e Altro (1957) are songbooks of collected poems. Among his other works are a "notebook" of translations, Quaderno di Traduzioni (1948), and a prose composition, La Farfalla di Dinard (1960). See HERMETICISM.

Montalembert, Comte de. Charles Forbes (1810–1870). French journalist and politician. With Lamennais, he founded the journal L'Avenir (1830) in which he upheld the interests of the Roman Catholic Church and the clergy. In the days of the Second Empire, Montalembert published his Des Intérêts Catholiques au XIXe Siècle (1852) and L'Eglise Libre dans l'État Libre (1863), both works strongly supporting Roman Catholicism.

Montalvo, Juan (1832–1889). Ecuadoran essayist. A bitter foe of tyranny, Montalvo attacked Ecuadorian dictator Gabriel García Moreno in the pages of his journal El Cariopolita. When he heard of García Moreno's assassination, he declared, "My pen has killed him!" His savage polemical essays, Catilinarias (1880), were directed against a new dictatorship and contributed to his being banished from Ecuador. His best known work, Siete tratados (1882), consists of seven treatises on moral and literary subjects, including a famous comparison between Washington and Bolivar. He also wrote Capítulos que se le olvidaron a Cervantes (1885), a successful imitation of Cervantes. Montalvo is not considered a profound or original thinker and is esteemed today largely because of the fecundity and vigor of his style.

Montargis, Dog of. A dog named Dragon in French legend. He belonged to Aubrey de Mondidier, who was murdered by the villain Richard de Macaire in 1731 near the castle of Montargis. Dragon's behavior drew suspicion on Macaire, and the king ordered a trial by combat between man and dog. Dragon defeated Macaire, who confessed. Guibert de Pixerécourt (1773–1844) dramatized the tale as Le Chien de Montargis (1814).

In 1615 the versatile Monchirétiën wrote the Traité de l'économie politique (Treatise on Political Economy), a work which is credited with giving the new science its name and, which, though of protectiveist tendency but free-trade aspirations, had enormous influence upon the policies of Richelieu and Colbert.

Monte Cristo, Count of. See Count of Monte Cristo.

Montefeltro, Federico da. Duke of Urbino (1422–1482). Italian nobleman. Captain general of the Church, he was famous for his political wisdom and his patronage of learning and the arts. The palace he built in his city state became one of the great courts of the Renaissance, a magnet for the illustrious and the talented men of his day. During the reign of his son Guidobaldo, the continuing splendor of the court was captured by Castiglione, who made it the physical and spiritual setting of The Courtier.

Montefeltro, Guidobaldo da (1472-1508). Italian nobleman. Son of Federico and duke of Urbino, he married Elisabetta Gonzaga, who maintained his splendid court while he was ill. He is affectionately recalled by Castiglione in The Courtier, which is set in 1507 at the ducal court.

Montespan, Marquise de. Born, Françoise Athénais de Rochechouart (1641-1707). Mistress of Louis XIV of France and mother of 8 of his children. She performed notable service to French letters as the wife of Racine and Boileau. He is noted for his Lettres persanes (1721), a series of 160 fictional letters exchanged—for the most part—between two Persians, satirizing Parisian institutions, individuals, gambling, religious intolerance, and royal power. Montesquieu's Considerations sur la grandeur et la décadance des Romaines (1734) demonstrates how a democracy, once having lost these public virtues that constitute the very essence of its existence, perish through tyranny. His most famous work, De l'Esprit des lois (1748), analyzes the relation between human and natural law. See The Spirit of the Laws.

Montessori, Maria (1870-1952). Italian physician and educator. The first woman in Italy to receive a medical degree, after working with defective and feeble-minded children, she opened in 1907 in the slums of Rome the first of her case dei bambini ("children's houses"). His works are noted for their dramatic expressiveness, adventurous harmonies, and careful orchestration.

Montezuma or Motzepanza II (1480?-1520). Aztec emperor (1503-1520). Having tried unsuccessfully to dissuade Cortés and the Spaniards from proceeding to the Aztec capital at Tenochtitlán, Montezuma was kidnapped and held as a hostage soon after their arrival. He continued to rule as chieftain and apparently won the affection of his captors. During an Indian uprising, he was struck on the forehead by a shower of stones, as he was addressing his subjects, and died a few days later. He is the principal character in an opera, Montezuma (1964) by Roger Sessions, with a libretto by Giuseppe Borgese.

She also wrote Anne of Avonlea (1909) and many other books for girls.

Montherlant, Henry de (1896-1942). French dramatist, novelist, and essayist. His major theme, the haughtily superior male who both asserts and scorns his power, appears in early novels like The Bullfighters (Les Bestiaires; 1926). The Bachelors (Les Celibataires; 1934; also translated as Lament for the Death of an Upper Class and Perish in Their Pride) ironically describes the decadent aristocracy in the aristocracy elegantly and cruelly trenchant style for which Montherlant is noted. In later works he goes on to portray the true aristocrat: the capable, courageous, virile man of rigorous integrity, doomed to intellectual and spiritual solitude if he would avoid the modern sin of mediocrity. Montherlant usually portrays women as selfish and inadequate creatures who use love as a tool to destroy men and to undermine their sense of moral absolutes.

The novel series Les Jeunes Filles includes Young Girls (Les Jeunes Filles; 1936), Pity for Women (Pitié pour les femmes; 1936), The Demon of Good (Le Demon du Bien; 1937), and The Lepers (Les Lepreuses; 1939), the last two also translated together as Costals and the Hippogriff. His plays, set amid the wars, famines, and domestic turmoil of Renaissance Italy and Spain, seek a universality applicable to contemporary Europe. They include Quex After Death (La Reine Morte; 1942). No Man's Son (Fils de personne; 1943), Maladetta (1946), The Matter of Santiago (1947), Tomorrow the Dawn (Devin il fera jour; 1949), Port-Royal (1954), and Don Juan (1958).

Montеспенсier, Duchesse de. Anne Marie Louise d'Orléans (1627-1693). French princess, known in her life and remembered as "La Grande Demoiselle." Daughter of Gaston d'Orléans, the brother of Louis XIII, the duchesse de Montеспенсier was frustrated in her hope of marrying Louis XIV when she sided against the royalists during the second Fronde; she then spent a period in disgrace before returning to the court and asking permission to marry the French courtier and soldier, the future due de Lauzun. The king objected to the match; Lauzun was imprisoned, and she was not able to obtain his release for 10 years, and then only by ceding a huge portion of her estates to the king's bastards. She finally married Lauzun, was unhappy, and devoted herself to religious affairs and to the writing of her lively Mémoires, which were published after her death in 1729. Her romance La Relation de l'île Imaginaire (Account of the Imaginary Isle) and La Princesse de Paphlagonie were published under the name of her secretary, Jean Ségrais.

Mont-Saint-Michel and Chartres (privately printed, 1904; published, 1913). An historical and philosophical study by Henry Adams. The volume is subtitled A Study in 13th-Century Unity, and complements the later Education of Henry Adams. Adams sees the century 1150-1250 as "the point in history when man held the highest idea of himself as a unit in a universal universe." At that point, philosophy, theology, and the arts were all informed by faith. The book begins by discussing the Norman style and spirit of the 12th-century cathedral at Mont-Saint-Michel. From this precursor, Adams moves to the culminating moment in the 13th century, when the Virgin of Chartres was a viable symbolic link between reason and intuition, science and religion. By 1250, according to Adams, St. Thomas's scholasticism, with its emphasis on reason, had begun to destroy coherence.

Moodie, Susanna [Strickland] (1803-1885). English-born Canadian novelist. After her marriage to J. W. D. Moody founded the Northfield Seminary for girls (1879), Mount Hermon School for boys (1881), and the Chicago Bible Institute (1889).

Moody, William Vaughn (1869-1910). American poet, dramatist, and educator. Moody's reputation has rested on a few often anthologized lyrics, such as Gloucester Moon and An Ode in Time of Hesitation. But from 1900 until the time of his death, his greatest effort was devoted to the drama. The Masque of Judgment (1900), The Fire Bringer (1904), and the incomplete The Death of Eve (1912) form a trilogy of verse dramas. The Great Divide is his best-known play. The Faith Healer (1909) was his final drama before his untimely death. See Trumbull Stickney.

Deep in daydreams as a result of his reading, he has an unfortunate love affair, and abandoning his childhood sweetheart, goes to Chicago in the hope of finding a more satisfactory existence. Moore was a cofounder of the Literary Theatre at Dublin, from which the Abbey Theatre developed, and author of the plays The Strife at Arlington (1895) and The Bending of the Bough (1900). His fiction, revealing traces of the influence of Balzac, Flaubert, and Zola, includes Confessions of a Young Man (1888), and Esther Waters. Memoirs of My Dead Life (1906) and the trilogy Hall and Farewell (1911–1914) are autobiographic in content, while Héloïse and Abelard (1921) and Aphrodite in Aulis (1931) are beautifully styled romances, the first historical, the second legendary. In his criticism, Moore was an influential defender of the impressionist school of painting and of the naturalist school of literature. His book of poetry includes Flowers of Passion (1878) and Pagan Poems (1881). See Brook Kerith, The; Irish Renaissance.

Moore, Henry [Spencer] (1898– ). English sculptor. Posed between realism and abstraction, he has formed a style which retains the inherent qualities of the sculptured material, whether bronze, stone, or wood. His style is typified by the hollowing-out of the human form in an effort to make space as meaningful as mass.

Moore, Marianne [Craig] (1887– ). American poet. Born in St. Louis, Mo., she was educated at Bryn Mawr College and was the acting editor of The Dial from 1925 to 1929. Her poetry is of the type called objectivist, presenting in each poem an object, scene, person, or bit of information precisely expressed and meticulously delineated. Her work is distinguished by wit, irony, intellectual appeal, compact, individual metrical patterns in syllabic verse. She is particularly fond of animals, and much of her imagery springs from the animal world.

Miss Moore’s first book, Poems (1921), was published without her knowledge by two friends, Hilda Doolittle (H.D.) and Robert McAlmon. Her later works include Observations (1924); Selected Poems (1925); The Pangolin and Other Verse (1936); What Are Years? Moore, Thomas (1779–1852). Irish poet of the romantic period. He is known for his graceful lyrics and Irish folk songs, set to traditional tunes, which he published in Irish Melodies (1807–1835). Some of the famous songs of this collection are The Harp That Once Through Tara’s Halls, The Minstrel Boy, and Believe Me, If All Those Endearing Young Charms. Lalla Rookh and Loves of the Angels, narrative poems with an Oriental setting, were also very popular. Additional writings by Moore include Poetical Works (1801), published under the pseudonym of Thomas Litttle; The Two-Penny Post Bag (1813), satires; The Epicurean (1827), a novel; pieces dealing with the adventures of the Fudg Family; a History of Ireland (1846); and several biographies, including one of Byron (1830), a close friend of Moore. Moore came to be regarded as the national poet of Ireland, and he was, next to Byron, the most popular writer of verse in the English romantic period. Subsequently, however, his work has been deperected for its shallowness and sentimentiality.

Moore, Thomas Sturge (1870–1944). English poet, critic, and translator. He was associated with the aesthetes of the 1890’s, but was more severely classical and more experimental than they were; he translated the poetry of the French symbolists. morality plays or moralities or (Fr.) moralités (15th-16th centuries). Allegorical dramas of the late Middle Ages. Although presented as popular pageants the way the mystery plays were, they are different in that the characters are always abstract personifications (Merry, Truth, Everyman, King, Church) rather than figures of Biblical history or individually characterized personalities; the mystery vividly portrays an event in religious history, whereas the morality is the dramatic presentation of a sermon. Most famous of the English morality plays is Everyman; others include The Pride of Life (c.
More, Paul Elmer

1400), The Castle of Perseverance (c. 1405?), Wisdom (c. 1460). The French moralités were often indistinguishable from farces, and by the end of the 15th century the English morality plays also included many scenes of broad comedy burlesquing the everyday life of the time or turning to political satire.
Thus in the 16th century the morality play developed into the interlude.

Morand, Paul (1888–1975). French novelist, diplomat, playwright. Morand is best known for the stories in Ouverture la Nuit (1921) and Féméré la Nuit (1923), and for his novels Green Shoots (Tendres Stocks; 1921) and Europe at Love (L'Europe galante; 1925). All these works depict the atmosphere of the 1920s. Afterward he turned to studies of racial and social groups, such as Black Magic (1928) and Living Buddha (1927), and of cities, such as New York (1936).

Morante, Elsa (1912– ). Italian poet and novelist, wife of author Alberto Moravia. Her most successful novel is Arthur's Island (L'Isola di Arturo; 1957).

Spanish dramatist. The son of poet and dramatist Nicolás Fernández de Moratín, he was apprenticed to a jeweler as a youth, but he later turned to diplomacy and traveled extensively throughout Europe.
His career was ruined as a result of his collaboration with the Napoleonic invaders of Spain. After the fall of Joseph Bonaparte, he fled to France, where he remained in permanent exile, living in constant fear of imaginary assassins.

Moratín's literary reputation rests on his five plays, which are notable for their successful blending of French classicism and the traditional drama of Spain. His masterpiece, El sí de las niñas (1806), is a charming comedy directed against parental tyranny.
One slightly inferior are La comedia nueva or El café (1792), a satire on contemporary dramatists, and La mojigata (1804), an acute analysis of hypocr.
yey. He also wrote a prose satire on bad writers,
La derrota de los pedantes (1789), and translated Shakespeare's Hamlet and several works by Molière.

Moravia, Alberto. Pen name of Alberto Pin-cherle (1907– ). Italian novelist and short-story writer. His numerous works are noted for their realism and emphasis on sexuality as a means of character analysis. Moravia's protagonists, who belong, for the most part, to the middle and lower classes, are incapable of positive reactions to the reality life threats upon them. Moravia's first and perhaps most typical novel is The Time of Indifference (Gli In differenti; 1929). Among his later, more significant works are Mistaken Ambitions (Le Ambizioni Suglate; 1935), The Fancy Dress Party (Le Maschere; 1941), Agostino (1945), The Woman of Rome (La Romana; 1947), La Disubbidanzia (1948), Conjugal Love (L'Amore Coniugale; 1949), The Conformist (Il Conformista; 1951), A Ghost at Noon (Il Dispresso; 1954), Two Women (La Ciociara; 1957), and The Empty Canvas (La Noia; 1960). Moravia is a recognized leader of the neorealist school of writing that emerged after World War II.

Moravian Brethren (Ger., Mährische Brudergemeinde). A pietistic sect based on the evangelical 15th-century movement led by the Bohemian reformer, John Hus. After much persecution it was restored in 1722 by Count Zinzendorf in a Silesian town called Herrnhut (hence the original German name of the group, Herrnhuter). The immediate purpose was to use Herrnhut as a sanctuary for religious refugees from Moravia and Bohemia. Many of the Moravian Brethren emigrated to the U.S. after 1735. A permanent settlement arose in Pennsylvania.

Known for Le Roi David (1921), with music by Arthur Honegger, Morax also wrote Guillaume
Tell (1914); and Charles le Téméraire (1944).

Mordant, Sir. See Faber, Queene, The.

Mordecai. In the Old Testament, the uncle of Esther. Through his wise counsel to his niece when she became queen, he helped save the Jewish people from the plots of Haman.

Mordred, Sir. In Arthurian legend, one of the knights of the Round Table, traditionally the treach-erosous one. In Malory's Mort d'Arthur (c. 1469), he is the bastard son of King Arthur and Queen Margawse, and half brother of her other sons. When King Arthur goes to France on a military expedition,
Sir Mordred usurps the throne and attempts to marry Guinevere (his stepmother). Upon receiving the news, Arthur hastens back to England to fight Mordred, and in the ensuing battle, each gives to the other his death blow.

The name is spelled Mordred in Tennyson's Idylls of the King (1859–1885), where a much altered version of the story is given. Here, Mordred does not try to seduce Guinevere but rather to expose her liason with Launcelot. With 12 other knights he forces his way into the queen's chamber when Laun-celot is there.

In the Welsh Mabinogion, Mordred appears as Medrawd. Like Arthur, Mordred may have originated in an actual, historical figure. See Annales Cambriae.

More, Hannah (1745–1833). English writer, reformer, and philanthropist. Her writings include Percy (1777) and The Fatal Falsehood (1779), tragedies; Village Politics and Repository Tracts (1792), religious tracts on reforming the poor; and Coelebs in Search of a Wife (1809), a novel.

More, Henry (1614–1687). English philosophical writer and poet. A saintly man and a loyal Royalist, he was one of the leaders of the Cambridge Platornists. Among his chief works are An Anti-dote against Atheism (1653), Divine Dialogues (1668), and A Brief Discourse of the Real Presence (1681).

More, Paul Elmer (1864–1937). American critic. While at Harvard, More met his future student Irving Babbitt and, under his influence, re-owned his interest in romanticism and espoused Babbitt's interest in neo-humanism, classicism, and restraint. However, he never entirely lost his love for Oriental literature and mysticism and was himself something of a contemplative. Between 1901 and 1914 he was an active journalist, writing many of the essays collected in his Shelburne Essays (11 vols., 1904–1921) and establishing his principles in the discipline of the New Humanism. In the Demon of the Absolute (1928) he warned against absolutists creeds, urged philosophical dualism, advocated standards of taste based on tradition, argued against romanticism and sentimental humanitarianism, and particularly condemned the naturalistic writers. Among his later works are _The Greek Tradition_ (5 vols., 1921–1931), the _New Shelburne Essays_ (3 vols., 1928–1936), and _Pages from an Oxford Diary_ (1937), an autobiography.

More, Sir Thomas (1478–1535). English statesman, lawyer, humanist, saint, poet, and author, and a friend of Erasmus, Colet, and other leading scholars of the time. A leading figure of English humanism, More was one of the most versatile and talented men of his age. His writings include a biography of Pico della Mirandola (1510); _The History of Richard III_ (written c. 1513, posthumously published, 1543), which was based on an earlier account by Cardinal Morton. _Utopia_ (1516), his most famous work, was written in Latin. A loyal defender of Roman Catholicism, he engaged in vigorous controversies with the Protestant heretics of the time, especially William Tyndale, against whom he wrote _A Dialogue Concerning Heresies_ (1528).

More held important positions in the government of his time, being a Member of Parliament, an envoy on several missions abroad, a court official, and ultimately Lord Chancellor, succeeding Cardinal Wolsey in 1529. Though he had been a long-time friend and favorite of Henry VIII, More was a staunch Catholic and could not accept Henry's position announced in 1531 that the English king, and not the Italian Pope, was the head of the Church in England. More resigned from the Chancellorship in 1532. He wrote a justification of his position in _An Apology of Sir Thomas More_ (1533). Two years later, Parliament passed a bill requiring that all subjects take an oath acknowledging the supremacy of Henry over all other foreign kings, including the Pope. More refused, was imprisoned, and finally executed a year later. He was beatified in 1866 and canonized by Pope Pius IX in 1895.

He is the subject of a memorable biography, _The Life of Sir Thomas More_ (1557?), reprinted 1935, by his son-in-law William Roper, and of a modern play _A Man for All Seasons_ (1961) by Robert Bolt.

Moréas, Jean (1856–1910). Pen name of Jannis Papadiantopoulos. French poet. Born in Athens, Moréas was closely associated with the symbolists and published such volumes of poetry as _Les Syrtes_ (1884) and _Les Cantillènes_ (1886). His later work, however, was deliberately classical in both form and content. The lyrics that appear in _Les Stances_ (1899–1901), and posthumously in 1920, are fine examples of his restrained, quiet classicism.

Moreau, Frédéric. The central character in Gustave Flaubert's novel _L'Education Sentimentale_.

Morel, Charles. A violinst in Marcel Proust's _Remembrance of Things Past_. The son of the servant of the narrator's great-uncle Adolphe, he becomes the homosexual lover of the Baron de Charlus and then of Robert de Saint-Loup, as well as a procurer of women for Albertine.

Morel, Paul. See Sons and Lovers.

Moreland, Catherine. See Northanger Abbey.

Morelos, José María (1765–1815). Mexican priest and revolutionary leader. An able organizer and administrator, Morelos became one of Hidalgo's chief aides and took command of the revolutionary forces after the latter's death. In 1813 he convened a congress at Chilpancingo which declared Mexico's independence and drafted the country's first constitution. Morelos was later captured and shot by the Spaniards.

Moretti, Marino (1885– ). Italian novelist, poet, and short-story writer. He began his prolific career as a writer in 1905, when he associated himself with the circle of poets nicknamed the Crepuscolari. He turned from poetry to prose soon after and has since written some 40 odd volumes of novels and short stories. Most of his works have a markedly provincial setting (Cesenatico and the surrounding region along the shores of the Adriatic). His fiction suggests De Amicis in the novels of sentimentality struck by the themes he develops. Pascoli appears to have influenced his simple and unassuming style.

Moretti's short-story collections include _Pesci Fuor d'Acqua_ (1914), _Conoscere il Mondo_ (1919), and _Personaggi Secondari_ (1920). His most successful novels are _La Voce di Dio_ (1920) and _La Vedova Fioravanti_ (1941). Among his many other novels are _Il Sole del Sabato_ (1916), _Guenda_ (1918), _Né Bella Né Brutta_ (1921), _I Due Fanciulli_ (1922), _I Puri di Cuore_ (1923), and _Mia Madre_ (1923).

Morgan, Charles (1894–1958). English novelist. His novels, which are sensitive but difficult and mannered, are not generally popular. Morgan is, however, a winner of the Femina Prize, the Hawthorned Prize, and the James Tait Black Memorial Award, and his work is highly regarded in France and other European countries. Morgan served as an officer in the navy, and his first novel, _The Gunroom_ (1919), had to be withdrawn because of its unfavorable picture of navy life. Most of his novels deal with problems of morals and aesthetics in a faintly mystical tone; among them are _Sparkenbroke_ (1936), _The Voyage_ (1940), _The Empty Room_ (1941), _The Judge's Story_ (1947), and _The River Lane_ (1949). He was for many years drama critic of the London Times. The philosopher George Moore appointed him his literary executor. He married Hilda Vaughan, the novelist.

Morgan, Sir Henry (1635–1688). Welsh buccaneer. During hostilities between England and Spain, he captured Portobelo, Panama, and ravaged the coasts of Cuba and Maracaibo. Named commander-in-chief of the entire naval force of Jamaica, he captured Panama City after a bitterly fought battle (1671). He was later appointed lieutenant-general of Jamaica. Morgan has appeared in numerous literary works, among them _Cup of Gold_ (1940), a novel by John Steinbeck.

Morgan, John Pierpont (1837–1913). American financier. The Morgans, one of the leading banking families in the U.S., financed numerous important business enterprises, and helped to support many public institutions, particularly the Metropolitan Museum of Art. J. Pierpont Morgan became a notable art and book collector, and his great library in New York City, separately housed in a beautiful building, contains valuable manuscripts and rare books. His son, J. Pierpont Morgan, Jr. (1861–1943), turned this library over to public use in 1924.

Morgana. An enchantress, identified with the Lady of the Lake in Orlando Furioso, and also with Morgan Le Fay, the fairy sister of King Arthur. In the Orlando poem of Ariosto she dwells at the bottom of a lake where she keeps her treasure. In Boiardo's version of the Orlando story she is simply Lady-Fortune, but then takes on the attributes of a witch.

Morgana, Fata. See Fata.

Morgan le Fay. One of the most mysterious figures in Arthurian legend, and one who appears in most versions but in different guises. Almost always she is a sorceress or in other ways has supernatural powers. Sometimes she is the sister of Arthur, sometimes his half sister, and almost always she is his enemy, or the enemy of Guinevere. In Malory's Morte d'Arthur (c. 1469), she is forever plotting against Arthur, and once she succeeds in stealing from him the sword Excalibur, giving it to her lover in order that he might kill Arthur. In Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, she is an unobtrusive old woman who remains in the background, for the most part, and is only revealed in the end to be "Morgan the goddess," who plotted the action of the tale. Oddly, however, with all her animosity toward Arthur, it is she, in some versions, who takes him to Avalon to be healed of his wounds after the great final battle. Also it is to be noted that, in Malory's Morte d'Arthur, she is the only one of Arthur's enemies who is not ultimately vanquished by him. She also appears in Orlando Furioso, Orlando innamorato; and Osser the Dane.

Morgante Maggiore, II. The comic masterpiece of the Florentine Renaissance poet Luigi Pulci, it is a burlesque version of the Carolingian material inspired by the style and technique of the Cantariorie. Completed in twenty-three cantos and published in 1470, it appeared in an edition of 1483 with five added cantos, hence the title "The Greater Morgante." Morgante is the name of the giant who figures prominently in the plot. In 1822, Lord Byron's translation of the first canto of the poem appeared in The Liberal, edited jointly with Leigh Hunt. The tale relates the adventures of Orlando, who leaves the Paris court of Charlemagne in anger at the instigations of Gano of Maganza (Ganelon). At the monastery of Chiaramonte he defeats two giants but spares the third, Morgante, who becomes his shield-bearer and companion. The giant aids Orlando and the other paladins in their various adventures in pagan lands. They are also assisted by the magician Malagigi and the fiend Astarotte, who is a theologian and philosopher. When temporarily separated from Orlando, Morgante meets the demigiant Margutte, a charming fellow, but an immense glutton who is proud of his ability as a thief and liar. He joins Morgante in several feasts of appetite, treachery, and thievery until he dies in a fit of laughter at the sight of a monkey wearing his (Margutte's) boots. Soon after, his loyal friend, Morgante, also dies, of a crab bite, and is buried by the grief-stricken Orlando. The final cantos of the poem recall the famous battle of Roncivalle (Roncesvalles), the death of Orlando, the punishment of Gano, and the further adventures of Rinaldo. The final octaves praise the inspirer of the poem, Lucrezia Tornabuoni, mother of Lorenzo de' Medici, and ask God's mercy for its author.

Morgenstern, Christian (1871-1914). German poet, known for the grotesque poems in his collection Palmström (1910). His significance as a serious poet was long overshadowed by the immense popularity of his humorous Galgenlieder (Gallows Songs, 1905), but he is now receiving more critical attention.

Morgiana. In the Arabian Nights, the clever female slave of Ali Baba who appears in the story Ali Baba and the Forty Thieves. She discovers that the robbers have been brought to her master's house concealed in jars of oil, and kills them by pouring boiling oil into the jars. Then, recognizing the captain of the thieves dining with Ali Baba, she subdues him during the dagger dance and marries the nephew of her grateful master.

Morglay. The sword of Sir Bevis of Hamton; also, a generic name for a sword.

Morier, James [Justinian] (1780-1849). English diplomat and novelist. He is known for The Adventures of Hajji Baba of Ishmaan and The Adventures of Hajji Baba of Ispahan in England (1828), in which he satirizes Western civilization in the tradition of Montesquieu's Lettres Persanes. The books reflect Morier's intimate knowledge of Near-Eastern character, gained during his service as English ambassador to Persia.

Mörke, Eduard (1804-1875). German poet, generally considered the greatest in the 19th century after Goethe. Gottfried Keller later characterized him as "this son of Horace and a fine Swabian lady," by which he meant that Mörke's poetry combines classical balance and monumentality (Horatian qualities), sophisticated charm and wit (the lady), and deep feeling for his Swabian homeland. Like the poets of Swabian romanticism, Mörke sometimes wrote folklike lyrics, but he was also capable of a powerful classical style not unlike that of Klopstock and Hölderlin. His thought is generally close to that of the conservative Romantic movement, with an affirmation of most bourgeois values. On the surface, his life was quiet and modest. He was educated in theology and served, at various times, as a Protestant pastor and a girls' school literature teacher. He was, however, never free of internal torment, the result of unhappy youthful loves, an unhappy marriage in 1851, religious doubts, and dissatisfaction with the clergy as a profession. This double character of his life is reflected in his verse which, beneath the surface, beneath its careful consciousness of form and economy, often expresses an abysmal melancholy. He especially favors the theme of transience: the transience of love, as in An eine Adelsharp (To an Aeolean Harp, written 1837) and Ein Stündlein wohlf vor Tag (A Little Before Dawn, written 1857), or of life in general, as in Denk' es, o Seele (Remember, O My Soul, written 1852). He was also highly skilled in description, and his Auf eine Lampe (On a Lamp, written 1846) is considered an early example of the Dunkelromantik. His prose works include a highly sentimental novel Maler Nolten (Painter Nolten, 1832) which in form is quite daring, embodying voluminous lyric and even dramatic insertions, and the masterful novella Mozart auf der Reise nach Prag.

Morii Ogai (1862-1922). Japanese physician and litterateur. After spending four years in Germany, he became a surgeon in the Imperial Army, rising to the rank of surgeon-general. An indefatigable translator and writer of original works, he was one of the major contributors to the introduction of Western literature and ideas to Japan during the Meiji period. See Wild Geese (1959) translated by Kingo Ochiai and Sanford Goldstein.

Morison, Samuel Eliot (1887– ). American historian. A prolific writer whose work is outstanding both for its scholarship and its felicity of style, Morison taught at Harvard University from 1915 to 1955; he wrote several books about the university, including Harvard College in the Seventeenth Century (2 vols., 1936). His other works on early New England include Builders of the Bay Colony (1930) and The Puritan Pronaos (1936), reissued as The Intellectual Life of Colonial New England (1956), in which he stressed Puritan interest in literature and learning.

Morison's findings as commodore of the Harvard Columbus Expedition (1939–1940) furnished him with material for his masterly biography of Columbus, Admiral of the Ocean Sea (2 vols., 1942), which won a Pulitzer Prize; a one-volume edition appeared as Christopher Columbus, Mariner (1955). An officer in the U.S. Naval Reserve (1942–1951), Morison was official navy historian during World War II and wrote a History of United States Naval Operations in World War II (15 vols., 1947–1962), upon which he based his subsequent Two-Ocean War (1963). He is also the author of Strategy and Compromise (1958) and John Paul Jones: A Sailor's Biography (1959), another Pulitzer Prize winner.

Morley, Christopher [Darlington] (1890–1957). American novelist, journalist, and essayist. After returning from England, where he was a Rhodes scholar, Morley worked on several magazines and served as contributing editor of the Saturday Review of Literature from 1924 to 1941. A dabbler in many literary genres, he wrote poetry, plays, essays, and novels. His best-known novels are Parnassus on Wheels (1917); its sequel, The Haunted Bookshop (1919); Where the Blue Begins (1922); The Trojan Horse (1937); and Kitty Foyle (1939). Morris, Peter. See John Gibson Lockhart.

Morris, William (1834–1896). English artist, designer, poet, and socialist. An admirer of John Ruskin's writings and of Gothic architecture, Morris trained as an architect but eventually studied painting with Dante Gabriel Rossetti. Unable to find suitable furniture or draperies for his house, he set up the manufacturing and decorating firm eventually known as Morris & Co., and did much to raise British standards of taste in furniture and ceramics as well as to revive interest in stained glass and textiles. Morris' poetic writings include The Defence of Guenevere, and Other Poems (1858), reflecting his interest in the Middle Ages; The Life and Death of Jason (1867), on a classical theme; and The Earthly Paradise (1868–1871), on an ingeniously combined classical and medieval theme. As a result of two trips to Iceland, Morris translated the Norse sagas and wrote his masterpiece, Sigurd the Volsung (1876), a narrative poem evoking the heroic legendary North. An enemy of evil social conditions, which he believed fostered physical ugliness, Morris joined the socialist Democratic Federation in 1883 and helped form the Socialist League in 1885. His political connections led to the writing of numerous socialist works in prose and verse, including Socialism, Its Growth and Outcome (1893). Among Morris' other works are translations of the Odyssey (1875) and the Aeneid (1887), the morality play Love is Enough (1873), The Water of the Wondrous Isles (1897), and The Story of the Sundering Flood (1898). Mort de Sénèque, La. See François l'Hermitte.

Morte d'Arthur, Le (c. 1469). An English prose rendition of the legends of King Arthur by Sir Thomas Malory. It was first printed in the year 1485 by William Caxton who assembled the whole and presented it as one continuous narrative, entitled it Le Morte d'Arthur. The evidence of the Winchester Manuscript (recently found) indicates, however, that Malory really wrote this famous work as eight separate romances, and a modern edition presents the material in that manner under the title The Works of Sir Thomas Malory.

In these eight romances, Arthurian Legend assumed ultimate and splendid shape. Malory's primary purpose in writing this material seems to have been, simply, the telling of a good story, and few will argue that he did not succeed. Even in his own era, the Morte d'Arthur enjoyed great popularity in many countries, and the influence it has had on subsequent generations cannot be overemphasized.

Written while Malory was in jail, the eight tales seem to have been taken from many English and French sources. One of them, called The Tale of

His efficient operations made him greatly feared, but he was never captured by the Federals. When Lee surrendered, Mosby disbanded his group and began to practice law in Warrenton, Va. A friend and admirer of General Grant, he was consul at Hong Kong (1878–1885), and an assistant attorney for the department of justice (1904–1910). He is the author of Mosby’s War Reminiscences, and Stuart’s Cavalry Campaigns (1887) and Stuart’s Cavalry in the Gettysburg Campaign (1908).

Moses. In the Old Testament (Exod. 1: Deut. 34), the Hebrew lawgiver who led the Israelites out of Egypt through the wilderness and to the Promised Land. Because Pharaoh had decreed that all Hebrew boy babies should be killed, Moses’ mother put him in a basket and left him in the bulrushes, where he was found and adopted by Pharaoh’s daughter. Later, he identified himself with his own people and, because he killed an abusive Egyptian taskmaster, was forced to flee the country. He returned, called down on Pharaoh’s recaeleant head the Ten Plagues and led the Children of Israel out of Egypt, passing through the Red Sea on dry land. For 40 years he led his discontented, rebellious followers through the wilderness and was mediator for them with Jehovah, with whom he spoke on Mount Sinai when receiving the Ten Commandments. Moses is spoken of in the Bible as the meekest of all men (Num. 12:3); but on one occasion he impulsively and vainly attempted to bring water out of it, and for this sin he was punished by being forbidden to enter the Promised Land. He was, however, given a glimpse of it from Mount Pisgah, where he died. George Eliot wrote a poem The Death of Moses.

The novel, which is less an artistic work than a Marxist propaganda tract, is cited by Soviet critics as a model of socialist realism.

Christine, assisted by her lover, Adam Brant, poisons her husband. Lavinia, also in love with Brant, persuades Orin to revenge their father's death. Brant is murdered, Christine commits suicide, and Orin and Lavinia travel to the South Seas in an unsuccessful attempt to forget. Peter Walsh, whom she loves but has rejected because she is afraid his possessive love would infringe on her own personality, arrives as a visitor from India. In the evening she holds a party. Through interior monologues and the stream of consciousness method, characters and past lives of herself, her family, and her friends are revealed. A complementary character is Septimus WARREN SMITH, who has retreated entirely into a private world, and gone mad; he finally commits suicide. Mrs. Dalloway and Septimus never meet, but their lives are connected by external events (such as an airplane overhead or a bus passing both), and by the fact that they both think the same kinds of thoughts.

However, when Vivie learns that her mother not only was a madam but still is, she kely rejects her. Disillusioned, but unsentimental, Vivie is ready to start her own life.

Because of its subject matter, Mrs. Warren's Profession caused a storm of protest from the public and was closed when it was first produced in New York by Arnold DALY. It was not produced in England until 1925.

One concerns the love affair of BEATRICE and BENEDICK, who become betrothed as a result of the clever schemes of their friends, each one telling that the other is pining away in unrequited passion. The other plot deals with a conspiracy against CLAUDIO, who is engaged to Beatrice's gentle cousin HERO. Don John, who hates Claudio, stages a pretended assignation between Borachio, one of his followers, and Margaret, Hero's maid, who is garbed as her mistress. Claudio, who witnesses the scene and suspects Hero's virtue, rejects his bride at the altar, but through the good offices of kindly Friar Francis, the matter is finally cleared up. Many sources have been suggested for the plot, since similar tales have been told by Bandello, Ariosto, and Spenser. See DOGBERRY; LEONATO; DON PEDRO.

muckrakers. In U.S. history, a group of reformers whose writings drew public attention to corruption in politics and business and to other social ills. The term was first used, in a deprecatory sense, by Theodore Roosevelt, who likened them to the character in Pilgrim's Progress who is so busy raking mud that he cannot perceive the celestial crown held above him.

Muckraking reached its height in the first decade of the 20th century. The spearhead of the movement was McClure's Magazine with other mass-circulation periodicals, such as Collier's and Cosmopolitan, following its lead. Among the outstanding examples of muckraking literature are books based on articles that first appeared in these magazines: Ida M. TARBELL's History of the Standard Oil Company (1904), Lincoln STEFFENS' Shame of the Cities (1904), and Samuel Hopkins Adams' The Great American Fraud (1906). Other famous exposures include David Graham Phillips' The Treatyon of the Senate (1906), Burton J. Hendrick's Story of Life Insurance (1907), and Ray Stannard Baker's The Railroads on Trial (McClure's, 1906). Many novelists also turned to muckraking, notably Upton Sinclair, who assailed the meat-packing industry in The Jungle.

Mudarra. See Lara, Cantar de los Siete Infantes de Maudra-Rakshasa. A 7th-century Sanskrit play, The Signet Ring of Rakshasa, by Vishakadatta. It is concerned with the machinations of Chanakya, the minister of Chandragupta Maurya, emperor of India in the third century B.C., in attempting to subdue Rakshasa, the recalcitrant minister of the Nandas, dynastic rulers of a neighboring kingdom. There are no female characters in the play, since it deals with political intrigue, a subject not considered edifying for feminine tastes.

Mufti. An Arabic word meaning an official administrator of Muslim law. When the office of Grand Mufti of Constantinople was abolished in 1924, the place was filled by the Grand Mufti of Jerusalem.

In English, the term is used to denote civil costume, as distinguished from military or official.

Muhammad, Mahomet, Mohammed (Mecca, 570–Medina, 632). From the Arabic, "the praised one"; the founder of Islam, the Muslim religion. He adopted this name about the time of the Hegira to apply to himself the Old Testament Messianic prophecies (Haggai 2:7). His original name is given both as Kotham and Halabi.

When Muhammad introduced his system to the Arabs, they asked for miraculous proofs. He then ordered Mount Safa to come to him, thanked God when it did not move for "it would have fallen on us to our destruction," and went to the mountain to pray. This is the origin of the phrase, if the mountain will not come to Muhammad, Muhammad must go to the mountain, often used of one who bows before the inevitable.

Voltaire was the author of a drama, Mahomet (1738); James Miller wrote an English version called Mahomet the Imposter (1740).

Muir, Edwin (1887–1959). Scottish poet, translator, and literary critic. He published his First Poems in 1925, but he did not attain general recognition as an important 20th-century poet until his Collected Poems appeared in 1952. His work is characterized by its simple and direct style and its concern with dream imagery and archetypal myth and fable. Like other modern poets, he is indebted to the poetry of the 17th-century metaphysical poets and to the psychology of Jung and Freud, and he deals with contemporary intellectual, emotional, and social problems. During the 1930's he and his wife, Willa Muir, published translations of the works of Franz Kafka, introducing him to the English reading public. His autobiography, The Story and the Fable (1940; revised and expanded as Autobiography in 1954), with its evocations of childhood and its use of dream and fable, is an interesting book in its own right and a useful background to his poems. Muir was brought up on a poor Scottish farm and obliged to earn his living as a clerk in Glasgow at the age of 14. Deeply conscious of his Scottish heritage, he wrote Scottish Journey (1935) and other topographical and political books. His books of literary criticism include Latitudes (1924), a collection of the essays he contributed to The Freeman under the editorship of Van Wyck Brooks; The Structure of the Novel (1928); and The Estate of Poetry (1962). His works of fiction include The Marionette (1927) and Poor Tom (1932).

Muir, John (1838–1914). Scottish-born American naturalist and writer. Muir, who migrated with his father to a Wisconsin farm, described his early experiences in The Story of My Boyhood and Youth (1913). Between 1863, when he left the University of Wisconsin, and 1868, when he settled for six years in the Yosemite Valley, Muir traveled thousands of miles afoot through Wisconsin, Illinois, Indiana, and Canada; he also made a journey from Indiana to Mexico, the journal of which he published as A Thousand Mile Walk to the Gulf (1916).

Muir had the naturalist's keen eye, a poetic appreciation of nature, and a gift for style. A lover of animals, he repeatedly expressed his wonder and admiration for the intelligence of beasts. Stickmen (1909) is a loving tribute to the loyalty and resourcefulness of his little half-wild dog.

Much of Muir's life was devoted to saving the natural beauties of the West from destruction by commercial exploitation, and his letters report his constant, heart-breaking struggle to prevent man from ruining the beauties of nature. His other works include The Mountains of California (1894), Our National Parks (1901), and The Yosemite (1912).

Mukhopadhyay, Prabhat Kumar (1868–1938). Bengali novelist and short-story writer, considered the finest prose writer in the language after Tagore. Among his better known collections of stories are Navakatha (New Tales) and Deshi o Bilati (Local and Foreign).

Mullins, Priscilla. See Courtship of Miles Standish, The.

Mulock, Dinah Maria. See Dinah Maria Mulock Craik.

Mumford, Lewis (1895– ). American writer, philosopher, historian, and teacher. Mumford's diverse books all explore the relation of modern man to both his natural and his self-created environment. A study of the works of Patrick Geddes, Scottish biologist and sociologist, stimulated his interest in city and regional planning, and in 1924 Mumford helped to found the Regional Planning Association of America. In his books The Brown Decades (1931), The Culture of Cities (1938), City Development (1945), and The City in History (1961) he shows how the city expresses man's civilization but also influences its development. The Culture of Cities is part of Mumford's four-volume study called The Renewal of Life, which also includes Technics and Civilization (1934), The Condition of Man (1944), and The Conduct of Life (1951). In these books Mumford described the emergence of the modern scientific world and stressed man's obligation to use his now nearly infinite resources to help create a better life.

Mumford's Sticks and Stones (1924) was one of the first histories of American architecture. He collected his articles on architecture in a volume called From the Ground Up (1956). Two other important works are The Golden Day (1926), a pioneer study of 19th-century American literature, and Herman Melville (1929). Mumford also published Green Memories (1947), a biography of his son, Geddes, who was killed at 19 in World War II.

Among his well-known works are Summer Night, The Scream, Death in the Room, The Sick Child, Ashes, and Portrait of A. Strindberg.

Munday [or Monday], Anthony (c. 1553–1633). English dramatist, actor, and pamphleteer. Munday's varied activities, which included acting as a spy on English Catholics in Rome and Paris, resulted in his being named as the official pageant writer for the City of London, a post coveted by Ben Jonson, during the reign of James I. The great majority of his dramatic works were written in collaboration with other writers and include Sir Thomas More (1595), The Downfall of Robin Hood (1598), The Death of Robin Hood (1598), and Pedele and Fortunio (1583).

Mundt, Theodor (1808–1861). German novelist, historian, and liberal journalist. His most famous work is Moderne Lebenswirren (The Confusion of Modern Life), 1834), a novel which, like other products of the JUNGE DEUTSCHLAND ("Young Germany") movement, attempts to attack directly specific social problems of the time.

Munera. See FAERIE QUEENE, THE.

Munich Crisis. A European diplomatic crisis of September 1938. War was threatened by the demand of Adolf Hitler for the incorporation into Germany of a group of Sudeten Germans living in a region that had been given to Czechoslovakia as part of its national territory by the Treaty of Versailles at the close of World War I. In an effort to prevent war, Neville Chamberlain, prime minister of Great Britain, conferred with Hitler at Berchtesgaden and later made a peace treaty at Munich, Germany, which permitted the annexation of the Sudeten region to Germany in return for a pledge by Hitler that the independence of the remainder of Czechoslovakia would be respected. Chamberlain believed that "peace in our time" had been achieved, but Hitler's pledge was not kept. The Munich agreement was only a strengthening of Hitler for his later aggression against Poland (September 1939), which brought about World War II.

Made king of Naples in 1809, he took the title of Joachim I and became known as "the Dandy King." Murat joined Napoleon on his return from Elba, but was later captured and executed.

Murder in the Cathedral (1935). A drama in verse by T. S. ELIOT. It deals with the assassination of St. Thomas à Becket, the archbishop of Canterbury who opposed King Henry II's attempt to limit the privileges of the clergy. In the play, Thomas is tempted by offers of worldly happiness, power, and influence, but rejects them in order to obey what he regards as the laws of God; he is martyred. The language of the play is mostly ritualistic and liturgical, spoken in a chorus by the women of Canterbury and in monologues and formal exchanges by the other characters. The interlude is a sermon by Becket to his invisible congregation. The villains, four tempters in Part one and four knights and murderers in Part two, are comic figures, expressing modern attitudes in colloquial language. The first work Eliot completed in his attempt to revive poetic drama on the English stage, Murder in the Cathedral is generally regarded as his best play.

Her novels are noted for their wit, intricacy, and sensitivity of style, as well as for their psychological penetration and philosophical implications. Man's need for love and freedom are explored as part of his greater need to affirm his own reality. See UNDER THE NET, THE BELL, AN UNOFFICIAL ROSE. Among Iris Murdock's other works are the novels The Flight from the Enchanter (1956), The Sandcastle (1957), A Severed Head (1961), The Unicorn (1963), and a study of the philosophy of Jean Paul Sartre (1953). Smokies. In addition to her local-color books, Miss Murfree wrote a series of Southern historical novels.

Muscular Christianity. Healthy or strong-minded Christianity, which braves a man to fight the battle of life bravely and manfully. The term was applied to the teachings of Charles Kingsley—somewhat to his annoyance, for he was less concerned with personal fortitude than a program of vigorous social action by the Church at large.

Muses. In Greek mythology, the nine daughters of Zeus and Mnemosyne; originally goddesses of memory only, but later identified with individual arts and sciences. The paintings of Herculaneum show all nine with their respective attributes:

1. Calliope, Muse of epic poetry. Her symbols are a tablet and stylus, sometimes a scroll.

Music (harmony) of the spheres. A theory of Pythagoras. He, having ascertained that the pitch of notes depends on the rapidity of vibrations, and also that the spheres move at different rates of motion, concluded that the planets must make sounds in their motion according to their different rates; and that, as all things in nature are harmoniously made, the different sounds must harmonize. In this originated the old theory of the harmony of the spheres. Kepler has a treatise on the subject. See spheres.

Musics Duel (1646). A free translation by Richard Crashaw of a Latin poem by the Jesuit Famianus Strada. Describing a musical contest between a nightingale and a lusit, the poet is a tour de force of verbal music, ingeniously imitating the sweetness and variety of song.

He is best known for the extraordinary depth of psychological and cultural analysis built into his enormous unfinished novel Der Mann ohne Eigenschaften (The Man Without Characteristics). Of this work, which has had considerable influence upon German prose down to the present, Musil completed two volumes: Reise an den Rand des Möglichen (Trip to the Limit of Possibility, 1930) and Ins tausendjährige Reich (Into the Millennium, 1932); a fragmentary third was published posthumously in 1943. Among his other works, the best known is Die

Verwirrungen des Zöglings Téless (The Confusions of Young Téless, 1906), a short novel.

Muslim or Moslem. A follower of Muhammad. The word comes from the present participle of the Arabic aslama, to be safe or at rest, from which Islam is also derived.

Muset, Alfred de (1810-1857). French poet, novelist, and dramatist. Muset's early poetry partakes both of Byronic wit and Byronic passion (see Romanticism); it probes introspectively into the ecstasies and despair of love. His celebrated love affair with George Sand ended disastrously in 1855 and this brought a darker coloring to his subsequent life and work. His poetic works include Contes d'Espagne et d'Italie (1830), Premières poésies (1829-1835); and Poésies nouvelles (1836-1852), which includes the series of lyrics for which he is best known, Les Nuits.

Muset's plays—comedies of manners called comédies-proverbes, as many of the titles were taken from proverbs popular at the time—also include fanciful comedies in the style of Shakespeare. Among his plays are On ne Badine pas avec l'Amour (1834), Barberine (1835), Un Caprice (1837), and Il Faut qu'une porte soit ouverte ou fermée (1845). La Confession d'un enfant du siècle (1836) is an autobiographical novel.

Mussolini, Benito (1883-1945). Italian dictator. Originally a socialist agitator, he later advanced a program of economic controls and national expansion that appealed to many Italians in the troubled years after World War I. In 1922 he led his followers in the famous march on Rome that resulted in his appointment as prime minister; he then proceeded to mold the Italian government to the ideals of fascism, stifling all opposition. Embarking on an aggressive foreign policy, he conquered Ethiopia (1935-1936), withdrew from the League of Nations, and entered World War II on the side of Germany. After the Allied invasion of Italy, he was deposed and imprisoned, but was rescued by the Germans, who installed him as head of a puppet state in northern Italy. Forced to flee, he was recognized by partisans and shot, together with his mistress Clara Petacci.

Mussorgski, Modest Petrovich (1838-1881). Russian composer. He is best remembered for his opera Boris Godunov (1874), based on the play by Aleksandr Pushkin. The work is famous for its choral passages and it is sometimes said that the chorus is the protagonist rather than Boris. His other works include Night on Bald Mountain and Pictures at an Exhibition (orchestrated by Maurice Ravel, originally for piano). Mussorgski was a close friend of Nikolai Rimsky-Korsakov who revised much of Mussorgski's music after his death.

Mutiny on the Bounty (1932). A historical novel by Charles Nordhoff and James Norman Hall. This vivid narrative is based on the famous mutiny which members of the crew of the Bounty, a British war vessel, carried out in 1787 against their cruel commander, Captain William Bligh. The authors kept the actual historical characters and background, using as narrator an elderly man, Captain Roger Byam, who had been a midshipman on the Bounty. The story tells how the mate of the ship, Fletcher Christian, and a number of the crew rebel and set Captain Bligh adrift in an open boat with the loyal members of the crew. The book was followed by two others, forming a trilogy: Men Against the Sea (1934), which tells of Bligh and his men in the open boat, and Pitcairn's Island (1934), which describes the mutineers' life on a tiny Pacific island for 20 years.

The original idea of writing a book on the mutiny occurred to Hall as far back as 1916, when he was browsing in a Paris bookstore. Eventually he wrote the English, Nordhoff the Polynesian, chapters, but the work as a whole was in the truest sense a collaboration, each man contributing heavily to the work of the other.

My Antonia (1918). A novel by Willa Cather. It deals with the life of Bohemian immigrant and native American settlers in the frontier farmlands of Nebraska. The heroine, Antonia Shimerda, is forced to work as a servant on the farms of her neighbors after her father kills himself in despair at his failure to become a successful farmer. She elopes with a railway conductor, but returns home, and eventually becomes the patient and strong wife of a Bohemian farmer, Anton Cuzak, the mother of a large family, and a typical woman of the pioneer West. The speaker is the Renaissance duke of Ferrara who, while negotiating a marriage with the daughter of a count, indicates to the count's agent a portrait of his former wife, his "last Duchess." As he speaks of her, there is the intimation that, because she did not properly appreciate the honor bestowed upon her by his marrying her, he arranged for her murder.

My Life (Moya zhin'; 1896). A long story by Anton Chekhov, subtitled The Story of a Provincial. The hero of the tale, Poleznov, rejects his position as a member of the intelligentsia and follows Tol-stoian teachings by supporting himself as a laborer. The story has been cited as Chekhov's criticism of Tolstoi's preachments, but the tale at most seems to be an examination of their doctrinal effects.

My Lost Youth (1855). A poem by Henry Wadsworth Longfellow. Based on the author's boyhood in Portland, Maine, its continual refrain is:

A boy's will is the wind's will,
And the thoughts of youth are long, long thoughts.

Although well known in Europe for his novels, short stories, and poems, and to some degree for his journalism, he became known to readers of English only after the translation of his best-known novel, The Mermaid Madonna.

Myrmidons. In classic mythology, a people of Thessaly. They followed Achilles to the siege of Troy, and were distinguished for their savage brutality, rude behavior, and thirst for rapine. They were originally ants, turned into human beings by Zeus to populate the island of Oenone.

Myrrha. In Byron's historic drama Sardanapalus (1819), an Ionian slave. She was the beloved concubine of Sardanapalus, the Assyrian king. Mysteries of Udolpho, The (1794). A Gothic novel by Mrs. Ann Radcliffe. The heroine, Emily de St. Aubert, has been brought up by a loving father in sunny Provence. On her father's death, she is left in the hands of her foolish aunt Madame Cheron, who imprudently marries Montoni, an adventurer. The scene moves to Montoni's melancholy Gothic castle in the Apennines, from which he pillages the countryside. Emily's existence is enlivened by her aunt's death from Montoni's persecutions, by the attentions of Montoni himself, and by the discovery that there is a mystery surrounding her birth. Eventually, she escapes and returns to Provence, where she solves the mystery and marries her lover, the chevalier de Valencourt, from whom she had been estranged by her aunt's folly.

Mysterious Mother, The (1768). A blank-verse Gothic tragedy by Horace Walpole, which deals with the theme of incest.

Mysterious Stranger, The (written 1898; pub. 1916). A story by Mark Twain. A boy in Eseldorf (Jackass Village), Austria, in the year 1590, is sitting with his two friends when Satan makes their acquaintance. Disguised as a well-dressed and pleasing stranger named Philip Traum, Satan convinces the boy of the falseness of morals, the kindness in killing a cripple, and the nonexistence of heaven. Destroying the boy's ideals, he vanishes. The book expresses Clemens' most pessimistic view of "the damned human race."

mystery plays or mysteries or (Fr.) mystères (13th-16th centuries). Medieval dramas based on the Old and New Testaments and the Apocrypha. In English the term is usually used interchangeably with miracle plays, and thus can also include plays based on the lives of the saints. The mystery plays grew out of dramatically expanded presentations of the events of Christ's life in church liturgy. As these liturgical dramas were lengthened, and enlivened with touches of realism and popular humor besides, they were moved to the porch or courtyard of the church; as the players were drawn more and more from the laity, the presentations moved to the public square or market place, although still given on the occasion of some religious holiday.

Most towns in England had at least a few presenta-

...tions by their own craft guilds or parish clerks, or by visiting players; and about a dozen of the large towns developed large cycles of mystery plays after 1311, when the Corpus Christi day festival was confirmed, and the plays were given annually as commercial pageants under civic control. Each cycle presented a series of episodes beginning with the Fall of Satan and continuing through Biblical history, with particular development of the details of Christ’s life and resurrection. Each play was performed by the members of an appropriate craft or trade guild: for instance, the story of Noah by the shipwrights, the Last Supper by the bakers, etc. They used stage sets on wheels, so that the performance could be easily repeated in as many as a dozen different sections of a town during the day.

The plays are generally metrical, although of various verse forms. Their interpolation of wholly secular comic by-play into the religious material was the beginning of modern drama. There is the characterization of individuals, earthy and realistic humor, and a great deal of fairly coarse buffoonery. Aside from the individual plays unconnected with the cycles, there are four major collections: the 48 York Plays (early 14th century); the 32 Towneley Mysteries (middle 14th-early 15th century), also called Wakefield Mysteries; the 25 Chester Plays (14th century), which are less dramatic and humorous, and resemble more closely the serious French mystères; and the 42 so-called Coventry Plays (15th century), which were probably actually performed by a traveling company. The plays by the unknown Wakefield Master are considered the best.

The French mystères, usually Christmas or Easter pageants, were presented after 1371 by confréries, or fraternities of players. In 1402 the Confrérie de la Passion was given the royal commission for the presentation of the Easter Passion play, and it soon monopolized religious drama. However, it often joined forces with other groups who presented popular farces; comic scenes were thus introduced into the mystères, which continued to be given into the 16th century. Compare morality plays.

Mystery, meaning something beyond human comprehension, is (through French) from the Lat. mysterium and Gr. μυστήριον, from μυείν, to close the eyes or lips. It is from this sense that the plays were called mysteries, though, as they were frequently presented by members of some single guild, or mystery in the sense (from ministerium) of a trade, handicraft, or guild, even here the words were confused and opening made for many puns.

Myth of Sisyphus, The (Le Mythe de Sisyphe; 1942). An essay by Albert Camus. It is the first outline of his theory of the absurd: conscious man confronting an unintelligible universe. Man yearns to know, and absolute knowledge is impossible; thus the lucid man must live in the absence of hope. Yet rejecting both despair and suicide, Camus urges that life and creation are possible within the narrow limits of what man does know. He makes the mythical Sisyphus his hero of the absurd: to him, at least, belong his rock, his awareness of his fate, and his futile struggle towards the heights, which is enough to fill a man’s heart and thus make him happy.

Mythological cycle. In Gaelic literature, a series of Old Irish sagas that survive in medieval manuscripts, but date from much earlier. Here the exploits of the heroes of the Tuatha Dé Danann, the later gods of the Celts, are related. Among the major tales in the mythological cycle are The Wooing of Elain, The Battle of Moytura, and The Nurture of the Houses of the Two Milk-Vessels.

Myxolydian mode. See Greek Music.
Naaman. In the Old Testament, a Syrian commander and warrior in the service of the king of Damascus. When he was stricken with leprosy, he sought and was cured by the Hebrew prophet Elisha, of whose power he had heard through a captive Israelite maid. While still serving his master, an enemy of the Israelites, he brought back to Damascus some earth from Samaria so that he might worship the God of Israel on Israel's soil. See RIMMON.

Nabokov, Vladimir (1899– ). Russian-born novelist and poet. Born of a noble Russian family, Nabokov was educated in England, lived in Europe, and came to America in 1940. His style is unusually fine, lucid, and controlled. Lolita (1958), a droll and satirical novel of Professor Humbert Humbert's passion for a 12-year-old "nymphet," created something of a sensation; the theme of an older man's fascination for a young girl appears in several others of his books, including Laughter in the Dark (1938) and in one of the stories in Nabokov's Dozen (1958; reprinted as Spring in Fialta). Among his other books are The Real Life of Sebastian Knight (1941), Bend Sinister (1947), Pnin (1957), Invitation to a Beheading (1959), and Pale Fire (1962). The Gift (1963) is a translation of a novel he wrote in Russian during the 30's. His Poems appeared in 1959.

Nabuco, Joaquim (1849–1910). Brazilian statesman and writer. The son of a wealthy landowner, Nabuco was a leader in the struggle against slavery, which he combated by political activity and in writings such as O Abolicionismo (1883). After the overthrow of the Brazilian monarchy, Nabuco retired from public life temporarily but later served as ambassador to the U.S. (1905–1910). Cosmopolitan in outlook, he spent many years in France and England and was an enthusiastic supporter of the Pan-American movement. His finest literary work is probably his autobiography, Minha Formação (1900), in which he gives a vivid portrait of slaveholding society in 19th-century Brazil.

Naidu, Sarojini (1879–1949). Indian poet writing in English. She organized flood relief work in India (1908), was the first Indian woman president of the Indian National Congress (1925), and lectured in India and the U.S. (1925–1929). Sometimes called "the nightingale of India," she exemplifies in her light, delicate, sentimental verse the romantic phase of Indian poetry in English; author of The Golden Threshold (1905), The Bird of Time (1912), and The Broken Wing (1915–1916).

Naive and Sentimental Poetry, On (Über naive und sentimentalische Dichtung; 1795–1796). An essay by Friedrich Schiller. In it, he develops at length the distinction between the "naive" poet, who seeks to depict objectively the balanced whole of life, and the "sentimental" poet, who is concerned more with depicting the ideals for which men should strive. Clearly enough, he was thinking of Goethe as the naive poet and himself as the sentimental poet. Parallel to this distinction, he describes two types of character: the realist, who acts in accordance with an objective view of reality, and the idealist, who bases his actions upon a subjective ideal. The importance of this essay in Schiller's dramatic development can be seen in the fact that, whereas all his earlier heroes had been idealists, the heroes of his next two plays, Waltenstein (1798–1799) and Mary Stuart (1800), were realists.

Naked and the Dead, The (1948). A novel by Norman Mailer. It tells the stories of the members of an American infantry platoon invading a Japanese-held island in the Pacific during World War II. It is generally regarded as the finest novel to be written about the war.

Nala. In Hindu legend a king of Nishadha and husband of Damayanti, whose story is one of the best-known in the Mahabharata. Damayanti, through enchantment, falls in love with Nala without ever having seen him. Nala is showered with magic gifts by the gods and the wedding is celebrated. Nala later loses everything by gambling and becomes a wanderer, while Damayanti returns to her father's court. A product of the squalid atmosphere depicted in that novel, she becomes a prostitute and leads a similarly dissipated existence. One of Zola’s themes in this series of novels is the transmission of traits through heredity; another is the significant influence of the environment in shaping human beings.

In 1918 he was chosen chairman of the Norwegian Association for the League of Nations; in 1927 he represented Norway on the League of Nations Disarmament Committee. Nansen received the Nobel Peace Prize (1922) for his attempts to repatriate prisoners and his efforts to alleviate the Russian famine. In 1930 a refugee office in Geneva was opened by the League of Nations in his name. He was the author of Eskjimo Life (1891), In Night and Ice (1897), Through Siberia (1914), and Russia and Peace (1923).

Nantes, Edict of. A decree (1598) issued by Henry IV of France establishing qualified religious toleration for French Protestants. They were granted liberty of conscience and the right to worship publicly in certain localities as well as some political and juridical rights. The edict marked the end of France’s religious wars. Louis XIV’s revocation of the Edict of Nantes in 1685 ended toleration and was followed by a mass migration of Protestants to the Netherlands, England, and America.

Naomi. In the Bible, the mother-in-law of Ruth whose story is told in the Old Testament book of that name.

Naphtha, Leo. In Thomas Mann’s novel THE MAGIC MOUNTAIN, a tubercular Latin teacher in the Davos school near Haus Berghof. He is an Austrian Jew who has been converted and become a Jesuit; and his attitudes, like his background, are a welter of violent contradictions. At various times he seems to represent both socialism and materialism, both socialism and reaction. In his long debates with Settembrini, he upholds mysticism and faith against reason and empiricism, absolutism and authority against enlightenment and liberalism. His self-contradictory nature is epitomized when he meets Settembrini for a duel, and, rather than firing at the latter, kills himself.

Involved in the Revolution, he was imprisoned but managed to avoid the bloodletting of the Robespierre’s Reign of Terror. While serving the Committee of Public Safety, he fought against the Austrian’s invasion of France and was able to defeat the Austrians at Jüterbog. He defeated the Russians at Austerlitz and inflicted a crushing defeat on the Austrians at Ulm. In 1805 he defeated Austria and Russia at Ulm, and in 1806 he defeated Prussia at Jena. In 1807 he defeated Austria and Russia at Austerlitz. He was defeated at Trafalgar, but his fleet at Cape Trafalgar was the first to defeat the British fleet. He was defeated at Leipzig, and in 1814 he was defeated at Waterloo. He abdicated in 1814 and was exiled to Elba. In 1815 he returned to France and was declared Emperor for the second time. allies, organized by Pitt and Metternich and led by Wellington (1814). Forced to abdicate, Napoleon was banished to the island of Elba; 10 months later, he escaped and returned to France in a final effort to regain power. But history's tide was no longer his to command, and after the brief triumphant glory of the Hundred Days, he was crushed at the Battle of Waterloo (June 18, 1815). His last years were spent in exile on the island of St. Helena.

A figure of great interest, not only to historians but to other writers as well, an enormous amount of literature has been written about Napoleon, including such works as Arthur Conan Doyle’s Uncle Bernac, Sardou’s Madame Sans Gêne, and George Bernard Shaw’s Man of Destiny.

Napoleon II. Napoleon François Charles Joseph Bonaparte. Duke of Reichstadt (1811-1832). Son of Napoleon I and Marie Louise. At his birth he was given the title of the king of Rome. Also known as L’Aiglon (Fr., “the Eaglet”), he was named by his father as his successor upon his abdication (1814), but he never ruled. From 1814 until his death, he lived at the court of Vienna, under the control of Metternich. Edmond Rostand made Napoleon II the hero of his drama L’Aiglon (1900).

Napoleon III. [Charles] Louis Napoleon Bonaparte (1808-1873). Emperor of France (1852-1871). The 3rd son of Louis Bonaparte, king of Holland, and Hortense Beauharnais, Louis Napoleon was born in Paris but spent the early years of his career in exile (1815-1830). Returning to France, he favored the Revolution of 1848. Elected to the National Assembly, he became president of the Republic in 1848. Louis Napoleon soon began to pursue his absolutist policies; suppressing the Republicans he became dictator by coup d’état (1851). In 1852, he proclaimed himself Napoleon III. This period in French history is known as the Second Empire. Eugénie Marie de Montijo de Guzmán became the bride of the emperor on January 29, 1853. Napoleon’s plans for a Roman Catholic, French empire in Mexico resulted in the disastrous Maximilian Affair (1863-1867). This was followed by the Franco-Prussian war (1870-1871). During the war Napoleon III was captured at Sedan and held prisoner for the duration. In 1871 he was deposed by the National Assembly. Retiring to England with his wife and family, he spent the remainder of his life there.

Napoleon of Notting Hill, The (1904). A novel by G. K. Chesterton. It is a fantasy of the future, when London is an orderly, conformist, dull city. The people elect a king who restores medieval pagantry and the autonomy of the separate sections of London. Because the provost of the Notting Hill section objects to having a new highway built, he engages the rest of the London borough in ingenious, medieval-style battle. “Napoleon” and the king are both killed.

Nara. The first Japanese historical period (710-794). It is notable for the flowering of Buddhist art and learning and the introduction of Chinese culture. The earliest recorded histories, Kojiki (712) and Nihongi (720), and the anthology of ancient poetry, the Man’yōshū, are products of this age. Nara was the first capital of Japan.

Naraka. The hell of Hindu mythology. It has 28 divisions, in some of which the victims are pecked by ravens and owls; in others they are doomed to swallow boiling hot cakes, or walk over burning sands. Each division has its name: Rurayu (fearful) is for liars and false witnesses; Rodha (obstruction) for those who plunder a town, kill a cow, or strangle a man; Sukara (swine) for drunkards and stealers of gold, and so on. Naraka, in Hindu conception, is not an eternal hell, only a temporary one.

Narasinha. See Vishnu.

Narcisse Parle (Narcissus Speaks). The title of 2 poems by Paul Valéry. First a sonnet (1890), then a longer monologue (1891), the idea was entirely rewritten to become Fragments du Narcisse (1922) and finally appeared as the libretto Cantate du Narcisse (1938). Narcissus, in love with his own reflection in the water, symbolizes the self seeking its own perfect image. The image, however, is shattered into fleecing ripples when Narcissus tries to kiss it.

Narcissus (Narkissos). In Greek mythology, a beautiful youth. He was beloved by the nymph Echo. When he repulsed her, caring for no woman’s love, she caused him to fall in love with his own reflection in a pool. He pinned away for longing for this image and was changed into the flower that bears his name. The psychological term narcissism, a neurotic obsession with one’s own person, is derived from this story.

Narrative of A. Gordon Pym, The (1838). A novelette by Edgar Allan Poe. A New England boy stows away on a whaler, surviving mutiny, savagery, cannibalism, and wild pursuit. At the end of the story, the hero drifts toward the South Pole in a canoe; before him, out of the mist, rises a great white figure. There is some confusion in detail, because Poe, serializing the story, often did not pick up the loose ends. Based on the factual travels of J. N. Reynolds, whose book Poe had reviewed, the tale deals with situations later to intrigue Melville.

Nasby, Petroleum V. [esuvius]. Pen name of David Ross Locke (1833-1888). American journalist and humorist. In 1861, while he was coeditor of the Jeffersonian in Findlay, Ohio, Locke met the town loafer and drunkard attempting to obtain signatures to a petition advocating the exile of all Negroes from town. The few Negro families in Findlay were respectable, industrious citizens, and the irony of the occurrence both amused and angered Locke. A few days later a letter appeared in the Jeffersonian signed Petroleum V. Nasby, an alleged Copperhead. The letter was an ironic, bitter attack on those whose views paralleled the town drunkard’s.

After becoming editor, later owner, of the Toledo Blade in 1865, Locke continued to publish his Nasby letters for 16 years. Funny as he seemed to the readers of his day, Nasby was a serious, satirical creation. This drunken, bigoted, cowardly advocate of white supremacy and states’ rights by espousing the Southern cause made it look ridiculous. Several collections... of Nasby letters appeared, beginning with The Nasby Papers (1864).

Naseby (1645). A battle during the English Civil War in which Parliament's New Model Army under Sir Thomas Fairfax and Oliver Cromwell defeated the Royalist forces. The victory gave control of the English midlands to Parliament and broke the royal power.

Nash, Ogden (1902- ). American writer of light verse. He is known for his sophisticated whimsy and satire, his adept use of the pun and distorted rhyme, and the imitable cleverness of his free verse style. Much of his writing has appeared in the New Yorker, and he has done much to establish that magazine's characteristic tone of statement. Nash's many collections of verse include Free Wheeling (1931), Hard Lines (1931), Happy Days (1935), The Bad Parent's Garden of Verse (1936), I'm a Stranger Here Myself (1938), Versus (1949), The Christmas That Almost Wasn't (1957), Boy Is a Boy (1960), and Everyone But Thee and Me (1962). He also wrote the lyrics for the musical comedies One Touch of Venus (1943), with S. J. Perelman, and Two's Company (1952).

Nashe or Nash, Thomas (1567-1601). English satirist and dramatist. A graduate of Cambridge and one of the University Wits, Nashe was a brilliant and original writer and an outstanding personality of his time. His first published piece is the preface to the Menaphon of Robert Greene (1589), in which he attacked pompous contemporary writers; he continued his assessment of contemporary literature in An Anatomy of Absurdities (1589). The Martin Marprelate Controversy gave him a further opportunity to exercise his lively wit; under the pseudonym of "Pasquil" he replied to the Marprelate pamphlets in A Counterpuff Given to Martin Junior (1589); The Return of the Renowned Cavaliero Pasquil of England (1589); and The First Part of Pasquil's Apology (1590). Pierce Penniless, His Supplication to the Devil (1592) is a satire on contemporary society. Nashe entered a bitter controversy with Richard and Gabriel Harvey, whom he attacked in Strange News of the Intercepting of Certain Letters (1593, also known as Four Letters Confuted); apparently repenting, he apologized to Gabriel Harvey in the preface to Christ's Tears over Jerusalem (1593). Before this pamphlet appeared, however, Harvey had printed a tract denouncing Nashe, and the next edition of Christ's Tears had a new and scathing preface. In 1596 he published a still more violent attack on Harvey in Have with You to Saffron-Walden. The feud was brought to an end by ecclesiastical order in 1599.

Also among Nashe's writings is The Unfortunate Traveller, or the Life of Jack Wilton (1594). A prose romance of adventure, it is a precursor of the English novel, and is notable for its detailed, journalistic style. Some critics consider it to be one of the finest examples of prose fiction of the period.

Only one of Nashe's plays has survived, a satirical masque called Summer's Last Will and Testament (1593). He may have collaborated with Christopher Marlowe on Dido, Queen of Carthage (c. 1593), and prepared the unfinished play for the stage after Marlowe's death. He worked with Ben Jonson on The Isle of Dogs (1597, not extant), a comedy which resulted in Jonson's imprisonment for a time for having attacked the state.

Nasr-ed-Din. In Turkish legend, a famous jester, sometimes called the Turkish Tyl Eulenspiegel and, like Eulenspiegel, the hero of many pranks that have been collected in a jest book and attributed to him. He is said to have died about 1410.

Nasser. The Arabian merchant whose fables were the delight of the Arabs. D'Herbelot tells us that when Muhammad read them the Old Testament stories they cried out with one voice that Nasser's tales were the best; upon which the Prophet gave his malediction on Nasser and all who read him.

Nast, Thomas (1840-1902). German-born American political cartoonist and illustrator. Nast's first political cartoon appeared soon after he joined the staff of Harper's in 1862. With his gift for devastating caricature, he chastised Andrew Johnson and supported Grant in two presidential campaigns. The greatest battle of his career, however, was his attack against the Tweed Ring, which had the finances of New York City completely in its control.

Nast, always conservative and usually Republican, came out strongly against race prejudice, while he attacked the income tax, inflation, and the reduction of the armed forces. He is credited with having been the first to use the donkey as a symbol for the Democratic Party, the elephant for the Republicans, and the tiger—the emblem of Tweed's old Americus Fire Company—for Tammany Hall.

After leaving Harper's in 1866, Nath tried unsuccessfully to establish a weekly of his own. He died of yellow fever while serving as consul at Guayaquil, Ecuador.

Natchez, Les (1826). A romance by François René de Chateaubriand. Written between 1797 and 1800, Les Natchez is based partly on the writer's own experiences in America. René, the hero tortured by his melanchooly, flees to an Indian tribe and marries an Indian girl. The book closes as their romance ends in bloody violence.

Nathan, George Jean (1882–1958). American drama critic and editor. Nathan devoted most of his energies to the interpretation of the theater; he was noted for his wit, cynicism, sophistication, and erudition. Nathan and H. L. Mencken, two scornful commentators, worked together on the Smart Set, and later on The American Mercury. Nathan, who wrote play reviews for The New Yorker and other periodicals, established a magazine of his own, The American Spectator. With Mencken he wrote Europe after 8:15 (1914) and The American Credo (1920). Among his other books are Mr. George Jean Nathan Presents (1917), The Autobiography of an Attitude (1925), The World of George Jean Nathan (1952), and The Theater in the Fifties (1953).

His books include Jonah (1925), a new version of the biblical story; One More Spring (1933), presenting a touchingly happy solution to the economic depression; Portrait of Jennie (1940), concerned with a painter and a little girl from another world; and They Went On Together (1941), dealing with war refugees. Among his latest novels are The Color of Evening (1960), The Wilderness Stone (1961), and A Star in the Wind (1962).

Nathan the Wise (Nathan der Weise; 1779). A drama by Gotthold Ephraim Lessing. It is set in Jerusalem during the Crusades. The title character is a Jewish trader who has come to look upon all religions as forms of one great truth. A Christian knight falls in love with Nathan's adopted daughter Recha, and the development of this situation involves the Sultan Saladin, a Muslim, so that all three faiths are brought into close contact. In the end, it is discovered that the knight and Recha are actually brother and sister, and that both are the children of Saladin's brother. The blood relationship among these three characters symbolizes the essential unity of the three religions.

nation of shopkeepers. This phrase, applied to Englishmen by Napoleon in contempt, comes from Adam Smith's Wealth of Nations; a book well known to the emperor. Smith wrote:

To found a great empire for the sole purpose of raising up a people of customers, may at first sight appear a project fit only for a nation of shopkeepers.

Native Son (1940). A novel by Richard Wright. It is the story of a Negro youth, Bigger Thomas, the product of a Chicago slum, whom society victimizes because of his race. He commits two murders, is defended in court by a Communist lawyer, and is condemned to death. Wright's first novel, it stresses the sensational but it is also highly forceful, moving, and skillful. It is based partly on Wright's own experiences and partly on the case of Robert Nixon, a Chicago Negro, who was electrocuted in 1938 for murder.

Natsune Sōseki (1867–1916). Japanese novelist. A leading literary figure of the Meiji period, his humorous novel Waga hai wa neko de aru (I Am a Cat, 1905) has seen several English translations.

naturalism. A movement in fiction begun in France in the latter half of the 19th century. Revolting against the subjectivism and imaginative escapism which seemed to characterize the Romantic school, the naturalist writers were influenced by the biological theories of Darwin and the social determinism of Taine. The new movement sought to depict human society and the lives of the men and women who compose it as objectively and truthfully as the subject matter of science is studied and presented. Stendhal, Balzac, and Flaubert were forerunners of the movement; the Goncourt brothers, Maupassant, Daudet, and above all Zola formulated the principles and engaged in the practices of naturalism. In technique their work was marked by an objective, detached method of narration, meticulous accuracy of detail, and scholarly care in the documentation of historical background. Its subjects were drawn from the lower strata of society and no detail of their sordid, unhappy lives was spared. Emphasis was placed on the social environment of the characters and on the totally subordinate relation of the individual human being to it. In the naturalistic novel, there is a pervading sense of the control exerted over the actions and destinies of the characters by impersonal social, economic, and biological forces. Human free will is shown as weak and almost completely ineffectual. Despite similarity of method, however, there was a difference in the aims of the naturalist writers. The Goncourt brothers engaged in a cold analysis of social misery, while Flaubert justified his minutely descriptive method on aesthetic grounds. Zola employed both his technique and his subject matter in the service of his passionate zeal for social reform.

In England, the novels of George Gissing, Thomas HARDY, and Samuel BUTLER show affinities with naturalist writings; Somerset Maugham's Liza of Lambeth is in the tradition of Zola.

Naturalism in America, which appeared just before the turn of the 20th century, was to some extent an outgrowth of realism and was largely influenced by the spread of the theories of evolution, historical determinism, and mechanistic philosophy. The earliest naturalistic novel was Stephen Crane's Maggie: A Girl of the Streets, but Crane did not continue to work in this vein. Frank NORRIS and Jack LONDON, whose early naturalistic novels were the first to follow Crane's, became perhaps more famous as exponents of naturalism than as artists in their own right. Theodore DREISER is also considered a naturalist, as is the later writer James T. FARRELL. The proletarian literature of the 30's was in some ways an outgrowth of naturalism, though the similarities between the two are largely due to their common emphasis on the lower class.

Naturalism in German literature was a short-lived but important movement of about 1882-1891. The most important documents from its early phase are the Kritische Waffengänge (Critical Passages-at-Arms, 1882-1884) by the brothers HART, a critical periodical; Moderne Dichtercharaktere (Modern Figures in Poetry, 1884), an anthology of verse edited by Hermann CONRAD; and Revolution der Literatur (Revolution of Literature, 1885), a collection of essays by Karl BLEIBTREU. In all these works, however, what the authors wanted was not realism and objectivity in style as much as simple naturalness, in opposition to what they saw as the classicistic posturing of such authors as HEYSE and GEIBEL. They wanted genuine, heartfelt sentiment and expression in literature—which they found in LILLIECRON'S poetry, for example—and preferred genuine romanticism to affected realism. In addition, they felt that German authors should concentrate on timely German subject matter; it was for this reason that they liked such writers as ANZENGEBRUCH and WILDENBRUCH, while entirely rejecting the exotic "professorial novels" of Dahn and EBERS.

It was not until the later phase of the movement, with the early plays of Gerhart HAUPTMANN and the works on which Holz and SCHLAF collaborated, that German naturalism tended toward an emphasis on exact and detailed realism. The basic elements of the dramatic technique of late naturalism may be summarized as follows: (1) emphasis on simple family situations rather than on heroism or historic events; (2) the complete avoidance of didacticism or artificiality in dialogue, and the use of dialect where appropriate; (3) the avoidance of monologues and asides; and (4) the avoidance, as much as possible, of obvious plot contrivance. Holz, in his Die Kunst, ihr Wesen und ihre Gesetze (Art, Its Essence and Its Laws, 1891), gives a theoretical justification for such realistic techniques.

Naturalism in Germany was quickly superseded, and even in the works of such men as SÜDDERMANN, HALBE and KRÄTZER there are strong nonnaturalistic tendencies. But the naturalistic emphasis on genuineness of expression and respect for the unique individual experience as such strongly influenced impressionism and expressionism.

natural school. A Russian literary movement, particularly strong in the 1840's, which originated with the critic Vissarion BELINSKI. The school held that literature's task was to give a truthful representation of reality with the aim of criticizing society by depicting its true nature.

Nature (1836). An essay by Ralph Waldo Emerson. It is the best expression of the Transcendentalist philosophy. Emerson sees Nature as Commodity in its practical functions, as Beauty in the delight it arouses, and as Discipline in the education it gives the Reason and Understanding. The essay treats man's relationship with nature, and its values. Behind every natural fact, the Transcendentalist finds a spiritual truth.

Natyashastra. A Sanskrit treatise on dramatics, elaborating the theory of rasa, by BHARATA (first century).

Nausicaa (La Nausée, 1938). A novel by Jean Paul SARTRE. It is also known in English translation under the title The Diary of Antoine Roquentin. The historian Roquentin records the process of his "nausea," a violent feeling of disgust inspired by the overwhelming fact that things and people cannot help existing, and yet there is "absolutely no reason for existing." Rejecting concepts of a cosmic purpose or of human progress as illusions, he is horrified by the absurdity of human life and the ugliness of its pretenses. Anny, his former mistress who returns to him, confesses similarly that she no longer experiences "perfect moments," which she used to feel when the opportunity offered by a "privileged situation" had been harmoniously completed. When she leaves him again, Roquentin discovers that, because there is no more reason to live, he is free despite the deathlike loneliness of this freedom. He concludes that the only possible escape from the oppressiveness of the accident of existence is through the act of creation, and contemplates writing a book so beautiful that he can accept himself.

Nausicaa (Nausikaa). In Homer's Odyssey, daughter of Alcinous, king of the Phaeacians. She conduct Odysseus to the court of her father when he is shipwrecked on the coast. Homer's portrait of this young lady is refreshingly human and believable.

Navagiero, Andrea (1483-1529). Venetian Humanist. Navagiero edited classical texts for the Aldine press, was the official historian of Venice, and served as librarian of St. Mark's. While in Spain on an embassy to Charles V, he persuaded the poet Boscan to write Petrarcan verse in Spanish, thus inaugurating Petrarcanism in Spain. His Latin poems, entitled Luxus (Light Pieces) were imitated by Thomas Lodge.

Navas de Tolosa, Las. A plain in southern Spain, the site of a battle (1212) between the forces of the Muslim states of the Iberian peninsula and those of the kingdoms of Castile, Leon, Aragon, Portugal, and Navarre. Despite their superior numbers, the Muslims were completely defeated in what was the greatest Christian victory of the Reconquest.

Naxos. The largest island of the Cyclades group in the Aegean Sea. It is celebrated for its beauty and appears in legend as Dionysus' favorite island. It was here that Theseus deserted Ariadne, whom Dionysus found, consoled, and married. The island figures prominently in the account of Acetes, the Tyrrhenian mariner, who alone among his fellows did not conspire to abduct Dionysus to Egypt and subsequently became a Bacchanal on Naxos.

Nazaruth. The village in lower Galilee, Palestine (now north Israel) where Jesus lived as a boy and young man, and learned the trade of carpentry.

Nazarite. A word from the Hebrew nazar, “to separate.” It refers to one separated or dedicated by a vow to the Lord; Nazarites in the Old Testament refrained from intoxicating drink and allowed their hair to grow (Num. 6:1-21).

Nazi (shortening of the word nazional). A member of the National Socialist German Workers' Party. Hitler, who helped found the party in 1920, outlawed all others in 1933. Nazism, which was anti-communist, anti-Semitic, anticapitalist, and anti-intellectual, had a strong emotional appeal for the discontented German people. See FASCISM; Karl HAUSHOFER.

Nebo, Mount. See PISGAH.

Nebuchadnezzar. The greatest king of Assyria. His reign lasted forty-three years (604-561 B.C.). He restored his country to its former prosperity and importance, practically rebuilt Babylon, restored the temple of Bel (Baal), erected a new palace, embanked the Euphrates and probably built the celebrated Hanging Gardens. In the Old Testament narrative he besieges Jerusalem, is victorious and carries the Jews away captive into Babylon. His name became the center of many legends, and the story related in Daniel (4:29-33) that he was one day walking in the palace of the kingdom of Babylon and said, "Is not this great Babylon that I have built... by the might of my power, and for the honor of my majesty?" and "the same hour... he was driven from men, and did eat grass as oxen, and his body was wet with the dew of heaven, till his hairs were grown like eagles' feathers, and his nails like birds' claws," is probably an allusion to the suspension of his interest in public affairs, which lasted, as his inscription records, for four years. Nebuchadnezzar was the king who, according to the account in Daniel, put the three Hebrews, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego into the fiery furnace for refusing to bow down to a golden image.

Necessary Angel, The (1951). A collection of essays on poetry by Wallace STEVENS. The major theme of the essays is the relation of the imagination—"the necessary angel"—to reality, and the way it invests reality with meaning.

Necessity of Atheism, The. See Percy Byshe SHELLEY.

Nechayev, Sergei Genadyevich (1847-1882). Russian revolutionary. Noted for his unscrupulous and audacious escapades, Nechayev provided the basis for the characterization of Pyotr Verkhovenski in Dostoevski's novel The Possessed. It was Nechayev's manner of operation, however, rather than his actual achievements, that made him a legend in Russian revolutionary history. He accomplished nothing to stand in the way of his revolutionary schemes. Friend and enemy alike were used as instruments to further his plans. The organizations and large numbers of followers that Nechayev claimed to head were largely products of his imagination. For a short time he managed to win the favor of the eminent revolutionary Mikhail Bakunin, but his unprincipled behavior eventually alienated the anarchist leader.

Nechayev's most famous exploit was the murder in 1869 of a student named Ivanov, a member of a small revolutionary group headed by Nechayev. For his part in planning the crime, which was arranged to elicit strict obedience from the other members of the group, Nechayev was arrested in 1872 and imprisoned in the fortress of Peter and Paul in St. Petersburg. He died there at the age of 35. A crime similar to the Ivanov murder was planned and carried out by Verkhovenski in The Possessed.

Necker, Jacques (1752-1804). Swiss-born French banker and statesman. He succeeded Turgot as minister of finance in 1776. His Account Rendered, which dispelled any illusions about the economic equilibrium of the monarchy, brought about his dismissal in 1781. He resumed office in 1788-1789, and again in 1789-1780. He was the husband of Suzanne NECKER and father of Mme de STAEL.

Necker, Suzanne. Born Curchod (1739-1794). Wife of the French financier and statesman Jacques NECKER, mother of Madame de STAEL. She was famous earlier and at the time of the French Revolution as hostess to political and literary leaders. She wrote on literary and moral subjects, including Réflexions sur le divorce (1749).

Nectar. The drink of the gods of classical mythology. Like their food, AMBROSIA, it conferred immortality.

Nehemiah. In the Old Testament, a Hebrew whom Artaxerxes, the Persian king, sent to help rebuild Jerusalem (c. 420 B.C.) after the Babylonian captivity. Also, a book of the Old Testament called by his name.

Nehru, Jawaharlal (1889-1964). English-educated Hindu political leader. He joined Gandhi's movement and later became second only to Gandhi in influence throughout India. He was four times president of the Indian National Congress. In 1947 he became the first prime minister of India. He wrote The Unity of India (1941).

Neirdht, John G[neisenau] (1818- ). American short-story writer and poet. Neirdht is best known for The Lonesome Trail (1907), a collection of short stories of pioneering heroes and Indians, and for his epic cycle of the West, the five book-length narrative poems, The Song of Hugh Glass (1915), The Song of Three Friends (1919), The Song of the Indian Wars (1925), The Song of the Messiah (1935), and The Song of Jed Smith (1941). The poet laureate of Nebraska, Neirdht also published several novels; a volume of lyric poetry, A Bundle of Myrrh (1907); and a play, Two Mothers (1921).

Neklyudov, Prince. See Resurrection.

Nekrasov, Nikolai Alekseyevich (1821-1878). Russian poet and editor. He was a prominent figure in the radical wing of literature during the middle years of the 19th century. Nekrasov's first collection of poems appeared in 1840, but they received no special attention. His first literary success was as an editor. In 1846 he edited and published the popular Peterburgski sbornik (Petersburg Anthology), which contained Dostoevski's first novel, Poor Folk. From 1847 to 1866, Nekrasov edited Sovremennik (The Contemporary), in which appeared the early works of Tolstoi, Goncharov, and Turgenev. Sovremennik was suppressed for political reasons, and, in 1868,
Nekrasov, Viktor Platonovich

Nekrasov became editor of Otechestvennye Zapiski (Fatherland Notes), which he made as popular and influential as Sovremennik had been.

Nekrasov's poetry typifies the concern with social, rather than literary, values which was characteristic of the literature of his period, especially among liberal and radical writers. His verse tends more to popular than to literary usages of language and often contains elements based on or taken from folklore. His best-known poems are Korobeiniki (The Pedlars, 1861), Moroz-Kramyi Nos (Frost the Red-nosed, 1863), and Komu na Russ' zhit' khoroisho (Who Lives Well in Russia, 1865-1877).

Nekrasov, Viktor Platonovich (191– ). Russian novelist and short-story writer. Nekrasov fought at Stalingrad during World War II; in 1946 published In the Trenches of Stalingrad (V okopakh Stalingrada), a novel based on his experiences there. His later work includes a novel entitled Home Town (V rodnom gorode; 1954), set in Kiev after World War II. He has also written a series of travel sketches, On Both Sides of the Ocean (Po obye storony okeana; 1962), whose favorable comments on life in the U.S. have drawn Khruschev's personal condemnation.

Nelson, Horatio. Viscount Nelson (1758-1805). English naval hero who, although he was victorious at the battle of Trafalgar (1805), was fatally wounded. His liaison with Emma, Lady Hamilton, was the subject of numerous books and plays, notably Lady Hamilton by Alexandre Dumas and Divine Lady by Mrs. L. Adams Beck. See Nile, BATTLE OF THE.

Nemean. Pertaining to Nemea, the ancient name of a valley in Argolis, Greece, about ten miles southwest of Corinth.

The Nemean games were among the four great national festivals of Greece, celebrated at Nemea every alternate year, the second and fourth of each Olympiad. Legend states that they were instituted in memory of Opheltes (Archemorus), an infant who died from the bite of a serpent as the expedition of the Seven Against Thebes was passing through the valley. The victor's reward was at first a crown of olive leaves, but subsequently a garland of ivy. Pindar has 11 odes in honor of victors.

In another myth, the Nemean lion kept the people of the valley in constant alarm. The first of the twelve labors of Heracles was to slay it. He could make no impression on the beast with his club, so he caught it in his arms and squeezed it to death. Heracles ever after wore the skin as a mantle.

Nemesis. The classical Greek personification of righteous anger. She exacts retribution from all who violate the natural order of things, either by breaking a moral law or through an excess or riches or happiness. Hesiod calls her the daughter of Night. Other legends say she is the daughter of Oceanus or of Dike (Justice). Her principal sanctuary was at Rhamnus in Attica where there was a statue of her, said to be carved by Phidias from marble the Persians had brought to Marathon as the material for their trophy, presumptuously counting on victory in advance.

Nemirovich-Danchenko, Vladimir Ivanovich (1839-1943). Russian director, dramatist and, with Konstantin Stanislavski, co-founder of the Moscow Art Theatre. His works include My Life in the Russian Theatre (1937) and the play, Kremlin Chimes (1942).

Nemo, Captain. The hero of Twenty Thousand Leagues Under the Sea by Jules Verne.

Nemours, Duc de. Gaston de Foix (1489-1512). French soldier, known as "the Thunderbolt of Italy." The nephew of Louis XII, he organized a brilliant campaign against the Spaniards in Italy and died after a great French victory at Ravenna.

Nennius (c. 800). An early medieval Welsh historian. He is important in connection with the origins of Arthurian literature. He specifically mentions an Arthur, crediting him with a part in 12 victories over invading Anglo-Saxons, and with killing 960 by himself. See ARTHURIAN LEGEND.

neoclassicism. The revival or adaptation of classical taste and style. In English literature, it is especially used to describe the spirit underlying much of the work of the late 17th and 18th centuries. Racine, Voltaire, Addison, Swift, and Pope are typically neoclassical in their approach to art. Their connection with the classical past is exemplified by their emphasis on traditionally classic values, such as sense of form, balance, discipline, dominance of reason, restraint, unity of design and aim, clarity, and proportion.

neomodernism, French artistic movement. Founded, about 1886, upon the recently formulated optic and color theories of such scientists as Edouard Root and Marie Eugène Chevreul, neomodernism sought to create a scientific method for the empirical division of tone used by the impressionists (see IMPRESSIONISM). The neomodernists carried the technique of division to its inherent extreme in their use of pointillism, which consisted of juxtaposing tiny dots of pure color upon a white canvas, thus allowing the eye alone to unite the strokes and create the impression of tone. Pointillism is best embodied in the work of Georges Seurat. Paul Signac (1863-1935) was the leading spokesman of the movement.

Neoplatonism. Nineteenth-century term to describe the philosophy of Plotinus, developed during the 2d century. The last great Greek philosophic synthesis, it was influenced by Plato in its division between sensible and intelligible, and by Aristotle in its equation of Being with intelligence. The basic impulse of Neoplatonism is man's return to God through reason. It asserts three levels of reality: that of non-Being, Nature, vegetative existence, sensible things; that of Being, Intellec (Nous), Plato's Ideas; and, finally, the level of Beyond Being, the One, the Good. It is with this last and for Neoplatonists most real level that union is to be achieved. The fundamental concept is unity. The philosophy is based on the assumption that there is Truth. One must awake from the sleep of this world into superconsciousness. This highest level of awareness is incommunicable by the intellect; it is an upward journey of the soul. These ideas were found highly congenial by the developing Christian philosophy. The relationship to St. Augustine has been indicated. There is evidence of the influence of Neoplatonism in the early German Idealism of Hegel and Bergson.

Neopolemus or Pyrrhus. A son of Achilles. He was called Pyrrhus from his yellow hair, and Neopolemus because he was a new soldier, or one who came late to the siege of Troy. According to Vergil, it was this youth who slew the aged Priam. He married Hermione, daughter of Helen and Menelaus. On his return home he was murdered by Orestes at Delphi. He is an important and sympathetic figure in Sophocles' Philoctetes. See ANDROMACHE.

Neo-realism. See the NEW WAVE.

NEP. See NEW ECONOMIC POLICY.

Nepenthe or Nepenthes (Gr. nεπενθας, grief). An Egyptian drug mentioned in the Odyssey (iv. 228). It was fabled to drive away care and make persons forget their woes. Polydamna, wife of Thonis, king of Egypt, gave it to Helen, daughter of Zeus and Leda. Poe mentions it in The Raven: "Quaff, oh quaff this kind Nepenthe and forget they lost Lenore."

Nephele. See Ἱξών; the GOLDEN FLEECE.

Nephelococcygia. See CLOUD-CUCKOO-LAND.

Nymphs. An Egyptian goddess, sister and wife of Set. Both she and Set are associated with the ritual of the dead.

Nepomuk, St. John of (1340?–1393). The patron saint of Bohemia. As confessor to the queen of King Wenceslaus IV he refused to reveal to the king what the queen had confessed, and the king caused him to be drowned in the river Moldau at Prague. Canonized in 1729.

Neptune (Neptunus). The Roman god of the sea. Originally a water god of little importance, he became an important deity through identification with the Greek Poseidon, especially after Rome was a significant maritime power. The god was represented as an elderly man of stately bearing, bearded, carrying a trident, and sometimes riding a dolphin or a horse.

Nereids. The sea nymphs of Greek mythology. They were the fifty daughters of Nereus and gray-eyed Doris. The best known are AMPHITRITE, THETIS, and GALATEA.

Nereus. In classic mythology, father of the water nymphs. Nereus was a very old prophetic god of great kindliness. His scalp, chin, and breast were covered with seaweed instead of hair.

Nergal. The Sumerian king of the underworld, son of Enlil and Ninlil.

Nérieaut, Philippe. See Philippe DESTOUCHES.

Nerissa. In Shakespeare's Merchant of Venice, the clever waiting-woman and confidante of Portia. Possessing a fair share of her mistress' elegance and wit, Nerissa marries Gratiano and accompanies Portia to Venice disguised as a law clerk.

When he was adopted by Claudius, he took the name Caius Claudius Nero. At first acclaimed by all as a liberal and sober leader, the young emperor lost little time in correcting this impression. To please his mistress Poppaea, he had his wife Octavia murdered, and, when Poppaea was pregnant, he killed mother and child by kicking her to death. He amused himself with playing the harp and taking part in athletics in the Circus, and he was always able to coerce a large attendance at both performances. In the summer of 64 A.D., a great fire destroyed a sizable portion of the city. The story that the mad emperor lit the fire "to see how Troy looked when it was in flames" and that he occupied himself musically "while Rome burned" is now generally held to be a legend. He did, however, blame the Christians for the fire and persecuted them cruelly for several years.

After the fire, Nero rebuilt Rome, and erected for himself the DOMUS AUREA. In the meantime conspiracies had been forming. In one of them, Pisō's CONSPIRACY, the poet Lucan and the philosopher SENECA were involved, and both men were ordered to commit suicide. This they did, and their stoic deaths further incensed the populace against the emperor. In 68, after Nero returned from a concert tour of Greece, the armies installed Galba as emperor, declared Nero an enemy of the state, and would have executed him had he not first taken his own life. He is a prominent character in Sienkiewicz' Quo Vadis (1896). Stephen Phillips wrote a poetic drama entitled Nero (1906). See ACRIPPINA; BRITANNICS.

Nerthus or Hertha. A German or Scandinavian goddess of fertility, or Mother Earth. The name is found in Tacitus. The goddess was worshiped on an island. She roughly corresponds to the classical Cybele, and is probably confused with the Scandinavian god Njörðr or Niðor, the protector of sailors and fishermen. Nerthus and Niðor alike mean benefactor.

Neruda, Pablo. Pen name of Neftali Ricardo Reyes (1904– ). Chilean poet. After the appearance of Veinte poesias de amor y una cancion desesperada (1924) had established Neruda as one of Chile's most promising poets, the Chilean government appointed him to various consular posts in Europe and Asia. In 1934 he was assigned to Madrid, where he mingled with Spanish writers such as Manuel Altolaguirre, with whom he founded (1935) a literary review called Caballo Verde para la Poesia. In the same year Neruda published a translation of William Blake's The Visions of the Daughters of Albion and The Mental Traveller. His outspoken sympathy for the Loyalist cause during the Spanish Civil War led to his recall in 1937, but he soon returned to Europe to aid in the settlement of republican refugees in America. From 1939 to 1943 he was Chilean consul in Mexico. Upon returning to Chile, Neruda became active in politics, was elected to the senate, and joined the Communist Party. When the party was declared illegal in Chile, Neruda was expelled from the senate. After spending several years in exile, he returned to Chile in 1953.

Neruda's earliest poetry—La cancion de la fiesta (1921), Crepusculario (1923), and Veinte poesias—is reminiscent of MODERNISM in form and tone. The poetry of the next stage in Neruda's career, espe-Nervo, Amado

Residencia en la tierra, I and II (1933; 1935), shows the poet trying to depict in each single stroke the full measure of his intuition and experience; written in a style that is usually described as surrealistic, these poems create an anguish-ridden world of chaos, desolation, and decay.

His political and social sensibilities stirred by the defeat of the Spanish Loyalists, Neruda began to see himself in relation to mankind. In such works as Tercera residencia (1947), Canto general (1950), Odas elementales (1954), and Estravagario (1958), Neruda—now a militant communist—became the people's poet and sought, above all, to communicate. Though there is considerable debate over the merits of Neruda's later work—a debate, moreover, that is often clouded by the intrusion of politics—he is widely regarded as the greatest Spanish-American poet since Darío.

Nervo, Amado (1879-1919). Mexican poet. As a young man, Nervo studied for the priesthood, an experience reflected in the mysticism that characterizes much of his work. When he was forced to leave the seminary for financial reasons, he turned to journalism and was the cofounder of the Revista Moderna, an influential modernist review. From 1905 to 1918 he held a diplomatic post in Madrid and at his death was Mexican minister to Argentina and Uruguay.

Nervo's early works, such as Perlas negras (1898), Poemas (1901), and Jardines interiores (1905), place him in the mainstream of Modernism. Subsequently, however, his poetry became more subjective and revealing, and such works as Serenidad (1914) and Elevación (1917) express the asceticism and tranquility of the poet's later years.

Nessus (Nessos). In Greek mythology, the centaur responsible for the death of Heracles. Heracles had ordered him to carry his wife Deianira across a river; when the centaur attempted to carry her off, Heracles shot him. In revenge, Nessus gave Deianira his bloody tunic, telling her that it would preserve her husband's life. Later, when Heracles was unfaithful to her, she gave it to him as a present. The centaur's blood, together with the hydra's poison with which Heracles' arrow had been smeared, clung to his body, setting his flesh afire. The pain was so great that he immolated himself. Deianira2 handed herself from remorse.

Nest of Gentefolk, A (Dvoryanskie gnezdo; 1859). A novel by Ivan Turgenev. It tells the story of the tragic love affair between the hero Fedor Ivanovich Lavretzki and Liza Kalitina. Lavretzki is about to marry Liza when his first wife, whom he has believed dead, returns to him. Liza goes into a convent and Lavretzki is left to his bleak duty. The novel, which poetically evokes the peaceful atmosphere of the provincial Russian feudal estate, had a great success on its publication.

Nestor. The oldest and wisest of the Greek generals who fought at Troy. The son of Neleus and king of Pylos, in the western Peloponnesus, he was accustomed to offering sage advice at considerable length on every occasion. Robert Graves has ironically pointed out that Nestor's counsel, though highly respected, generally turned out to have disastrous consequences. Heinrich Schliemann, the famous amateur archeologist, thought that he had discovered Nestor's cup, described in detail in the Iliad. Recent excavations on the site of Pylos prove that it was indeed a highly important center in Macedonian times. Nestor appears in Shakespeare's Troilus and Cressida.

Nestorians. Followers of Nestorius (d. c. A.D. 451), patriarch of Constantinople. He maintained that Christ had two distinct natures, and that Mary was the mother of His human nature, which was the mere shell or husk of the divine. The sect spread in India and the Far East, and remains of the Nestorian Christians, such as their inscriptions, are still found in China, but the greater part of their churches were destroyed by Tamburlaine about 1400. Rumors of influential Christian centers in the East may have given rise to the legend of Prester John.

Nestroy, Johann (1801-1862). Austrian playwright and actor. He is best known for his humorous satires, such as Der böse Geist des Lumpenwägibus oder Das liederliche Kleeblatt (The Evil Spirit of Lumpenwägibus or The Disolute Cloverleaf, 1835). He also wrote parodies of such authors as Hebbel and Richard Wagner.

Nets to Catch the Wind (1921). A book of poems by Elinor Wylie. The first collection of her poetry to bear her name, it contained some of her most characteristic verse. Many of the poems are in the metaphysical vein, the title being taken from the 17th-century poem The Devil's Law Case by John Webster. Velvet Shoes and The Eagle and the Mole, two of the author's best-known poems, were first printed in this volume.

Neveu de Rameau, Le (Rameau's Nephew; 1891). A satirical character sketch by Denis Diderot, written (1762) in the form of a dialogue between Diderot and Rameau, the nephew of the French composer Jean Philippe Rameau. Written in the most vivacious style, Diderot gives a character sketch of the nephew of the celebrated musician; he is a lazy, original, hare-brained, sensual, utterly frank social parasite, whose gifts for pantomime, conversation, monologue, and music serve Diderot well in his biting satire on contemporary society and the artists who either pleased or displeased him.

Neveux, Georges (190- ). Russian-born French dramatist and screenwriter. Much influenced by his surrealist friends, he produced highly poetic and symbolic plays which take place in a world of dream and fantasy. Chief among these works are Juliette ou la Clef des songes (1930) and Le Voyage de Thèse (1943).

Nevins, Allan (1890- ). American historian and journalist. A graduate of the University of Illinois, Nevins was an editor and writer for the New York Evening Post (1913-1923) and for the Nation (1913-1918). In 1931 he was appointed professor of history at Columbia University, where he remained until 1958, when he became a senior research associate at the Huntington Library in San Marino, Calif.

Nevins won Pulitzer prizes for two of his earlier works: Grover Cleveland (1932) and Hamilton Fish: The Inner History of the Grant Administration (2 vols., 1936). He studied the U.S. from 1847 to 1861 in The Ordeal of the Union (2 vols., 1947) and The Emergence of Lincoln (2 vols., 1990), continuing the story in The War for the Union (2 vols., 1959), part of a projected four-volume work on the Civil War. With Frank E. Hill, he wrote Ford (1954-1963), a three-volume study of the great automotive pioneer and the company he founded; another work dealing with a prominent American businessman is Study in Power: John D. Rockefeller (2 vols., 1953). Other works by Nevins include The Gateway to History (1938) and Herbert H. Lehman and His Era (1963).

New Apocalypse. A romantic, surrealistic movement in English poetry. Led by G. F. Hendry, G. S. Fraser, and Henry Treece in 1939, it was formed in reaction to the social poetry of W. H. Auden and others which was dominant in the 1930's. The movement was short lived. Only George Barker and Dylan Thomas wrote the kind of poetry its leaders advocated.

New Atlantis, The (1627). A Utopian fable by Francis Bacon, published in an unfinished state after his death. It is an account of a voyage to the island of "Bensalem," and of the government and manners of its people. Of particular interest is the Bensalem institution for scientific study, "Solomon's House," which provided inspiration for the founding of the Royal Society.

Newbery, John (1713-1767). English publisher of newspapers and children's books. Newbery published the daily newspaper, The Public Ledger (1760-1761) which featured Oliver Goldsmith's "Chinese Letters" or Citizen of the World and contributions by Samuel Johnson. He also brought out the famous 20-volume collection of voyage narratives called The World Displayed; or, a Curious Collection of Voyages and Travels (1759-1761; 1774-1778; 1790). The "Newbery Medal," established by Frederic Melcher, is awarded annually (since 1921) for the best children's book written by an American.

Newbolt, Sir Henry (1862-1938). English poet. He wrote hearty, patriotic poems, such as Drake's Drum and The Fighting Temeraire. He also wrote on naval history, and was appointed official Naval Historian in 1923.

Newcomes, The (1855). A novel by William Makepeace Thackeray. The plot is loose and complex, dealing with three generations of Newcomes. The lovable Colonel Thomas Newcome is a man of simple, unworlidy tastes and the utmost honor. The colonel's son, Clive, an artist, is in love with his cousin Ethel Newcome, who, however, is urged by her brother to consider a more ambitious marriage. Clive, despairing of winning Ethel, marries Rosey Mackenzie, with whom he finds he is mismeasured. But Rosey dies in the course of time and Clive finally marries Ethel.

New Criticism. A movement in 20th-century American literary criticism. Although the term was first used by Joel Spengarn in an address at Columbia University in 1910, it was not generally known until John Crowe Ransom used it as the title of a book on critical methods in 1941. The New Critics are united in their emphasis on dealing with the text directly; they insist that the work of art be considered as an autonomous whole, rather than as an excuse for biographical, cultural, or social speculations. Beyond this point, the New Critics differ widely: Kenneth Burke has emphasized literature as symbolic action; Yvor Winters has been concerned with the moral aspects of form and style; R. P. Blackmur has investigated the larger meanings of language; Cleanth Brooks has dealt with the ambiguity of poetic statement.

The New Criticism derived in part from the writings of Ezra Pound and T. S. Eliot. It tended to accept Eliot's definition of the English tradition in poetry, with its emphasis on the 17th century. With John Crowe Ransom at the center, the movement was also closely associated with the writers at Vanderbilt University who published the magazine The Fugitive (1922-1925).

Later, Yale University attracted several of the New Critics to its faculty. Although the movement has been rejected as too limited in many quarters, it has left its mark on contemporary criticism; careful scrutiny of the text has become an accepted approach, even for those embracing other critical methods.

New Deal. A name applied to the program of recovery and reform initiated by President Franklin D. Roosevelt in 1933. He first used the phrase in a speech to the Democratic convention on July 2, 1932, when he said, "I pledge you, I pledge myself, to a new deal for the American people."

The New Deal is generally divided into two phases. The first, lasting from 1933 to 1935, aimed at alleviating the economic hardships caused by the depression of 1929. During the Congressional session known as the "Hundred Days" (March 9 to June 16, 1933), legislation was enacted to regulate banks and currency (Emergency Banking Relief Act), to curtail unemployment (Civil Conservation Corps Reforestation Relief Act), and to raise farm prices (Agricultural Adjustment Act); the Tennessee Valley Authority was created to improve social and economic conditions in a seven-state area; and the National Industrial Recovery Act, which was declared unconstitutional in 1935, was passed to stimulate industry and lessen unemployment.

Roosevelt's message to Congress on Jan 4, 1935, in which he asked for social reform legislation, is regarded as the opening of the second phase of the New Deal (1935-1939). This period saw the creation of a Works Progress Administration (1935) to relieve unemployment and the enactment of the National Labor Relations Act (1935), which guaranteed unions the right to bargain collectively. Other legislation included a Social Security Act (1935), to provide unemployment compensation and old-age and survivors insurance, and the Fair Labor Standards Act (1938), establishing a minimum wage and a maximum work week.

Newdigate, Sir Roger (1719-1806). English antiquarian and founder of the Newdigate Prize at Oxford for English poetry.

New Economic Policy or NEP. A period of temporary return to capitalist trade and activity in the Soviet Union during the early 1920's. The policy was designed to help restore the country's war-damaged economy. The period was one of disillusionment on the part of many Communists and of rife opportunism and chicanery in economic life. The atmosphere of the time is well rendered in Leonid Levon's novel The Thief, and in the comic novels of Il'f and Petrov.

Newell, Robert Henry. See ORPHEUS C. KERR PAPERS.

New England Nun, A, and Other Stories (1891). A collection of 20 stories by Mary E. Wilkins Freeman. Realistic and ironic, the stories represent Mrs. Freeman's best writing. New England Primer, The. A textbook used in early New England to teach children the alphabet and the rudiments of reading. The earliest extant edition is dated 1727, and millions of copies were sold as late as the 19th century. The author of the primer is unknown, but the pocket-sized book was similar to contemporary English volumes. Included in the 1749 edition were an alphabet with verses and illustrations, rules for behavior, several hymns, the prayer Now I Lay Me Down to Sleep, and pious stories of several martyrs. See illustration on page 2.

Newgate. A famous English prison. Newgate Gaol was originally merely a few cells over the gate; the first great prison was built in 1422, and the last in 1770-1783. For centuries it was the prison for London and for the County of Middlesex. It was demolished in 1907, and the Central Criminal Court (opened 1905) erected on its site.

New Grub Street (1891). A novel by George Gissing. It deals in grimly realistic fashion with the struggles and compromises of the modern literary world. The hero is Edwin Reardon, a novelist whose valiant attempts to maintain the standards of his art in the face of financial pressure are opposed by an unsympathetic wife. In sharp contrast to Reardon is his friend Jasper Milvain, a critic, whose cleverness and lack of moral or artistic integrity ultimately bring him great success.

New Harmony. A collectivist community founded in Indiana in 1825 on the former site of a Rappite religious settlement. New Harmony was sponsored by Robert Owen, who instituted communal ownership among the members. Dissension arose almost immediately, and the project was abandoned in 1828 at great financial loss to Owen.

new humanism or neo-humanism. A term applied to a movement in early 20th-century American literature and philosophy in which classical restraint and conservative values were upheld in an attempt to create standards for the judgment of literature and art to counter the "romantic excesses" of the 19th century. William C. Brownell is considered by some to have first formulated the principles that were adopted by the leaders of the movement, which was at its peak during the late 1920's and early 1930's. Irving Babitt and Paul Elmer More were its best articulate advocates. Norman Foerster edited Humanism and America (1930), a collection of representative essays. After a vituperative battle with the literary radicals, led by H. L. Mencken, the humanist movement was eclipsed by the development of the New Criticism.

He championed the musicodramatic ideas of Christoph Willibald Gluck and Richard Wagner in Gluck and the Opera (1895), Wagner as Man and Artist (1914), and other books. He wrote some excellent biographies, such as Hugo Wolf (1907) and The Life of Richard Wagner (1933; 4 v.)

Newman, John Henry Cardinal (1801-1890), English churchman and author, famous as the leader of the OXFORD MOVEMENT. He took an outstanding position in the theological controversies involved in the movement and in 1845, after resigning the position that he held as Protestant vicar of St. Mary's, was converted to the Roman Catholic Church. In 1846 he was ordained a priest and in 1879 was made a cardinal. Throughout his career he continued to engage in bitter controversies, especially with the Protestant clergyman and novelist Charles Kingsley and with the Catholic Cardinal Manning. His most famous work, Apologeta pro Vita Sua, a history of his intellectual development and conversion to Catholicism, was written to refute charges made against him by Kingsley. Among his other works, those in prose being marked by a clear, quiet, and smoothly flowing style, are Lyra Apostolica (1834), a collection of religious lyrics published with hymns of other authors and including Newman's Lead, Kindly Light; Lost and Gain (1848), a partially autobiographical novel dealing with the Oxford Movement; A Dream of Gerontius, a mystic religious poem; Grammar of Ascent (1870), analyzing religious belief; The Idea of a University Defined (1873), a collection of lectures that had an important influence on later theories of liberal arts education. See TRACTS FOR THE TIMES.

The novel is notable for the penetration and wit of its characters' conversations.

Newton, Sir Isaac (1642–1727). English mathematician and natural philosopher. One of the greatest geniuses the world has known, he made three scientific discoveries of fundamental importance: first, the method of fluxions, which forms the basis of modern calculus; second, the law of the composition of light; and third, the law of universal gravitation, which he presented to the world in his major work Principia. Among his other works are Method of Fluxions (1693), Optics (1704), and Chronology of Ancient Kingdoms Amended (1728). The story that Newton's hypothesis on gravity was inspired by the fall of an apple was first told by Voltaire, who claimed to have heard it from the scientist's niece.

New Wave, the (la Nouvelle Vague), including the New Novel (Nouveau Roman) and the New Theater (Nouveau Théâtre). A literary and cinematic movement originating in a cross-influence of novel and film in France of the late 1950's. Although the New Wave does not constitute a definite school and though it has no unified code, Alain Robbe-Grillet and Nathalie Sarraute are considered the leading theorists of a group of young writers, film scenarists, and directors who propose to continue the line of experiment marked by Proust, Kafka, Joyce, and Faulkner. The novels of such writers as Michel Butor, Marguerite Duras, Claude Mauriac, Robert Pinget, and Claude Simon, and the films of such directors as Philippe de Broca, Claude Chabrol, Jean-Luc Godard, Louis Malle, Jean-Pierre Mocky, Alain Resnais, and François Truffaut constitute an attempt to evolve an art of appearances which, omitting all social and moral judgments and fixed values, concentrates on the rigorously exterior description of objects and events in order to reveal the character seeing or experiencing them; thus, events often take place not in chronological time, but in the time of human experience, memory, and fantasy. The leading dramatists of the New Theater, a related movement, are Jean Genet, Eugène Ionesco, and Samuel Beckett.

As individual differences among the writers and directors popularly associated with the New Wave become more apparent, the term is seen to be less meaningful, and it has been repudiated by many of those to whom it was most commonly applied.

Margaret elopes with Tom, Lord Lovell marries Lady Allworth, and Sir Giles, from rage and despair, loses his mind.

Although avowedly "not for the old lady in Dubuque," it is widely read throughout the country. Among its features are "The Talk of the Town," consisting of comments and anecdotes, often written in recent years by E. B. White; "Profiles," biographical sketches of unusual, interesting, or little known personalities; and examples of unconscious humor selected from current books and periodicals. Since the death of Ross in 1951, the magazine has been edited by William Shawn.

Nexø, Martin Andersen (1869–1954). Danish proletarian novelist and short-story writer. Born in the slums of Copenhagen, Nexø worked as a herd boy and a shoemaker's apprentice. He developed a warm sympathy for the poor and a faith in the innate goodness of man; his convictions led him to practical action, as a social democrat and later as a member of the Communist Party. Pelle the Conqueror (1906-1910) was the first of his novel series dealing with the struggles of the working classes. Its subject is the Danish labor movement and its hero, Pelle, is a trade-union leader. In English the work was divided into four parts: Boyhood, Apprenticeship, The Great Struggle, and Daybreak. Ditte Menneskebarn (5 vols., 1917–1921) related the story of a poor, suffering servant girl. Among Nexø's other works are Soldage (1903), an account of travels in Andalusia, and Under aaben Himmel (Under the Open Sky: My Early Years, 1938), an autobiography.

Nibelungenlied, The. A medieval German epic poem in four-line stanzas. It was probably written about 1190 or 1200, but the author and the exact original version are unknown. Although based on Scandinavian legends as told in the poet's Edda and the Völunga Saga, it draws further on German legend and omits much of the supernatural material; Siegfried, for instance, is no longer a descendant of the Scandinavian god Odin, but the son of the king of the Netherlands and a typical hero of medieval romance.

Siegfried sets out for Worms to woo the famous beauty Kriemhild. Her three brothers, Burgundian kings, learn from their retainer Hagen that Siegfried is the hero who killed the Nibelung kings and took their name, their treasure of gold, and their cape of darkness, which makes the wearer invisible. Hagen also explains that Siegfried's skin is almost entirely invulnerable, for, except for a spot covered by a fallen leaf, it became horrid when he bathed in the blood of a dragon he had slain.

Siegfried helps the three brothers fight the Saxons, then agrees to help one of them, Gunther, in courting Queen Brunhild of Iceland, on the condition of his own marriage to Kriemhild. Brunhild has vowed that she will marry the man who can best her at hurling a spear, throwing a stone, and jumping. Siegfried in his magic cape stands beside Gunther and invisibly accomplishes the difficult feats for him, so the double marriage is celebrated. But Brunhild is still suspicious about Gunther's strength, and on their wedding night she ties him in a knot and hangs him on the wall. He appeals to Siegfried, who, again invisible, wrestles her into pleased submissiveness and takes her girdle and ring, which he gives to Kriemhild. Then one day the two queens argue fiercely before the cathedral, and Kriemhild proves with the girdle and ring that Brunhild had been duped in accepting Gunther.

At this point Brunhild's role, so important in the Völunga Saga, becomes vague, and that of the retainer Hagen becomes dominant. Presumably jealous for Gunther's sake of Siegfried's glory, Hagen tricks Kriemhild into revealing Siegfried's one vulnerable spot and arranges a great hunt, during which he murders Siegfried. He seizes the treasure hoard from Kriemhild (it had been her wedding gift from Siegfried), and sinks it in the Rhine in collaboration with her brothers. The grieving widow broods on her wrongs, and when Etzel (Attila, king of the Huns) proposes marriages, she accepts on condition that he aid her plans for vengeance. After the wedding they invite her brothers for a visit, then attack them with the help of the heroes Hildebrand and Dietrich of Bern. When Hagen, the last living Burgundian, refuses to tell where the treasure is, Kriemhild kills him. At this point Hildebrand, horrified at the carnage caused by one woman, turns against her and kills her, leaving Etzel and Dietrich to lament the dead.

Nicander (Nikandros, fl. 2d century B.C.). A Greek poet and grammarian, born in Ionia. Both of his two surviving poems are on medical subjects.

Nicanor. The husband and victim of the evil queen Cleopatra in Pierre Corneille's tragedy Rodrigo.

Niccolini, Giovanni Battista (1782–1861). Italian dramatist. His tragedies, which presented historical instances of Italy's long struggle against domestic despotism and foreign domination, served to highlight the resistance of Italian patriots to their Austrian, Spanish, and Papal rulers during the Risorgimento. Among his tragedies are Nabucco (1816), Giovanni da Prida (1830), and Arnaldo da Brescia (1838), his most famous work.

Nicene Creed. The creed formulated by the Council of Nicea (A.D. 325) on the basis of older wordings, specially designed to combat the heresy of Arius. The controversial filioque clause in this creed, which was largely responsible for the Great Schism of 1054, was recognized by the Council of Toledo in 589.

Nichiren. Japanese Buddhist sect founded by Nichiren (1222–1282). It bases its teachings on the Lotus Sutra and claims that Japan is the true center of Buddhism and the Lotus Sutra is the ultimate teaching of the historical Buddha. Noted for the fanaticism of its priests and adherents, it gained great strength during the Kamakura period (1185–1333). A post-World War II phenomenon has been the growth of a splinter group, the Sōka Gakkai with more than five million members. It is an active force in Japanese politics and shows extreme right-wing and ultranationalistic tendencies.

Nicholas, St. One of the most popular saints in Christendom, especially in the East. He was the patron saint of Russia, of Aberdeen, of parish clerks, of scholars (who used to be called clerks), of pawn-brokers (because of the three gold balls that he gave to the daughters of a poor man to save them from earning their dowers in a disreputable way), and of little boys (because he once restored to life three little boys who had been cut up and pickled in a salting tub to serve for bacon). He is invoked by sailors (because he averted a storm during a voyage to the Holy Land) and against fire. Finally, he is the original of Santa Claus.

Little is known of his life, but he is said to have been bishop of Myra (Lycia) in the early 4th century. One story relates that he was present at the Council of Nicaea (325) and there buffeted Arius on the jaw. His day is December 6, and he is represented in episcopal robes with three purses of gold balls, or three small boys, in allusion to one of the above legends.

Nicholas I (Nikolai Pavlovich; 1796-1855). Czar of Russia (1825-1855). His reign is noted for its extremely conservative, reactionary character, which was perhaps, in part, a direct result of the December Uprising that occurred upon his accession to the throne. Two other events that made Nicholas tighten his grip on the country even more were the Polish uprising of 1830-1831 and the 1848 revolutions in Europe. The Czar's determination to keep insurrection out of his country extended even to his personal censorship of the work of the great Russian poet Aleksandr Pushkin. The closing years of Nicholas' reign were marred by the debacle of the Crimean War (1854-1856), which clearly showed the corruption and inefficiency of the Czarist government.

Nicholas II (Nikolai Aleksandrovich; 1868-1918). Czar of Russia (1894-1917). Nicholas II's reign, filled with misfortunes and blunders, ended in the abolition of the monarchy and the revolution of 1917. The czar was not strong enough to deal with the social and political upheaval in his country, even if anything could have been done about it at such a late stage.

Even before the First World War, the influence at court of such sinister characters as the monk Rasputin had made even the supporters of the monarchy uneasy. The "Bloody Sunday" massacre in January, 1905, also contributed to the revolutionary mood of the people. On this occasion, a large procession of workers, on their way to the Winter Palace to place their petitions before the czar, were fired on by troops, and hundreds of workers were killed and wounded. A general strike was called throughout the country, and the government all but toppled. Only the granting of the Constitution of 1905 and the promise of liberal reforms stopped the 1905 revolutionary movement from succeeding. During this period, the government also had the problem of the Russo-Japanese War (1904-1905), the destruction of the Russian fleet at Tsushima in May, 1905, stirring general discontent.

The next, and final, severe test of the regime started in 1914 with Russia's entry into World War I. Defeats on the battlefield and confusion and mismanagement at home finally brought about Nicholas' abdication in March, 1917. This was the first step in the Russian Revolution which culminated in October, 1917, with the seizure of power by the Bolsheviks. The czar and his family were put to death by the Bolsheviks in July, 1918.

Nicholas V, Pope. Tommaso Parentucelli (1398-1455). At the age of 49 he succeeded to the papacy and remained an outstanding patron of Humanism and the arts until his death. He founded the Vatican library and laid the architectural plans for Renaissance Rome.

Nicholas Breakspear. See Adrian IV.

Nicholas Nickleby (1838-1839). A novel by Charles Dickens. When Nicholas' father dies leaving him penniless, his uncle Ralph Nickleby refuses to help him. Having his mother and his sister Kate to support, Nicholas sets about to make a living. He first serves as usher to Mr. Wackford Squeers, schoolmaster at Dotheboys Hall; the brutality of Squeers and his wife, especially toward a poor, half-witted boy named Smike, causes Nicholas to leave in disgust. Smike runs away from school to follow Nicholas, remaining his follower until he dies. Next Nicholas joins the theatrical company of Mr. Crummles, and finally he secures a good post in a counting house owned by the benevolent Cheeryble Brothers. In the meantime, Kate Nickleby has been working for Madame Mantalini, a milliner. Ralph Nickleby tries to lure her from her innocence by encouraging his friend Sir Mulberry Hawk to make unseemly advances toward her. He is foiled in this, and in his plan to force Madeline Bray to marry his friend Grizle, by Nicholas, who interferes and saves his sister from Mulberry Hawk and who himself falls in love with Madeline Bray. Ralph tries to retaliate by injuring Nicholas through Smike, who finally dies. Ralph's final blow, the discovery that Smike was his son, causes him to commit suicide. Nicholas marries Madeline and Kate marries the Cheerybles' nephew Frank.

This novel attacks schools and schoolmasters in much the same way that Oliver Twist attacks the workhouses. Dickens' ruthless exposure, through Dotheboys Hall, of actual conditions in many schools in England, where the pupils were half starved and taught nothing, led to the closing or reformation of many such institutions. See Newman Noggs; Infant Phenomenon.

Nichols, Anne. See Abie's Irish Rose.

Nichols, Robert (1893-1944). English poet and dramatist, associated with the Georgians. Ardours and Endurances (1917) is a collection of war poems.

Nickleby, Kate. In Charles Dickens' Nicholas Nickleby, sister of Nicholas. She is beautiful, pure-minded, and loving. She worked hard to assist in the expenses of housekeeping and shuns the attempts of her uncle Ralph and others to lead her astray.

Mrs. Nickleby. Widowed mother of Nicholas and Kate. She is a weak, vain woman who imagines an idiot neighbor is in love with her because he tosses cabbages and other articles over the garden wall.

Nickneven. A gigantic, malignant hag of Scottish superstition. William Dunbar has well described this spirit in his Flying of Dunbar and Kennedy.

Nick of the Woods, or the Jibbenainsay (1837). A novel by Robert Montgomery Bird. "Bloody Nathan," scorned by the pioneers as a timid Quaker who abhors all violence, is later revealed to be the feared killer of Indians, "Nick of the Woods." Bird describes the causes and symptoms of Nathan's split personality with remarkable psychological insight; he presents the Indians as brutish savages, in protest against James Fenimore Cooper's idealization. His background as a dramatist serves Bird well; he maintains suspense despite the complexity of plot.

Nicodemus. In the New Testament, a Pharisee who came to visit Jesus by night (John 3:2). After the crucifixion, he brought myrrh and aloes and helped Joseph of Arimathaea with the burial of Jesus.
Nicolai, Christoph Friedrich (1733–1811). German enlightenment philosopher. He was a friend of Lessing, with whom he edited the Letters, Concerning the Most Recent Literature (Briefe, die neueste Literatur betreffend; 1759–1765). He was, however, more narrowly rationalistic than Lessing and less amenable to progressive ideas, as is seen in his Feynner kleiner Almanach (Pancy Little Almanac, 1771 f.), in which he satirically attacked Herder.

Nicole, Pierre (1625–1695). French theologian. An ardent Jansenist and a solitary resident at Port-Royal, Nicole defended Jansenism against its enemies in a series of letters much in the manner of the Lettres Provinciales of Pascal: Les Imaginaires, ou lettres sur l'héroïsme imaginaire (The Imaginary Ones, or Letters on the Imaginary Heroe, 1664) attempted to prove that the supposed Jansenist heresy, if it existed at all, was at best a tiny matter, while Les Visionnaires, ou seconde partie des lettres sur l'héroïsme imaginaire (The Visionary Ones, or Second Part of the Letters on the Imaginary Heroe, 1667) rebutted the attack of Desmarets de Saint-Sorlin on Jansenist doctrine. Nicole aided Antoine Arnauld in drafting of La Perpétuité de la Foi de l'Eglise Catholique touchant l'Eucharistie (The Perpetuity of the Faith of the Catholic Church Concerning the Eucharist, 1669–1676) and accompanied him into exile, but soon managed to placate the authorities and to return.

Nicomachean Ethics. See Aristotle.

Nicomède (1651). A tragedy by Pierre Cornelle. It relates the triumph of Nicomède, conqueror of Cappadocia, over the hostile machinations of his father, the king of Bithinia, of his stepmother Arsinoé, of the Roman ambassador Flaminius, and of his own half brother Attale. Nicomède parries all intrigue skillfully and magnanimously and, with the eventual help of Attale, frustrates a plot to imprison him in Rome. The play, by virtue of the characterization of the central stoical figure, is one of Cornelle's most striking.

Niebuhr, Reinhold (1892– ). American theologian. After serving as pastor in Wright City, Mo., and Detroit, Mich., where he took an active interest in labor problems, Niebuhr joined the faculty of the Union Theological Seminary. One of the most important and influential of American theologians, he persistently emphasizes the reality of sin and the tragic estate of man in his fallen condition, and decries the secular tendency to discount sin. He sees the problem of modern man as one in which power and technology have brought confusion and meaninglessness, and the task of Christianity as ministering to the world as well as to the spirit. Among his books are Moral Man and Immoral Society (1932), The Children of Light and the Children of Darkness (1944), Christian Realism and Political Problems (1953), The Self and the Drama of History (1955), Leaves from the Notebook of a Tamed Cynic (1956), and Beyond Tragedy: Essays on the Christian Interpretation of History (1961).

Niemöller, Martin (1892– ). German Protestant minister, opposed to Nazi control of the church. He was put in a concentration camp (1938) and released after the war.

Nietzsche, Friedrich (1844–1900). German philosopher, classical scholar, and poet. He is most famous for the theory of the Übermensch (superman) which he developed in Thus Spake Zarathustra. As early as his Unzeitgemässe Betrachtungen (Unintemly Observations, 1873–1876), he had sharply criticized the systematic philosophy of the earlier 19th century, especially that of Hegel; and throughout his career, he continually sought to penetrate beyond all rational, systematic schemes to the irrational, human level beneath, as in his well-known Beyond Good and Evil. His complete rejection of Christianity was based on the belief that Christianity leads man's thoughts away from this world and into the next, thus making him less capable of coping with earthly life; he felt that Christianity teaches men how to die but not how to live. In his early career, especially in The Birth of Tragedy, his views were influenced by Schopenhauer. His own lyrics strongly influenced the poetry of expressionism. Other well-known works are Menschliches, Allzumenschliches (Human, All Too Human, 1878), Der Antichrist (1888), and Ecce Homo (1888). In 1889 he went insane and remained so until he died. See Elisabeth Förster-Nietzsche.

Nievo, Ippolito (1831–1861). Italian novelist and poet. His most successful work is the lengthy novel Le Confessioni di Un Italiano (1858), republished as Le Confessioni di Un Ottuagenario (1867), which recounts events occurring in Italy during the 82 years covered in the fictitious narrator's reminiscences. Nievo himself, an ardent patriot, served as a member of Garibaldi's Red Shirts.

Nifheim. A legendary realm of Scandinavian mythology. In contrast to Valhalla, the abode of fallen warriors, Nifheim is said to have received all those who died of disease or old age. It existed from the beginning in the North, in endless cold and everlasting night; Hela ruled over it. In its center was the well Hvergelmir, from which flowed 12 rivers.

Nigger, The (1909). A play by Edward Sheldon. It is one of the earliest uses of the familiar theme of the white man who discovers that he has Negro blood. In this case the man is a state governor who is about to sign a bill that will harm the financial interests of a cousin. The latter threatens to reveal the secret, but the governor signs the bill anyway.

Nigger Heaven (1926). A novel by Carl Van Vechten. One of the first novels about Negro life in Harlem, the book takes its title from the topmost gallery where Negroes were required to sit in theaters. Set in the jazz era, the novel is filled with melodramatic episodes, and ends with a murder of which the hero is falsely accused. It is, nevertheless, noteworthy as a true and understanding exploration of the Negro's suffering and aspirations, the more remarkable that it was written by a white man.

Nigger of the Narcissus, The (1897). A novel by Joseph Conrad. Less a narrative than a study of men's characters under stress, the story is centered on a Negro sailor, James Wait, who is dying of tuberculosis. The brooding presence of death brings out the best and the worst in the crew of the Narcissus. In this tense atmosphere Donkin, a mean-spirited agitator, almost manages to stir the crew to mutiny.

Night Flight (Vol de Nuit; 1931). A novel by Antoine de Saint-Exupéry about the air line director Rivière. Rivière must appear harsh and ruthless in order to raise his pilots above self-pity and to extract from them that supreme effort through which aviation will achieve victory over the night.

nightingale. For the classical legend, see Philomela. There is a passage in T. S. Eliot's The Waste Land which confuses the nightingale with the nightjar:

... yet there the nightingale
Felled all the desert with invisible voice
And still she cried, and still the world pursues,
"Jug Jug" to dirty ears.

This is unfair. No nightingale ever cried "Jug Jug." The goatherd does and nightjar is another name for it, not nightingale.

Nightingale, Florence (1820–1910). English nurse and hospital reformer, known as the Lady with the Lamp. Early interested in nursing, she inspected schools and hospitals throughout England and in Europe, and spent several months (1849–1850) at a Roman Catholic hospital at Alexandria, Egypt. She trained (1850–1851) as a nurse at the Institute of Protestant Deaconesses at Kaiserwerth, studied further in Paris, and in 1853 returned to London to take charge of a woman's hospital. At the news of the suffering of the wounded in the Crimean War, she volunteered her services and, at the head of a group of 38 nurses, set up a hospital at Scutari in November, 1854, soon after the battle of Balaklava. Here she set up stringent observance of sanitation and by 1855 the death rate from cholera, typhus, and dysentery had fallen from about 50 per cent to about 2 per cent. She worked tirelessly and ceaselessly, making her nightly rounds with hand in band and performing administrative duties as well as nursing. After the war, with funds donated as a testimonial to her services she founded (1860) the Nightingale home at St. Thomas's Hospital for the training of nurses, and thereafter, for 30 years, helped to establish nursing homes in England. She was not able to participate actively in nursing since her own health had been ruined during her war service. In 1907, she became the first woman to receive the Order of Merit.

Nightmare Abbey (1818). A novel by Thomas Love Peacock. In this book, Peacock satirizes the leading figures and concepts of romanticism in England in his day. Among the characters, Mr. Flosky is considered to represent Coleridge, Scynthia Glorwy, Shelley, and the extravagant Mr. Cypress is a caricature of Lord Byron.

Night Over Taos (1932). A regional drama by Maxwell Anderson. It deals with a clash between American frontiersmen and the Mexican patriarchate of Taos in 1847.

Night Thoughts on Life, Death and Immortality (1742–1746). A poem by Edward Young, written in nine books in blank verse. Although its full title reads The Complaint; or, Night Thoughts on Life, Death and Immortality, the poem is commonly referred to as simply Night Thoughts. It is the most specifically theological of the major works of the age. It contains the reflections of the poet late at night on "life, death and immortality," a long soliloquy urging an erring youth, Lorenzo, to turn to virtue, and a vision of the Judgment Day and eternity thereafter, with a description of the magnificence of the starry heavens. The poem contains many autobiographical allusions: Young refers to the successive deaths of his wife, his step-daughter, and her husband. The characteristic theme in the poem, aside from its sentimental and orthodox elements, is upward progress through endless gradations of being:

Nature revolves, but man advances; both Eternal; that a circle, this a line.

It is one of the outstanding examples of the melancholy "graveyard school" in eighteenth-century English literature.

Nihilism (from Lat., nihil, "nothing"). An extreme form of 19th-century revolutionism, indignantly claimed by Karl Marx, which took form in Russia in the 1850's, and was specially active in the 1870's and later, under Bakunin. It aimed at anarchy and the complete overthrow of law, order, and all existing institutions, with the idea of re-forming the world de novo. The following was the code of the Nihilists: (1) annihilate the idea of a God, or there can be no freedom; (2) annihilate the idea of right, which is only might; (3) annihilate civilization, property, marriage, morality, and justice (4) let your own happiness be your only law. The name was given to them by the novelist Turgenev in his Fathers and Children. Dostoyevsky portrays Nihilism in The Possessed and The Brothers Karamazov.

Nikolayeva, Galina Yevgenyevna (1914— ). Russian novelist. Her long novel A Battle on the Way (Bitwally put; 1957) is one of the more interesting recent Soviet works. The novel has an unusually large part of it given over to non-political and generally forbidden areas of exploration, such as an unhappy love affair and descriptions of the work of the secret police.

Nile, battle of the. A naval engagement fought in Abukir Bay, near Alexandria, Egypt (August 1, 1798). The British fleet under Horatio Nelson defeated the French fleet under Brueys. As a result of the victory, Napoleon's expedition to Egypt ended in failure, and Nelson earned for himself the epithet of "the hero of the Nile."

Nimier, Roger (1925-1962). French novelist, essayist, and journalist. He was noted for his refusal to take anything seriously. An insolent and nonchalanwit characterized his work, such as the novels The Blue Hussar (1950) and Children of Circumstance (Les Enfants tristes; 1951), and the essays in Le Grand d'Espagne (1950).

Nimmo, Chester. A politician, hero of a trilogy of novels by Joyce Cary. See PRISONER OF GRACE, A.

Nimrod. In the Old Testament, the son of Cush, famous for his exploits as "mighty hunter before the Lord" (Gen. 10:9). Thus, the name refers generally to any daring or outstanding hunter. Alexander Pope says of Nimrod that he was "a mighty hunter, and his prey was man" (Windsor Forest, 1713); so also does Milton interpret the phrase (Paradise Lost, 1667).

Nims, John Frederick (1913- ). American poet and teacher. Nims works in both "modernist" and traditionalist forms, though the harshness of many of his scenes makes even his most formal poems seem ragged and strained. Among his works are The Iron Pastoral (1947) and Knowledge of the Evening: Poems 1930-1960 (1960). He edited The Poems of St. John of the Cross (1959).

nine. A mystical number. From the earliest times the number nine has been regarded as a mystical number of peculiar significance. Deucalion's ark, made by the advice of Prometheus, was tossed about for nine days before it stranded on the top of Mount Parnassus. There were nine Muses, frequently referred to as merely "the Nine." There were nine Gallicenae or virgin priestesses of the ancient Gallic oracle; and Lars Porsena swore by the nine gods, who were Juno, Minerva, and Tinia (the three chief), Vulcan, Mars, Saturn, Hercules, Summanus, and Vebidus; while the nine of the Sabines were Hercules, Romulus, Escluspius, Bacchus, Aeneas, Vesta, Santa, Fortuna, and Fides.

There were nine rivers of Hell, or, according to some accounts, the Styx encompassed the infernal regions in nine circles. Milton makes the gates of Hell "thrice three-fold; three folds are brass, three iron, three of adamantine rock." They have nine folds, nine plates, and nine linings.

In the early Polemic system of astronomy, there were nine spheres; hence Milton, in his Arcades, speaks of the "celestial syrens' harmony that sit upon the nine enfolded spheres." They are those of the Moon, Mercury, Venus, the Sun, Mars, Jupiter, Saturn, and the Firmament, or that of the fixed stars, and the Crystalline Sphere. In Scandinavian mythology there were nine earths, Hel being the goddess of the ninth; there were nine worlds in NIFLHEIM, and Odin's ring dropped eight other rings (nine rings of mystical import) every ninth night.

In folk tale, nine appears many times. The ABRAcadabra was worn nine days, and then flung into a river; in order to see the fairies one is directed to put "nine grains of wheat on a four-leaved clover"; nine knots are made on black wool as a charm for a sprained ankle; if a servant finds nine green peas in a peaseed, she lays it on the lintel of the kitchen door, and the first man that enters in is to be her cavalier; to see nine magpies is most unlucky; a cat has nine lives; and the nine of diamonds is known as the Curse of Scotland.

There are nine orders of ANGELS; in heraldry, there are nine marks of cadency and nine different crowns recognized; and among ecclesiastical architects there are nine crosses.

Nine Days' Wonder. Something that causes sensational astonishment for a few days, then is forgotten. Like so many other concepts that grew up in the Middle Ages, such occurrences are predicted with numeronological exactitude: three days are spent in amazement, three in discussion, and in three more interest subsides completely. In Elizabethan times, an event widely advertised as a nine days' wonder was William Kemp's morris dance from London to Norwich, undertaken on a bet. Kemp was a famous comedian and dancer of jigs, who was an important member of Shakespeare's company at the Globe Theatre.

1954 (1949). A satirical novel by George Orwell. Set in the society of the future, toward which Orwell believed both extreme right- and left-wing totalitarianism were heading, it is the story of a man and a girl who rebel. In this terrifying society there is no place for truth, for historical records are destroyed and propaganda replaces information. Thought and love are punished, while privacy is impossible. Placards everywhere say: "Big Brother is watching you." Big Brother represents Stalin, and the satire is chiefly directed against Russia.

1919 (1932). A novel by John Dos Passos, the 2nd of his trilogy U.S.A. (q.v.). It takes the characters introduced in The 42nd Parallel, with a few additions, through World War I and presents a kaleidoscopic picture of the war years.

Like the other novels of the trilogy, 1919 uses the "newreel" and "camera eye" techniques; it also contains brief biographical sketches of such public figures... as Theodore Roosevelt, J. P. Morgan, Woodrow Wilson, and the Unknown Soldier.

Nineteen Theses. The original document of the Reformation, nailed on the door of the castle church at Wittenberg by Martin LUTHER on Oct. 31, 1517. Essentially, it was an indictment of the valency of the Roman Catholic Church and, especially, of the common practice of selling indulgences in connection with the sacrament of penance. Luther contended that, after confession, absolution was dependent only upon the sinner's faith and divine grace, not upon the priest. At this point, Luther was not an advocate of actual separation from the church of Rome.

Nine-three (Quatre-vingt-treize; 1879). A historical novel by Victor Hugo. Set in the France of 1793, the novel involves in its action Marat, Danton, and Robespierre. The principal roles in this highly melodramatic work are played by the marquis de Lantenac, his nephew Gauvin, and a former priest with republican sympathies named Cimourdan.

Nine Worthies of London. A kind of chronicle-history in mixed verse and prose of 9 prominent citizens of London. It was published in 1592 by Richard Johnson, author also of The Seven Champions of Christendom. His Worthies are:

Sir William Walworth, who stabbed Wat Tyler, the rebel, and was twice Lord Mayor (1374, 1380).

Sir Henry Pritsch, who (in 1356) feasted Edward III (with 5,000 followers); Edward the Black Prince; John, king of Austria; the king of Cyprus; and David, king of Scotland.

Sir William Sevenoaks, who fought with the dauphin of France and built twenty almshouses and a free school (1418).

Sir Thomas White, merchant tailor, who, in 1553, kept the citizens loyal to Queen Mary during Wyatt's rebellion.

Sir John Bonham, who was entrusted with a valuable cargo for the Danish market, and made commander of the army raised to stop the progress of the great Solyman.

Christopher Croker, who became famous at the siege of Bordeaux, and companion of the Black Prince when he helped Don Pedro to the throne of Castile.

Sir John Hawkwood, who was one of the Black Prince's knights, and immortalized in Italian history as Giovanni Acuti Cavaliro.

Sir Hugh Caverley, who was famous for ridding Poland of a monstrous bear.

Sir Henry Maliverer, generally called Henry of Cornhill, who lived in the reign of Henry IV. He was a crusader, and became the guardian of "Jacob's well."

The names of Sir Richard Whittington and Sir Thomas Gresham are "conspicuous by their absence."

Ninlil. See Nin. Ninlil. A Sumerian goddess of air, the wife of Enlil. Following the sage advice of her old mother Nundarshegunu, Ninlil so delighted Enlil, the storm-god, that he came to her in three different forms. The resulting offspring were Nergal, the king of the underworld, Ninazu, another underworld deity, and a third deity who remains unknown.

Ninmah. See Nin. Ninon de Lenclos. See Anne Lenclos.

Ninshubur. The herald of INANNA in Sumerian mythology.

Ninsun. A Babylonian goddess, the mother of Gilgamesh.

Nintu. Also called Ninhursag and Nimma. A Sumerian mother goddess. Possibly a later form of the ancient earth-goddess Ki, she created human beings, molding six varieties of them from clay. To the water god Enki, she bore Ninsh, who in turn bore him Ninkur, upon whom Enki fathered Utu, the goddess of plants. When Enki ate the plants, he was cursed by Ninu, but he eventually persuaded her to remove the curse, in return for various gifts.

Ninurta or Ningirsu. Sumerian and Babylonian god of war, the south wind, and artificial irrigation. He was the hero of a fragmentary epic poem that tells of his successful war on the dragon Kur. Following the advice of his talking weapon Sharur, Ninurta, a son of Enil, moves against Kur, a monster often associated with the underworld. At first defeated, Ninurta returns to the battle and destroys Kur completely. His death, however, adversely affects the normal behavior of the waters upon which the land depends for irrigation. Ninurta therefore guides the flood waters into the Tigris, and the fertility of the fields returns. Of the stones that were flung in his battle with Kur, Ninurta blesses those that had been on his side and curses the others. In many respects, this myth is the forerunner of innumerable others in which a hero slays a dragon. See War of the Gods; Poem of Baal, The.

Ninus. Son of Belus, husband of the legendary Semiramis, and the reputed builder of Nineveh. In the Pyramus and Thisbe travesty in Shakespeare's Midsummer Night's Dream (c. 1595), the lovers meet at his tomb.

Niobe. Mythical queen of Thebes, daughter of Tantalus and wife of Amphion. She boasted that she had borne many children, whereas Leto had borne only two. Leto complained of the insult to her children, Apollo and Artemis, and they avenged her by killing all Niobe's children and, in some versions, her husband as well. Grief-stricken, Niobe returned to her homeland, Lydia. There, at her own request, Zeus turned her to stone on Mount Sipylos, and she may be seen there to this day constantly weeping.

Njord or Njorth. The Scandinavian god of the sea, the protector of seafaring men. He ruled the winds, calmed the seas, and ward ed off fire. He was one of the Aesir, and father, by his wife Skadi, of Frey and Freya. His home was Noatun, the place of ships. The name means benefactor.

Nippur. An important city of ancient Sumeria. It was the cult center of the god Enlil.

nirvana (Sansk., blowing out, extinction). In Buddhist teaching, a complete annihilation of the 3 main ego-drives for money, fame, and immortality. It also signifies enlightenment and the deliverance of the self from transmigration, because annihilation of the ego-drives destroys past karma and does not create new karma.

Nisard, Désiré (1806-1888). French literary critic. Violently opposed to romanticism, Nisard is noted for his rigid respect for 17th-century NEOCLASSICISM. His Histoire de la littérature française (1844-1861) is his best known work.
NISUS AND EURYALUS

In Vergil's Aeneid, young Trojans who accompany Aeneas from Troy and win great distinction in the war against Turnus. In Book IX of the Aeneid, they enter the enemy camp in the dead of night but are detected by the Rutulians. Euryalus is slain, and Nisus trying to save his friend perishes also.

Nö. Japanese theater. The plays dealt largely with well-known historical themes, often with Buddhistic overtones, and are frequently of much literary merit. The acting is highly stylized; masks, elaborate costumes, music, and a chorus are integral parts of the performance. Developed in court and noble society during the Muromachi period (1333–1600), its greatest exponent was Seami Motokito. Nö is influenced greatly by Zen Buddhism.

Noah. A righteous man in the Old Testament whom God chose to spare from the Flood that covered the face of the earth. During the 40 days and nights of the deluge, Noah lived in the ark, which he had built and where, with his own family, he had taken the animals, two by two, following God's command. The ark finally came to rest on Mount Ararat, and Noah with his three sons Shem, Ham, and Japheth, their families, and the various birds and animals came out safely to repopulate the world. According to the biblical narrative, the first rainbow then appeared as God's promise to Noah that never again the world should be so destroyed. (Gen. 6–9). See Flood Myths.

According to legend, Noah's wife was unwilling to go into the ark; the quarrel between the patriarch and his wife forms a prominent feature of Noah's Flood, in the Chester and Townley mystery plays. In the Koran, Noah's wife, known as Waia, tries to persuade the people that her husband is mad.

Noailles, Comtess Anna de [born Princesse de Brincovian] (1876–1932). French poet. She published nine volumes of lyric and romantic poetry (1901–1934), and an autobiography, Le Livre de ma vie (1932).

Nobel, Alfred Bernhard (1833–1896). Swedish engineer and industrialist. Nobel amassed a great fortune from his discoveries of synthetics and explosives (especially dynamite) and their manufacture, and from exploitation of the Baku oil fields. He was also an unsuccessful writer of novels and plays. In his will he set aside over $9 million for the establishment of the Nobel Prizes.

Nobel Prizes. Annual monetary awards of variable amounts ($50,000 in 1963) made to persons who have contributed mankind through their contributions in the fields of physics, chemistry, medicine, literature, and work for peace. They are paid out of a fund established for that purpose by the will of Alfred Nobel. The awards are presented in Stockholm on the anniversary of Nobel's death (Dec. 10) each year, but they are occasionally reserved in one or more categories, especially the peace prize.

The literary awards are selected by the Swedish Academy of Literature. The recipients have been: 1901, René François Armand Sully Prudhomme (Fr.); 1902, Theodor Mommsen (Ger.); 1903, Björnson (Nor.); 1904, Frédéric Mistral (Fr.) and José Echegaray y Eizaguirre (Sp.); 1905, Henryk Sienkiewicz (Pol.); 1906, Giosuè Carducci (It.); 1907, Rudyard Kipling (Eng.); 1908, Rudolf Eucken (Ger.); 1909, Selma Lagerlöf (Swed.); 1910, Paul von Heyse (Ger.); 1911, Maurice Maeterlinck (Belg.); 1912, Gerhart Hauptmann (Ger.); 1913, Rabindranath Tagore (Ind.); 1914, none; 1915, Romain Rolland (Fr.); 1916, Verner von Heidenstam (Swed.); 1917, Karl A. Noble Savage. The concept, from earliest Greek times, of the existence of an exotic, superior people uncorrupted by civilization. The earliest known use of the phrase occurs in Dryden's Conquest of Grenada (1672). According to the Roman historian Diodorus Siculus, a contemporary of Julius Caesar, just such untainted savages are described in the works of the early Greek authors Jambulus and Euhemerus. In modern times, from the 15th century, this ideal man was often described in exaggerated terms in the travel accounts written by explorers, missionaries, and emigrants from Europe. The Italian historian of the 15th century, Pietro Martire Anghiara, who knew Columbus, Vespucci, Magellan, and other explorers, praises the virtuous conduct of the savages of the Antilles; the pastor Jean de Léry, who accompanied the French admiral and explorer Nicholas Durand de Villegaignon to Brazil, undertakes to defend the savage Brazilians; Father Lejeune, a Jesuit missionary, in his Relation of 1634, defends the Canadian savages; Father Du Tertre, a Dominican, extols the virtuous simplicity of West-Indian savages in his Relation of 1654. The noble savage's supposed purity of heart, his tranquil existence, his love of nature, and his religious life, uncomplicated by numerous conflicting dogmas, by persecution, served as subject matter for individual comparisons between occidental civilization and the more perfect savage cultures. Frequently the noble savage also supposedly lived under just and reasonable laws which, when compared to European authoritarian governments, were made to seem infinitely more desirable. Literally hundreds of travel books describing such utopias were extremely popular from the 16th to 19th centuries and gave impetus to emigration from Europe to the new world. Rousseau, though aware that a return to the primitive state was impractical, nevertheless used the myth of the noble savage to give substance to the anathemas he hurled against civilization. Voltaire's Nodier serves as an example of the convention of the noble savage. Chateaubriand's novels dealing with the American Indian, René, Atala, and Las Natchez, portray the romantic, sentimentalized aspects of this myth; its influence is also to be found in the Indian novels of James Fenimore Cooper. See PRIMITIVISM.

Noctes Ambrosianae (1822–1835). A series of papers on literary and topical subjects, in the form of dialogues, contributed to Blackwood's Magazine. They were written principally by John Wilson under the pseudonym Christopher North. The title is taken from Ambrose's, a public house where Wilson and his friends met; Wilson recorded their talks with wit and vivacity. Although he often used imaginary characters, he impersonates James Hogg and William Maginn with great humor.

Nod, Land of. A land referred to in the Bible. It is said that "Cain went . . . and dwelt in the Land of Nod" (Gen. 4: 16). It was there that he found a wife. The phrase may mean merely "the land of wandering" rather than a definite locality.

Nodier, Charles (1780–1844). French poet, novelist, and short-story writer. During the early years of the romantic period, Nodier produced such tales as Smaura ou les Démons de la nuit (1821), and Triby ou le Lutin d'Argal (1822). These contain the elements of fantasy, horror, and melancholy that characterize the Gothic novel. Nodier's own novels include Le Peintre de Salzbourg, journal des émotions d'un cœur souffrant (1803) and Jean Sbogar (1818). Essais d'un jeune barde, a collection of poetry, was published in 1804.

No Exit (Huis Clos; 1944). A play by Jean Paul Sartre. It is also known in English under the title In Camera. The scene of the play is a drawing room into which a man and two women who have died are escorted. Unable to leave, they discover that "hell is other people." At the end, when the door is finally opened, they find they are inseparable and cannot leave.

Noggs, Newman. In Charles Dickens' Nicholas Nickleby, Ralph Nickleby's clerk. He is a tall man of middle age with goggle eyes set in a cadaverous face and one miserable suit of clothes. This kind-hearted dilapidated fellow "kept his hunter and hounds once," but ran through his fortune. He discovers a plot of Ralph, which he confides to the Cheeryble brothers; they frustrate it and then provide for Newman.

Nogueira Pessôa, Fernando Antônio. See Fernando Antônio Nogueira Pessôa.

Nolan, Philip. The fictional chief figure in The Man Without a Country by Edward Everett Hale. There was a real Philip Nolan, a horse-trader, who was a historical personage killed on the Mexican border (1801). Hale explains in The Real Philip Nolan (1901) that only his novel Philip Nolan's Friends (1876) was based on the historical Nolan.

nom de guerre. A French phrase originally and literally meaning "war name," now merely meaning a pseudonym or assumed name. It was customary at one time for everyone who entered the French army to assume a name; this was especially the case in the times of chivalry, when knights were known by the device on their shields.

nominalism. One of two rival doctrines in the disputes of the medieval schoolmen (see SCHOLASTICISM). It held that all abstractions, or universals, such as the general concept of a circle, of truth, of beauty, and the like, are mere names, rather than realities in themselves, and that only a particular and individual object or event has reality. It logically resulted in what was considered a heretical attitude toward the concept of the Trinity. See REALISM; Pierre Abélard.

nonconformists or dissenters. In England, members of Protestant bodies who do not conform to the doctrines of the Church of England. The term was used particularly to refer to the 2,000 clergyman who left the church in 1662 rather than submit to the Act of Uniformity, which demanded "unfeigned assent to all and everything contained in the Book of Common Prayer."

nones. In the ancient Roman calendar, the 9th (Lat., nonus) day before the roes in the Roman Catholic Church. Nones is the office for the ninth hour after sunrise, or 3:00 P.M.

Non-U. A term, meaning "not upper class," popularized in England by Nancy Mitford. The term was invented by Professor Alan Ross in 1954 for a philological study which provides a set of rules for categorizing Englishmen as U or Non-U according to their speech habits.

Noon Wine (1937). A short novel by Katherine Anne Porter. It was reprinted in the collection of three novels entitled Pale Horse, Pale Rider (1939). In Miss Porter's deceptively simple style, it tells the story of Mr. Thompson, an ineffectual farmer who kills a disagreeable stranger who he imagines is attacking his eccentric but valuable hired man. Though acquitted of murder, Thompson commits suicide.

Norandino. A king of Damascus in the Orlando Furioso of Ariosto. He proclaims a tournament, which attracts the knight Grifone and the bragart Martano. The latter takes credit for Grifone's deeds by appearing in his armor to claim the victory. When Grifone persuades Norandino of Martano's treachery, the king has him hanged. See also ORIGILE and APOLLINATE.

Nordhoff, Charles Bernard (1887–1947). American writer. He is best known for the trilogy narrating the story of the ship Bounty, on which he collaborated with James Norman Hall: Mutiny on the Bounty, Men Against the Sea (1933), and Pitcairn's Island (1934). Nordhoff drove an ambulance in France in 1916 and later joined the Lafayette Flying Corps. In 1920 he went with Hall to Tahiti, where they remained for many years. The Fledgling (1919) is an account in diary form of his flying experiences during the war. Both The Pearl Lagoon, adventures in the South Seas, and Picaro, a novel about two brothers in Guadaloupe whose destinies were bound up with airplanes, appeared in 1924.
The Derelict (1925), another novel of adventure in the South Seas, was the last book Nordhoff wrote alone.

vengeance but at the last minute shares the tragic fate
she has brought upon him.

Conqueror; Battle of Hastings.

Norris. In Scandinavian mythology, the three demigodswomen who presided over the fates of both men and gods. The three were known as Urdur, Verthandi, and Skuld, or Past, Present, and Future.
Originally there was only one Norn, Urdur, but later the two others were added. They appeared at the cradle upon the birth of a child, and dwelt at the root of the sacred ash, Yggdrasill, sprinkling it from the fountain Norna to preserve it from decay. See Fates.

Norris, Aunt or Mrs. A character in Jane Austen's novel Mansfield Park. She is a satirical portrait of the typical busybody.

American novelist. Known for his naturalistic depictions of life in the U.S., Norris was born in Chicago.
In his youth, he studied art in Paris and wrote medival romances, such as Yvernelle: A Tale of Feudal France (1892), but at the University of California he read Zola and began work on McTeague. He later reported the Boer War, joined the staff of the San Francisco Wave, and went to Cuba to cover the Spanish-American War.

His first published novel was Moran of the Lady Levy (1898), a tale of adventure in which a captain's daughter takes command of the ship and is rescued by a shanghaied sailor. McTeague, one of the first naturalistic novels in America, appeared the following year. After two more romances, Blix (1899) and A Man's Woman (1900), Norris began a trilogy on the growth, sale, and consumption of wheat. Of the three volumes planned, only The Octopus. Norris' most ambitious work, and The Pit were written. Vandercook and the Elude (1914), a naturalistic story of the degeneration of a man suffering from lycanthropy, was written in 1894–1895.

Norris explained his literary credo in an essay The Responsibilities of a Novelist (1903), in which he declared that the novelist must always be able to say,
"I never trudged; I never took off the hat to Fashion and held it out for pennies. By God, I told them the truth."

Norris, Kathleen [Thompson] (1880– ).
American short-story writer and novelist. Mother (1911), the story of a schoolteacher and her mother, was a best-seller. Certain People of Importance (1922) is considered her best novel. She also wrote a play, Victoria (1933), and a collection of short stories, Bakers' Dozen (1938).

North, Christopher. See John Wilson.

Northanger Abbey (1818). A novel by Jane Austen. Visiting Bath with her friend Mrs. Allen, an older but flighty, irresponsible woman, Catherine Morland falls in love with Henry Tilney, a young clergyman. Believing her to be wealthy, Henry's father invites Catherine to Northanger Abbey, the Tilney home. Greatly influenced by her reading of Mrs. Radcliffe's novel Mysteries of Udolpho, Catherine sees Northanger Abbey as a house of nightmarish mysteries and is terrified by her own imagination.
Her visions of medieval horror prove groundless, of course. However, she is soon ordered out of the house by Henry's dictatorial father when he discovers that she is not wealthy. Henry follows her and persuades her to marry him. The novel gives Jane Austen an opportunity to satirize the Radcliffe school of romantic mystery and treat a favorite theme of feminine self-delusion.

northeast passage. A way from the Atlantic to the Pacific and on to India from Europe eastward round the north extremity of Asia. Its discovery was often attempted even in the 16th century.

After the discovery of America, there was much talk of a northwest passage through to the East by way of the Atlantic, and explorers were constantly sailing up the bays and rivers of the American coast in hopes of finding such a passage. This search accounts for Henry Hudson's exploration of the Hudson River and Hudson Bay.

North Star (Polaris). See Great Bear.

northwest passage. See northeast passage.

Northwest Passage (1837). A historical novel by Kenneth Roberts. It describes Major Robert Rogers' expedition in 1759 to destroy the Indian town of St.
Francis and his search for an overland route to the Northwest. Roberts used Rogers' own Concise Account of North America (1765) and unearthed lost documents for the facts of his story.

Northwest Territory. An American territory northwest of the Ohio River, comprising practically all the land owned as unsettled territory by the 13 colonies at the time of the Declaration of Independence. It was ceded to the federal government by the various states laying claim to it, and from it were formed the states of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, and Wisconsin.

Norton, Caroline Elizabeth Sarah. Born Sheridan (1808–1877). English writer, granddaughter of Richard Brinsley Sheridan. She was famous for her wit, beauty, and marital troubles, the last of which occasioned her letter, addressed to the queen, in criticism of the divorce laws; she was influential in bringing about the change in attitude toward mar-rried women of the time. A strong vein of social protest and autobiography runs through her verse, such as A Voice from the Factories (1836), and her prose, such as The Wife and Woman's Reward (1835). She is said to be the original of George Meredith's heroine in Diana of the Crossways (1885).

teacher and man of letters. Professor of the history of fine art at Harvard, Norton was a frequent contributor to periodicals. In 1865 he helped to found and edit The Nation. Norton was active as translator, editor, biographer, and bibliographer. His friendships with famous men and women of his time make his Letters (1913) valuable documents.

Notre Dame de Paris. See HUNCHBACK OF NOTRE DAME.

Notre, Thomas (1532–1584). English lawyer and poet. A staunch anti-Catholic, he translated Calvin's Institutions (1559). With Thomas Sackville, he was author of the first English tragedy in blank verse, Gorboduc, or Ferrex and Porrex (performed 1561; published 1565). Norton wrote the first three acts of the play, Sackville the last two.

Norumbega. Early map-makers' name for a region and its chief city vaguely situated on the east coast of North America. On the map of Hieronymus da Verrazano (1592) it reads Aranbeg, and coincides more or less with Nova Scotia. It was sought in vain in the region of the Penobscot River by Champlain in 1604. Whittier wrote a poem Notreembege dealing with the search for this fabulous city. The word Norumbega is possibly of Indian origin.

Norwood, Nevil Shute. See Nevil Shute.

Nostradamus. Real name Michel de Nostredame (1503–1566). French astrologer and physician. His famous Centuries (1555), a book of prophecies, caused much controversy and was condemned by the papacy in 1781.

Nostromo (1904). A novel by Joseph Conrad. Set in the South American republic of “Costaguana,” it is an exciting, complicated story about capitalist exploitation and revolution on the national scene, and personal morality and corruption in individuals. Charles Gould's silver mine helps to maintain the country's stability and its reactionary government, but absorption in the mine warps his character and makes him neglect his gentle wife, Dofia Emilia. When the revolution comes, Gould puts a consignment of silver in the charge of Nostromo, the magnificent, “incorruptible” capataz de cargadores (foreman and leader of the dock hands). Chance and vanity make Nostromo decide to bury the silver and to pretend that the boat in which he was shipping it sank. Trying to protect his silver he is later killed by his fiancée's father. Silver is the pivot of the whole story. It is the cause of the foreign capitalist intervention and exploitation that in turn causes the revolution. It corrupts and destroys some men, and reveals the strengths, weaknesses, and ruling passions of others. Dr. Mornygham is a proud man who never forgives himself for once breaking under torture. Martin Decoud, a journalist, is a cynic and sensualist who kills himself rather than endure enforced isolation. Giorgio Viola is a noble, idealistic and dedicated old republican. His daughter Linda continues to love Nostromo, though all his unfaithfulness. Conrad's narration is complex and oblique, not following a normal time-sequence. He starts halfway through the events of the revolution and proceeds by way of flashbacks and glimpses into the future.

Notables. In French history, an assembly of nobles, or notable men, appointed and convoked by the king to form a special deliberative council. The first significant assembly of Notables occurred in 1554, although they are mentioned earlier in French history. They were convened again in 1626 by Richelieu, and not again until 1787 (160 years later), when Louis XVI called them together in an attempt to relieve the nation of some of its pecuniary embarrassments. The last time they convened was November 6, 1788.

Not by Bread Alone (Ne kholebom yedinyi; 1956). A novel by Vladimir Dudintzev. Noted for its criticism of the Soviet bureaucratic establishment, the story concerns the efforts of a young Soviet inventor, Lopatkin, to get his invention accepted by the authorities. He is blocked by an unscrupulous factory director, Drozdov, a careerist who has no interest in anything but his own cozy spot in the hierarchy. Through intrigue, Lopatkin is arrested and sent to a labor camp. When he is released, he finds Drozdov still in power. The authorities are at last ready to accept his invention, but Lopatkin is no longer interested in personally participating in an order that allows Drozdov to go on prospering. He is left facing a continual struggle against such a system.

Notebooks of Malte Laurids Brigge, The (Die Aufzeichnungen des Malte Laurids Brigge; 1910). A novel by Rainer Maria Rilke. The hero, a young Danish poet, has come to Paris, and the novel is written as though it were no more than a collection of his notebook entries, in which observations on immediate experience, reminiscences of youth, and speculations about life and art are seemingly indiscriminately mixed. The book's over-all structure, which emerges only gradually, is a symbolic repetition of the story of the Prodigal Son.

Notes from Underground (Zapiski iz podpol'ya; 1864). A long story by Feodor Dostoevski. Touching on many of the philosophical problems dealt with in his novels, the story is divided into two parts. The first part is a monologue in which the narrator philosophizes, poses and then laughs at his posing, and defends himself in advance against criticism of his ideas; the second is a recounting of adventures from the narrator's life which illustrate some of the ideas propounded in the first part of the story. On one level, the work is a complex psychological portrait of the narrator, the underground man. On another level, it is a polemic against the positivist philosophy of the radical thinkers in Russia, who believed in the rationality of man and the possibility of social betterment through material progress. The narrator not only disagrees intellectually with the radicals; he himself embodies the irrationality which he insists is the essence of man. The story, one of Dostoevski's most powerful and original works, is usually considered the starting point of Dostoevski's literary maturity.

Notes Toward a Supreme Fiction (1942). A long poem by Wallace Stevens. It marked his tendency to shift away from the rich metaphor and imagery of his earlier poetry toward a more abstract poetic statement about the nature of poetry. It is divided into three sections labeled “It Must be Abstract,” “It Must Change,” and “It Must Give Pleasure.”

No Time for Comedy (1939). A play by S. N. Behrman. It is concerned with a playwright who has the urge to deal with the serious problems and tragedies of his time, but has the talent only for light comedy.

Notre Dame de Paris. See HUNCHBACK OF NOTRE DAME.

Nouvelle Héloïse, Julie ou la (1791). An immensely successful epistolary novel by Jean Jacques Rousseau. It is the moralistic story of a wife, Julie d'Etanges, beset by her former lover, SAINT-PREUX. Her husband, M. de Wolmar, invites him to live with them; Saint-Preux leaves because of the impossible situation, but is recalled by the dying Julie. He promises to remain after her death to educate her children. It is a philosophic novel exalting virtue and the natural man, as opposed to hypocritical social morality.

Nouvelle Revue Française, La. A review of literature and the arts, founded in 1909 by André Gide, Jacques Coquand, and Jacques Rivière. Reflecting the independent spirit of its founders, the magazine sought to discover and encourage new authors. Its interest in the new, however, was combined with a belief in permanent aesthetic values transcending any contemporary trend. During the years before and after the First World War, the Nouvelle Revue Française exercised considerable influence in the French literary world. Its members began a publishing house, the maison d'éditions de la NRF, which has since been taken over by Gaston Gallimard.

Nouvelle Vague, La. See NEW WAVE, THE.

Novallis. Pen name of Friedrich Leopold Freiherr von Hardenberg (1772–1801). German poet and novelist, the leading poet of early GERMAN ROMANTICISM. From the pietism of his parents, the mysticism of Jakob Böhme, and the ideals of his fellow romantics, he developed a unique personal faith, in the mystical unity of all things. He believed that man had once lived in complete union with nature and had been able to communicate directly with the world of animals, plants, and objects. This union, however, had been lost, and man's goal must be to regain it. His ideas about history were similar. In his essay, Die Christenheit oder Europa (Christianity, or Europe, written 1799), he urges that Europe strive toward the establishment of a new universal church, and that regain the spiritual unity of the Catholic Middle Ages, which had been lost in the Reformation. His young fiancée, whom he adored, died in 1799, and many of his subsequent works, including the prose-poems Hymnen an die Nach-(Hymns to the Night, 1800), express a mystical yearning for death. His unfinished novel, Heinrich von Ofterdingen, a highly allegorical bildungsroman some sections of which are in the form of MARCHEN, treats the growth of a young poet in an idealized medieval Europe. It was also in this novel that the symbol of the Black Flower, which was later taken to represent all romanticism, first appeared. Some of Novalis' religious poems have been included in Protestant hymnbooks. His friends F. Schlegel and Tieck edited his works after he died.

Novelas ejemplares (Exemplary Novels, 1613). A collection of 12 tales by Miguel de CERVANTES Saavedra. To Cervantes and his contemporaries, the word novela meant a short story in the Italian manner rather than a novel. He added the word ejemplares, however, to indicate that he had avoided the licentiousness of his Italian models. Although the stories vary in style and content, the best are those which give free rein to the author's personal experience and practical philosophy, such as RINCONEDE Y CORTADILLI and EL COLOQUIO DE LOS PERROS. The other stories are LA gitanilla, EL amante noble, LA española inglesa, EL LICENCIADO VIDRIERA, LA fuerza de sangre, EL celoso extremeno, LA ilustre fregon, LAS dos doncellas, LA señora Cornelia, and EL casamiento engañoso. Sometimes included in the collection is the rambald Tia fingida, first published in 1814; its authenticity, however, is doubtful.

novelette. A long short story. Of 15,000 words or somewhat more, it is less considerable in length than the novella.

novella. The Italian word for the short prose narrative, popular during the medieval and Renaissance periods. As the etymology suggests, the tales were originally news, or "What is new?" and concerned mainly the events of town and city life that were worth repeating—from a clever remark made by a local wit to a joke played on the town idiot by clever ruffians, from stories of clever seductions to tales of grim revenge taken by a husband on his betrayers. As these tales gathered into collections, they were joined by other tales of a more literary type: legends and anecdotes from ancient and modern history, oriental folk tales, courtly and romantic epis-isodes. The earliest known collection, Le cento novelle antiche (The Hundred Ancient Tales), also known as the Novellino, was of anonymous authorship; its tales are short and simple. But as the form developed in the hands of artists such as Franco Sacchetti, Boccaccio, Matteo Bandello, and Basile the style, structure, length, and psychological subtlety of the stories made them popular with learned audiences throughout Europe. Their chief literary influence was on playwrights such as Shakespeare, who used them for his plots. His Romeo and Juliet, for example, began as a novella by Da Porto.

In the modern period, the term is used in English to designate a serious fictional form that is somewhere between the novel and the short story in length. Also sometimes called the nouvelle, the novella probably contains from 30,000 to 40,000 words, as compared to a full novel of a minimum of 60,000 words, and often of twice that and more. See NOVELETT.

Novello, Ivor. Originally Ivor Novello Davies (1893–1951). English actor, composer, and film star. He wrote the song Keep the Home Fires Burning. The author of a number of musical revues, he also wrote for the legitimate theater. His plays include The Truth Game (1928) and Symphony in Two Flats (1929).

Novello, Vincent (1781–1861). English organist. He composed and edited sacred music, and introduced to England unknown works of Haydn, Mozart, and Palestrina. He was the founder of the music publishing firm, Novello & Co., the first firm to print cheap music.

Novikov, Nikolai Ivanovich (1744–1818). Russian satirical journalist. During the reign of Catherine the Great, he published The Drone (Truten'; 1769–1770), The Painter (Zhivopisets; 1772–1773), and The Purse (Koshekhol'; 1774), all of which were leading periodicals of the day, as well as a number of books. His jibes at Russian society, and, what was worse, at the government, displeased the empress, and in 1791 he was imprisoned. After his release in 1796 by Czar Paul, he lived on his own estate for the rest of his life.

Novum Organum (Lat., “new instrument”; 1620). A philosophical treatise written in Latin by Francis Bacon. The second part of his projected Instauratio Magna, it presents Bacon’s statement of his inductive method of interpreting nature and organizing knowledge, by which the results of experience are studied, and a general conclusion regarding them is reached. This method was the opposite of the procedure of reasoning deductively from a given postulate by means of the syllogism which was the universal practice among the Scholastic philosophers of his day.

The Novum Organum also contains an exposition of Bacon’s concept of the four “Idols,” or false images of the mind, which he saw hindering the attainment of true knowledge: (1) Idols of the Tribe, errors originating in human nature itself; (2) Idols of the Cave, errors originating in the peculiar psychology of each individual; (3) Idols of the Market-Place, errors and confusions of language originating in social and practical intercourse among men; (4) Idols of the Theater, errors originating in formal systems of philosophy, each of which presents a world of its own, like a stage play.

Noyes, John Humphrey (1811–1886). American religious leader. A believer in perfectionism and the second coming of Christ, he declared himself sinless in 1834, and was thereupon requested to withdraw from Yale; his license to preach was revoked, and Noyes wandered among groups of perfectionists in the country. He returned to his home in Putney, Vt., and formed a community known as the Bible Communitas (1835). This group adopted communism, and published its religious views. Noyes soon asserted a belief in polygamy; complex marriage was practiced in Putney, Vt., in 1846. Noyes was forced to flee to New York where he and his followers established the prosperous Oneida Community. During the following years, Noyes published several volumes, including Bible Communism (1848), Male Continence (1848), and Scientific Propagation (1873), as well as a History of American Socialists (1870). His organizational skill made the Oneida Community the longest-lasting and most successful of American utopian experiments. In 1879, Noyes was forced by public disapproval to flee to Canada.

Nozdryov. A hard-drinking, loudmouth bully in Nikolai Gogol’s Dead Souls. Nozdryov cheats at cards with Chichikov, the hero, then threatens to have the latter beaten for pointing out the fact. Nozdryov’s coarseness makes him the only character who is totally immune to Chichikov’s subtle wiles.

Nubbles, Kit. In Charles Dickens’s Old Curiosity Shop, a shuffling, awkward, red-faced lad employed for a time to wait on Little Nell and do all sorts of odd jobs at the Old Curiosity Shop. When Little Nell and her grandfather lose the shop to Quilp and disappear one night, Kit, their only faithful friend, sets out to find them. He catches up with them only after Little Nell has died. Later, he is falsely accused of theft and saved from transportation by the Marchioness.

nullification, doctrine of. In U.S. history, a theory, held largely in the South and particularly in South Carolina, that the federal union is primarily a league of states and that a state may declare an act of Congress invalid if it exceeds constitutional restrictions on federal power. The doctrine was most effectively set forth by John C. Calhoun. In 1832 South Carolina passed an ordinance nullifying the tariff acts of 1828 and 1832, but President Jackson’s determination to enforce federal authority and the passage of a compromise tariff ended the controversy.

Numa Pomphilus. The legendary 2nd king of Rome (715–672 b.c.). The nymph Egeria favored him with secret interviews and taught the lessons of wisdom and law that he embodied in the institutions of his nation.

Numa Roumestan (1881). A political novel by Alphonse Daubet. It relates the rise to power of the titular hero, a Provençal of sufficient wit, ambition and impudence to win notable success in the field of politics. He is said to have been drawn from Léon Gambetta.

The book contains much Mosaic law; Moses is portrayed as a prophet to whom God speaks directly. Nun’s Priest’s Tale, The. One of the Canterbury Tales of Geoffrey Chaucer. The Host agrees with the Knight that the Monk’s Tale is gloomy, and turns to one of the priests accompanying the Prioress.
to demand something merry. The Priest makes a mock-heroic epic of one of the episodes in the fables of REYNARD THE FOX. The cock Chauntecleer (or Chanticleer) is described as belonging to a widow and ruling seven hens, his favorite being Pertelote. One dawn he wakes in fright, having dreamed a fox was after him. Pertelote calls him a coward and cynically suggests indigestion as the cause. He lectures her severely on the importance of dreams, citing numerous examples from scholarly authorities of people who dreamed accurately of coming disasters.

Nevertheless, he lets Pertelote distract him, but the fox Don Russell indeed awaits him. The fox flatters him that he only wants to hear if the cock has as fine a voice as his father. Chauntecleer closes his eyes to crow, and is seized. Hearing the shrieks of Pertelote and the other wives, the widow sets many men and animals to chase the raider. Chauntecleer tricks Don Russell into opening his mouth to taunt his pursuers, and flies into a tree, resisting all the fox’s further enticements.

Nut-Brown Maid, The. An English ballad (given in Percy’s Reliques), probably dating from the late 15th century. It tells how the “Not-browne Mayd” is wooed and won by a knight who pretends to be a banished man. After describing the hardships she would have to undergo if she married him, and finding her love true to the test, he reveals himself to be an earl’s son, with large hereditary estates in Westmorland.

Nymphidia. A poem by Michael Drayton, dealing with romantic problems at the court of King Oberon and Queen Mab. The story is told to the poet by Nymphidia, an attendant of the queen. The description of the fairy court, people, and events—all diminutive in scale—is a remarkable feat.

Oak, Gabriel. See Far from the Madding Crowd.

Oates, Titus (1649-1705). English perjurer and fabricator of the Popish Plot. An ordained Anglican minister, he was expelled from his living, became a Roman Catholic, and was later expelled from two Jesuit colleges. In 1678, Oates and Israel Tonge, a London clergyman, concocted what became known as the Popish Plot, charging that the Roman Catholics planned to assassinate Charles II, place the duke of York (later James II) on the throne, and turn the country over to the Jesuits. The story was widely believed; Oates was granted a large pension by the government, and, as a result of the public uproar, some 35 innocent persons were executed. After the accession of James II, Oates was convicted of perjury, flogged, and imprisoned, but he was pardoned by William III in 1689, and his pension was restored. In 1698, he became a Baptist, but was soon expelled from the congregation for hypocrisy.

Oath of the Tennis Court. The oath taken by the French National Assembly in 1789. After it had been prevented by Louis XVI from using its normal meeting place, the Assembly convened at the tennis-court building on June 20, 1789, where it took the oath never to disband until France had been given a constitution. As this negated the power of the king, the event is often considered the beginning of the French Revolution.

Obadiah. (1) A Minor Prophet of the Old Testament and the name of the book which records his prophecy, denouncing the Edomites and foretelling Israel's restoration.

(2) A slang term for a Quaker.

(3) A household servant in Sterne's novel Tristram Shandy (1759–1767). There is also an Obadiah in Fielding's novel Tom Jones (1749).

Oberman (1804). A novel by Etienne Pivert de Sénanour. Written in the form of letters, it greatly influenced the romantic movement of the 19th-century. The novel in part describes the author's wanderings in the forest of Fontainebleau and in Switzerland. Sénanour's restlessness, his disillusionment, and his torment of body and soul are, however, the real subject of his work. In its analytical, introspective concerns, Oberman foreshadows the development of modern fiction.

Oberon. In medieval legend, the king of the fairies. Probably an outgrowth of Alberich, the king of the elves, he appears in the medieval French romance Huon de Bordeaux as the son of Julius Caesar and Morgan Le Fay.

In Shakespeare's Midsummer Night's Dream, he is a strong-willed figure who resorts to a trick to obtain from Titania, his wife, the services of her changeling page. He dispatches Puck to anoint the sleeping queen with a love potion. In her drugged state, she makes love to Bottom and is so ashamed when she awakes that she agrees to Oberon's demand.

objective correlative. A phrase coined by T. S. Eliot in his essay Hamlet (1919). The term refers to the external equivalent of an inner emotional reality. Thus a scene, action, image, verse rhythm, or any other artistic device that expresses a subjective state may be regarded as its objective correlative.

objectivism. (1) In philosophy, a theory emphasizing external reality or the objective truth of man's knowledge; also, in ethics, stressing the objectivity of moral good.

(2) In literary history, a term used to describe a movement or theory of composition in which material objects are selected, and studied and presented for their own sakes rather than for any extraneous purposes, such as their suitability for symbolizing an emotion or intellectual concept of the author. The work of William Carlos Williams, who first used the term, is a good example of objectivism; Marianne Moore and Wallace Stevens have also been called objectivist poets. See Imagism; Symbolism.

Oblomov (1859). A novel by Ivan Goncharov. The work is one of the outstanding classics of Russian realistic fiction of the 19th century. The hero, Ilya Ilyich Oblomov, a Russian landowner living in St. Petersburg, is the embodiment of physical and mental laziness. His chief activities are indulging in reveries while lying on his couch and occasionally quarreling with his gloomy, coarse servant Zakhar. Oblomov's robe and slippers, his almost constant apparel, become part of his character in the course of the book. Oblomov ignores his business affairs, although the estate on which he depends for his income and comfortable existence is being mismanaged and rapidly going to ruin. Contrasted to Oblomov is his friend Andrei Sholtoz, the model of the efficient man of business. All his efforts to rouse Oblomov to some kind of action end in failure. Not even the love offered by the young Olga Ilinskaya can move Oblomov to give up his way of life. Although he loves Olga, Oblomov chooses the peaceful, effortless existence he can have by marrying Agaf'ya Pshenitzyna, his landlady. Olga marries Sholtiz, and Oblomov, coddled by Agaf'ya, sinks deeper into reverie and financial ruin until he dies.

Goncharov's novel holds a secure place in classic Russian literature on the basis of the characterization of its central character. Oblomov has come to symbolize all that is slothful in man's nature. The reasons cited for his inactivity range from the social situation in Russia under serfdom to the superior sensibility of the hero. Since the well-known essay by the critic Nikolai Dobroluylov, Chto takoye oblo- moshchina? (What is Oblomovshchina? 1859), the main emphasis in Russian criticism has been on the social aspect of Oblomov's malady. The novel has also been regarded as a forerunner of later psychological discoveries because of the hero's anxieties, self-questioning, his reliving childhood in a dream, and the part these things are shown to play in his adult life.

Obregón, Alvaro (1860–1902). Mexican soldier and political leader. Carranza's ablest general in the struggle that followed the overthrow of Francisco Madero, Obregón became president in 1920. During his administration some economic and social reforms were initiated, especially in education, but there was continuing conflict with the U.S. and the Roman Catholic Church. Re-elected in 1928, Obregón was assassinated by a religious fanatic before he could take office.

O'Brien, Fitz-James (1828–1862). Irish-born American writer. He is noted for his remarkable short stories of the weird and uncanny, including The Diamond Lens (1858) and What Was It (1859). He wrote primarily for magazines and today he is considered among the forerunners of the modern science-fiction writer.

O Captain! My Captain! (1865). A poem by Walt Whitman. Commemorating the death of Abraham Lincoln, it is written in conventional rhyme and meter. The Captain, who has brought the ship of state to a safe port, has “fallen cold and dead.”

O'Casey, Sean (1884–1964). Irish dramatist. Born and reared in a Dublin slum, O'Casey very early in life developed the two abiding concerns that were to characterize his life and work: a fierce uncontrolled vitality of language and a rigid, uncompromising social conscience. The artistic fusion of these elements has resulted in two of the most powerful plays written in the 20th century, Juno and the Paycock and The Plough and the Stars. Hindered by bad eyesight, so that he was unable to read until the age of 12, O'Casey compensated for his late start by developing a voracious appetite for books. At the same time he became active in the revolutionary movement as an organizer of the transport strike of 1913 and a member of the Irish Citizens Army. He also joined the Gaelic League, learned the Irish language, and gained an entrance into the literary world.

The first of his plays to be produced was The Shadow of a Guzman (1923), a play presented by the Abbey Theatre, with which O'Casey was to be associated for the next six years. In 1924, the Abbey presented Juno and the Paycock. Regarded by many as O'Casey's masterpiece, Juno is a masterly blend of comedy and tragedy, set against the background of the Irish civil war. The production of The Plough and the Stars (1926) was greeted with rioting on the Dublin streets, as a result of the alleged anti-Irish sentiment of the play. In 1928 the Abbey Theatre rejected O'Casey's next play, The Silver Tassie, the rejection resulting in O'Casey's breaking his connection with the Abbey. The Silver Tassie, an expressionist drama dealing with World War I, was produced in London in 1929. Within the Gates, another play in the expressionist mode, appeared in 1933, revealing once again his strong sympathy with the lower classes. O'Casey's subsequent plays have been less successful, frequently hampered by the somewhat doctrinaire socialist message imposed upon them. Among these are Purple Dust (1940), The Star Turns Red (1940), and Red Roses for Me (1947).

In 1939, O'Casey published I Knock at the Door, the first book of his six-volume autobiography. It was followed by Pictures in the Hallway (1942), Drums Under the Window (1945), Inishfallen Fare Thee Well (1949), Roses and Crowns (1952), and Sunset and Evening Star (1954). "Autobiography" is perhaps too precise a term for these highly lyrical, occasionally florid, always vivid accounts of his struggle to wrest some order and significance from the anarchic events of the first half of the 20th century. See Irish Renaissance.

Oecolomus or Ockham, William of (c. 1285–1349). English scholastic philosopher and theologian, known as "Doctor Invincibilis" and "Venerabilis Inceptor." He joined the Franciscans, was a partisan of strict observance in their controversy over evangelical poverty, and became general of the order in 1342. In his Dialogus (c. 1343) he summarizes many of his previous writings, contesting the temporal power of the Pope and asserting that a king has independent authority in civil affairs.

Oecolomus' philosophy was greatly influenced by his teacher Duns Scotus, although later they were rivals in scholastic disputes. He revived a modified Nominalism, maintaining the distinction between concrete realities and the abstraction of universals. Thus he claimed that purely intellectual abstractions are not valid knowledge and that reasoning must be based on experimental proof. In this view, the basis of the later position known as theological scepticism, the existence and attributes of God are not susceptible of proof by human reason, but can only be approached through intuition.

Occleve or Hoccleve, Thomas (c. 1360–c. 1450). English poet, a copy clerk in the Privy Seal Office. He addressed to Prince Hal, later Henry V, his De Regimine Principum (On the Governance of Princes, c. 1411–1412), a treatise of 5463 lines in rhyme royal on the responsibilities of rulers, adapted from earlier similar works. Its long autobiographical preface (2,000 lines) includes a eulogy of Chaucer. Other autobiographical poems include La Male Règle (1406), about his unruly youth, and Complaint and Dialogue to a Friend (both c. 1421–1422), about his nervous breakdown. Of his other minor poems and translations, his Mother of God, a lyrical hymn to Mary, was formerly attributed to Chaucer.

Occupation, the. During World War II, especially, the occupation of France by German forces (1940–1945). See VICHY government.
Oceanus (Okeanos). In Greek myth, a river. It was believed to flow in a boundless circle around the earth. Homer names Oceanus as the origin of all things, including the gods. In Hesiod's Theogony he is a Titan, son of Uranus and Ge (Heaven and Earth). Oceanus and his wife Tethys bore 3,000 sons, the Rivers, and 3,000 daughters, the Water Nymphs (Oceanides). He appears in Aeschylus' Prometheus Bound.

Ochiltree, Edie. One of Sir Walter Scott's more engaging characters, a garrulous, kind-hearted, wandering beggar in The Antiquary.

Ochino, Bernardino (1487–1564). Italian Capuchin monk. Ochino became vicar-general of the Capuchin order (1538) but was attracted to the ideas of the Protestant reformers Juan de Valdés and Reginald Pole. He finally fled Italy and traveled about Europe, stopping in England from 1547 to 1553. His surviving works include Predicke and Dialoghi, sermons and dialogues in which he embodies his religious thought.

Ochs, Adolph Simon (1858–1935). American publisher and editor. In 1896, Ochs came to New York, after losing most of his money in the panic of 1893; he bought The New York Times, which had been nearly destroyed by the Hearst and Pulitzer competition. Realizing that his newspaper could not compete with the sensational dailies, he appealed to readers with the slogan: "All the news that's fit to print." Dignified and nonpartisan, offering additional features including book reviewing, foreign news coverage, and financial reporting, The New York Times rapidly increased its circulation, becoming one of the most influential newspapers in the country. Ochs also published the Philadelphia Times (1902–1912) and the Philadelphia Public Ledger (1902–1912). His interest in public welfare led him to found the Chattanooga Lookout Mountain Park and make possible the publication of the Dictionary of American Biography.

Ochs von Lerchenau, Baron. See Rosenkavalier, Der.

Ockham, William of. See William of Ockam.

Ocynus, rope of. Profitless labor. Ocynus, in Roman fable, was always twisting a rope, but an ass ate it as fast as it was twisted.

O'Connell, Daniel (1775–1847). Irish nationalist, statesman, and orator. He was a prominent lawyer who became known as an opponent of the Act of Union (1801), the Church of Ireland, and the civil disabilities placed on Catholics because of their religion. He founded the Catholic Association, which, gaining quietly and impressively in strength and numbers, was suppressed in 1825. O'Connell was elected to Parliament (1828), but refused to take his seat until Wellington's hard-won Catholic Emancipation Act (1829) went through Parliament. He was elected (1831) to lord mayor of Dublin. When the Tory Sir Robert Peel became prime minister, O'Connell resumed his agitation for an independent Ireland. He re-established the Catholic Association, Peel declared it illegal, and O'Connell was tried and convicted for conspiracy; the decision was reversed by the House of Lords. O'Connell's stay in prison, however, weakened his health and he died on his way to Italy to convalesce. A radical group within O'Connell's, Young Ireland, steadily gained adherents to the violent policy that O'Connell had consistently opposed.

O'Connor, Flannery (1925–1964). American novelist. Born in Georgia, Miss O'Connor takes Southern settings for the locale of her stories. Wise Blood (1952), her first novel, was praised for its originality and stark power. The Violent Bear It Away (1960) is a quasi-comic novel populated with compelling and grotesque characters. A Good Man Is Hard to Find (1955) is a collection of some of her short stories. She was considered among the most promising of the younger contemporary novelists.

O'Connor, Frank. Pen name of Michael O'Donovan (1903– ). Irish short-story writer and author of poetic translations from Gaelic. He was encouraged by AE and was for a time one of the directors of the Abbey Theatre. O'Connor's work is noted for its sense of humor, its realism, and its poetic sensitivity. Guests of the Nation (1931) is a collection of short stories about the Irish-English troubles. Dutch Interior (1940) is a collection of separate stories which together paint a discouraging picture of Irish life. Later stories, such as The Holy Door and Up-rooted, are fine comedies. An Only Child (1960) is a memoir of the author's childhood and youth.

O'Crohan, Thomas (1856–1937). Irish author of The Islandman (1929), an autobiography in Gaelic of a peasant from the Blasket Isles. He states that his purpose in writing is "to set down the character of the people about me so that some record of us might live after us, for the like of us will never be again."

octameter. In prosody, a line of verse containing eight metrical feet, which may be in any meter, usually identified together with the name of the meter, as iambo octameter, trochaic octameter, etc. Octameter is the longest line designated by a special term; beyond octameter, it would be necessary to speak of the nine-foot line, ten-foot line, and so on. Such lengthy lines, however, are rare.

Octavia (d. 11 B.C.). Roman matron. The sister of Octavius Caesar, she married Mark Antony after the death of her first husband in 41 B.C. Antony divorced her in 32 when Cleopatra came into his life. One of her daughters by Antony became the mother of Caligula, and the other the grandmother of Nero.

She is a character in Shakespeare's Antony and Cleopatra, in which she is described as being "of a holy, cold, and still conversation." She also appears in Dryden's All for Love.

Octavius Caesar. See Augustus.

Octopus, The (1901). A novel by Frank Norris. The first of a projected trilogy on American wheat, the novel depicts the struggle for power between California wheat ranchers and the railroad, "the octopus" that encircles and strangles them. With its epic sweep, the novel includes two love affairs, one involving the mystical Vanamee, and comes to a climax with a pitched battle between farmers and railroad men. The Pit is its sequel.

Octoroon, The (1859). A play by Dion Boucicault. Based on an English novel, the play treats the subject of slavery. Zoe, a slave of mixed blood, must be sold by a man who loves her to another, whom they both hate. The first of many works treating the theme of mixed blood, the play was revived in New York during 1961.
ode. In prosody, a lyric poem of exalted emotion, devoted to the praise or celebration of its subject.

(1) The Pindaric Ode was first composed in ancient Greece by Pindar and other poets for choral recitation, and written in units of three stanzas each, called respectively the strophe, antistrophe, and epode. The chorus moved up one side of the orchestra chanting the strophe, down the other chanting the antistrophe, and came to a stop before the audience to chant the epode. The ode continued in this way to its end. Modern poets using this form do not, of course, write for such performance, but they still use its basic construction. Their first three stanzas usually have rhyme and are constructed with great freedom and variety; the pattern then repeats these three stanza forms as a unit throughout the poem.

(2) The Horatian or stanzaic ode is written in a succession of stanzas that follow the pattern of the first stanza, which may be in any form. Horace used this form, as did Keats in his Ode to a Nightingale.

(3) The irregular ode is a modern invention and has no regular pattern at all; it came about through misunderstanding (by the English poet William Collins) of the Pindaric form. William Wordsworth's Ode: Intimations of Immortality is perhaps the best-known example.

Ode: Intimations of Immortality from Recollections of Early Childhood (1807). A famous poem by William Wordsworth. It is based on the Platonic doctrine of "recollection," which asserts that the process of learning is actually only a recollection to the adult mind of knowledge gained in a pre-existent spiritual realm and lost to the individual at birth. Wordsworth's poem celebrates the child who, "trailing clouds of glory," still retains in infancy memories of his celestial abode. Although the mature man has forgotten this knowledge, we are told, he can regain it by heeding his intuition and remembering his own childhood.

Ode on a Grecian Urn (1819). A famous ode by John Keats. It describes the perfection and timelessness of art, as contrasted to the living world of change, in the figures of the youth and his "unravished bride" whom he can never possess and never ceases desiring:

Forever wilt thou love, and she be fair!

Odessas Tales (1927). A collection of short stories by Issak Babel. Set in the Soviet writer's birthplace, the Black Sea city of Odessa, the stories are also known as Jewish Tales ( Yemenitskiye rasskazy).

Ode to a Nightingale (1819). A poem by John Keats. It expresses the emotions of the poet as he listens to the song of the nightingale, his vision of sensuous beauty, and his melancholy as he feels his own mortality in contrast to the immortality of the bird's song:

Thou wast not born for death, immortal Bird!

No hungry generations tread thee down; The voice I hear this passing night was heard In ancient days by emperor and clown:

Perhaps the self-same song that found a path Through the sad heart of Ruth, when, sick for home, She stood in tears amid the alien corn;

The same that caused the faery daisies to blush With a lower voice When in some sad hour I hear the friendless wren's shrill trill, Supposing it the voice of my untried spirit,

Ode to the West Wind (1820). One of the best-known poems by Percy Bysshe Shelley. In it the poet addresses the wild, strong wind of autumn—as he was once, "tameless, and swift, and proud"—and implores that it may now inspirit him with its force.

Scatter, as from an unextinguished hearth Ashes and sparks, my words among mankind! Be through my lips to unawakened earth The trumpet of a prophecy! O, Wind, If Winter comes, can Spring be far behind?

Odets, Clifford (1906-1963). American playwright. Odets was acclaimed in the 1930's as an outstanding proletarian dramatist. His first two plays, which are often considered his best, are concerned with the class struggle: Waiting for Lefty and Awake and Sing. He continued to use socialist themes in his succeeding plays. Till the Day I Die (1935) deals with the Communist underground movement in Nazi Germany. Paradise Lost (1935) depicts the decline of a middle-class family. Golden Boy (1937) portrays a young Italian-American who should have been a violinist but who chooses the easier way to fame through boxing. Night Music (1940) and Clash by Night (1941) are two later plays written before Odets turned to Hollywood. With The Country Girl (1950), later made into a movie, he managed to repeat his early success. The play marks the end of his preoccupation with political themes; it centers on the struggle of a young woman to remain faithful to her dissolute husband. The Flowering Peach (1954) was less successful.

Odets was at first an actor with the Theatre Guild; in 1931, he became one of the founders of the Group Theatre, which later produced his best-known plays.

Odette de Crécy. A cocotte in Marcel Proust's Remembrance of Things Past. At first "the lady in pink" introduced to the narrator by his great-uncle Adolphe, she becomes the mistress and then the wife of Charles Swann, and by him the mother of Gilberte. After Swann's death she marries his rival, de Forcheville; then, a widow again, she becomes the mistress of the duc de Guermantes.

Odin. The Scandinavian name of the Anglo-Saxon god Woden. He was the supreme god of the later Scandinavian pantheon, having supplanted Thor.

Odin was god of wisdom, poetry, war, and agriculture, and on this latter account Wednesday (Woden's day) was considered to be specially favorable for sowing. He was god of the dead also, and presided over the banquet of those slain in battle. See Valhalla. He became the All-wise by drinking from Mimir's fountain, but purchased the distinction at the cost of one eye, and is usually represented as a one-eyed man wearing a hat and carrying a staff. His remaining eye is the Sun.

The father of Odin was Bor. His brothers are Vili and Ve. His wife is Frigga. His sons are Thor and Balder. His mansion is Gladsheim. His court as war god is Valhalla. His two black ravens are Hugin (thought) and Munin (memory). His steed is Sleipnir. His ships are Skiethladder and Naglfar. His spear is Gungnir, which never fails to hit the mark aimed at. His ring is called Draupnir, which every ninth night drops eight other rings of equal value. His Odysseus. The hero of Homer's Odyssey and an important figure in many other classical myths. In the Iliad and the Odyssey, he is shrewd and wily, but also generous and noble. In the works of later authors he becomes, for the most part, cruel and cunning. This is his character, for instance, in Sophocles' tragedy Philoctetes. He appears also in a humorous treatment of the episode of Polyphemus' cave in Euripides' satyr play Cyclops. He is one of the great epic characters of literature. He was called Ulysses by the Romans.

Odyssey. An epic poem by Homer. It recounts the adventures of Odysseus on his way home to Ithaca after the Trojan War. Though written in heroic verse, it has been called the first novel because of its exciting narrative and the effective use of flashbacks to heighten the dramatic action. The poem opens on Ogygia, the far western island of the sea nymph Calypso. She has kept Odysseus imprisoned on her island for seven years, offering him immortality as an inducement to stay with her, but Odysseus insists on returning to his wife Penelope. The story now turns to Odysseus' son Telemachus, back home in Ithaca. Penelope's suitors have been eating them out of house and home. Resolving, under the influence of Athene, to be a man, he sets out to find his father. He first consults Nestor in Pylos, then Menelaus in Sparta, who tells Telemachus that he has learned of Odysseus' captivity in Ogygia.

Meanwhile, on Zeus' orders, Calypso has released Odysseus. Shipwrecked on the Phaeacian island of Scheria, he is befriended first by the young Nausicaa, then by her parents, King Alcinous and Queen Arete. At a banquet, he reveals his identity and tells the story of his wanderings. After leaving Troy and making a raid on the Ciconians, he landed in the country of the Lotus-eaters. There some of his men ate the lotus, which made them forget their homes, and they had to be carried away by force. Next time they landed on the island where the Cyclops lived; they were trapped by Polyphemus in his cave, and those not eaten escaped by a trick after blinding the Cyclops. It is this deed that won the enmity of Poseidon, the father of Polyphemus. Reaching the island of Aeolus, Odysseus was given the unfavorable winds in a leather bag, so that they were blown straight toward home. But Odysseus' men, thinking that the bag held treasure, opened it, and they were blown back to Aeolus' island, where the god refused to help them again. The cannibal Laestrygonians destroyed all but one of Odysseus' ships. Odysseus and his crew reached Aeaea, where the enchantress Circe turned most of the men into swine. However, Hermes gave Odysseus a bowl filled with moly which saved him, and he frightened Circe into changing his men back to their normal shapes. Next, Odysseus descended into Hades to learn from the ghost of Tiresias how he would reach home. Following Circe's advice, he was able to avoid Scylla and Charybdis, with a loss of only six men, and sailed past the sirens without danger by putting wax in his men's ears. Odysseus, however, had himself tied to the mast so that he could enjoy their song. The crew would probably have reached Ithaca in safety, had not the men stolen the cattle of Helios on the island of Thrinacia, for which crime the ship was destroyed by a thunderbolt, and only Odysseus was saved by being cast ashore on Ogygia.

When they hear this harrowing tale, the Phaeacians send Odysseus home to Ithaca on one of their ships, laden with rich presents. After he has landed, Poseidon avenges himself on the Phaeacians by turning the ship into stone. Disguised by Athene as a beggar, Odysseus stays in the hut of the faithful swineherd Eumaeus while he determines how to rid his house of suitors. At first he is recognized by his old dog Argus, somewhat later by his mother Anticleia. He is ridiculed by the suitors and by the beggar Ilaus, whose jaw Odysseus breaks. With Telemachus' help, Odysseus hides the suitors' weapons, locks them in the great hall, and the palace and shoots them down with his bow. His wife and aged father are finally reunited to him and he reestablishes himself as king of Ithaca, when Athene calms the resentment of the suitors' families.

The Odyssey, like the Iliad, was attributed by the ancient Greeks to the poet Homer. Many modern scholars feel that this masterful dramatic structure and fairly consistent style are his work, for the most part at least. However, it is thought to be a somewhat later composition than the Iliad, although belonging to the same general period. Also, while the Iliad is a collection of mythical material that grew up about an event that actually seems to have occurred toward the end of Mycenaean era, the Odyssey is largely a collection of folk tales, many of which are easily recognizable in the tales of other lands. These tales have been given continuity and coherence by attributing the adventures to a single hero, and, moreover, by reworking each incident so that it contributes to a consistent picture of that hero. The consistency of the author's concept of Odysseus as a fictional character can be appreciated by comparing him with Heracles, whose saga is also the result of a gradual accretion of unrelated tales, but whose adventures were never told in a unified work of literature.

The monumental and complex figure of Odysseus and the chief work in which his adventures were told have had a perennial fascination for later writers. The most remarkable work that has been inspired by the Odyssey was James Joyce's novel Ulysses, in which a single day's events in the life of Leopold Bloom, a notably unheroic Jewish citizen of Dublin, are made to conform to the pattern of the Odyssey.

More recently, the Greek poet Nikos Kazantzakis undertook to relate the further adventures of Odysseus in The Odyssey: A Modern Sequel.

Odyssey: A Modern Sequel, The (1938). An epic poem by Nikos Kazantzakis. It was translated into English verse by Kimon Friar in 1958. The poem was begun in 1925 and reworked through seven versions, and was intended as the summation of the author's philosophical attitudes. It contains 24 books, and is richly flavored with the idioms and rhythms of Greek folk songs and legends, the earthy language of shepherds and fishermen. The poem's prologue and epilogue are invocations to the sun; fire and light supply the poem's dominant imagery. The journeys of Odysseus are presented as an agonized but ecstatic struggle toward freedom and purity of spirit.

The modern sequel is grafted to the Homeric epic at Book XXII, just after Odysseus has slain the suitors of Penelope. Although the mythological setting is retained for its hero's further adventures in Ithaca, Sparta, Crete, and down the length of Africa to his death at the South Pole, Kazantzakis has said that his Odyssey is "a new epical-dramatic attempt of the modern man to find deliverance by passing through all the stages of contemporary anxieties and by pursuing the most daring hopes."

Oedipe (Oedipus, 1659). A tragedy by Pierre Corneille. Based on the Oedipus Rex of Sophocles, it is marred by the addition of Dirce, a character invented by the author, sister of Oedipus and beloved of Theseus, prince of Athens. The Oedipe (1718) of Voltaire, his first tragedy, suffers from a similar irrelevancy, the introduction of Jocasta's former lover Philoctetes, who is briefly suspected of murdering Laius.

Oedipus (Oidipous). In Greek mythology, the son of Laius, of the Theban dynasty founded by Cadmus, and of Jocasta (or Epicasta). He is the tragic hero of many dramas, most notably of Sophocles' Oedipus Rex (Oidipous Tyrannos) and Oedipus at Colonus (Oidipous epi Kolonoi). His story is told also in the Iliad and in the many works dealing with his sons (see Seven against Thebes).

In the most familiar version of the myth, Laius, having learned from an oracle that he would be killed by his own son, thrust a spike through the infant's feet and had him exposed on Mt. Cithaeron. Rescued by a shepherd, he was raised by the childless king Polybus of Corinth and his wife Periboea (or Merope) as their own son. When he grew to manhood, Oedipus was warned by the Delphic oracle that he would kill his father and marry his mother. Avoiding Corinth in horror, he met Laius on the road and, not knowing him, killed him in an argument. He proceeded to Thebes, which was then being ravaged by the Sphinx. When Oedipus answered her riddle, the Sphinx killed herself and the regent Creon offered him the throne of Thebes and the hand of Laius' widow Jocasta, who was Creon's sister. Later, famine struck Thebes and the Delphic oracle advised Creon to cast from the city the slayer of Laius. The seer Tiresias and an old shepherd revealed Oedipus' identity, Jocasta committed suicide, and Oedipus blinded himself with her brooch.

Banished from the city and shunned by his sons, Eteocles and Polynices, he cursed them and wandered, an outcast, for many years. At last, his faithful daughter Antigone led him to a grove at Colonus sacred to the Eumenides. Creon tried to force his return to Thebes so that his body, buried outside the gates, would magically protect the city in war. But Theseus, the king of nearby Athens, defended him and, dying, Oedipus promised that his tomb would guard Athens from harm.

The story of Oedipus was told also by Seneca in his tragedy Oedipus and by Jean Cocteau in his play The Infernal Machine and in his libretto for Stravinsky's opera Oedipus Rex. In the 19th-century Golden Legend of Jacobus de Voragine and other medieval works, the Laius-Jocasta-Oedipus myth was attached to the legend of Judas Iscariot. It is a theme common in folk lore.

Oedipus at Colonus (Oidipous epi Kolonoi). See OEDIPUS.

Oedipus complex. Attachment to a parent of the opposite sex. Sigmund Freud used this term to describe a supposedly universal emotional process in which young boys are sexually attracted to their mothers and resent their fathers as rivals. Given normal family relationships, the conflict is resolved in childhood; otherwise, it may result in many emotional problems in adult life. See OEDIPUS.

Oedipus Rex (Oidipous Tyrannos). See OEDIPUS.

Oehlenschläger, Adam Gottlob (1779-1850). Danish poet and playwright. The leader of the romantic movement in Denmark, Oehlenschläger enjoyed a period of intense creativity during his early years. Guldhorne (The Gold Horns, 1802) is a romantic poem that extolled the glory of his country's past. His poetic dramas, based on Scandinavian myth and legend, include Sanct-Hansatten-Spil (The Play of St. John's Eve, 1803) and Aladdin (1805). Among his northern tragedies are Hakon Jarl (Earl Hakon, 1848) and Balder hin Gode (Baldir the Good, 1808).

Oenomaus (Oinomaoi). See Pelops.

Oenone (Oinone). In classic myth a nymph of Mount Ida. She had the gift of prophecy, and told her husband Paris that his voyage to Greece would involve him and his country (Troy) in ruin. According to the legend, Paris came back to her beseeching her to heal his severe wounds, but she refused, and changed her mind too late. When the dead body of old Priam's son was laid at her feet, she stabbed herself. This story forms the subject of Tennyson's Oenone and The Death of Oenone.

Oeneon. In Jean Racine's tragedy Phèdre, the nurse of Phèdre. She persuades her mistress to declare her passion to Hippolyte, and she later convinces King Theseus that Hippolyte made advances to Phèdre. Thus, it is Oeneon who brings about the ruin of Hippolyte and Phèdre. Realizing this, she kills herself.

Oenopion (Oinopion). In classic myth, father of Merope, to whom the giant Orion made advances. Oenopion, unwilling to give his daughter to him, put out the giant's eyes in a drunken fit.

O'Farolain, Sean (1900- ). Irish novelist, short-story writer, biographer, playwright, and teacher. A Nest of Simple Folk (1933) describes the movement of some ordinary Irish people toward a decision to join in the rebellion. Bird Alone (1936) and Come Back to Erin (1940) are novels which, like most of his later work, attack Irish provincialism and the repressive censorship of Catholicism. He is the author of biographies of Eamon de Valera (1933) and the Irish patriot Daniel O'Connell (1938). I Remember! I Remember (1961) is a book of short stories. See IRISH RENAISSANCE.

It is a study of his struggle for independence, his intellectual development, and his attempt to become an artist. Philip gets entangled and obsessed by his love affair with Mildred, a waitress. After years of struggle as a medical student he marries a nice girl, gives up his aspirations, and becomes a country doctor. The first part of the novel is partly autobiographical, and the book is regarded as Maugham's best work.

O'Flaherty, Liam (1897- ). Irish novelist and short-story writer. Although he has spent much time wandering adventurously around the world, O'Flaherty always writes about the Irish life among the poor and in his native Aran Islands. The Informer, a novel about the Irish revolution, is his best-known book. Much of his finest work appears in his short stories, many of them masterpieces of bare, lyrical realism: Spring Sowing (1926), Two Lovely Beasts and Other Stories (1948), and other collections. Famine (1937) is a historical novel. He wrote several "melodramas of the soul," novels compounded, like Graham Greene's, of the thriller and the psychoanalytic case history: The Black Soul (1925), Mr. Gilhooley (1926) and The Assassin (1928). Autobiographical and travel books are Two Years (1930) and I Went to Russia (1931). See IRISH RENAISSANCE.

Of Time and the River: A Legend of Man's Hunger in His Youth (1935). A novel by Thomas Wolfe. It is a sequel to Look Homeward, Angel, in which Eugene GANT, the hero, spends two years as a graduate student at Harvard, returns home for the dramatic death of his father, and teaches literature in New York City at the “School for Utility Cultures” (New York University). Eventually he tours France, returning home financially and emotionally exhausted. When the manuscript of the novel was submitted to Maxwell Perkins of Scribner’s, it was several thousand pages long. Perkins helped Wolfe to edit and divide the material into two sections, some of which was included in The Web and The Rock.

Og. According to rabbinical mythology, an antediluvian giant (Deut. 3:11) saved from the Flood by climbing on the roof of Noah’s ark. Og’s bedstead, made of iron, was above 15 feet long and nearly seven feet broad. Legend relates that Og picked up a mountain to hurl at the Israelites but got so entangled with his burden that Moses was easily able to kill him.

Ogham or Ogam. The traditional alphabet of the ancient British and Irish people. It was used in writing on wood or stone and was supposedly invented by one Ogmna. Ogham, and the language associated with it, was employed by the druids; it died in the fifth century with the coming of Christianity.

Ogier, François. See TIR ET SIMON.

Ogier the Dane. A hero of medieval French romances, one of Charlemagne’s paladins. He is probably based on the Frankish warrior Autgarus, who first opposed Charlemagne, then joined him. According to tradition, however, he is held as hostage for his father Geoffrey of Dannemarch (probably a region in the Ardennes, but later understood as Denmark). He gains Charlemagne’s favor for his deeds in Italy, but kills the queen’s nephew to retaliae for the death of his own son in a quarrel, and is pursued and imprisoned. Released to fight against the Saracens in Spain, he again wins favor and is eventually given the siefs of Hainaut and Brabant.

According to another legend, MORGAN LE FAY has him brought to AVALON when he is 100 years old. She introduces him to King Arthur and rejuvenates him, sends him out to fight for France, but snatches him back before he can marry, to wait until he is next needed.

He is identified with the Danish national hero HOLGER DANSKE.

O’Hara, John [Henry] (1905– ). American short-story writer and novelist. Noted for his uncanny ear and skillful rendering of dialogue, O’Hara, who was born in Potsville, Pa., began his career as a newspaperman. His short stories and novels, many of them set in the fictitious town of Gibsville, Pa., form a commentary on contemporary American manners and morals. Among his best-known short-story collections are The Doctor’s Son and Other Stories (1935) and Pal Joey (1940), which was made into a successful musical with music and lyrics by Richard Rodgers and Lorenz Hart. As a novelist, O’Hara established his reputation with Appointment in Samarra (1934), his famous first novel, and Butterfield 8 (1935), which deals with the promiscuous Gloria Wandrus. His later books include A Rage to Live (1949), Ten North Frederick (1955), From the Terrace (1958), Sermons and Soda-Water (1961), The Cape Cod Lighter (1962), Elizabeth Appleton (1963), The Hat on the Bed (1963), and The Horse Knows the Way (1964).

After writing scenarios in California, she moved to a ranch in Wyoming and wrote three novels about horses: My Friend Flicka (1941), Thunderhead (1943), and The Green Grass of Wyoming (1946). She discusses her own novel, The Son of Adam Wingate (1952), in Novel-in-the-Making (1954). She is also a composer of popular musical works, among which Wyoming Suite for Piano (1946) is the most ambitious.

O’Hara, Scarlett. The willful and colorful heroine of Margaret Mitchell’s historical novel Gone with the Wind.

O’Higgins, Bernardo (1778–1842). Chilean general and statesman. The natural son of Irish-born Ambrose O’Higgins, who served as viceroy of Peru, he became commander of Chile’s revolutionary forces in 1813. Defeated by the Spaniards at Rancagua, he fled to Argentina where he joined San Martín’s army of liberation. After the army’s heroic march across the Andes, San Martín and O’Higgins were victorious at the battles of Chacabuco and Maipu and declared the independence of Chile (1818). As supreme director of Chile, O’Higgins proved a vigorous, enlightened ruler, but clerical and conservative opposition to some of his reforms and his harsh treatment of political opponents led to his ouster in 1823. He spent the rest of his life in Lima, Peru. A province of Chile is named for him.

After the devastating dust storms of the 1930’s, these men and their families, most of whom were from Oklahoma, were forced to leave their land and seek work elsewhere. Many of them became migrant workers in the fruit orchards of California. John Steinbeck’s novel The Grapes of Wrath is about an Okie family.

Old Believers. In Russian history, dissenters opposed to the 17th-century liturgical reforms of Patriarch Nikon. The disagreement resulted in a split in the Russian Church during the 17th century. One of the leaders of the dissidents was the priest Avvakum, who described in his autobiography the sufferings he endured for his cause. In 1667 a church council excommunicated Avvakum and his followers, branding them with the name Raspolni (schismatic) by which the sect continued to be known.

Old Buck, Jonathan. In Scott’s Antiquary, the laird of Monkbarns, an old antiquary devoted to the study and accumulation of old coins and medals. Although he is sarcastic, irritable, and a woman hater, his character is tempered with kindness and humor.

Oldcastle, Sir John (1377–1417). The model for Shakespeare’s famous character Sir John Falstaff. A play called Sir John Oldcastle, now ascribed to Anthony Munday, was printed in 1600 as the work of Shakespeare. There are indications that in both parts of Henry IV the name Oldcastle was originally used but later changed to Falstaff.

Old Comedy. A style of comedy. The plays of Aristophanes are the only surviving examples. Like tragedy, it evolved from the rituals in honor of Dionysus, and the two have in common the use of the chorus in parodos, exodos, and lyric interludes between episodes of dialogue. Comedy, however, apparently developed out of the parts of the Dionysiac festivals most directly concerned with fertility: ritual marriage and feast, bawdy jokes and songs. This ancient religious sanction accounts for both the obscenity and the freedom of political commentary in the plays. Other characteristics of Old Comedy are the pseigos, a kind of patter song sung by the chorus in one breath; the agon (contest), in which the two halves of the chorus argue violently over some contemporary question; and the parabasis, in which the chorus address directly to the audience an elaborate plea to reward the author with their approval. Old Comedy reached its end with the defeat of Athens in the Peloponnesian War, after which freedom of speech was greatly curtailed.

Old Creole Days (1879). A collection of short stories by George W. Cable, dealing with 19th-century New Orleans. Noted for their local color and their use of dialect, the stories are a blend of realism and romance. Madame Delphine, included in later editions of the book, was a tale of miscegenation, as was Tite Foulette. Other stories were Ah Poquelin, the story of a former slave trader; Café des Exilés, a tale with a smuggling plot; and Belles Demoiselles, a story about a proud father’s loss.

Old Curiosity Shop, The (1840). A novel by Charles Dickens. The heroine, Nell Trent, better known as Little Nell, lives with her grandfather, an old man who keeps a curiosity shop. In order to make some money for Little Nell, the grandfather borrows from the hunchback Daniel Quilp. An obsessive gambler, the grandfather loses all that he has and Quilp takes over the Old Curiosity Shop. Little Nell and her grandfather leave and roam about the countryside as beggars. They meet Thomas Codlin and his traveling puppet show and work for Mrs. Jarley’s Wax Works. Mr. Marton, a kindly schoolmaster, gives them a house near an old church, and Little Nell tends the graves. When Kit Nubbles, their only friend, and the grandfather’s brother finally locate them after a long search, Little Nell is dead; her grandfather dies shortly thereafter. Kit marries Barbara and tells the story of Little Nell to his children. The Old Curiosity Shop is torn down to make way for a new building. Many modern readers have found Dickens overly sentimental about Little Nell. Some well-known characters from the book include Sampson and Sarah Brass; Dick Swiveller; the Marchioness.

Oldenbourg, Zoé (1916– ). Russian-born French historical novelist. The World Is Not Enough (Argile; 1946) and its sequel The Cornerstone (Pierre Angulaire; 1953), as well as Destiny of Fire (Les Brûlés; 1960), take place during the Crusades of the Middle Ages. Old Man and the Sea. The (1952). A novelette by Ernest Hemingway. It movingly depicts an old Cuban fisherman who has been 84 days without a catch. Far from port on the 85th day he hooks a gigantic marten, and, against great odds in a battle lasting two days, brings the fish alongside and harpoons it. Soon sharks appear, and the old man breaks his knife after he has killed only a few; during the last night of the voyage home, the sharks devour all but the head of the great fish. The story has been interpreted as an allegory of man's inevitable defeat in the struggle with existence; in spite of defeat, however, man can fight with dignity, courage, and stoicism.

given over to cleaning the moss from old gravestones, cutting new inscriptions, and erecting new stones for fallen Covenanters.

Old Mortality (1839). A short novel by Katherine Anne Porter. It appeared in the collection
Pale Horse, Pale Rider, which also included Noon
Wine, as well as the title story. The child Miranda has heard for many years her family speaking with a nostalgia that approaches reverence of her now dead aunt, who had been known for her grace and beauty.
In adolescence, however, Miranda comes to realize that her aunt was actually a totally self-centered woman to whose whims several other people had been sacrificed. Miranda, grown to young womanhood, is also the heroine of Pale Horse, Pale Rider.

Old New York (4 vols., 1924). A series of four novelettes by Edith Wharton, each dealing with a decade in the years 1840 to 1880. False Dawn is vance of his time that his father disinherit's him.

The Old Maid is considered the best of the group.

man. In New Year's Day, a wife sacrifices herself to obtain money for a sick husband, only to be scorned by society.

the Old Testament has three divisions: the Law, or Torah, comprising the first five books known as the Pentateuch; the eight books of the Prophets, and the Hagiographis, or Writings, which includes the poetical books Proverbs, Job, Ruth, Ecclesiastes, etc.

Old Vic. Affectionate name for the Royal Victoria Hall in London. As a theater it first opened in 1818 as the Coburg. The name was changed in 1833. The specialties of the house were extravagant melodramas.
In 1871 it became a music hall, later an opera house and movie theater.

With Sir George Dance's gift of £25,000 in 1914, the Old Vic was able to establish itself as the home theater for a Shakespearean company. By 1916 the entire works of Shakespeare had been performed on its stage.

It was badly damaged in World War II. A new theater houses the famous Shakespeare company, but the Old Vic is still used as a rehearsal hall.

business. The more adventurous Sophia elopes to Paris with a young ne'er-do-well who deserts her.
She finally establishes herself as the successful keeper of a pension, and lives peacefully through the siege of Paris and other contemporary events. In her old age she returns to Bursley to live—and die—with her widowed sister. The novel is remarkable for its sense of passing time and its detailed, sympathetic picture of ordinary women's lives.

Bireno is captured by Cimosco. When Orlando rescues Bireno, the two are free to wed, except that Bireno has fallen in love with the daughter of Cimo-

Oliosha, Yuri Karlovich (1899-1960). Russian novelist and short-story writer. He is best known for his short novel Envy, one of the outstanding works of prose fiction in Soviet literature. The novel was well received at first, but later Soviet critics condemned its preoccupation with private emotions and its implied satire on the Soviet scene. Oliosha insisted on his right to deal with the subjects he chose, and, after making a speech at the first meeting of the Union of Soviet Writers in 1934, he was rarely heard from again, though his reputation was rehabilitated in 1957 when a selection of his works was published.
His collected stories originally appeared in a volume entitled The Cherry Stone (Vishnyovaya kosotcha; 1930). He is also the author of an adventure novel,
Three Fat Men (Tri tolstaya; 1920), and a play, A List of Blessings (Spisok blagodeyanny; 1931).

Oliphant, Laurence (1829-1888). English his novel Piccadilly (1866). He later became involved in spiritualism.

ist. She is chiefly known for her books dealing with provincial English society in the 19th century. Among 1876), including Sales Chapel (regarded as her best novel), The Perpetual Curate, The Rector, Miss Marjoribanks, and Phoebe Junior; A Beleaguered City

(1880); and Autobiography (1889).

Olive. In ancient Greece sacred to Pallas Athene.
She was said to have made it her gift to the Athenians, thereby gaining their loyalty in preference to their previous patron Poseidon. It was a symbol of peace, and also an emblem of fecundity: Athenian brides wore or carried olive garlands as ours do a wreath of orange blossom. A crown of olive was the highest distinction of a citizen who deserved well of his country, and was the highest prize in the Olympic games.
The phrase "to hold out the olive branch," meaning to make overtures to peace, alludes, of course, to its ancient identification with peace. On some ancient Roman medals, the legendary King Numa is shown holding an olive twig, indicative of his peaceful reign.

Oliver. Orlando's envious older brother in Shakepeare's As You Like It. He forces his brother to flee to the Forest of Arden, but is reconciled with him when Orlando saves his life. He eventually weds Celia.

Oliver Twist (1837-1839). A novel by Charles Dickens, depicting the world of poverty, crime, and the workhouse of 19th-century London. The novel was written against the background of the new Poor Law of 1834, which ended the supplemental dole to the poor and forced husbands, wives, and children into separate workhouses in the name of utilitarian efficiency.

Oliver, a foundling, is born in the workhouse where he commits the unspeakable crime of asking for more gruel. He is apprenticed by Mr. Bumble to the undertaker Mr. Sowerberry, but soon runs away only to fall into the hands of a gang of thieves headed by Fagin. With the aid of Jack Dawkins (the Artful Dodger), Nancy, Bill Sikes, and Charley Bates, Fagin tries to make Oliver into a thief. The wealthy Mr. Brownlow tries to rescue Oliver, but through the machinations of the evil Monks, who has a special interest in corrupting him, Oliver is kidnapped by Fagin's gang; he is forced to take part in a burglary during the course of which he is wounded. He is nursed by Mrs. Maylie and her foster child Rose (later revealed to be Oliver's aunt). Eventually the secret of Oliver's parentage is disclosed; Monks is his half brother and has tried to ruin Oliver in order to retain all their father's property. In the end, Monks, Fagin, and the gang are brought to justice. Mr. Brownlow adopts Oliver and educates him. In Oliver Twist, one of his most popular novels, Dickens illustrates that poverty breeds crime and that the road from the workhouse to Fagin's gang is a short and straight one.

Olives, Mount of. A ridge east of Jerusalem. Jesus used to go to the Mount of Olives to pray and meditate in the evening. It was here perhaps that he taught his disciples the Lord's Prayer. At the foot of its western slope is the garden of Gethemane.

Olivier. Also Oliver, Oliviero, Olivieri. The close friend of Roland among the paladins of Charlemagne, gifted with the moderation and common sense that Roland lacks. His family is at war with Charlemagne, so that Roland and Olivier meet as dueling opponents. When their long and chivalrous battle is stopped by divine intervention, they become sworn friends, and Roland is engaged to Olivier's sister. The Chanson de Roland describes the death of all three.

As Oliviero he appears prominently in Pulci's Morgante Maggiore and Boiardo's Orlando Innamorato. In Ariosto's Orlando Furioso he joins Orlando (Roland) and Brandimarte in a great duel with the pagan leaders Agramante and Gradasso at Lipadusa; he is seriously wounded, but survives.

Oliver, Sir Laurence [Kerr] (1907- ). English actor of stage and screen. He made his debut on the English stage (1924) in Byron and in America (1929) in Murder on the Second Floor. He established his reputation in 1931 in Private Lives with Noel Coward and Gertrude Lawrence. He has had a long association with the Old Vic Company and is best known for his Shakespearean roles. He has produced and directed three movies in which he stars: Henry V, Hamlet, and Richard III.

Ollivant, Alfred (1874–1927). English novelist. His book Bob, Son of Battle (1898) is one of the world's most famous dog stories, to be compared with the animal stories of Anna Sewell (Black Beauty), Marshall Saunders (Beautiful Joe), and Albert Payson Terhune (Lad).

Olney. A country parish in England where William Cowper boarded with Mrs. Mary Unwin and received the religious ministrations of the Rev. John Newton, whom he assisted for a time in charitable activities in the parish. Newton, by forcing Cowper to incessant religious exercises, subjected the poet to a nervous strain which brought on an attack of insanity in 1773. During this period the Olney Hymns (1779) were written. The hymn, Light Shining out of Darkness contains the famous stanza:

God moves in a mysterious way,
His wonders to perform;
He plants his footsteps in the sea,
And rides upon the storm.

His own poetry, often of a humanist and religious bent, has been collected in The Cock of Heaven (1940), Things of Sorrow (1943), and The Scarecrow Christ (1945).

Olympic games. The greatest of the four sacred festivals of the ancient Greeks. It was held at Olympia every fourth year, in the month of July. The festival commenced with sacrifices and included all kinds of contests of sport, ending on the fifth day with processions, sacrifices, and banquets to the victors, who were garlanded with olive leaves. In 1895 an international committee met in Paris in the interests of establishing modern Olympic games to which various countries should send contestants. The first games of the new series were held at Athens in 1896, and after that date they occurred every four years with the exception of the duration of World Wars I and II.

Olympus (Olympos). The home of the gods of ancient Greece. There Zeus held his court; the mountain is about 9800 ft. high, on the confines of Macedon and Thessaly.

Om. Among the Brahmans, the mystic equivalent for the name of the Deity. It was adopted by modern occultists to denote absolute goodness and truth or the spiritual essence.

Om mani padme hum (I salute the jewel in the lotus). The mystic formula of the Tibetans and northern Buddhists. It is used as a charm and for other religious purposes. They are the first words taught to a child and the last uttered on the deathbed of the pious. The lotus symbolizes universal being and the jewel the individuality of the speaker.

O'Malley, Grace. Gaelic name, Gráinne Ní Mhaillé (fl. 1550–1600). Irish princess. A member of a famous family of sea-farers, she commanded a large fleet of war galleys that preyed on English ships and coastal villages. There are numerous legends about her career, and she may have inspired one of the episodes in James Joyce's Finnegans Wake (1939).

Omar Khayyám (d. 1123). Persian astronomer-poet. Born at Naishápûr, in Khorasan, Iran, as Abu'l-fath 'Omar, son of Ibrahim the 'Tentmaker, Omar adopted as his poetic name the designation of his father's trade, Khayyâm. He spent his whole life in his native town, where he studied under the celebrated teacher the Imam Mowaffak and was later granted a pension by the Vizier Nizam ul Mulk, a former schoolfellow, becoming known far and wide as a scholar and astronomer. He was one of a commission of eight appointed by Malik Shah to revise the calendar, and was the author of astronomical tables and a book on algebra, as well as the celebrated collection of quatrains, the Rūdākīyat of Omar Khayyám.

Never popular in his own country, Omar's poetry had been preserved only in mutilated manuscripts, among which the one in the library of the Asiatic Society, Calcutta, is perhaps the most nearly complete; it contains 516 rubāyīt (or rubādīs). Edward Fitz-Gerald translated 101 of them from the original Persian into English. The Rubāyītī is a series of quatrains rhymed a-a-b-a (or sometimes a-a-b-a in the original), each one expressing a complete thought. Of Omar's thought, Fitz-Gerald wrote: "Omar . . . pretending sensual pleasure as the serious purpose of Life, only diverted himself with speculative problems of Deity, Destiny, Matter and Spirit, Good and Evil, and other such questions."

O'Neill, Eugene

Omnibus Bill. A congressional bill dealing with a number of different subjects. A famous American Omnibus Bill was the Compromise of 1850.

Omoo: A Narrative of Adventures in the South Seas (1847). A novel by Herman Melville. The book begins by recapitulating the ending of Typee, in which the hero escapes on the whaler Julia. The crew of the Julia mutinies, and is imprisoned on the island of Tahiti. Melville and his friend, Doctor Long Ghost, are released, and explore the island together. Omoo is superior in style to Typee; Bembo, Jermin, and the Doctor are vivid characters. The title of the book is a Polynesian word for a rover, one who wanders from island to island.

O’More, Rory. The name of 3 famous Irish rebel chiefs of the 16th and 17th centuries. The name appears frequently in Irish poetry.

Omphale. In Greek mythology, a queen of Lydia. Heracles was sold to her as a slave. For her he rid Lydia of robbers and other pests, and they had several children. The idea that they changed clothes, Omphale wearing the lion’s skin and Heracles woman’s dress, was spread only by later writers such as Ovid.

omphalos. See Delphic Oracle.

On American Taxation. A famous speech by Edmund Burke, delivered in the English Parliament on April 19, 1774, urging that the duty on tea imported into the American colonies be repealed. It was not successful.

On Conciliation with the American Colonies. A speech by Edmund Burke, delivered in the English Parliament in March, 1775, in an effort to prevent disaffection between Great Britain and the colonies in America by granting them autonomy. Burke hoped for a system that might preserve both English superiority and colonial liberty. For his resolution in favor of conciliation, his speech won only 58 votes.

One Day in the Life of Ivan Denisovich (Odný dan’ Ivana Denisovicha; 1963). A short novel by Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn (1918– ). It describes conditions in a Soviet prison camp during the Stalin era. This short book traces in excruciating detail the struggle of one prisoner to stay alive and to snatch what meager comforts he can find during a typical day in the camp.

The book was apparently a revelation to persons inside the Soviet Union as well as abroad. In terms of internal Soviet affairs, it was one more step in the de-Stalinization campaign begun by Khrushchev’s speech at the 20th Communist Party Congress in 1956.

Solzhenitsyn, a former schoolteacher, had himself been an inmate of a prison camp.

Oneida Community. A perfectionist religious society established in New York State in 1847 by John Humphrey Noyes. An experiment in practical communism, the community developed an excellent school system, ran a 900-acre farm, and governed itself democratically. The original 40 settlers grew to some 300; they manufactured steel traps and silver-plated ware. Their system of polygamy and polyandry, developed for the purpose of scientific propagation, aroused public disapproval. The community was abandoned in 1879, but reorganized as a business corporation two years later.

O’Neill, Danny. The hero of a series of novels by James T. Farrell: A World I Never Made (1936), No Star Is Lost (1938), Father and Son (1940), My Days of Anger (1945) and The Face of Time (1953). At the outset, Danny is brought up in a lower-middle-class Irish-Catholic background in Chicago, similar to that of the hero of Studs Lonigan. He goes to live with more well-to-do relatives, however, and is shown as a quiet little boy with a precocious knowledge of baseball. He grows up to be a sensitive young man, becoming a student at the University of Chicago and rebelling against the life accepted by Studs Lonigan. Danny, who is thought to be based on the author himself, also appears briefly in the Lonigan series.

O’Neill, Eugene [Gladstone] (1888–1953). American playwright. By common consent considered the greatest American dramatist, he is one of the most significant figures in the recent history of the theater. The winner of the Nobel Prize in 1936, O'Neill is famous for his technical experiments, being a pioneer in the use of myth on the modern stage. Influenced by German expressionism and the ideas of Freud and Nietzsche, his grim and moving psychological studies of men and women in the America of his time sometimes employ religious symbolism.

The son of James O’Neill and Ella Quinan, both actors, O’Neill spent his early youth in restless wandering, working at odd jobs about the country and taking several voyages at sea, which provided him with much material for his plays. In 1912 he entered a tuberculosis sanitarium and there began reading plays and eventually writing them. Of this early work only Thirst and Other One-Act Plays (1914) was published; O’Neill spent a further apprenticeship at the Harvard Workshop directed by George Pierce Baker.

Crucial in his development was his association in 1916 in Provincetown, Mass., with George Cram Cook, Susan Glaspell, and the Provincetown Players. Bound East for Cardiff, a one-act play describing the last moments of a dying seaman, was produced by them in 1916. Other plays of the sea followed, including The Long Voyage Home (1917), concerning sailors in a London bar after a voyage; Ile (1917), the story of a captain who insists on continuing his hunt for whale oil at the expense of his wife’s sanity and the threat of a mutiny; The Moon of the Caribbees (1918), telling of the crisis on the steamer Glencairn when women come aboard; and Where the Cross Is Made (1918), the tale of another obsessed captain. These were collected in Bound East for Cardiff and Other Plays (1916) and The Moon of the Caribbees and Other Plays (1919). In 1948 four of the plays were revived under the collective title S.S. Glencairn.

O’Neill’s first full-length play was Beyond the Horizon, the winner of a Pulitzer Prize. The Emperor Jones indicated that O’Neill’s naturalism was being modified by the expressionism of Strindberg. Anna Christie, another play of the sea, won a second Pulitzer Prize for O'Neill; Gold (1921) was a full-length expansion of the earlier Where the Cross Is Made. The Hairy Ape again combined expressionism and naturalism.

With Desire Under the Elms, O'Neill's interest in Freudian psychology was combined with his growing interest in the theories of Nietzsche. In All God's Chillun Got Wings, a play about Negroes and whites, O'Neill helped to destroy the convention of caricaturing Negroes in literature. In these years he also wrote The Great God Brown and Marco Millions.

Strange Interlude, another Pulitzer Prize winner, is a psychological study notable for the use of asides and soliloquy. Mourning Becomes Electra, a trilogy based on Aeschylus, attempts to transform the Greek concept of fate into psychological and environmental determinism. Ah, Wilderness (1933), a nostalgic play about an adolescent boy, and Days Without End (1934) mark the end of O'Neill's early productivity. His name did not return to Broadway until 1946 when The Iceman Cometh, a treatment of social outcasts, was produced. A Moon for the Misbegotten (1957) and A Touch of the Poet (1958) were part of a larger cycle of plays O'Neill was working on at the time of his death. Long Day's Journey into Night, produced in 1956 but written before 1941, is largely autobiographical, with moments equaling the best of the O'Neill of the early period. See Lazarus Laughed.

One of Ours (1922). A novel by Willa Cather. It tells the story of Claude Wheeler, a boy who grows up on a Western farm, goes to a Western university, enters the army, and is later killed in France. The book, which is based in part on the letters of a relative of Miss Cather's who died in World War I, was awarded a Pulitzer Prize.

Onions, Oliver (1873–1961). English novelist. He changed his name to George Oliver but continued to publish under his original name. He wrote novels of grim realism and ghost stories, including Mushroom Town (1914), Ghosts in Daylight (1924), and Poor Man's Tapestry (1946). Onions married the novelist Berta Ruck.

Onís [y Sánchez], Federico de (1885–1971). Spanish academician, philologist, and critic. Onís is a student of the famous Spanish scholar Menéndez Pidal. Having been a member of the faculty of several universities, he came to the U.S. where he joined the faculty of Columbia University (1916); here he remained as chairman of the department of Spanish during the period 1929–1954. His most famous work is the Antología de la poesía española e hispanoamericana (1934).

onomatopoëia. The formation of words imitating the sound of the object or action expressed, as in buzz, hiss, clack, bang, and twitter. In rhetoric, the figure of speech in which the writer deliberately reproduces in the sound of the words he selects the actual sound that he is describing or that is connected with his subject. Poe's Bells, the hissing passage in Milton's Paradise Lost where Satan's minions turn into snakes, and the famous frogs' chorus in Aristophanes' satirical play The Frogs are all good examples of onomatopoeia.

On the Eve (Nakanune; 1860). A novel by Ivan Turgenev. The heroine, Elena Stakhova, is wooed by three men: the scholar Bersenev, the sculptor Shubin, and the civil servant Kurnatovski. Unmoved by all of them, she immediately falls in love at first sight with the Bulgarian revolutionary, Insarov. Elena feels she has at last found her goal in life, to fight for social justice by Insarov's side. She leaves with him to continue the struggle for freedom in Bulgaria. Insarov dies on the way, but the inspired Elena goes on to carry on his work. Although he was attempting to show a young revolutionary acting in a positive manner, Turgenev was criticized by the radicals for portraying him as a Bulgarian and not as a Russian.

On the Sublime (Peri Hypsous). A Greek treatise of unknown author and date. It is attributed to Dionysius or Dionysius Longinus, and was probably written in the first half of the 1st century A.D. The treatise finds five sources of the sublime in literature: significant thoughts, intense emotion, powerful figures of speech, excellence in choice of language, and effective organization. The author states that a passion for novelty often converts the sublime into the ridiculous. The sublime has universal appeal. The author discusses the possibility of "noble error," saying that sublimity, not correctness, enables man to approach the gods. He cites Homer, Plato, and Demosthenes as examples. The treatise was first published by Robortello in 1554, and was translated by Boileau in 1674. It was widely admired, particularly by Dryden, Addison, Pope, Goldsmith, Reynolds, Hurd, Fielding, and Gibbon.

Open Boat, The (1898). A short story by Stephen Crane. Often considered the greatest of his works in this form, it is based on a personal experience of the author. It deals with four men who have escaped in a small open boat from their sinking ship: the captain, the cook, an oiler, and a newspaper correspondent. They discuss the possibilities of being saved, sight land, and await help that does not come. After a whole night of drifting just off shore, they attempt to land on the boat. In the process three of the men come ashore successfully, but the oiler dies, just as he is about to reach safety. Told in a style of great understatement and economy, the story carries far more significance, weight, and drama than the slight plot would seem to indicate.

open-door policy. The principle of giving equal opportunity and recognition to all foreign nations in matters of trade. See John Hay.

Ophelia. In Shakespeare's Hamlet, the young and innocent daughter of Polonius and sister of Laertes. Dutifully, she obeys Polonius' request that she spurn Hamlet's advances and later permits her father to spy on her and Hamlet. After the death of Polonius, she loses her mind. The scene in which her madness is poignantly revealed is one of the most famous in literature.

Opheltes. A character in Greek mythology. As the Seven Against Thebes were on the way to their fatal war, they stopped at Nemea. Hyphasis, a former queen of Lemnos, and now a slave to King Lycuragus, was caring for Opheltes, the king's infant son. Left alone while she showed the soldiers a spring, the child was killed by a snake. The Seven killed the snake and instigated the Nemean Games in honor of the child. The seer Amphiarraus, one of the Seven, saw the event as an evil omen and renamed the child Archemorus (Beginner of Death or Doom). Opheltes is thought to have been a form of the familiar infant god of Cretan mythology.

Ophir. An ancient country or region—perhaps in southeastern Arabia—noted for its gold, as well as for its silver, ivory, and precious stones. According to Old Testament narrative, it was the source of the treasure of King Solomon (I Kings 10:11).

O Pioneers! (1913). A novel by Willa Cather. Her second novel and the first to be set in Nebraska, it tells of how Alexandra Bergson, on the death of her father, takes over the care of her family and the management of the farm. The other Bergsons are weak or dull, but Alexandra, energetic and courageous, succeeds in building up a prosperous farm. Her hopes for the future of her young brother Emil are blasted when he is killed by a jealous husband, but eventually her loneliness comes to an end with her marriage to Carl Linstrom. Alexandra's deep devotion to the land dominates the novel.

Opitz, Martin (1597-1639). Early German critic and baroque poet. He is especially famous for his Buch von der Deutschen Poeterey (Book on German Poetry, 1624), in which he set forth the poetic principles which were to be quite closely followed by subsequent baroque poets writing in German. Opitz, who was strongly influenced by Ronsard and the Pléiade in France, believed that poetry must be based on the models of classical antiquity, and he endeavored to show how the German language could be suited to these models. His own work includes many translations from Greek and Latin, and many poems in classical forms such as the elegy and ode.

Oppenheim, E[dward] Phillips (1866-1946). English novelist, popular and prolific writer of thrillers. He produced an average of more than three novels a year for over 50 years. Among his works are The Long Arm of Mannister (1910), The Moving Finger (1911), and The Great Impersonation (1920).

Oppenheim, James (1882-1932). American poet and writer of fiction. Oppenheim was early a social worker in New York, and the life of the city's slums furnished him with the material for his first book of short stories, Dr. Rast (1909). After two potboiling novels, he published Songs for the New Age (1914), the volume that marked his arrival as a serious writer. In 1916 he founded and edited the magazine Seven Arts, with which Van Wyck Brooks and Waldo Frank were also connected. The poems of Songs for the New Age (1914), The Solitary (1919), The Mystic Warrior (1921), and The Golden Bird (1923) were strung together with connecting lines in The Sea (1923). During World War I, Oppenheim became interested in psychiatry, an interest reflected in The Book of Self (1917), a poetic treatment of psychiatry, and in Your Hidden Powers (1923) and Behind Your Front (1928).

Optimism. The doctrine that "whatever is, is right," that everything which happens is for the best. It was originally set forth by Leibniz from the postulate of the omnipotence of God, and is cleverly travestied by Voltaire in his Candide, ou l'Optimisme, where Dr. Pangloss continually harps on the maxim that "all is for the best in this best of all possible worlds."

Oracle (Lat. oraculum, from orare, to speak, to pray). The answer of a god or an inspired priest to an inquiry respecting the future; the deity giving the response; or the place where the deity could be consulted. In ancient Greece there were many oracles, some of which were consulted by men of other nations. Perhaps the best known was the Delphic oracle, but the oracle of Zeus at Dodona, one of the most ancient, was very highly respected. The oracle of Trophonius, in Boeotia, was perhaps the most awesome. Other famous oracles were as widely separated as that of Heracles at Gades, in Spain; that of Zeus (or Amen), in Libya; and that of Ares, in Thrace.

One reason for the reputation for infallibility enjoyed by many oracles was that their answers were given in such ambiguous terms that they were sure to be right, no matter what happened. A famous example of this, told by Herodotus, was the sad experience of Croesus, who, on consulting the oracle about whether he should make war on Persia, was told that if he did, he would overthrow a great empire. He optimistically assumed that the empire was Persia—but it was his own empire of Lydia. Greek drama and myth is full of stories of oracles that turn out to be right, often after many years, and usually to the great sorrow of the recipient who has failed to accept the admonition.

Oracle of the Holy Bottle. A translation of L'Oracle de la Dive Bouteille, situated "near Cathay in Upper India," to which Pantagruel, Panurge, and Friar John journey in Rabelais' Gargantua et Pantagruel in an effort to learn whether Panurge should marry. They approach the temple through vineyards, descend through subterranean passages, and eventually pass through the gates of the temple itself, over which is the inscription "In wine, truth." There the Pontiff Bacbuc (Heb., "bottle") leads Panurge unto a side chapel where the Holy Bottle is sitting in the middle of a fountain. Bacbuc casts something into the fountain, whereupon the water begins to bubble, and the Bottle makes a cracking sound like "Trinch!" (Ger., "Drink!"). Bacbuc declares this to be a perfect answer and gives Panurge what appears to be a book but is in fact a flask full of wine so that he may interpret the oracle. The potion inspires Friar John and Panurge to recite doggerel. Bacbuc then sends the joyful party home, reminding the travelers that many secrets of nature are yet to be revealed by time and study.

Orage, Alfred Richard (1873-1934). English journalist and psychologist. Orage had been a lecturer on theosophy when a large, anonymous donation allowed him to buy the New Age and make it a Socialist weekly. He attracted many distinguished contributors to the New Age such as G. B. Shaw, H. G. Wells, Hilaire Belloc, G. K. Chesterton, Arnold Bennett, Katherine Mansfield, and Richard Aldington. He gave up his weekly after the founding of the rival New Statesman. Orage was a remarkably clear expositor of a broad economic philosophy.

orange girls. In English theaters during the Restoration, the girls who sold refreshments to the spectators were called "orange girls." Nell Gwyn (1650-1677) began her career as an orange girl.

Orators, The (1932). A work by W. H. Auden in prose and some verse. It presents the author's early political and psychological ideas through symbolic satirical scenes from English middle-class life. Among the sections are Address for a Prize-Day, Letter to a Wound, and Journal of an Airman. The Journal is an account of the campaign against the enemy—disease and inertia in middle-class society and the individual consciousness.

Orc. In the Orlando Furioso of Lodovico Ariosto, a great sea monster that devours human beings. When Angelica is exposed to him on a rock, Ruggiero, riding the back of his winged steed, the Hippogriff, rescues her by dazzling the beast with the fatal glow of a burnished shield.

orchestra. In ancient Greek theaters, the large, circular dancing floor occupied by the chorus. Surrounded on three sides by tiers of seats, and on the fourth by a raised platform for the principal actors, it had an altar of Dionysus at its center. It was used by the chorus in their dances and songs, and also for processions and pageantry.

Orcus. A Latin name for Hades, the abode of the dead.

ordeal (AS, ordel, related to adcelan, "to deal, allot, judge"). An ancient Anglo-Saxon and Teutonic practice of rendering justice in disputed questions of criminality by subjecting the accused person to a physical test, such as by battle, fire, water, or the like. This method of "trial" was based on the belief that God would defend the right, even by miracle if needful. All ordeals, except the ordeal by battle, were abolished in England by law in the early 13th century.

In ordeal by battle, the accused person was obliged to fight anyone who charged him with guilt. This ordeal was allowed only to persons of rank.

Ordeal by fire was also for persons of rank only. The accused had to hold in his hand a piece of red-hot iron, or to walk blindfolded and barefoot among nine red-hot ploughshares laid at unequal distances. If he escaped uninjured, he was accounted innocent, alter non. This might be performed by a deputy.

Ordeal by hot water was for the common people. The accused was required to plunge his arm up to the elbow in boiling water, and was pronounced guilty if the skin was injured in the experiment.

Ordeal by cold water was also for the common people. The accused, being bound, was tossed into a river; if he sank he was acquitted, but if he floated he was accounted guilty. This ordeal remained in use for the trial of witches to comparatively recent times.

In the ordeal by the bier, a person suspected of murder was required to touch the corpse; if he was guilty, the "blood of the dead body would start forth afresh."

In ordeal by the cross, plaintiff and defendant had to stand with their arms crossed over their breasts, and he who could endure the longest won the suit.

The ordeal by the Eucharist was for priests. It was supposed that the elements would choke him, if taken by a guilty man.

Ordeal of Richard Feverel, The (1859). A novel by George Meredith, with the subtitle A History of Father and Son. The plot concerns the tragic working out of Sir Austin Feverel's self-evolved system of education; in applying the precepts of this system to the upbringing and education of his son Richard, Sir Austin expects to create a perfect specimen of manhood. Richard is tutored at home by an uncle, Adrian Feverel, and is carefully protected from any untoward contact with the opposite sex. In spite of the system, however, Richard falls in love with Lucy Desborough, a girl beneath his station, and is forced to marry her. Sir Austin refuses to see Lucy and attempts to punish Richard by maneuvering to keep them apart, with the result that Richard succumbs to the attractions of a clever woman of low repute, while Lucy, in his absence, is approached by an aristocratic libertine. Bessie Berry, Richard's old nurse, a person much loved for her good judgment and large heart, finally succeeds in extirpating Lucy from her difficulties. In the meantime, the repentant Richard lingers abroad, until his uncle Austin Wentworth, a man of tolerance and understanding, effects a reconciliation between Lucy and Sir Austin. Richard then returns, but when he hears of the libertine's insult to Lucy's honor, he challenges him to a duel, is badly wounded, and on recovery learns that Lucy has died of brain fever. Richard is mentally broken, and the failure of his father's system is complete.

order. In classical architecture, a column with its entablature viewed as a unit fully characteristic of a given style. It is customary to distinguish three orders of Greek architecture (Doric, Ionic, and Corinthian) and two Roman orders (Tuscan and Composite). The Parthenon on the Athenian acropolis, often considered antiquity's most perfect building, conforms to the Doric order with its simple capitals and massive columns.

O'Regan, Teague. See Modern Chivalry.

O'Reilly, John Boyle (1844-1890). Irish-born American journalist, poet, and novelist. An ardent Fenian, O'Reilly was sentenced to penal servitude because of his revolutionary activities while in the British army and was deported to Australia. His powerful novel, Moondyne (1879), about convict life there was based on his own experiences. As a result he helped gain the freedom of all Irish military prisoners in Australia. The editor for many years of the Boston Pilot, he also published such books of poems as Songs from Southern Seas (1873). He was one of the first Americans to publish the poetry of Oscar Wilde.

O'Reilly, Persse. In James Joyce's novel Finnegans Wake, the author, hero, or singer of The Ballad of Persse O'Reilly. Delivered in H. C. Earwicker's tavern, it is a gay, complex song having to do with Earwicker’s misdeed in the park. The name is derived from the French perce-oreille, meaning earwig; O’Reilly is therefore another incarnation of Earwicker himself. The ballad has often been anthologized.

Oresteia (458 B.C.). A trilogy of plays by Aeschylius, the only extant trilogy of Greek dramas. It includes Agamemnon, The Libation-Bearers, and the Eumenides. See the House of Atreus.

Orestes. In Greek mythology, the son of Agamemnon and Clytemnestra. Aided or abetted by his sister Electra, he killed his mother and her lover Aegisthus to avenge his father, whom they had murdered. He appears in more Greek dramas than any other personage, notably in Aeschylus' Oresteia, Sophocles' Electra, and Euripides' Electra, Iphigeneia in Tauris, Orestes, and Andromache. See the House of Atreus.

Orestes (408 B.C.). A drama by Euripides. The main theme is the revelation of the character of Orestes and his friends, who are shown to be bungling criminals. The play opens on Orestes asleep, tormented by the Erinyes for the murder of his mother. He and Electra beseech Menelaus to help them escape their city’s death penalty, but he refuses on the urging of Tyndareus, the father of Clytemnestra and Helen. Orestes and Pylades set out for the Argive Assembly, where Orestes makes a fool of himself and ensures his condemnation. Electra, Orestes, and Pylades decide to kill Helen and hold Hermione as hostage against Menelaus. The most unusual messenger scene in Greek tragedy follows, in which a Phrygian slave from Helen’s retinue jumps onto the stage and blurts out in jumbled language what has happened within. At the conclusion, Orestes and Pylades have set the palace afire and are preparing to murder Hermione; Electra is about to set fire to the whole city; Menelaus is shouting helplessly from below, calling the townspeople to his aid. Then, Apollo appears from above and dictates the solution: Orestes is to marry Hermione; Electra and Pylades will be married; Menelaus must find himself a new wife, since Helen has been taken up into the sky as a beacon for sailors. The artificial deus ex machina is convincing by its very absurdity; it is a fitting conclusion to a bitter play.

Orfeo and Euridice. The tale of Orpheus and Eurydice, with the Gothic machinery of elves or fairies. It exists in a number of ballad versions. Sometimes Eurydice is also called Lady Isabel.

Orgoglio. See Faerie Queene, The.

Orgon. In Molière’s comedy Tartuffe, the brother-in-law of the religious hypocrite and impostor Tartuffe. His credulity and faith in the scheming humbug can scarcely be shaken even by the evidence of his senses. Eventually, by a ruse, his wife reveals to him Tartuffe’s true nature.

Oriane. See Guermantes.

Oriani, Alfredo (1852–1909). Italian poet, novelist, dramatist, and writer on history, politics, and social problems. His fiction is noted for its highly ornate and ponderous style suggestive of that of Victor Hugo, Eugène Sue, and other French serial novelists in vogue during the second half of the 19th century.

Oriani had a taste for unusual plot situations which act as catalysts for the pathological states of mind common to his characters. Among his better-known novels are Geloista (1894), which describes an unsuccessful ménage à trois; La Disfatta (1896), in which a child’s death destroys all vestiges of love and hope in his parents; Vortice (1899), which describes in detail a planned suicide; and Olocausto (1902), whose protagonist is forced into prostitution at the age of 16 and dies as a result of the loss of her childhood innocence.

An Hegelian idealist who subscribed to the mystique of national mission, Oriani often enunciated extremist views on nationalism and imperialism which made him a precursor of fascism.

Among his political writings are Fino a Dogali (1889), inspired by the Italian campaign in Africa; Il Nemico (1892); La Rivolta Ideale (1908); and La Lotta Politica in Italia (1892), a three-volume study of Italian political institutions from the Middle Ages to the 19th century.

Oriflamme (Fr., “flame of gold”). The ancient banner of the kings of France. First used as a national banner in 1119, it was a crimson flag cut into three triangular pennants to represent tongues of fire. It was carried on a gilt staff and a silken tassel hung between each flame. Originally the banner of St. Denis, the sacred Oriflamme became royal property in 1082. It was carried at Agincourt in 1415. It was said that the sight of it blinded any infidel. In the 15th century the Oriflamme was succeeded by the blue standard powdered with fleur-de-lis, and the last heard of the original Oriflamme is a mention on the inventory of the Abbey of St. Denis dated 1534.

Origen (c. 185–c. 253). One of the Greek Fathers of the Church. The head of the catechetical school in Alexandria, in Caesarea. He wrote prolifically and collated the Hexapla.

Origille or Origille (Origilla). In the Orlando poems of Matteo Maria Boiardo and Lodovico Ariosto, the beloved of the knight Grifone. She deserts him for the braggart Martano. In the Boiardo poem, Orlando Innamorato, she is revealed to be the daughter of Monodante and sister of the warrior Brandimarte.
Original Sin. The sin of all at birth. In orthodox Christian theology, the belief that all men are born with the taint of sin resulting from the primal disobedience of Adam and Eve in eating the fruit of the forbidden tree. This sin is held to be removed by the Sacrament of Baptism.

Origin of Species. Full title On the Origin of Species by Means of Natural Selection, or the Preservation of Favoured Races in the Struggle for Life (1859). A work by Charles Darwin. In it he develops his theory of evolution by natural selection. Darwin argues that every species develops or evolves from a previous one and that all life is a continuing pattern. His objects of study were the variations from generation to generation in domestic plants and animals. In the "struggle for existence," common to all life, an animal or plant that inherits an unfavorable variation is not likely to survive and produce offspring. The severe conditions in the environment tend to kill off individuals with unfavorable variations in favor of "the survival of the fittest," that is, individuals with favorable variations. Darwin concludes that there exists a "natural selection" of favorable variations, which produces new varieties. While subsequent investigation has superseded some of Darwin's arguments, Origin of Species remains one of the most influential books ever published.

Orillo. A monstrous magician in Lodovico Ariosto's Orlando Furioso. He is capable of reintegrating his body when it is cut to pieces. Astolfo, learning from a book given him by the enchantress Logistella that Orillo's life depends on literally one hair of his head, decapitates him and, with the headless body in pursuit, plucks out each hair until he finds it; the head then dies and the body falls lifeless from its horse.

Orinda the Matchless or The Matchless Orinda. See Katherine Philips.

Orion. In Greek mythology, a famous hunter. In the many unconceived variants of his story, he appears as an amiable if rather lustful giant. In one tale, he is blinded by Oenopion, king of Chios, to prevent his marriage to Oenopion's daughter; travels eastward toward the home of the sun, with a boy on his shoulders to guide him; and finally has his sight restored by the sun's rays. Two other legends, his pursuit of the Pleiades, and his death from a scorpion's sting as a result of trying to ravage Artemis, are astronomical myths that try to explain the relative positions of the constellations Orion, the Pleiades, and the Scorpion.

O'Riordan, Conal Holmes O'Connell. Pen name, Norrys Connell (1874–1948). Irish novelist and playwright. He succeeded John Millington Synge as director of the Abbey Theatre in 1909. Among his novels are The Fool and His Heart (1896) and Adam of Dublin (1920).

Oriskany. A village in Oneida County, N. Y., site of one of the bloodiest battles of the American Revolution (Aug. 6, 1777). About 800 American militiamen, under General Herkimer, on their way to the relief of Fort Stanwix, were ambushed by a detachment of Indians and British. Although the ensuing battle was a victory for the Americans, their forces were too weakened to proceed to Fort Stanwix.

Orithyia (Oreithyia). In classic mythology, a nymph. The north wind Boreas loved her, and she bore him two sons, Zetes and Calais, who became famous as winged warriors in the company of the Argonauts.

Orlando. (1) The courageous hero of Shakespeare's As You Like It, who challenges Duke Frederick's wrestler to prove his mettle. In love with Rosalind, who leads him a merry chase through the Forest of Arden, he typifies the fashionable Elizabethan "lovesick swain," penning verses to Rosalind and hanging them on trees.

(2) The Italian name of Charlemagne's paladin Roland.

Orlando (1928). A fantastic novel by Virginia Woolf. Orlando begins as a young Elizabethan nobleman and ends, 300 years later, as a contemporary young woman based on the author's friend, Victoria Sackville-West. The novel contains a great deal of literary history and brilliant, ironic insights into the social history of the ages through which Orlando lives. Orlando starts life as a male poet and ends as an equally intense and able woman poet in order to emphasize the author's belief that women are intellectually men's equals. The novel is thus a companion-piece to the feminist essay A Room of One's Own.

Orlando, Vittorio Emanuele (1860–1952). Italian statesman. Named prime minister in 1917, he was one of the Big Four at the Versailles Peace Conference in 1919. After clashing with Wilson over territorial concessions to Italy, he left the conference; although he later returned, the failure of the Versailles treaty to incorporate Italian demands resulted in his resignation. He withdrew from public life during the fascist regime.

Orlando Furioso (Roland Mad). A romantic epic by Lodovico Ariosto. It was published in 1516 with 40 cantos, and in a longer version of 46 cantos in 1532. Its plot continues where Boiardo broke off his Orlando Innamorato; like the earlier poem, the subplots involving Charlemagne's paladins and various pagan knights are interwoven (intricature). The magic and enchantments of the earlier poem are continued and expanded, but with an ironic tone that contrasts strongly with the seriousness of Boiardo yet avoids the burlesque of Pulci and other popular treatments of the material.

The poem begins with the escape of Angelica from the custody of Duke Namo of Baviera, to whom Charlemagne had entrusted her in hopes of avoiding conflict between Orlando (see Roland) and his cousin Rinaldo, both desperately enamored of her. She flies to the island of Ebuda, where she is captured and exposed to a sea monster from which she is rescued by Ruggiero. Orlando, who has dreamt of her plight, arrives at Ebuda to save Olympia instead. Continuing his search for Angelica, he is detained in the enchanted castle of Atlante until his beloved rescues him. Angelica then disappears again and arrives at Paris, where a great battle has taken place; she meets the wounded Moorish youth Medoro, cares for him, and elopes with him to Cathay. Orlando goes mad with grief at this betrayal. Astolfo takes his winged horse to Ethiopia, then mounts the chariot of Elijah and, with Saint John as his guide, travels to the moon. There he recovers the lost wits of Orlando, who recovers upon sniffing the urn in which they lie. As the poem nears its end, the siege of Paris is broken and Agramante killed. Ruggiero, converted to Chris-

Thus, despite its title, the poem is really centered on Ruggiero, the progenitor with Bradamante of the Este family. Like Boiardo, the poet flatters his patrons of the Ferrara court in this imaginary genealogy. Similar emphasis is given to descriptions of such delightful creatures as Astolfo’s hippocriff and such memorable places as the grotto of the witch Melissa and the island of oblivion ruled by the enchantress Alcina. Unlike his predecessors, Ariosto makes use of the opening octaves of each canto to set forth his personal views and critical comments.

The Furioso was the most influential of the early Orlando poems. In England its popularity during the Renaissance is attested by Robert Greene’s play The History of Orlando Furioso (1594), Spenser’s Faerie Queene (1590; 1596), and the translation done by Sir John Harington in 1591, presumably as a penance imposed by his godmother, Queen Elizabeth. Numerous artists have used the characters and incidents of Ariosto’s poem for paintings and musical works, witness the Alcina of Handel.

Orlando Innamorato (Roland In Love). A romantic epic by Matteo Maria Boiardo, who first blended the chivalric material of the Carolingian stories with the amorous motifs of the Arthurian cycle. Written in octaves, its first two books (of 29 and 31 cantos respectively) appeared in 1487; the third book was unfinished, breaking off at the ninth canto. The entire poem was rewritten by Berni in pure Tuscan, and Ariosto continued its plot in his Orlando Furioso.

At Paris, where thousands of knights have gathered for a tournament, the pagan princess Angelica suddenly appears. She has come from Cathay to sow discord in the ranks of the paladins and thus render them helpless before the Saracens, led by Agramante, emperor of Africa, and Gradasso, king of Sericana. One by one, Charlemagne’s knights desert the court in pursuit of Angelica or each other. In the many subplots that follow, all interwoven (intrecciatura), the paladins Orlando (see Roland), Rinaldo his cousin, Astolfo, and Brandimarte undergo various enchantments, combats with giants and pagan warriors, and timely rescues. The pagan warrior Ruggiero, descended from the Trojans, is introduced as the forerunner of the Este family, who were Boiardo’s patrons. When the poem breaks off, Ruggiero has not been reunited as yet with the warrior maiden Brandiamante, sister of Rinaldo and the object of his love. The pagan forces still threaten Charlemagne at Paris.

Orléans, Anne Marie Louise d’. See Duchesse de Montpensier.

Orleans, the Maid of. See Joan of Arc.

Orondo. In Torquato Tasso’s Gerusalemme Liberata, a Saracen warrior who plans to kill Goffredo, the Christian general, by disguising himself and his men as crusaders. When he approaches the general in his disguise, Goffredo who has learned of the plot kills him immediately.

Ormulum (c. 1200). Middle English religious poem by an Augustinian monk named Orm (Orm, Ormin). The extant manuscript of 20,000 unrhymed lines, alternately of eight and seven syllables, is a fragment comprising only one eighth of the projected work. The poem paraphrases Latin texts from the New Testament used in the Mass, following each with a homily explaining its meaning. Tediously repetitive, the work has little literary value, but its verse form and language are historically important as one of the first examples of English poetry after the Norman conquest, as is Orm’s use of a phonetic spelling as a guide to pronunciation.

Ormuzd. The principal deity of the ancient Zoroastrians and modern Parsees. He is the angel of light and good, and creator of all things, according to the Magian system. He is called Ahura Mazda, the good god, and is said to be in perpetual conflict with Ahriman, over whom he will ultimately triumph. The Latin form is Oromasdes. See Zoroaster.

Oromasdes. See Ormuzd.

Orosius, Paulus (5th century). Spanish historian and theologian. He became a disciple of St. Augustine of Hippo, who encouraged him to write the Latin Adversus Paganos Historiarum, a general history of the world refuting the pagan assertion that Christianity was responsible for the decline of the Roman Empire. Now ignored, it was once very popular; King Alfred translated it, making a number of additions, particularly about Germanic history.

Orozco, José Clemente (1883–1949). Mexican painter. He is known for his murals, deeply nationalist in character, which depict the social and political conflicts of his country.

Orphan Angel, The (1926). A novel by Elinor Wylie. It tells the hypothetical story of what might have happened to Shelley in America if he had been rescued from drowning by an American ship. A highly imaginative story, it emphasizes Mrs. Wylie’s preoccupation with the romantic poet.

Orpheus. In Greek mythology, a fabulous musician. A son of the muse Calliope and Apollo or Ocegrus, he was born in Thrace and was a devotee of Dionysus. He married Eurydice, a dryad, but she was killed by a snake while fleeing the advances of ARISTAEUS. Orpheus descended into HADES to find her. His playing of the lyre so delighted even Hades himself that Orpheus was permitted to take Eurydice back with him, provided that he did not look at her until they arrived in the upper world. When they were nearly there, however, he no longer heard her behind him, and looked back. Eurydice returned to Hades.

Inconsolable, Orpheus would have nothing to do with other women. The Thracian women, outraged by this behavior, tore him to pieces in a bacchanalian revel—and Orpheus thus suffered the same fate as his god Dionysus. The fragments of his body were collected by the Muses and buried at the feet of Mt. Olympus, but his head, which had been thrown into the river Hebrus, was carried into the sea and came ashore on the island of Lesbos. There it became a famous oracle.

The story of Orpheus and Eurydice has been a favorite subject for dramatists and composers. The first extant opera, by Jacopo Peri, was based on it, as were many others, including those by Monteverdi and Haydn; the most famous is Gluck’s Orpheus and Eurydice (Orfeo; 1762). Of the many dramatic versions of the story one of the most unusual is Orfée, a motion picture by Jean Cocteau.

Orphic Sayings (1840–1844). A series of philosophic epigrams by Bronson Alcott. They dealt with temptation, conscience, enthusiasm, hope, speech, and nature; with each issue of The Dial in which they appeared, the sayings became increasingly mystical and less intelligible.

Orphism (6th century B.C.). A Greek mystic cult popular at that time. Its mysteries were supposedly taught to men by ORPHEUS. They centered about the myth of Zagreus, son of Zeus and Persephone, who was torn to pieces by the TITANS at Hera’s orders. For this crime, Zeus destroyed the Titans and swallowed the heart of Zagreus, who was reborn of STOCLE in the person of Dionysus. The orphic rites apparently included the treading and eating of animals representing Zagreus, whose myth was probably Thracian or Phrygian in origin. The notion, peculiar to the orphics, that human beings contained elements of both divinity and evil was explained by the fact that men were created from the ashes of the Titans, who, evil themselves, had nevertheless swallowed the divine Zagreus. Although orphism differed from both orthodox myth and popular cult, it influenced PLATO, PINDAR, and the PYTHAGOREANS.

Orsini, Felice (1819–1858). Italian revolutionist. He is remembered chiefly for his attempted assassination (Jan. 14, 1858) of Napoleon III. He was executed at Paris.

Orsino. The sentimental duke of Illyria in Shakespeare’s Twelfth Night. He is in love with Olivia, but finally marries Viola. His famous words open the play:

If music be the food of love, play on...

Orson. In the French romance VALENTINE AND ORSON, the brother who grows up “the wild man of the forest” until overcome by his twin. He eventually rescues Fezon from the Green Knight and marries her.

Ors y Ravira, Eugenio D’. Known as Xenius (1882–1955). Spanish author and art critic. A student of philosophy and law, he wrote La bien Plantada (1920), a novel, and Guillermo Tell (1926), a play—both successful. However, it is in the field of art criticism that his true merit lies, particularly in such works as Pousins y El Greco (1922), Tres horas en el Museo del Prado (1923), Cézanne (1924), La vie de Goya (1929), and Pablo Picasso (1930).

Ortega y Gasset, José (1883–1955). Spanish philosopher. One of the leading philosophers of the 20th century, he received his early education at the hands of the Jesuits, went on to the University of Madrid, and after receiving his doctorate, traveled to Germany in order to continue his studies. It was at this time that he came under the influence of the philosophy of Kant, apparent in much of his work. His studies completed, he returned to Spain, accepting the chair in metaphysics at the University of Madrid. It was from this position that he exerted his influence upon Spanish philosophy and 20th-century ideas. In 1936 he was exiled by the Civil War, but returned to Spain in 1945. His first book was the absorbing Meditaciones del Quijote (1914). This was followed by his essays which appeared in eight volumes spread out over the period 1916–1934 and titled El Espectador. España invertebrada (1921) is a critical review of decadence in Spanish literature and an attempt to locate the roots of Spain’s decadence. Best known abroad are El tema de nuestro tiempo (The Modern Theme, 1923), La deshumanización del arte e ideas sobre la novela (The dehumanization of art and notes on the novel, 1925), and La rebelión de las masas (The Revolt of the Masses, 1930). This last work is a subtle analysis of the decaying effects of mob control upon government and the arts.

Ortmit or Otmit. Earlier Hartmit. German legendary hero, as in the HELDENBUCH. He wins his bride by fighting giants, but is later slain by a dragon. His brother Wolfdietrich (earlier Harnderi) then kills the dragon and marries Ortmit’s widow.

Orville, Lord. See Evelina, or the History of a Young Lady’s Entrance into the World.

Orwell, George. Pen name of Eric Blair (1903–1950). English novelist, essayist, and critic. He was an independent-minded socialist, and his first works were largely studies of working-class life and culture. Educated at Eton, Orwell was typical of the gentleman-radical. His years with the Imperial Police in Burma provided material for the novel Burmese Days (1934), an attack on British imperialism, and for essays such as the title essay in the collection Shooting an Elephant (1950). His years as a vagabond doing odd jobs for a living are described in Down and Out in Paris and London (1933). The Road to Wigan Pier (1937) is a discussion of social problems; Keep the Aspidistra Flying (1936) and Coming Up for Air (1939) are comic novels about ordinary working people. Orwell is notable for the simplicity of his style and his journalistic or documentary approach to fiction. This method was followed by a number of leftist writers of the 1930s.
Ostrovski, Nikolai Alekseyevich

Homage to Catalonia (1938) expresses Orwell's disillusionment during the Spanish Civil War, in which he fought on the Republican side. It describes the internal dissension between the Republican and Communist allies, and Communist deceit and intellectual dishonesty. Orwell's last, best-known novels are ANIMAL FARM and 1984 (q.v.), biting satires on communism.

Osaka. A city in western Japan, formerly known as Naniwa. It was Japan's cultural center during the Tokugawa period (1600–1868). Known also as a commercial center, it was eclipsed by Tokyo during the Meiji period (1868–1912).

Osborn, Henry Fairfield (1857–1935). American paleontologist and archaeologist. He was curator of vertebrate paleontology of the American Museum of Natural History from 1891. His works include The Age of Mammals (1910); Men of the Old Stone Age (1915); Origin and Evolution of Life (1917); Evolution and Religion in Education (1926).

Osborne, John (1929– ). English playwright. His first play, Look Back in Anger, lent its name to the group of modern English writers now known as the "angry young men." Osborne and his contemporaries have attacked the static English social system, with particular denunciation of the Establishment. They have felt a vacuum in English culture and by Osborne's admission have looked to the U.S. to fill this void.

His plays include The Entertainer (1957), written for Laurence Olivier, the story of a cheap, scordid music hall entertainer; Epitaph for George Dillon (with Anthony Creighton; 1958) about a brutal, perhaps intelligent young man who becomes involved with a family of stupid people, later marrying the daughter; and Luther (1961), an historical drama about the German monk's split with the Catholic Church.

Osborne, Thomas Mott (1859–1926). American prison reformer. He was Warden of Sing Sing Prison from 1914 to 1916 and founded the Mutual Welfare League under which prisoners of Sing Sing exercised self-government. He was the author of Within Prison Walls (1914).

Oswald, Lloyd (1868–1947). English writer. The stepson of Robert Louis Stevenson, he collaborated with Stevenson on The Wrong Box (1889) and other books.

O'Shea, Kitty. See Charles Stewart Parnell.

Osiris. The supreme god and king of eternity of ancient Egypt, whose name means many-eyed. He was thought to be judge of the dead, ruler of the kingdom of the Other World, creator, god of the Nile, and constant foe of his twin brother and son Set, the principle of evil. He was slain by Set who cut his body into 15 pieces, but was buried by his wife Isis and revenged by Horus and Thoth. Because he was resurrected to an eternal reign in heaven, he symbolized hope for life beyond the grave and fostered the process of mumification. He was usually depicted as a mummy wearing the crown of upper Egypt, but sometimes also as an ox. He was the father of Anubis.

Osmond, Gilbert. See Portrait of a Lady, The.

Osric. In Shakespeare's Hamlet, a court fop, contemptible for his affectations. He serves as umpire in the duel between Hamlet and Laertes.

Ossa. See Pelion.

Ossian. The legendary Gaelic warrior, son of Fionn MacCumhait, who became a bard in his old age and is supposed to have lived about the end of the third century. It is to him that James Macpherson ascribed the authorship of a group of poems published from 1760 to 1763; Macpherson claimed that he had translated them from manuscripts collected in the Scottish Highlands, and a great controversy as to their authenticity was aroused. The Ossianic poems, compared at the time to the works of Homer, could move the poet Thomas Gray to write, "Imagination dwelt many hundred years ago in all her pomp on the cold and barren mountains of Scotland." It was soon generally agreed, however, that Macpherson, although compiling from ancient sources, was the principal author of the poems as published. See FINGAL, AN ANCIENT EPIC; TEMORA, AN EPIC POEM.

Ostend Manifesto. A declaration made in 1854 by the ministers of the U.S. in England, France, and Spain, "that Cuba must belong to the United States." It occasioned great discussion.

Ostia (from Lat. ostium, river mouth). The ancient Roman port at the mouth of the Tiber through which most goods shipped to and from Rome had to pass. Archaeologists have unearthed the remains of Roman insulae—three- and four-story buildings—which are the precursors of our modern apartment houses. The site now lies inland because of the heavy deposits of material left by the Tiber.

Ostracism (from Gr. ostrakon, an earthen vessel). Exclusion from society or common privileges. The word arose from the ancient Greek custom of banning one whose power was a danger to the state, the voting for which was done by the people recording their votes on tiles or potsherds. See ARISTIDES.

Ostrovski, Aleksandr Nikolayevich (1823–1886). Russian dramatist. Ostrovski's plays laid the foundation for realistic Russian drama. He produced almost 50 in all, both comedies and tragedies, many of them set among the conservative merchant class of Moscow. His first published play was The Bankrupt (Bankrot; 1847), produced in 1850 as Svoi lyudi—sotchisnyama. His best-known works include Poverty Is No Crime (Bednost' ne porok; 1854), The Diary of a Scoundrel, Easy Money (Beskhim degni; 1870), The Forest (Les; 1871), and his masterpiece, The Storm. He also wrote a fairy tale in verse, Snegurochka (The Snow Maiden; 1873) which formed the basis for the opera by Rimski-Korsakov (1880).

Ostrovsky, Nikolai Alekseyevich (1904–1936). Russian novelist. He wrote the popular novel How the Steel Was Tempered (Kah sakalyalas’стал’; 1932–1934), a success story of a young cripple, Pavel Kor-chagin, who overcomes his handicaps to become a writer and teacher. The story was based on Ostrovski’s own life. Its Marxist moralizing has made it one of early Soviet literature’s most praised productions.

O’Sullivan, Maurice (1904–1950). Irish author of Twenty Years A-growing (1933), an autobiography in Gaelic of an Irish peasant from the Blasket Islands.

Oswald. In Shakespeare’s King Lear, the villainous servant of Goneril. He tries to kill Gloucester, but is prevented by Edgar who kills him.

Othello, The Moor of Venice (c. 1604). A tragedy by William Shakespeare. Othello, a Moorish general in the service of Venice, appoints Cassio as his chief lieutenant, unwittingly arousing the enmity of Iago, his ensign, who thinks that he has better claim to the post. Partly to avenge himself for the slight and partly out of sheer malice, Iago devises a scheme to undo both Cassio and unsuspecting Othello, who regards Iago as a loyal, trustworthy friend. After causing the dismissal of Cassio by a trick, Iago hints to Othello that his bride Desdemona, the daughter of Brabantio, has had illicit relations with Cassio. Although Othello is reluctant to believe Iago’s accusations, his worst fears are confirmed when, as a result of Iago’s machinations, a handkerchief which he gave to Desdemona is found in Cassio’s possession. Enraged, Othello strangles Desdemona. Emilia, Iago’s wife and Desdemona’s faithful servant, discovers her husband’s plot and denounces him. Othello now realizes his horrible mistake and, after asking that he be remembered as one “lov’d not wisely but too well,” commits suicide.
Iago is condemned to torture for his crimes.

The source of the play is Cinthio’s Hecatommithi
(1565). Two operas called Othello, one by Rossini
(1816) and another by Verdi (1887), have been based on Shakespeare’s play.

Other Voices, Other Rooms (1948). A novel by Truman Capote. The hero, 13-year-old Joel Knox, comes to his father’s dilapidated mansion at Skully’s Landing. There he comes in contact with the effem-inately Randolph, with the Negro Jesus Fever and his daugther, and with his own invalid father. Beyond is the mysterious Cloud Hotel where Joel achieves self-awareness and a sense of the emptiness of Skully’s Landing. Sometimes described as a story of initiation, the book has also been interpreted as symbolizing a search for the Holy Grail and a search for the father.

ottium cum dignitate (Lat., “leisure with digny”). Retirement after a person has given up business and has saved enough to live on in comfort. The words were taken as a motto by Cicero.

Otranto, battle of (1480). During this engagement the Turks, led by Muhammad II, captured and massacred the inhabitants of the southern Italian city on the Adriatic, an audacious act that shocked the continent. But in the following year, allied Italian and European powers recaptured the city.

ottava rima. In prosody, a stanza of eight lines rhyming a-b-a-b-a-b-c-c. The form arose in Italy in the 14th century and was used by Boccaccio, Tasso, Ariosto, and many other Italian poets. In English it is usually written in iambic pentameters; it has been used, for example, by Keats in Isabella. In Don Juan, Byron strikes the mock-heroic, almost burlesque note which has come to be associated with the form.

Ottone (Otho). In Torquato Tasso’s Gerusalemme Liberata, a brave knight among the crusaders. When the infidel warrior Argante challenges the Christians to single combat, Ottone is the first to accept; but he is killed ruthlessly, in utter disregard of the laws of chivalry, by the ferocious Argante.

Otus (Otos) and Ephialtes. In Greek mythology, giant twins of Aloeus (or Poseidon) and Iphimedia. Enormous at nine years old, they tried to pile Mount Ossa on Mount Pelion in order to war with the gods on Olympus, but Zeus killed them.
Before their death they had managed to imprison Ares in a bronze bowl, where he stayed for more than a year.

Otway, Thomas (1652–1685). English dramatist. He is best known for his heroic tragedy Venic-Preserved, one of the finest tragedies of the Restoration. With the exception of The Orphan, or The Unhappy Marriage (1680), a domestic tragedy, about twin brothers in love with the same woman, the rest of his plays are of little merit. See Scapin.

Ouida. See Louise de la Rambée.

Our American Cousin (1858). A comedy by Tom Taylor. A work of no particular merit, this play will always be remembered as the one Abraham Lincoln was watching when he was assassinated by John Wilkes Booth [April 14, 1865].

Our Mutual Friend (1864). A novel by Charles Dickens. The “mutual friend” is John Harmon, a friend of Mr. Boffin and the Wilfers (see Reginald Wilfer, who has been left a fortune on condition that he marry Bella Wilfer. Since he has never met Bella, has not been home for 14 years, and is reported to have been murdered, he returns under the assumed name of John Rokesmith and acts as setary to Mr. Boffin, who is to have the Harmon money if the will’s conditions are not fulfilled. John and Bella fall in love, marry, and live for a time on John’s earnings. Finally, Boffin turns over the fortune and Rokesmith again becomes John Harmon.

Some recent critics consider this novel as one of Dickens’s finest from the point of view of conscious artistry, although it lacks the spontaneity of his earlier works. Dust as a symbol of money saturates the atmosphere of the book. Dust, deceit, and death fill the novel, reflecting Dickens’ increasing pessimism about the responsibility of upper middle-class society and life in general. Other characters in the book include Lizzie Hexam; Mr. and Mrs. Veneering; Silas Wegg; Eugene Wrayburn; and Jenny Wren.

Our Old Home (1863). A book of sketches by Nathaniel Hawthorne. Written during his consulship in Liverpool (1853–1957), it is a delightful record of his literary pilgrimages to the homes of English writers. He amusingly describes his consular duties, including his uneasy presence at British civic banuquets.

Oursler, [Charles] Fulton (1893–1952). American writer. He is best known for his popular religious books, The Greatest Story Ever Told (1947), as a series of radio broadcasts; 1949, in book form) and
The Greatest Book Ever Written (1951). He also wrote motion-picture scenarios and plays, including The Spider (1927), with Lowell Brentano, which had a long run on Broadway. He was associated with many magazines and became a senior editor of

Our Town (1938). A play by Thornton Wilder.
The action takes place in a typical New England town, Grover’s Corners, New Hampshire. The Stage Manager, a garrulous Yankee, sits at the side of the bare stage talking intimately to the audience as the play unfolds. He describes the characters and the setting. Act I is entitled “Daily Life;” the citizens engage in their customary pursuits, while Professor Willard and Editor Webb comment on them objectively. In Act II, “Love and Marriage,” Emily, daughter of Editor Webb, and George, son of Dr. Gibbs, fall in love and marry. In Act III, “Death,” Emily dies in childbirth, and is buried in the town cemetery. The ancient dead in the cemetery speak of their peace, and their perception of eternal harmony in the universe. The play was awarded a Pulitzer Prize.

Outcast of the Islands, An (1896). A novel by Joseph Conrad. It concerns the earlier lives of some of the characters in Almayer’s Folly. The outcast is Willems, who falls in love with the native girl Aiissa; she is given him in return for his help in throttling Almayer’s trade. Finally Aiissa shoots Willems. See Captain Lingard.

Outcasts of Poker Flat, The (1869). A short story by Bret Harte. A group of ne’er-do-wells—the gambler John Oakhurst, two prostitutes, and a drunkard—are expelled from Poker Flat, a mining camp. They are joined by an eloping young couple when a blizzard traps them all. The outcasts sacrifice themselves, one after another, for the young woman, who dies with them. Her lover returns too late with help.

Outis (Gr., “nobody”). The alias of the wily Odysseus in the cave of Polyphemus. When the monster roars with pain after being blinded by Odysseus and his crew, his brother giants ask from a distance who is hurting him. “Outis,” thunder out Polyphemus, and his companions go their way.

Outlook, The (1893–1935). An American weekly. It superseded The Christian Union (1870–1893) which had been edited first by Henry Ward Beecher and then by Lyman Abbott. Theodore Roosevelt wrote reform articles for The Outlook when he joined the staff in 1909. Hamilton Wright Mabie was another noted staff member. In 1928 the magazine absorbed The Independent. It became a monthly in 1932 as The New Outlook.

Out of the Cradle Endlessly Rocking (1899). A poem by Walt Whitman. The poet, a child, walks on the beach at moonlight and hears the mournful song of a bird; no longer an innocent, he asks the sea for the secret, and the waves whisper the “low and delicious word death. / And again death, death, death.”

Outsider, The (1956). A best-selling book of philosophic and literary essays by Colin Wilson. After describing various real individuals and fictional persons who were social misfits, Wilson claims that these “outsiders” are actually ideal heroes. Van Gogh, Nijinsky, Lawrence of Arabia, and all were existentialists who sought God and some transcendent meaning in human existence.

Outward Bound. See SUTTON VANE.

Overbury, Sir Thomas (1581–1613). English poet and prose writer, one of the early 17th-century character writers. When his clever series of prose sketches, Characters, was published in 1614, his didactic poem A Wife was included in the same volume. Overbury was imprisoned in the Tower of London and killed by slow poison at the instigation of Lady Essex, whose marriage to his patron Robert Carr (later the earl of Somerset) he had opposed.

Overcoat, The (Shinel’; 1942). A short story by Nikolai Gogol. Regarded as one of the major influences toward the development of realism in Russian literature, the story concerns a poor clerk in the St. Petersburg civil service, Akaki Akakyevich Bashmachkin. He is a miserable old man who is tormented by his callous fellow workers and who has only one thing to console him: his love of copying documents in his hovel at night. Copying is all he feels capable of doing, and when other, slightly more demanding work is offered him in the office, he refuses. Akaki’s life begins to change a little, when he goes to the tailor to have his threadbare coat repaired for the coming winter. The coat is too ragged to be patched any more, and Akaki is persuaded to let the tailor make him a new coat. He saves his money carefully, buys the material and the imitation fur for the collar, and has the coat made. The new garment draws attention at the office, and Akaki is even invited to a party. On the way home from the party, delirious with wine and the happiness of his new status, he is robbed of his precious coat. His frantic appeals to the authorities are futile, and the heartbroken Akaki dies. Following his death, mysterious thefts of coats, right off the backs of honest citizens, begin in St. Petersburg. Even the official who had irascibly refused Akaki his aid is robbed of his coat. The story ends with a hesitant policeman approaching a man he believes to be the thief and being threateningly turned on by the man. The policeman timidly retreats, and the mysterious figure disappears in the night.

Gogol’s story was hailed as one of the first pieces of literature to deal in a sympathetic way with the poor and downtrodden ordinary people of 19th-century Russia. Dostoevski has been quoted as saying about himself and his fellow writers: “We all came from beneath Gogol’s Overcoat.”

Overdone, Mistress. A bawd in Shakespeare’s Measure for Measure. Like the foolish Master Froth and the lusty tapster Pompey, she embodies the rampant licentiousness that Angelo attempts to suppress in Vienna.

Overland, Arnulf (1899– ). Norwegian poet. Overland’s first verse collections—Den en somme fest (The Lonely Feast, 1911); and De hundrede violiner (The Hundred Violins, 1912)—contained highly personal poems that were bitter and melancholy in tone. This sober introspection was to be replaced, however, by intense social concerns. Moved by suffering and injustice, he celebrated the brotherhood of socialism in such collections as Berget des hah (Blue Mountain, 1927), Hustavel (Law of Living, 1929), and jeg beveser dig (I Conjure Thee, 1934). Overland voiced anger and cried a warning against Nazism in Den rake front (The Red Front, 1937). During the German invasion of Norway, his poems were circulated anonymously; in simple, strong language they asked the Norwegian people to endure with courage. These poems, later published as Vi overlever alt (We Shall Live Through All, 1945), cost the poet time in a German concentration camp. Since the war he has published Tilbake til livet (1946) and Fiskeren og hans sjel (1950).

Overland Monthly, The. An American magazine published in California from 1868 to 1875 and from 1883 to 1933. During its first two and a half years, it was edited by Bret Harte, and pictured a huge California grizzly on its cover. Harte printed The Luck of Roaring Camp, Plain Language from Truthful James, and other stories in the magazine. The Overland also published other early California writers, among them Ina Coolbrith, Charles Warren Stoddard, and Edward Rowland Sill. Among the contributors to its later revival were George Sterling, Gertrude Atherton, Edwin Markham, and Jack London.

Over-Soul, The (1841). An essay by Ralph Waldo Emerson. The writer expresses his concept of a primal Mind, a cosmic Unity. This "soul of the whole," of which all men partake, is the keystone of Emerson's philosophic thought. The essay is included in his First Series.

Ovid. Full Latin name Publius Ovidius Naso (43 B.C.—A.D. 17). Roman poet, the first major writer to grow up under the empire. Although his parents had destined him for a career in law and had sent him to Athens to complete his studies, he decided to become a poet. He returned to Rome and, in a short while, gained the reputation of being the most brilliant poet of his generation. His first series of poems were light, sophisticated love elegies, Amores. He followed this success with the * HEROIDES*, where he first displayed his unique gift for psychological insight by composing dramatic monologues in the form of love letters written between mythological lovers, such as Paris and Helen, Hero and Leander. His Ars Amatoria (The Art of Love) was an instant success and established him, at the age of 40, as the undisputed arbiter of elegance for an upper-class Roman society that could no longer take itself seriously and that was generally disillusioned by the failure of the old Roman ideals to maintain the republic.

Ovid's greatest work, the Metamorphoses, reflects in its very theme the disillusionment of his generation. In 15 books of legends, he wrote the history of the world from chaos to the apotheosis of Julius Caesar. This great historical epic is written, not in terms of the destiny of Rome, which was Vergil's concern, nor in terms of the gradual decline of Roman virtue, which Livy described in his history, but in terms of the instability of the forms of nature. A woman is transformed into a bird, stones become people, a girl becomes a laurel tree. The poems of metamorphosis are linked with transitions that are so smooth that the reader comes to accept each tale of sudden change, not as bizarre and fanciful, but as a comment on the unpredictable nature of things.

Ovid was himself doomed to suffer a severe "metamorphosis"—from the witty cosmopolitan, whom Rome had hailed as the fit successor to Vergil, to a tired, lonely old man living out the last ten years of his life among fur-skinned barbarians. For some unknown indiscretion he was, in A.D. 8, exiled by Augustus to Tomi, a bleak fishing village on the northwest coast of the Black Sea. From there he sent poetic supplications to the Emperor and to his own influential friends that this sentence of banishment might be rescinded. These poems, sometimes sublime, often merely pathetic, were published as two collections of poetry, the Tristia ("songs of sadness"), and the Epistulae ex Ponto ("Letters from the Black Sea"). Despite his petitions, Ovid never returned to the city he loved. The greatest Roman poet of his age, he died in 17 on the bleak rim of the empire.

In the Middle Ages the poetry of Ovid was one of the major sources of Western man's knowledge of his own antiquity. Again, Ovid became an arbiter of elegance—this time for the medieval courts of love. He was revered as the great preceptor ofcourtly love. Through the Renaissance up to modern times his poetry has been respected as a treasury of mythic themes, the suggestiveness and psychological content of which have inspired the imagination of writers from Dante to Ezra Pound.

Owain. The hero of a 12th-century legend, The Descent of Owain, written by Henry of Saltrey, an English Cistercian monk. Owain is an Irish knight of King Stephen's court who, by way of penance for a wicked life, enters and passes through St. Patrick's Purgatory.

Owen, Robert (1771–1858). Welsh-born English manufacturer, pioneer in British socialism. A self-made business man, he became manager and part owner of cotton mills in New Lanark, Scotland in 1800. Here, for 25 years, he engaged not only in his business, but in educational, philanthropic, and propagandistic activities as well; he improved social conditions in the little mill town, laid particular stress on education, was the first to establish an infant school, inaugurated programs of adult education, and founded his Institution for the Formation of Character. His aim was to reorganize society on the basis of small, cooperative communities of from 800 to 2,500 members, combining agriculture and industry and organizing production and consumption. In 1824 he went to the U.S. and founded (1825) the New Harmony Community in southern Indiana, which lasted only until 1827. Although his ideas were received enthusiastically in the U.S., the failure of his project cost him nearly all his fortune and interest in his theories waned. Back in England, several other projects failed, but, undaunted, he continued the propagation of his ideas until his death at the age of 87.

Owen, Wilfred (1893–1918). English poet. He is considered the best of the poets who wrote in and about World War I. Influenced by Siegfried Sassoon, whom he met in an army hospital, Owen wrote technically experimental poems expressing his hatred of war and savagely and ironically describing the cruelty and horror he saw about him at the battlefield. Among his best-known poems are Dulce et Decorum Est, Anthem for Doomed Youth, and Strange Meeting. His use of alliterative assonance instead of regular rhyme influenced younger poets, especially W. H. Auden. Owen, who was killed a week before the Armistice, published only four poems during his lifetime and was unknown as a poet until Siegfried Sassoon published his Poems in 1920. Owen's well-known poetic manifesto includes the statement that "My subject is War, and the pity of War. The Poetry is in the pity."

Owl and the Nightingale, The (c. 1200). Early Middle English poem, of 1704 lines in octosyllabic couplets. It is a lively debate and exchange of personal abuse: the nightingale berates the owl for being ugly and singing only of misfortune, while the owl accuses her of enticing men to sin with her frivolous and amatory songs. The work is often interpreted allegorically as the conflict between gay pleasure-seeking and spiritual gravity, or between the new courtly love poetry and religious didactic literature.

Oxglass or Howleglas, Tyll. See Eulen-Spiegel.

Oxford, Edward de Vere, earl of (1550–1604). English courtier and poet, a favorite of Queen Elizabeth. He was regarded as typical of the group of courtly lyric poets, which included Sir Philip Sidney, Sir Fulke Greville, and Sir Walter Raleigh. He was known among his contemporaries as somewhat of a fop and considered to be the object of satire in Gabriel Harvey's Speculum Tuscanismi (1583), dealing with Italianate young Englishmen. Oxford was a patron of writers and actors; John Lyly served as his secretary and dedicated Euphues and His England (1580) to him. His verse is found in a number of poetic miscellanies, especially A Hundred Sundry Flowers (1573), which he may have edited. He was one of the jury at the treason trial of Lord Essex, and served as Lord Great Chamberlain at the coronation of James I. He has been one of the candidates for the "real" authorship of Shakespeare's plays.

Oxford Group Movement. An American evangelist, Frank Nathan Buchman (1878–1961), organized the Oxford Group Movement at Oxford, England (1921), sometimes called, in brief, the Oxford Movement or Buchmanism. It has no connection with the original Oxford Movement, emphasizing moral awakening through fellowship, public confession, and purity. Since 1939, the movement has been known as Moral Rearmament.

Oxford Movement, the. A movement in the Church of England, originating at Oxford around 1833 under the leadership of E. B. Pusey, John Henry Newman, and John Keble, which sought to bring back into the service of the Church much of the ritual and ornaments that had been dispensed with at the time of the Reformation, to emphasize neglected sacraments, practices, and doctrines, such as Confession, monastic or conventual life, and Apostolic Succession. A number of its followers, as did Newman, ultimately became Roman Catholics. See Tracts for the Times.

Oxford philosophers. See Logical Positivism, oxymoron. In rhetoric, an apparent contradiction in terms deliberately employed for effect. An example in the use of a qualifying adjective whose meaning is contrary to that of the noun it modifies, such as strenuous idleness, wise folly, etc.

Oz, the Land of. The setting for the Wonderful Wizard of Oz (1900) and other fantastic stories by Lyman Frank Baum. A mythical kingdom extremely popular with American children.

Ozymandias (1818). A famous sonnet by Percy Bysshe Shelley, first published by Leigh Hunt in his * Examiner.* It is an ironic commentary on the vanity and futility of a tyrant's power.
pacifism. The doctrine professed by those people, on moral or religious grounds, refuse to participate in activities of organized violence, especially war. During World War I English and American pacifists, among whom a number of well-known writers, artists and other intellectuals were included, were harshly treated, being fined, imprisoned, and in general socially ostracized by their former friends. William Jennings Bryan, Woodrow Wilson (at the beginning of his presidential career), Bertrand Russell, and Randolph Bourne were pacifists at this time. In the twenty years following World War I pacifism grew to be a comparatively influential international movement, especially among youth, and was supported by numerous religious and political organizations, both conservative and radical. Its culmination occurred about the middle of the 1930s, in the annual anti-war "strikes" held at a number of American schools, colleges, and universities, in the Oxford Oath, originating at Oxford University in England, by which students swore not to fight in any war waged by their national governments under any circumstances, and in the passage of legislation by the U.S. Congress to insure American neutrality in time of war. President Franklin D. Roosevelt was for a while identified with a speech in which the words "I hate war" occurred. With the rearmament of Germany, however, under Adolf Hitler, the avowed military ambitions of Fascist Italy and Nazi Germany, and the outbreak of the Spanish Civil War (1936), pacifism began to lose its popularity. An important factor in this change was the new stand of the U.S.S.R. and the national Communist parties, which had formerly encouraged the pacifist movement but now condemned only an "imperialist war" and advocated the formation of a Popular Front against Fascism. With the beginning of World War II, pacifism had lost its former influence, although legislation whose passage had been secured in England and the U.S. during the period of the movement's power permitted pacifists who could prove a bona fide basis for their beliefs—usually an acceptable religious creed—to become "conscientious objectors" and live together in camps at their own expense, exempt from military service but not permitted their former freedom until the end of the war. The Quakers have been outstanding among traditional religious pacifists.

Paconet. The dwarf in the romance of Valentine and Orson. He has a magic wooden horse on which he carries the twins and Clerimond from the dungeon of Ferragus to Pepin's court.

Pactolus. A small river of Lydia in Asia Minor, a tributary of the Hermus. The fact that it carried gold was explained by the story of Midas, whose ability, given him by Dionysus, to turn everything he touched into gold proved disastrous when it affected also his food, and was mercifully transferred by the god to the waters of the river. By the time of Augustus the Pactolus had ceased to produce gold.

Paderewski, Ignace [Jan] (1860–1941). Polish pianist, composer, and statesman. He was one of the greatest and most popular pianists of all time. He donated a large part of the proceeds from his concerts to the cause of Polish nationalism. In 1919 he was chosen premier of the new Polish Republic, returned to the concert stage in 1920, but rejoined the Polish government as president of parliament after it was exiled by the invasion of 1939. His best-known composition is a Minuet in G for piano. He is the subject of many biographies and panegyrics.

Paean. From Paian, in Greek mythology the "healer of the gods"; the name was later applied specifically to the god Apollo. In time it acquired the meaning of a song, hymn, or chant to Apollo, of a triumphant nature; hence a triumphal song in general.

Paean. In classical prosody, a metrical foot which included three short syllables and one long syllable. They are distinguished as (1) the first paean, with the first syllable long and the succeeding three short, (2) the second paean, with the second syllable long and the first, third and fourth short, and so on. In English prosody, the first paean occasionally appears singly in accent meter in such words as "shadowiness," and "tinglingly," in which an extra unaccented syllable seems crowded into the normal English limit of nonaccents.

Paganini, Niccolò (1782–1840). Italian violinist and composer. According to tradition, a supreme virtuoso in technical accomplishment, he was a performer and personality of extraordinary fascination. He wrote concertos and many other pieces for violin, notably the 24 Caprices, Op. 1, for solo violin. These works were transcribed for the piano in studies by Liszt and Schumann, and were the source of themes for piano variations by Brahms and Rachmaninoff. Harold in Italy by Berlioz was commissioned by Paganini.

Page, Thomas Nelson (1853–1922). American lawyer, novelist, essayist, historian, and diplomat. Page was deeply affected by the "Old Dominion" Virginia ideals of chivalry and family. Although he became a lawyer, he soon turned to literature and achieved his first success with the story Mars's Chain; it was later collected in a volume called In Old Virginia (1887). Page's novel, Red Rock, which treated Southern resistance to the policies of the Reconstruction, was a best seller. Dominated by a sentimental outlook, his work includes Two Little Confederates (1888), a children's story; Gordon Keith (1903) and John Marvel, Assistant (1909), two novels; The Old South (1892) and Social Life in Old Virginia (1897), collections of essays. Page was ambassador to Italy from 1913 to 1919.

After Les Marchands de gloire (1924), written with Paul Nivoix (1893–1958), Pagnol became famous for the satire Topaze (1923). His witty trilogy of life in Marseilles (Marie [1929], Fanny [1931], and César [1936]) was produced in film form.

Pailleron, Edouard (1834–1899). French dramatist. Pailleron's fame rests on his play Le Monde où Fon s'ennuie (The World Where One Grows Weary, 1881), a clever, animated piece of satirical writing, which mocks the ridiculous affectation of would-be ladies.

Pain, Barry Eric Odell (1865–1928). English humorist. He was popular at the beginning of the century, especially for his comedy of manners Eliza (1900). He also wrote parodies and ghost stories.

Paine, Albert Bigelow (1861–1937). American biographer, editor, novelist, and writer for children. His biography of Thomas Nast (1904) proved so successful that he was asked to write other biographies. It is in connection with Mark Twain that Paine is chiefly remembered; Twain liked the Nast biography so much that he accepted Paine's proposition that the latter become his secretary and official biographer. From this association emerged Twain's Speeches (1910), edited by Paine; Paine's Mark Twain, A Biography (1912); Mark Twain's Letters (1917); and Mark Twain's Autobiography (1924), edited by Paine. Paine also wrote Moments with Mark Twain (1920) and edited The Family Mark Twain (1935). Paine's attitude toward his subject is one of warm admiration rather than critical objectivity.

Paine, Thomas (1737–1809). English pamphleteer and political radical. The son of a Quaker corset-maker, Paine came to America in 1774. Famous for his activities in behalf of the colonies during the American Revolution, as well as in France during the French Revolution, he consistently urged revolt and independence instead of reform and tried to promote world revolution. Among his works are The Case of the Officers of Excise (1772), a plea for higher wages to excisemen, of whom he had been one; Common Sense; The American Crisis, a series of pamphlets supporting the American Revolution; Public Good (1780), in which he urged that western lands become the property not of one colony but of the nation; Dissertations on First-Principle of Government (1786), an attack on monetary inflation in the American colonies; The Rights of Man; The Age of Reason, for which he was denounced as an atheist.

Paine lived a turbulent career, beginning in a variety of humble occupations. He held several official positions in the colonies during the Revolution but made enemies and subsequently lost favor. In England he was tried for treason in absentia and outlawed because of some seditious passages in The Rights of Man. In France he was made an honorary citizen by the republican government (1792) and was a delegate to the Convention, until the more radical government of the Reign of Terror came into power and imprisoned him as an enemy Englishman. He died in the U.S. amid poverty and calumny, denounced as a radical, a drunkard, and an atheist, and was denied burial in consecrated ground. His remains were lost after being taken to England for reburial. In later years he came to be regarded as an American patriot and an important crusader for democratic rights.

Painted Veils (1920). A novel by James Gibbons Huneker. An experimental, satirical fantasy, it has for its background the art world of New York City, introducing many real people under their own names. Because the morals of the fictional characters are for the most part free and easy, the book, which was privately printed, was considered in its day highly daring.

Painter, William (1540?–1594). English prose writer. A clerk at the Tower of London and at one time a schoolmaster, Painter is best known for The Palace of Pleasure (1566–1567), a collection of 101 tales translated from classic and contemporary sources, especially Boccaccio's Decameron and Bandello's Novelle. Widely read, the book supplied plots to the leading Elizabethan poets and playwrights. Shakespeare's All's Well That Ends Well, Timon of Athens, Coriolanus, Romeo and Juliet, and Lucrece may all derive from Painter's collection.

Sometime later the two men, each intending to be reconciled with Elfride, meet on a train, but they arrive only in time for her funeral. She has married, but, loving Knight, has pined away and died.
Palace of Art, The (1830). An allegorical poem by Alfred, Lord Tennyson. Its object is to show that love of art will not alone suffice to make men happy.

Palace of Pleasure, The. See William Painter.

Les Douze Pairs), but the lists of their names vary widely. The Chanson de Roland lists Roland (Orlando), Olivier, Ivan, Ivory, Othon, Berengier, Samson, Ansel, Gerin, Gerier, Engelier, and Gerard. However, there are other important knights referred to as paladins in the Chanson, in Pulci's Morgante Maggiore, in Boiardo's Orlando Innamorato, and in Ariosto's Orlando Furioso: Astolfo, Florisnart, Fierrabras (Ferrumbras), Ganelon (Gan), Malagigi (Maugis), Namo (Nami), Ogier the Dane, Rinaldo (Renault), and Archbishop Turpin. These and other knights are also the protagonists of lesser known Chansons de Geste.

Palex in Horse, Pale Rider (1899). A short novel by Katherine Anne Porter. It tells the story of a short-lived love affair during the influenza epidemic of the First World War between a young Southern nouveau riche woman and a soldier. Like most of Miss Porter's work, it is written in a limpid, somewhat spare style that suggests far more than it says. The novel gave its name to the collection of three short novels in which it appeared, the others being Noon Wine and Old Mortality.

Palemon and Lavinia. A poetic version of Boaz and Ruth told by James Thomson in Autumn (1730), a section of his poem The Seasons. Palemon is also the name of the hero in Falconer's narrative poem The Shipwreck (1756).

Lived evill did I

Les Originaux ou le Cercle (1755) and Les Philosophes (1760) perfidiously satirize some of the Encyclopedists, such as Diderot, Rousseau, Helvétius, and Duclos. His La Dunciade ou la Guerre des sots (1764), imitated from Alexander Pope's Dunciad, and his Petites lettres contre de grands philosophes (1757) both pursue the same theme.

Palladio, Andrea (1508–1580). Italian architect. His study of Roman architecture led him to develop an original style of design incorporating classical elements. Among his famous buildings are the churches of San Giorgio Maggiore and Il Redentore at Venice; the Villa Capra, or Rotonda, at Vicenza (c. 1567), which was the first modern example of integrated landscape and building; and Palazzo Chiericati also at Vicenza (1550). He also wrote a treatise, Four Books of Architecture (Quattro libri dell'architettura; 1570), that raised great interest throughout Europe and was translated into English by Inigo Jones; its drawings served to disseminate his ideas and to make the Palladian style the basis of English Georgian architecture in the 18th century.

Palladium (Palladion). Wooden statue of Pallalas Athena in the city of Troy. It was said to have fallen from heaven. It was believed that so long as this statue remained within the city, Troy would be safe, but if ever it were removed, the city would fall into the hands of the enemy. The statue was carried away by the Greeks, and the city burnt by them to the ground. Later, Argos, Sparta, and Athens all claimed to possess this statue.

Pallas. (1) An epithet of the Greek goddess
Athena, and sometimes also of the Roman Minerva.
There are two main explanations of its origins. Apol-lodorus relates that Athena accidentally killed her playmate Pallas, daughter of the river-god Triton, and that, in token of her grief, she placed her friend's name before her own. In another tale, Pallas was a giant and the father of Athena. When he attempted to violate his daughter, she flayed him and took his skin for her segis, his wings for her shoulders, and his name to add to her own.

(2) In the Theseus legend, the son of Pandion and the father of fifty sons, the Pallantids. He plotted to steal the throne of Athens from his brother Aegaeus, Theseus' father, but he and all his sons were killed by Theseus.

Pallavicino, Gasparo (1486-1511). Lombard nobleman. He was a friend of Castiglione, who made him one of the interlocutors in The Courtier.

Pal Mall. A fine thoroughfare in the West End of London. It was named in the early 18th century because the game of Palle-malle (Ital. palla, ball, maggia, mallet) was played there.

As a young man, Palma combined political activity with literature, producing dramas and poems in the romantic style. Disillusioned by the turbulence of Peruvian politics, Palma decided to devote himself exclusively to literature and history. In 1872 he published the first collection of his delightfully ironic Tradiciones peruanas, the work upon which his reputation as a writer is based. From 1883 to 1912 he was director of Peru's national library, acquiring thousands of volumes to replace those that had been destroyed during the so-called War of the Pacific (1879–1883). At his death he was generally regarded as Peru's foremost man of letters.

Palmer. A Pilgrim to the Holy Land who carried a palm staff and spent his life visiting holy shrines and living on charity. At the dedication of palmer, prayers and psalms were said over them as they lay prostrate before the altar; they were sprinkled with holy water, and then received the consecrated palm branch, sign of their office.

Palmer, George Herbert (1847–1933). American theologian and teacher. A professor at Harvard, he excelled as a critic and expositor of philosophy, though he was not an innovator. Among his philoosophic works are The Field of Ethics (1901), The Nature of Goodness (1903), The Problem of Freedom (1911), and Altruism: Its Nature and Variety (1919). Palmer wrote a biography of his wife, The Life of Alice Freeman Palmer (1908); Mrs. Palmer was the president of Wellesley College (1882–1887).
Palmer also wrote literary and critical books, and published a much-admired translation of the Odyssey (1884).

Palmerin. The hero of several 16th-century Spanish romances of chivalry that rivaled Aulës of Gaul in popularity. According to tradition, the first work in the series, Palmerin de Oliva (1511) was written by an anonymous lady of Augustobriga.
However, it may have been written by Francisco Vázquez de Ciudad Rodrigo, to whom is also attributed the second part, Primaleon (1512). The final work of the series, Palmerin de Inglaterra (1547– 1548), is considered the best and was one of the volumes spared from condemnation in Don Quijote.
Although it is sometimes ascribed to Luis Hurtado, the author was probably Francisco de Moraes, a Portuguese. Robert Southey published an English trans-

Palmerston, 3d Viscount. Henry John Temple (1784–1865). English statesman. He was prime minister from 1835 to 1838 and from 1859 to 1865. He opposed construction of the Suez Canal. He supported a policy of neutrality in the U.S. Civil War, but intervened successfully in a number of threatening and actual international conflicts in favor of the status quo or the restitution of liberal order.

Palmieri, Matteo (1406–1475). Florentine writer. He is the author of a dialogue, Della vita civile (On the Civil Life) on the training of the ideal citizen. His Città di vita (City of Life) is a long philosophical poem in terza rima, influenced by Dante.

Palmyra. The Biblical Tadmor, a city east of Syria. After the revolt of its queen Zenobia, it was destroyed by the Emperor Aurelian (273 a.d.).

Paltock, Robert (1697–1767). English lawyer and author, principally known for the extraordinary fantasy and romance, The Life and Adventures of Peter Wilkins, a Cornish Man (1751), which describes a country of flying women.

Paludan, Jacob (1896– ). Danish novelist and essayist. A pessimistic critic of modern society, Paludan paints a dark, bitter portrait of Denmark at the beginning of World War I in his novel cycle
Jürgen Stein (2 vols., 1932–1933). In the novel Fugle omkring Fyret (Birds Around the Light, 1925), he depicts a small, quiet fishing village of simple people whose values are corrupted when an artificial harbor is constructed.

Pamela, or Virtue Rewarded (1740–1742).
An epistolary novel in two parts by Samuel Richardson, generally considered to be the first modern English novel. In the first part Pamela is Aggressive Chastity, in the second, Provocative Prudence. A simple, unsophisticated, fifteen-year-old country girl, Pamela Andrews has a surprising tendency for self-analysis.
She is the maidservant of a wealthy woman who dies and whose son, Mr. B., pursues her with base intentions. He kidnaps her and tries to seduce her, but is deterred by the tenacity of her resistance. She then convinces him to marry her and sets about to reform him. The story is told in a series of letters from Pamela to her parents, and reads like a private journal. See B., Mr.

Pan (Gr., all, everything). An Arcadian god of pastures, forests, flocks, and herds of Greek mythology; also, the personification of deity displayed in creation and pervading all things. He is represented with the lower part of a goat, and the upper part of a man. He invented the musical pipe of seven reeds, which he named Strinx.

Legend has it that at the time of the Crucifixion, just when the veil of the Temple was rent in twain, a cry swayed across the ocean in the hearing of many, “Great Pan is dead,” and that at the same time the responses of the oracles ceased forever. The Dead Pan, a poem by Elizabeth Barrett Browning (1844), is founded on this legend. Pan is also the subject of her poem A Musical Instrument and of Robert Browning’s Pan and Luna.

Panacea (Gr., all-healing). In Greek myth, the daughter of Asklepios, god of medicine. She was merely a personification of the idea of a cure-all.

In the Middle Ages, the search for the panacea was one of the alchemists’ self-imposed tasks. Fable tells of many panaceas, such as the Promethean unguent, which rendered the body invulnerable; Aladdin’s ring; the balsam of Fierabras; and Prince Ahmed’s apple.

Panathenaia (Panathenaia). An Athenian festival in honor of Pallas Athene. Under the Tyrant Pisistratus, it was given great importance and became the occasion for a contest of bards and other cultural events. It was probably for this festival that the many versions of the Iliad and the Odyssey were collated and standardized.

Panchatantara. A collection of fables in Sanskrit. The compilation is supposed to have been ordered in the fifth century by King Amarasakti of South India for the edification of his sons. There is an English translation (1955) by Arthur W. Ryder.

Pancrace. In Molîre’s Mariage Forcé, a doctor of the Aristotelian school, who involves himself in constant absurdity in his attempts to apply his cumbersome logical analysis to trivial matters. When his adversary cannot agree, he calls him “un ignorant, un ignorantissime, ignorantiffant, et ignorantifié.” See Scoganarella.

Pandarus (Pandaros). In Greek legend, a Lycian leader, one of the allies of Priam in the Trojan War. In the classic story he is depicted as an admirable archer, slain by Diomedes and honored as a hero-god in his own country. In medieval romance he is represented as such a despicable fellow that the word pandar is derived from his name. In Boccaccio’s Filostrato he is Criseyde’s young cousin. Chaucer, in his Troilus and Criseyde (see Troilus), makes him Criseyde’s uncle, a worldly-wise, but sympathetic character. Shakespeare, in his drama of Troilus and Criseyde, represents him as procuring for Troilus the good graces of Cressida, and in Much Ado About Nothing, it is said that Troilus “was the first employer of pandars.”

pandemonium (Gr., all the demons”). A wild, unrestrained uproar, a lawless, infernal tumult. The word was first used by Milton, in Paradise Lost as the name of the principal city in Hell, “the high capital of Satan and his peers.”

Pandora. In Greek mythology, the first woman. Prometheus had made an image and stolen fire from heaven to endow it with life. In revenge, Zeus commanded Hephaestus to make a woman, who was named Pandora (i.e., the All-gifted), because each of the gods gave her some power that was to bring about the ruin of man. Zeus gave her a vessel which she was to present to him who married her. Prometheus distrusted Zeus and his gifts, but Eponymus, his brother, married the beautiful Pandora, and, against advice, accepted the gift of the god. As soon as he opened the jar all the evils that flesh is heir to flew forth, and have ever since continued to afflict the world. According to some accounts the last thing that flew out was Hope, but others say that Hope alone remained. Some versions blame Pandora’s curiosity for the disaster.

Pandora’s box came to mean a present that seems valuable, but is in reality a curse, like that of Mimâs, who found his very food became gold, and so uneatable.

Pan-Germanism. A movement to incorporate all German peoples in one political organization and to extend German influence generally. It reached a height before World War I, and was continued by Adolf Hitler.

Pangloss, Dr. (Gr., all tongue”). The pedantic old tutor to the hero in Voltaire’s Candide, or L’Optimisme (1759). His distinguishing feature is his incurable and misleading optimism; he sees and endures all sorts of misfortune, but to the end he reiterates “All is for the best in this best of all possible worlds.” He is said to have been based on the philosopher Leibniz, but it is more likely that Voltaire had in mind the German philosopher Christian von Wolff (or Wolf, 1679–1754), who popularized Leibniz’s works, and whom Voltaire must have read.

Panic (1935). A verse play by Archibald MacLeish. The play attempts to show how human panic converts the financial crashes of the 1930’s into catastrophes as inevitable as natural disasters. MacLeish here rejected blank verse in favor of accentual meter.

Pan Michael. The third of a Polish historic trilogy by Sienkiewicz. See With Fire and Sword. Panormita, il. Antonio Beccadelli (1394–1471), Italian Humanist and scholar. He served as a secretary at the Naples court and was crowned with the laurel by the Emperor Sigismund in 1432. He was and still is noted for his authorship of a collection of epigrams, obscene in content, called Hermaphroditus (1425). The surname Panormita was derived from the Latin name of his native city, Panormus (Palermo).

Panova, Vera Fiodorovna (1905– ). Russian novelist. Her first successful work was Traveling Companions (Sputnik; 1947), describing the lives of a group of people working on a hospital train during World War II. Its focus on the human elements of the situation and its high quality of craftsmanship, in characterization and language, are also to be found in some of Panova’s later books, such as Krushilikha (1948), which is set in a woman factory whose name gives the novel its title, and Seasons of the Year (Vremena goda; 1953), about life in an industrial town.

Pantagruel. The principal character of Rabelais’ great satire, Gargantua and Pantagruel. The name, meaning "all-thirsty," had originally been given to a little sea devil in 15th-century mystery plays who threw salt into the mouths of drunks to stimulate their thirst.

Capitalizing on the popularity of a contemporary chapbook about a marvellous giant called Gargantuà, Rabelais introduced Pantagruel, the son of Gargantuà and Badebrec, in Les Horribles et espouvantables faictz et pourceuzes du très renommé Pantagruel, Roy des Dipسودes, fils du grand géant Gargantuà (1532), which later came to be known as Book II. Born during a terrible drought, Pantagruel is covered with hair at birth, like a young bear, and is so strong that though he is chained to his cradle he breaks his bonds into 500 pieces with a single blow of his infant fist. The tale goes on to recount his fabulous childhood feats, his tour of the universities and his life with Pantaloon in the Latin Quarter of Paris, and his conduct of the war against the Dipسودes in Utopia. Aside from the realistic description of student life and the famous letter in which Gargantuà, extolling the recent revolution in learning, instructs his son to immerse himself in all the new studies, the book remains on the whole faithful to medieval tradition.

In Books III-V Pantagruel continues as the hero, but he becomes less and less the fabulous giant and more the personification of the Renaissance man in search of knowledge and the good life.

Pantagruelism. According to Rabelais, "a certain gaiety of spirit produced by a contempt of the incidentals of fate." The term is now used to refer to coarse or boisterous humor that has a satirical or serious intent.

Pantheism. Rabelais' name is anagrammed as Alcofrybas Nasier. The doctrine that God is everything and everything is God. This monistic theory was elaborated by Spinoza, who, by his doctrine of the Infinite Substance, sought to overcome the opposition between mind and matter, body and soul. During the romantic period and later, Wordsworth, Shelley, Emerson, Tennyson, and others expressed various doctrines of pantheism in their writings.

Pantheon (from Gr. pan, all, and theos, god). A temple dedicated to all the gods; specifically, that erected at Rome by Agrippa, son-in-law to Augustus. It is circular, nearly 150 feet in diameter, and of the same total height; since the early 7th century, as Santa Maria Rotunda, it has been used as a Christian church.

The Pantheon at Paris was originally the church of St. Geneviève, built by Louis XV and finished in 1790. The following year the Convention gave it its present name, and set it apart as the shrine of those Frenchmen whom their country wished to honor.

Panurge (Gr., "all-doer"). In Rabelais' Gargantuà and Pantagruel, the high-spirited rogue who becomes Pantagruel's companion. In Book II, when Pantagruel first meets him in Paris, he is suffering from a chronic malady called "impuncts," which he has 63 methods of curing, "the most honorable and ordinary of which was filching." He proves to be "a quarrelsome fellow, a sharper, a toper, a roisterer, and a profligate, if there ever was one in the city of Paris. In every other respect, he was the best fellow in the world." Later, in the war against the Dipسودes, he displays a remarkable talent for ruse and cunning.

It is his inability to decide whether or not to marry that forms the basis of the plot in Books III to V. Although he still displays dialectical genius.
in his defense of borrowers and debtors in Book III and running in dispatching the dishonest DINGDONG in Book IV, he is characterized chiefly by cowardice in these latter books. During the tempest in Book IV, for example, he is reduced to hysterical blubbering, which he later dismisses with the statement, "I fear nothing by danger." See also Furry Lawcats and Traumaste.

Panza, Sancho. The squire of Don Quixote in Cervantes' novel. He is a short, pot-bellied rustic, full of common sense, but without a grain of "spirituality." He is famous for his proverbs. Panza, in Spanish, means paunch.

Panzini, Alfredo (1863-1939). Italian novelist, historian, essayist, and short-story writer. He was a literary disciple of Carducci, and his writings are significant for their carefully worked, classically intoned style.

For the most part, Panzini's fiction lacks a convincing treatment of character and a sustained interest in plot development. He excels instead in isolated lyrical vignettes, similar in form to Carduccian neoclassicism and similar in tone to the delicate moods of the Crepuscolari poets.

His novels include Wanted: A Wife (1o Cerco Moglie; 1920), La Madonnina di Mamé (1915), Santippe (1914), Il Mondo E' Rotondo (1920), Il Padrone Sono Me (1922), La Pulcella Senza Pulcellaggio (1925), and Viaggio Con La Giovane Ebrea (1935). He also wrote two essay-novels, La Lanterna di Diogene (1910) and Viaggio Sentimentale di Un Povero Letterato (1919), and two short-story collections, Piccole Storie del Mondo Grande (1901) and Fiabe della Virtù (1911).

Pao1 and Francesca. Guilty lovers whose history is one of the most famous episodes in Dante's Inferno. They are in the second circle, that of the carnal sinners, blown lightly about by stormy winds as they had been by their passions when alive. Married to an unattractive man for political reasons, Francesca da Rimini had fallen in love with Paolo Malatesta, her husband's handsome brother, while they were innocently reading together the story of Launcelot. (See Galeotto.) Her husband discovered their guilt and put them both to death (c. 1289). Another version, as in Stephen Phillips' poetic drama Paolo and Francesca (c. 1900), is that Paolo was sent by his brother to escort the bride from her home in Ravenna, with the same results. The story of the unhappy pair is also the subject of Francesca da Rimini (1901), a verse tragedy by Gabriele D'Annunzio, which has passages of great lyric beauty; D'Annunzio dedicated this work to Eleonora Duse, who played the title role in its first production. Other dramas on this theme have been written by Silvio Pellico, G. H. Boker, and F. M. Crawford. Leigh Hunt wrote a poem, The Story of Rimini (1816), about the unhappy lovers. They are also the subject of a tone poem (1877) by Tchaikovsky and an opera (1914) by Riccardo Zandonai.

Papegues. See Pope-Figs.

Papen, Franz von (1879- ). German diplomat. He was Nazi ambassador to Austria (1934-1938) and Turkey (1939-1944). He was acquitted at the Nuremberg Trials.

Paphian. Relating to Venus or rather to Paphos, a city of Cyprus, where Venus was worshiped; a Cyprian; a prostitute.

Paphnutius (Paphnuc). The chief character in Thaïs, a novel by Anatole France. He is a young monk who destroys himself in converting Thaïs, a famous courtesan.

Papimaniacs. An anglicism for Papimanes, in Rabelais' Gargantua and Pantagruel, the inhabitants of the isle of Papimany, who exist in the hope of laying eyes on their idol, the pope. Their leader is Bishop Stoutmoran (Fr., "Homemass"), and their holy book the papal decrets. The episode of the Papimaniacs is a thinly disguised satire on the Roman Catholic Church.

Papini, Giovanni (1881-1956). Italian writer and philosopher. One of the founders of the philosophical journal Leonardo (1903-1907), he was known as a bitter opponent and critic of Christianity. After World War I, he was converted to Roman Catholicism and transformed into an exponent of religious orthodoxy. His highly successful Life of Christ (Storia di Cristo; 1921) was published shortly afterwards. Other writings include Un Uomo Finito (The Failure; 1912), an autobiographical novel; Sant'Agostino (1929) and Dante Vivo (1933), biographies; and Gog (1931), a satire on modern society.

parabasis. See Old Comedy.

Paracelsus (1835). A narrative poem by Robert Browning. The hero is Bombastus Paracelsus (1493-1541), a famous Swiss physician who was said to have delved deep into alchemy and to have kept a small devil prisoner in the pommel of his sword. In the poem, Paracelsus, at 20, thinks knowledge the supreme good, and on the advice of two friends retires to a seat of learning. Eight years later, dissatisfied, he falls in with April, an Italian poet, and resolves to seek the supreme good in love. Again he fails, and, when dying in a cell in the hospital of St. Sebastian, deserted by all but one friend, he decries the supreme good to be "To see good in evil, and a hope in ill-success."

Pareclite (Gr. parakeutos, Helper, Advocate). The Holy Spirit as Comforter or Advocate. Abelard gave this name to the oratory of his hermitage at Nogent-sur-Seine.

Parade's End. A series of novels by Ford Madox Ford, consisting of Some Do Not (1924), No More Parades (1925), A Man Could Stand Up (1926), and The Last Post (1928), all published together as Parade's End in 1950. The series describes the adventures in love and war of Christopher Tietjens, an old-fashioned gentleman of the English governing class. Ford draws a brilliant picture of the social changes brought about by the First World War. Before the war, Tietjens is nobly faithful to his impossible wife. But trench warfare seems to him a symbol of the disintegration of his whole society. He has a mental breakdown, goes to live with a girl he loves, and gives up his position, wealth, and historic family ties.

paradise. The land of the blessed. The Greeks borrowed this word from the Persians; it originally denoted the enclosed and extensive parks and pleasure grounds of the Persian kings. The Septuagint translators adopted it for the garden of Eden, and New Testament writers applied it to heaven, the celestial abode of the blessed dead. Dante's Paradiso, the third part of his Divine Comedy, describes the poet's journey through the 10 spheres of paradise.

Paradise Lost (1667). An epic poem in 12 books by John Milton. Often considered the greatest epic in any modern language, it tells the story of Man's first disobedience and the fruit of that forbidden tree whose mortal taste Brought death into the World, and all our woe, With loss of Eden.

Satan fouses the panic-stricken host of fallen angels with tidings of a rumor current in Heaven of a new world about to be created. He calls a council to deliberate what should be done, and they agree to send him in search of this new world. Passing the gulf between Heaven and Hell, Satan disguised as an angel enters the orb of the Sun, and, having obtained the information he seeks, goes to Paradise in the form of a cormorant. Seating himself on the Tree of Life, he overhears Adam and Eve talking about the prohibition made by God, and at once resolves upon the nature of his attack. Gabriel sends two angels to watch over Paradise, and Satan flees. Sent to warn Adam of his danger, Raphael tells him the story of Satan's revolt and expulsion from Heaven, and why and how this world was made. After a time Satan returns to Paradise in the form of a mist, and, entering the serpent, induces Eve to eat of the forbidden fruit. Adam eats "that he may perish with the woman he loved." Satan returns to Hell to tell his triumph and Sin and Death come into the world. As Michael leads the guilty pair out of the garden, he shows them a vision of humanity's misery—but, as he explains, the Son of God has already offered himself as ransom for man, and, in Him, man shall ultimately be victorious over Satan.

In 1671, Paradise Regained (in four books), written by Milton on suggestion of his Quaker father Thomas Ellwood, was published. The subject is Christ's triumphant resistance to Satan's temptation, regaining the Paradise lost by Adam and Eve. The New Testament narrative is followed and enlarged upon, Satan, for instance, appeals not only to hunger, ambition, and pride, but also to the love of humanistic learning and art. Paradise Regained has never been as popular as its predecessor. The earlier poem is distinguished by richness and sonority of style, heroic characterization, and action on a grand, cosmic scale, while the verse of the sequel is generally far more austere and simple, and its action is much more restricted. See Adramelech, Arioch, Ardib, Beezel-bub, Ithuriel, Japhet, Lucifer, Pandemonium, Uriel, Uzziel, Zephon.

Paradise of Dainty Devices, The. An English poetical miscellany (see TopTet's Miscellany) of the Elizabethan period. First published in 1576, by 1606 it had gone through at least 10 editions. Its contents, originally compiled by Richard Edwards, show a taste for pious and serious works.

Paradise Regained. See Paradiso Lost.}

Paradiso (Paradise). Part III of the Divine Comedy by Dante. Beatrice and Dante are transported to the sphere of fire, where Dante first hears the musical harmony of the heavenly spheres. They move through the eight concentric heavens of the Moon, Mercury, Venus, Sun, Mars, Jupiter, Saturn, and the Fixed Stars, meeting in each heaven those of the blessed spirits notable for its appropriate virtue. Dante asks and Beatrice answers many specific questions about the nature of good and evil, original sin, transubstantiation, and the like. The ninth heaven is the Primum Mobile, divided into the nine orders of the angels. And beyond it is the Empyrean, a river of radiant light in the center of which is God's court, pictured as a white rose whose tiers of petals hold angels and beatified souls, united in the glorification of God. Here, as throughout the nine heavens, every participant is equally content with his position in the regions of bliss, but the closer a spirit is to God, the greater the intensity both of his joy and of the celestial light he reflects. Beatrice, who had originally been the one to petition that Dante be granted this extraordinary tour, now resumes her place in the rose, and is replaced by St. Bernard, who bids Dante to contemplate the Virgin Mary and himself prays her to allow the visitor a glimpse of the Godhead. Dante has been so thoroughly purified that, although still a mortal, his own will is totally merged in the Love and Will of the Creator, and he is thus capable of gazing for a moment on the supremely radiant light of the Trinity in Unity. paradox. A statement or proposition seemingly contrary to common sense, yet possibly true in fact and full of significance, at least in part because of its contradictory qualities. "Waging the peace" is a concept that is paradoxical in this sense. Sometimes a paradox is implied, sometimes explicit. The paradox as a rhetorical device is full of surprises and often produces a memorable passage. Oscar Wilde and Gilbert K. Chesterton were masters of the literary use of paradox. See Irony.

Parashurama. See Vishnu.

Parcae. The Latin name for the Fates. The three were Nona, Decuma, and Morta. Parcae is from the Latin pars, "a lot"; the corresponding Moirai of the Greeks is from the Gr. meros, "a lot."

Pardo Bazán [de Quiroga], Emilia (1852-1921). Spanish novelist. The only child of the count of Pardo Bazán, she wrote numerous critical and scholarly works and was professor of modern romance literatures at the University of Madrid. Although she is known for having introduced French naturalism into Spain, her work also contains elements of traditional Spanish realism and romanticism. Her finest novels are Los Pasos del Ulloa (1886) and its sequel, La madre naturaleza (1887); these works, which describe the gradual degeneration of an aristocratic family, are notable for their evocation of the Galician countryside. Her other novels include La tribuna (1882), El cisme de Vilamorta (1885), and La quimera (1905), a partly autobiographical work illustrating the spiritualist orientation of her later years. Some of her best short stories of Galicia are collected in Cuentos de Marineda (1892).

Pardoner's Tale, The. One of the Canterbury Tales of Geoffrey Chaucer. In the Prologue the Pardoner boastfully reveals both the fraudulent tricks he uses in selling supposedly holy relics, and his own vices, particularly his hypocrisy in preaching primarily against cupidity when his own motives are purely avaricious. Then he gives a sample sermon, railing against glutonous excess, drunkenness, gambling, and swearing. He uses as an exemplum the story, of Oriental origin, about three young revelers who determine to slay Death because he has just killed one of their comrades with the plague. Asked where they can find Death, an old man directs them to a tree, where they find a great pile of gold. They draw lots and send the youngest back to town for food and wine. The remaining two plot to kill him, so as to split the gold only two ways, while he puts poison in the wine, so as to keep all the treasure himself. When he returns, they stab him, then drink the wine; thus all three indeed find Death. The Par- donor boldly follows his sermon with an attempt to sell his relics; he turns first to the Host, who repulses him rudely, so that the Knight has to intervene to prevent a quarrel.

Paré, Ambroise (1517–1590). A French surgeon, often called the father of modern surgery. He introduced the practice of ligature of arteries in place of cautery in amputations. He was court physician to Henry II, Francis II, Charles IX, and Henry III.

Pareto, Vilfredo (1848–1923). Italian economist and sociologist. In 1893, after a career as a mining engineer, he became professor of political economy at Lausanne University. A man of vast erudition, he applied methods of mathematical analysis to general economic theory. His best-known work is Trattato di Sociologia Generale (The Mind and Society, 1916). Pareto’s contempt for democratic institutions being well known, Mussolini and his followers claimed him as the creator of fascist ideology.

Pariah. A member of a very low caste of Hindus in South India, from a word meaning a drummer. It was these who beat the drums at certain festivals. Europeans often extended the term to those of no caste at all; hence it is applied to outcastes in general.

Paribanou. In the tale of “Prince Ahmed and Paribanou” in the Arabian Nights, a fairy who gives Prince Ahmed a tent so small that a lady may carry it about as a toy, but which, when spread, will cover a whole army.

Paridell, Sir. See Faerie Queene, The.

Parini, Giuseppe (1729–1799). Italian poet. Highly didactic in tone and intention, his poems are critical of the corruption and injustices of 18th-century society, the moral being shown through subtly humorous satire. Il Giorno (The Day, 1763–1765, 1801) is a long poem in blank verse which ostensibly gives instruction in fashionable ways of spending time, but in reality pokes fun at the sterile life of the aristocracy. Like Il Giorno, Parini’s Odi (1764–1795) call attention to the ills of society and the need for immediate reform.

Paris. (1) In Greek legend, the son of Priam, king of Troy, and Hecuba; and through his abduction of Helen the cause of the siege of Troy. Before his birth Hecuba dreamed that she was to bring forth a firebrand, and, as this was interpreted to mean that the unborn child would bring destruction to his house, the infant Paris was exposed on Mount Ida. He was, however, brought up by a shepherd under the name of Alexander, and grew to perfection of beautiful manhood. When the golden apple of discord was thrown on the table of the gods, it was Paris who had to judge between the rival claims of Hera, Aphrodite, and Athene. (See Judgment of Paris.) He awarded the apple and the title of “Fair- est” to Aphrodite, who in return assisted him to carry off Helen, for whom he deserted his wife, Oenone. At Troy Paris earned the contempt of all by his cowardice, and he was fatally wounded with a poisoned arrow by Philoctetes at the taking of the city.

(2) In Shakespeare’s Romeo and Juliet, a young nobleman to whom Juliet is betrothed against her will.

Parish, Matthew (c. 1200–1259). English historian, most famous of the chroniclers at the Benedictine monastery of St. Albans. He revised the chronicles of England kept by his predecessors John of Cella (covering the period through 1188) and Roger of Wendover (through 1229), and continued a lively record of events in England and Europe until 1259, the whole work being called the Chronica Majora. He abridged it (c. 1253) as the Historia Minor, also called Historia Anglorum, covering the period 1057–1253. He also compiled and probably contributed to series of lives of the abbots of St. Albans and lives of the saints.

Parisina (1816). A poem by Lord Byron. It describes the illicit love of Parisina, the wife of Azo, the marquis of Ferrara, and Hugo, his natural son. The action is founded on fact, occurring in the life of Niccola III of Ferrara who had the lovers beheaded.

Parzizade, Princess. The heroine of one of the tales of the Arabian Nights, the “Story of the Sisters who Envied their Younger Sister.” She is most famed for her adventures while in search of the Talking Bird, the Singing Tree, and the Yellow or Gold-Colored Water. After she finds these treasures, her troubles are at an end.

Parker, Dorothy [Rothschild] (1893– ). American writer of short stories, verse, and criticism. Noted for her caustic wit, as drama critic on Vanity Fair and later The New Yorker she often drew blood with such critical sallies as her remark in her review of an unsuccessful Broadway play that Katharine Hepburn’s acting ran “the whole gamut of emotions from A to B.” Her works in verse are equally sardonic, usually dry, elegant commentaries on such themes as departing or departed love. The collection Enough Rope (1926) contains the often-quoted Resume, on suicide, and News Item, about girls who wear glasses. Her short stories, which were collected in After Such Pleasures (1933) and in Here Lies (1939), are as imbued with a knowledge of human nature as they are deep in disenchchantment; among the best known are Big Blonde and A Telephone Call. She also wrote a play, Close Harmony (1924), with Elmer Rice.

Parker, Sir Gilbert (1862–1932). Canadian novelist. He was the author of The Seats of the Mighty (1896), a best-selling novel about the fall of Quebec in 1759.

Parker, Louis Napoleon (1852–1944). English dramatist and composer. He is best known for his comedy Pomander Walk (1910), the historical play Disraeli (1911) which starred George Arliss, and the drama Joseph and His Brethren (1913). He translated many of the plays of Edmond Rostand.

Parker, Matthew (1504–1575). English prelate. Chaplain to Anne Boleyn (1535) and dean of Lincoln (1552), he was during Mary’s reign deprived of preferments, but became the second Anglican archbishop of Canterbury under Queen Elizabeth (1559). He was extremely influential in Anglicanism. He published the revised Bishops’ Bible (1572).

Parker, Theodore (1810–1860). American clergyman, writer and abolitionist. Parker was a Harvard graduate and a pastor of the Unitarian congregation at West Roxbury, Mass. He was an active member of the Transcendentalist Club and wrote often on its doctrines; the best statement of his unorthodox beliefs is contained in his sermon, On the Transient and Permanent in Christianity (1841). He rejected the church and scripture, relying on a personal intuition of God. He was constantly in trouble with the orthodox members of the church for his religious and later his social sentiments. He was an ardent abolitionist and supported many advanced social notions.

Parkman, Francis (1823–1893). American historian. Having contracted a severe case of what he called “Injuns on the brain” as a boy, Parkman made a trip to Wyoming in 1846 during which he lived with and studied the Sioux Indians, an experience he described in The Oregon Trail (1847). Upon his return to the East, Parkman suffered a physical and nervous breakdown and remained a semi-invalid for the rest of his life; afflicted with extremely weak eyesight, he constructed a wire frame that enabled him to write with his eyes closed. In 1851 he published History of the Conspiracy of Pontiac, the first volume of his series on the struggle between Great Britain and France for control of North America. To Parkman, the eventual success of the British represented the victory of progress over reaction. The other volumes of the series, which is distinguished by its documentation from original sources and by Parkman’s virile style and narrative skill, are Pioneers of France in the New World (1865), The Jesuits in North America (1867), LaSalle and the Discovery of the Great West (1869), The Old Regime in Canada (1874), Count Frontenac and New France under Louis XIV (1877), Montcalm and Wolfe (1884), and A Half-Century of Conflict (1892). Parkman also wrote Vassall Morton (1856), a semiautobiographical novel.

Parley, Peter. See Samuel Griswold Goodrich.

Parliamentary novels. A series of novels about political life by Anthony Trollope, including Phineas Finn, Phineas Redux (1874), The Prime Minister (1876), and The Duke’s Children (1880). The hero is Phineas Finn, a young Irishman, but Plantagenet Palliser, duke of Omnium, plays a prominent role.

Parliament of Fowls, The (probably c. 1382). A poem by Geoffrey Chaucer, almost 700 lines in rhyme royal. After reading Cicero’s account of Scipio Africanus’ appearance to the younger Scipio in a dream, the poet himself dreams that Scipio Africanus conducts him to a garden where he sees the Temple of Venus. Then he comes to a hillside where all the fowls have gathered at the bidding of Nature to choose their mates for it is Saint Valentine’s Day. Nature declares that the royal tereel eagle has first choice, and he chooses the lovely formel eagle. Two tercels of lower rank contest the claim, one declaring he has loved her longer, the other that he loves her most truly. The other fowls begin a lively dispute over the three claims, each bird according to its character, until Nature finally refers the choice to the formel eagle, who asks for a year to make up her mind. The other birds quickly choose their mates, sing a rondel, and fly away.

Parmenides of Elea (fl. 485 B.C.). A Greek philosopher, founder of the Eleatic School. Parmenides' philosophy is expressed in his long poem known as On Nature, of which only fragments survive. The goal of Parmenides' intellectual journey is light, the symbol of unity and knowledge. The philosopher was not concerned with the origin of the universe; he maintained that the world is an unchanging whole, that motion and change are only illusion, and that unity is truth. In these beliefs the Eleatic School opposed the Milesian School.

Parmigianino, II. Real name, Francesco Mazzola (1504–1540). Italian painter. In his native Parma and in Rome and Bologna, he painted religious subjects, scenes from mythology, and portraits. In his best-known works—The Madonna of the Long Neck, The Visitation, The Dresden Madonna, and Portrait of Ariadne—he displays the characteristics of the Mannerist style: a witty and perverse upsetting of High Renaissance idealism; rejection of contemporaneous achievements in creating rational space and realistic human forms; and an ambiguity of meaning which may reflect deep religious feelings. He is a link between the elongated, twisting figures of Michelangelo and those of El Greco.

Parnassians. French school of poetry (1860-1880). The Parnassians reacted against the excessive emotionalism and subjectivity of the romantic movement, advocating instead that poetry be calm, detached, and meticulously precise in technique. Their reaction against romanticism and their emphasis on precision and objectivity closely parallels the growth of realism and naturalism in drama and the novel. The Parnassians were first published in the Revue fantaisiste (1861). The school's leader was Charles Leconte de Lisle, whose poetry appeared in the Parnasse Contemporain (1865) along with the work of Gautier, Baudelaire, Sully Prudhomme, Verlaine, and Mallarmé.

Parnassus (Parnassos). A mountain in Phocis, Greece. It has two summits, one of which was consecrated to Apollo and the Muses, the other to Dionysus. Owing to its connection with the Muses (though they were more often associated with Mt. Helicon), Parnassus came to be regarded as the seat of poetry and music. Delphi was located on the southern slope of Parnassus.

Parnell, Charles Stewart (1846–1891). Irish nationalist leader, a Member of Parliament. He ceaselessly agitated for Home Rule in Ireland, winning William Gladstone and the Liberal party over to his side and uniting a number of dissident elements in his own country, until his career was brought to an end by accusations concerning his private life made by his enemies. He was named correspondent in a divorce suit (1890) initiated by one Captain O'Shea against his wife Kitty. Parnell is known for the devoted partisans and violent enemies that his policies and his personality created among the Irish people. He is referred to frequently throughout the works of James Joyce, to whom he was a political hero. See Phoenix Park.

Parnell, Thomas (1679–1718). Irish poet and clergyman, a member of the Scriblerus Club and a friend of Steele and Addison. He provided the preface, Essay on the Life, Writings, and Learning of Homer, to Pope's translation of the Iliad (1715–1720). His major works include the meditative poems A Hymn to Contentment (1714), A Night Piece on Death (1721), and the famous moral apologue The Hermit (1721). After Parnell's death, his poems were edited and published by Pope in 1721 with a dedicatory tribute to his poetic style.

Parody. In literature, a comic or satirical imitation of a piece of writing exaggerating its style and content in a sort of reductio ad absurdum, playing especially upon any weakness in structure or meaning of the original. A Christmas Garland, by Max Beerbohm, Condensed Novels, by Bret Harte, and Father William, by Lewis Carroll, are examples; the last named has become famous in its own right, and almost nobody remembers that it was written as a parody of a poem of the same name by Robert Southey.

Parolles. In Shakespeare's All's Well That Ends Well, a cowardly braggart and wastrel whose influence on Bertram is partially responsible for the latter's rejection of Helena. At one point in the play, he is led blindfolded among his friends and, in the belief that he has been captured by the enemy, vilifies them to their faces.

Parrington, Vernon L[ouis] (1871–1929). American teacher, historian, biographer, and critic. In 1927 Parrington published the Pulitzer-Prize-winning volume, The Colonial Mind. This work became the opening section of his Main Currents in American Thought (1927–1930), left unfinished at his death. Parrington frankly admitted in the preface to his first volume: "The point of view from which I have endeavored to evaluate the materials is liberal rather than conservative, Jeffersonian rather than Federalist." His analysis is, therefore, more satisfactory when he deals with authors who were exponents of liberalism: Roger Williams, Tom Paine, Emerson, Thoreau, Hamlin Garland, and Jefferson. His history has been attacked for its emphasis on social or economic themes but despite these criticisms, Main Currents has been highly regarded by students of American literature.

Parsees or Parsis. The modern Zoroastrians who reside mainly in the Bombay section of India. They are descendants of a group of Zoroastrians who fled India from Persia during the Muslim persecutions of the seventh and eighth centuries. Their name means people of Persia, and is derived from the old Persian province of Parsa. Although influenced by the Hinduism of India, they still maintain the main tenets of the Zoroastrian religion. A sacred fire is kept burning in their churches as a symbol of the Divine light that burns in man's soul. See Zoroaster.
Parsifal (1882). An opera by Richard Wagner largely based on the Parzival of Wolfram von Eschenbach. The evil Klingsor has enchanted the beautiful Kundry and uses her to lure the knights of the Grail into breaking their vows of chastity. In this way he has taken the sacred lance which wounded Christ from its guardian Amfortas, and has wounded him with it. But the innocent Parsifal resists Kundry’s kiss, and when Klingsor hurls the spear at him, it comes safely to his hand. Parsifal has to wander through many adventures, for he had failed in his ignorance to understand the ceremony of the Grail when he had been permitted to observe it; but eventually he returns to become king of the Grail, freeing Kundry from her spell by baptizing her, and healing Amfortas with a touch of the sacred lance.

Parson’s Tale, The. Last of the Canterbury Tales of Geoffrey Chaucer. It is a long prose sermon, replete with pious quotations, on the way of Penitence by which the soul may progress toward God. Contrition is followed by Confession, which involves an awareness of the difference between venial and deadly sins. An exposition of the seven deadly sins is interpolated, with the various branches of each, and the virtues which serve as remedies against them. The discussion of the manner of Confession is then resumed, followed by an explanation of Satisfaction, or the undertaking of penances, which is the last stage of Penitence.

A short paragraph, known as Chaucer’s Retractions, is attached to the end of this tale. Chaucer prays God’s forgiveness for those of his works that are frivolous or sinful, including most of the Canterbury Tales, and hopes that his moral works—the translation of Boethius, the homilies, and the lives of saints—will serve as penance.

Partage de Midi. See Break of Noon.

Parthenius (Parthenios, fl. 1st century B.C.). Greek grammarian and poet. The only work of his that has come down to us is Love’s Woos (Peri Erotikon Pathematon), consisting of 36 love stories. Parthenius taught Vergil Greek. A learned slave, he is said to have been freed in old age.

Parthenon. The great temple on the Athenian Acropolis to Athene Parthenos (i.e., the Virgin). Many of its sculptured friezes and fragments of pediments are now in the British Museum among the Elgin Marbles. The Temple was begun by the architect Ictinus about 450 B.C., and the embellishment of it was mainly the work of Phidias, whose colossal chryselephantine statue of Athene was its chief treasure.

Parthenopaeus (Parthenopaios). See Seven Against Thebes.

Parthenope. One of the sirens of Greek mythology. When she and her sisters drowned themselves in chagrin at Odysseus’ escape, her body was washed ashore at the present site of Naples, where the first settlement was named for her.

Partisan, The, a Tale of the Revolution (1835). A novel by William Gilmore Sims. The first novel in a trilogy dealing with the American Revolution in South Carolina, The Partisan centers on the events between the fall of Charleston and Horatio Gates’s defeat at Camden, and on the actions of Major Singleton and Colonel Walton, patriots and aristocratic landholders. Its sequel, Mellichampe, a Legend of the Santee (1836), deals with the time between the defeat at Camden and the arrival of Nathaniel Greene, and with the rivalry between Ernest Melli- chanup, a patriot, and Barsfeld, a Tory, for the hand of Janet Berkeley. The military action in Katharine Walton, or, the Rebel of Dorchester (1851), the third novel of the trilogy, is nearly the same as that in Mellichampe; the central characters are Colonel Walton, who appears in The Partisan, and his daughter Katharine, who marries Singleton, also the hero of the earlier book. The most famous character in the trilogy is Captain Foxor, sometimes considered the best comic character in American romantic fiction.

Partisan Review. An American literary magazine founded in 1934. At first wholly identified with the radical left wing in politics, it diverged after 1937 from orthodox Marxism and became more and more politically independent and concerned with intellectual, literary, and artistic questions. Edited by Philip Rahv, one of its founders, and William Phillips, its staff has included F. W. Dupee, Dwight Macdonald, and Mary McCarthy. Always concerned with avant-garde writing, the magazine printed parts of James T. Farrell’s Studs Lonigan before it appeared in book form. Other contributors have included Lionel Trilling, Richard Chase, Robert Gorham Davis, Saul Bellow, T. S. Eliot, Wallace Stevens, and Edmund Wilson. Several collections of material from the magazine have been published: The Partisan Reader (1934–1944) (1946), The New Partisan Reader (1953), Stories in the Modern Manner (1953), and More Stories in the Modern Manner (1954).

Partridge. In Henry Fielding’s Tom Jones, the attendant of Tom Jones, faithful, shrewd, and of childlike simplicity. His excitement in the playhouse when he goes to see Garrick in Hamlet is described in a famous chapter. Partridge has been both barber and schoolmaster before attaching himself to Tom Jones.

Partridge, Bellamy (1878–1960). American writer. He is known especially for Country Lawyer (1939), a book based on the life of his father, The Big Family (1941) was the story of a lawyer’s household of eight children, January Thaw (1945), which became a Broadway play, told of a city couple living in a renovated Connecticut farmhouse. Among Partridge’s many other books are The Old Oaken Bucket (1949) and The Roosevelt Family in America (1936).

Parvati. See Kali.

Parzival (early 13th century). A verse epic by Wolfram von Eschenbach, adapted from the Perceval of Chrétien de Troyes. Parzival is the guileless fool, totally innocent of sin and guilt. Leaving his wife Kondiwamar to visit his mother, he chances upon the castle of the Holy Grail, where its guardian Amfortas has been told that only a guileless fool’s sympathy can heal his wound. But Parzival obeys the laws of courtly etiquette rather than those of religion and humanity, and fails to ask the cause of his host’s suffering. He thus must leave the castle, and later that of King Arthur. He is determined now to win the Grail despite his disgrace, but cannot until a hermit helps him renew his humility and his pure faith in God. Then his achievements allow him to be received at the Round Table, and he asks the questions which will cure Amfortas, becomes king of the Grail, and is reunited with his wife.
For Wagner's use of this material see PARSIFAL, for the Arthurian version see PERCI VAL.

Pascal, Blaise (1623–1662). French philosopher, scientist, mathematician, and writer. At 12 years of age he discovered Euclid's axioms unaided; at 16 he wrote a treatise on conic sections, and at 18 he invented a calculating machine. He formulated the first laws of atmospheric pressure, equilibrium of liquids, and probability, and invented the hydraulic press. In 1654 a mystical experience caused his conversion to Jansenism, and a year later he retired to Port-Royal to end his days writing philosophical tracts. In 18 Lettres Provinciales (1656–1657), he sided with the Jansenists in a dispute over grace, and his argument in these 18 letters, graceful and ironic in style, routed the Jesuit opposition, quoting them verbatim to their own disadvantage and greatly damaging the Jesuit cause. The Pensées, fragments of a projected apology for the Christian religion, appeared in their entirety (1844) only after Pascal’s death.

Pascoli, Giovanni (1855–1912). Italian poet. The reputed inspirer of much modern Italian poetry, he is noted for the exactness of his descriptions, his novel rhythmic patterns, and his predilection for modest, simple, rural, and domestic themes. His poems appeared in the collections Myricae (1891); Poemetti (1897); Cantì di Castelvecchio (1903); Nuovi Poemetti (1906), showing the influence of French symbolism; Poemi Conviviali (1904); Odi e Inni (1906); and Poemi del Risorgimento (1913).

Pasiphaë. In Greek legend, a daughter of the Sun and wife of Minos, king of Crete. She was the mother of Ariadne, and also (through intercourse with a white bull given by Poseidon to Minos) of the Minotaur.

Pasolini, Pier Paolo (1922– ). Italian poet, novelist, and motion-picture director. His poetry and such novels as I Ragazzi di Vita (1955) and Una Vita Violenta (1959) are significant for their use of dialect as a literary medium. The working class and the slums of Rome figure prominently in both his novels and his films. Associated with the postwar group of leftist Italian intellectuals, Pasolini is an outspoken member of the Italian Communist Party.

Pasquier, Etienne (1529–1615). French humanist, poet, and historian. A friend of the poets of the Pléiade, he himself wrote a volume of love poems, the Monophile (1554). In his Recherches de la France (1560–1621), a history of France based on solid documentation, he made astute observations on French medieval and Renaissance poetry that revealed him as the first French literary historian and critic.

Pasquinade. A lampoon or political squib, having ridicule for its object. See Pasquino.

Pasquino. The popular Italian title applied to the torso of a classical statue discovered in the Roman ruins (1901) and located in today's Piazza di Pasquino. The figure, it is said, derives its name from an Italian tailor, whose house it was unearthed. It soon attracted anonymous satirists who found it a convenient place to attach their scurrilous verses on current events; this libelous verse and imitations of it were called pasquinades, and the word is occasionally applied to present-day political squibs and satiric comments. On April 25, as an annual custom, the statue was dressed to represent a pagan deity or classical figure; this occasion might merit the anonymous contributions of more notable writers such as Aretino, but though collections of pasquinades were published, the vogue has long since passed away.

Passage to India, A (1924). An ironic, compassionate novel by E. M. Forster about the difficulties of friendship between the races in British-ruled India. Adela Quested’s hallucination that the friendly young Indian, Dr. Aziz, has assaulted her in the Marabar Caves gives rise to hysterical racial feeling in the community. In this atmosphere even Mr. Fielding, the liberal English principal of a local college, finds his friendship with Dr. Aziz shattered by a misunderstanding. Adela, who has come to India to visit her fiancé, the City Magistrate Ronny Haslop, is traveling with his mother, Mrs. Moore. Mrs. Moore is an intuitive, half-mystical woman, and she has an Oriental understanding of Indians and India. Like Adela, she has an unpleasant experience in the ancient Marabar Caves; the echo in the cave seems to tell her of the worthlessness of life, and she has a nervous breakdown. However, she remains an influence for good, persuading Adela to take back her accusation against Dr. Aziz. The Indians come to regard Mrs. Moore as a goddess and almost worship her. Ronny breaks off his engagement with Adela, who, he feels, has betrayed the English by putting the truth above racial prejudice.
The novel is notable for its strong mystical flavor and its treatment of Indian religions. Mrs. Moore passes from sympathy with poetic Islam, Dr. Aziz’s religion, to Hinduism, the religion of destruction and creation which is practiced by the odd Professor Godbole.

_Passeur, Stève_ (1899– ). French dramatist. He is the author of such brutal plays as _L’Acheteuse_ (1930), _Je Vierai un grand amour_ (1935), _Le Témoin_ (1936), and _La Traîtresse_ (1946).

Passing of the Third Floor Back, The. See Jerome K. Jerome.

_Passionate Pilgrim, The_ (1599). A collection of lyric poems. It was published by William Jaggard, an English printer, with an announcement on the title page that they were “By W. Shakespeare.” Only about four of the poems are now considered to be Shakespeare’s; others are by Griffin, Barnfield, Marlowe, and lesser-known writers.

_Passionate Pilgrim, The, and Other Stories_ (1875). A collection of short stories by Henry James. The title story was one of a number of pieces stimulated by his trip abroad in 1869–1870. It tells of Clement Searle, who goes to England, long the object of his dreams, to claim a rich estate. The tale is ironic and tragic, but full of James’s own passionate love of England.

Passion Play (Ger., Passionspiel). A dramatic presentation of the suffering, crucifixion, and resurrection of Christ, usually performed during Holy Week. Similar to the _miracle play_, such representations developed during the 13th to 16th centuries and are still common. The most famous is that given every 10 years (with a few omissions) by the village of Oberammergau in Bavaria. It was first performed there in 1633, when the villagers vowed to repeat it regularly in gratitude for escape from a plague epidemic.

_Passover_ (Heb. Pesach). The most important Jewish feast. It commemorates the events recorded in the Old Testament (Exod. 12) when Jehovah killed the Egyptian first-born while sparing the Israelites. This was the last of the _Ten Plagues_ and the one that forced Pharaoh to release the Jews from their bondage.

On the first evening of the Passover the family celebration of Seder takes place; symbolic foods are served, and the story of the Exodus is read by the head of the household.

_Pasternak, Boris_ [Leonidovich] (1890–1960). Russian lyric poet and novelist. Pasternak, the son of a well-known portrait painter, was educated at the universities of Moscow and Marburg, majoring in philosophy. He published his first poetry in 1912. Two collections of his lyrics in 1922 and 1923, _My Sister Life_ (Seistra moyya zhizn’) and _Themes and Variations_ (Temy i variyazii) brought him recognition as one of the most important young poets of the early Soviet period. He was connected for a while with the literary group of futurists led by Vladimir Mayakovski, but soon went his own way. For Pasternak, this involved writing a difficult, personal poetry that displeased the Soviet censors, who were gaining more and more control of literature during the 1930’s. After publishing two long poems, _1905_ (1926) and _Lt. Schmidt_ (Leitenant Shmidt; 1927), Pasternak turned to translations for almost a decade, rendering some excellent Russian versions of Shakespeare’s tragedies, as well as works from the German, French, and Georgian. During these years Pasternak was also at work on a novel. The work was rejected for publication in Russia, but appeared in 1937 in an Italian translation and in English in 1958. This novel, _Doctor Zhivago_ created a sensation in the West, principally because of its obvious rejection of Marxism and its general disaffection from the Russian revolutionary experiment. In 1958, Pasternak was awarded the Nobel Prize for literature, but the furor stirred up in the Soviet Union forced him to reject the award. After living for years in peaceful and productive obscurity, he became the object of everyone’s attention, wounded by newsmen from the West in search of sensational copy and by literary watchdogs in his own country who demanded his exile from Russia. His example of courage and fortitude in the face of both onslaughts and the deep humanism so forcefully expressed in his work made him the idol of the younger generation of Russian poets and writers. He died after a brief illness in 1960, and his funeral assumed the character of a protest demonstration against the regime that had sought to silence him.

Besides his novel, Pasternak’s prose work includes an autobiographical sketch, _Safe Conduct_ (Okrhanunya gramota; 1931), and several short stories, including the memorable _Aerial Ways_ (Vozdushnye pushi; 1933).

_Pasteur, Louis_ (1822–1895). French chemist. Famous for his discoveries in applied bacteriology, Pasteur’s most sensational work concerned the development of a curative treatment for hydrophobia. Popularly, his name is associated with the process called _pasteurization_, which he developed, that causes the destruction of pathogenic organisms in milk and other liquids.

_Pastime of Pleasure, The._ See Stephen Hawes.

_Paston Letters_ (1422–1509). A series of letters and legal documents written by and to three generations of the Paston family in Norfolk, England. They are a valuable source of information about English history, as well as the business and social customs of the upper middle classes of the time.

_Pastor, Antonio._ Known as Tony Pastor (1837–1908). American theater manager. From 1881 to 1908 he managed the Fourteenth Street Theatre, a variety house, also known as Tony Pastor’s. He was a pioneer in the development of vaudeville. Among the performers who played in his theaters were Weber and Fields, Nat Goodwin, and Lillian Russell.

pastoral. A term now applied to almost any kind of work depicting a more or less idealized rural life. In a stricter sense, it is a kind of poetry dealing with shepherds and country folk, first written by the Greek poet Theocritus. As part of the general revival of classical literature, Italian poets of the Renaissance period cultivated the ancient pastoral types and stirred a renewed interest and activity in them throughout Europe. Latin eclogues were written by Dante, Petrarch, and Boccaccio, mostly in imitation of Vergil; Pontano, Spagnoli, and other humanists later continued to write in Latin, but the Italian eclogues of Rota, Boiardo, and Caviglione paved the way for a vernacular treatment of the form. The pastoral romance, pioneered by Boc-caccio's Ameto, was later revived with great influence by Sannazzaro in his Arcadia. There was no classical precedent except the primarily mythological satyr play for a pastoral drama. But the interest in pastoral generally, and in the drama, led to the advent of the pastoral play. Poliziano's Orfeo of 1480 had pastoral elements, but the first wholly pastoral play was Beccari's Sacrificio (1554). Tasso's AMINTA (1573) and Guarini's IL PASTOR FIDO (1590) were the climax of the trend.

Of less importance but equally in the tradition were the many pastoral lyrics (short poems, especially sonnets, with pastoral settings, characters, or brief incidents) written by such poets as Bernardo Tasso, Tansillo, and Marino. The so-called pastoral idyll, a short narrative poem dealing with an erotic episode from mythology, always included pastoral elements (as in Lorenzo de' Medici's poem Corinso); but these are more correctly called mythological poems or Ovidian narratives, as in Boccaccio's Ninfale Ficorlano and Marino's Sapolmgna.

Although pastoral poetry, almost by definition, always represents country life in a good light, it may be fairly true to the facts of rural existence. However, according to the conventions of the genre, which were largely established by sophisticated urban poets, the country is the abode of innocence and health, eloquent and musical shepherds, proud and beautiful maidens. Such a vision has provided a convenient setting for motifs of romantic love, either because the innocence of the shepherd's world lent itself to a special kind of erotic titillation—as in Longus' Daphnis and Chloe where the lovers, after embracing, are too naïve to know what to do next—or because Arcadia could be so much kinder to ideals of romantic love than the real world—as in most pastoral poetry of the Elizabethan and Spenserian schools where the lady is perfectly beautiful, the lover infinitely devoted, the world always at Spring.

Another use to which the pastoral has been put stemmed from the early identification of the piping shepherd with the poet. A pastoral poem, such as October from Spenser's The Shepherd's Calendar (1579), could serve as a vehicle for discussion of the poet's craft and in place in society. This identification also gave rise to the pastoral elegy, in which the poet, in the role of a shepherd, mourns the death of a gifted colleague. Milton's Lycidas (1637), Shelley's Adonais (1821), and Matthew Arnold's Thyrsis (1861) are notable examples of this form, reserved exclusively for dead poets.

A final, major function of pastoral has been the implicit or explicit criticism of the corruption, sterility, and falseness of life in city or court. This aspect is significant in the work of many classical authors, including Vergil in his Bucolics and Georgics, and is recurrent throughout English literature, gaining a new emphasis with the Romantic movement.

The pastoral was long ago adapted to prose in romances like Sidney's Arcadia (1590) and Milde de Scudery's Cyrus (1650), and its conventions have been burlesqued and disguised in all sorts of ways without changing their essential significance. For example, one of the several poems by William Carlos Williams called Pastoral is set on a city street, the only "sheep" are a flock of city sparrows, the only "shepherd" an old man gathering dog-lime in a gutter, and his tread is more majestic than that of the Episcopal minister approaching the pulpit of a Sunday.

In other words, the humble, simple man (the shepherd) still puts the proud, complicated man to shame.

Pastoral Symphony, The (La Symphonie Pastorale, 1919). A tale by André Gide: A Swiss pastor adopts and educates the blind orphan Gertrude, but tries to keep her from falling in love with his son Jacques, ostensibly from Christian scruples. On the eve of an operation which may restore the girl's sight, frightened that she may love him less than Jacques when she can see, the pastor yields to the desire which has suppressed under self-deceptive hypocrisy and seduces the girl. Her sight restored, Gertrude understands for the first time the truth about the people around her and the suffering which she has indirectly caused the pastor's wife and children. She commits suicide. Written in the form of the pastor's diary, the tale is remarkable for its restrained and oblique irony and for the sharpness of the author's observations on the hypocrisy which masquerades as Christian pity and duty.

Pastor Fido, II (The Faithful Shepherd). A Renaissance pastoral play by Giambattista Guarini, begun in 1590 and finally published in 1590. Its author called it a tragi-comedy, a new genre that combined a tragic plot with a happy ending, thus precipitating a major literary debate at the time. The plot stems from the lingering anger of Diana with the people of Arcadia because of a past incident involving the infidelity to Aminta of the nymph Lucina. To placate the goddess, the oracle says, two people of divine descent must wed and a faithful shepherd must be found whose pitiy will atone for the past cruelty of Lucina. The two Arcadians of divine descent are Silvio and Amarihill, but the former prefers hunting to women, and the latter is loved by and loves the shepherd Mirtillo. Amarihill's rival, Corisca, arranges to have her condemned for breaking her vows to Silvio, in hopes of winning her himself. Finally, the revelation of Mirtillo's divine descent enables him to marry Amarihill; and his willingness to die for her, also, satisfies the goddess' other demand. At the same time, Silvio consents to marry Dolinda, who has made him fall in love at last, and Corisca is pardoned.

Patchen, Kenneth (1911- ). American poet and novelist. He is noted for often surrealistic poems, which combine humor and fantasy; sometimes sentimental, they are always distinguished by striking imagery. Often concerned with the injustices and tragedies of 20th-century American life, Patchen has frequently illustrated his poems with his own abstract paintings. His books of poetry include Before the Brave (1936), Dark Kingdom (1942), Panels for the Walls of Heaven (1947), Selected Poems (1947), Red Wine and Yellow Hair (1949), and Because It Is (1960). A leader in the 19th-century revival of interest in Renaissance art and humanism, he was a formulator of the doctrine that art and aesthetics are in themselves one of the ends of life. His works, noted for their stylistic purity and precision, include Studies in the History of the Renaissance (1873); the philosophic novel Marcus theEpicius (1877); and the paraly autobiographical The Child in the House (1894); Greek Studies (1895); and the five posthumously published chapters of Gaston de Latour (1896), a novel left unfinished at his death. See ART FOR ART’S SAKE.

pater-noster (Lat., “Our Father”). The Lord’s Prayer; from the first two words in the Latin version. Every tenth bead of a rosary is so called, because at that bead the Lord’s Prayer is repeated; the name is also given to a certain kind of fishing tackle, in which hooks and weights to sink them are fixed alternately on the line, somewhat in rosary fashion.

Paterson (Books I-V; 1946, 1948, 1950, 1951, 1958). A long poem by William Carlos Williams. Set in Paterson, N.J., the poem is a statement on contemporary civilization. Williams uses one dominant metaphor throughout: the city is the human mind beside the river of time; the language of contemporary events (the waterfall) gives the only kind of meaning possible in the flux of time. The poem is composed of lyrics, narrative episodes, prose interludes, bits of letters, etc., to comprise an ecstatic statement on human life.

Pathelin, La Farce de maistre Pierre (c. 1470). An anonymous medieval French farce famous for the artfully cheating lawyer Pathelin (or Patelin). Having himself cheated the woolen-draper Jocasume, he comes to court to defend the shepherd Aignelet, charged with stealing Jocasume’s sheep. Jocasume gets so confused in making his complaints that the judge keeps demanding, “revenons à ces moutons” (let us come back to these sheep), a line later quoted by Rabelais and since become a proverbial plea to get back to the subject. The play was adapted as L’Avocat Pathelin (1706) by Jean Palaprat (1650–1721) and L’Abbé David Augustin de Bruyes (1640–1723).

pathetic fallacy. A phrase invented by John Ruskin to designate the illusion that external objects seem actuated by human feelings, particularly when one is under great emotional strain. Thus when a poet is tormented by grief, he is apt to ascribe to inanimate nature either sympathy or heartless cruelty. Tennyson’s In Memoriam, Shelley’s Adonais, and other elegies are especially noteworthy for eloquent effects gained by the use of the pathetic fallacy.

The best episode in the book involves Dew-of-June, Cooper’s most successful Indian heroine, and the siege of the blockhouse.

Patrick, St. (c. 373–464). The apostle and patron saint of Ireland. He was born at what is now Dumbarton; his father was Calpurnius, a deacon and Roman official. As a boy he was captured in a Pictish raid and sold as a slave in Ireland. He escaped to Gaul about 393, where he studied under St. Martin at Tours before returning to Britain. There he had a supernatural call to preach to the heathen of Ireland, so he was consecrated and in 432 landed at Wicklow. He at first met with strong opposition, but, going north, he converted first the chiefs and people of Ulster, and later those of the rest of Ireland. He founded many churches, including the cathedral and monastery of Armagh, where he held two synods. He is said to have died at Armagh and to have been buried either at Down or Saul. One tradition gives Patrick, John

Glastonbury as the place of his death and burial; Downpatrick Cathedral claims his grave.

St. Patrick left his name to numerous places in Great Britain and Ireland, and many legends exist of his miraculous powers: healing the blind, raising the dead. Perhaps the best known tradition is that he cleared Ireland of its vermin. In commemoration of this, St. Patrick is usually represented banishing the serpents. He is shown with a shamrock leaf in allusion to the tradition that when explaining the Trinity to the heathen priests on the hill of Tara he used this as a symbol.

Patrick, John (1905— ). American playwright. He won a Pulitzer Prize for his adaptation of Vera Schneider's novel, The Teahouse of the August Moon (1953). Patrick has written several other plays, including The Hasty Heart (1945), the story of a convalescent soldier based on the author's experiences as an ambulance driver in World War II. He has also written scenarios for many films.

Patrick's Purgatory, St. A cave in a small island in Lough Derg (a lake near Pettigo in Donegal). In the middle Ages it was a favorite resort of pilgrims who believed that it was the entrance to an earthly Purgatory. The legend is that Christ Himself revealed it to St. Patrick and told him that whoever would spend a day and a night therein would witness the torments of Hell and the joys of Heaven. Henry of Saltry tells how Sir Owain visited it, and Fortunatus, of the old legend, was also supposed to be one of the adventurers. It was blocked up by order of the Pope on St. Patrick's Day, 1497, but the interest in it long remained, and the Spanish dramatist Calderón wrote a play on the subject, El Purgatorio de San Patricio. See Marie de France.

Patroclus (Patroklos). In Homer's Iliad, a loyal friend of Achilles. Achilles, angry at Agamemnon, refused to fight with the Greeks, but, seeing them hard pressed, Patroclus begged to be allowed to join them, and Achilles finally gave him his own armor. Leading the Myrmidons into the battle, Patroclus was slain by Hector. Grief and fury over Patroclus' death caused Achilles to re-enter the fighting.

Patroons. The name given to a class of large landholders in New Netherland, those who within a four-year period had established a settlement of fifty persons. The patroons held their feudal privileges until the Anti-Rent War of the 1840's.

Paul, St. The great apostle and missionary of Christianity, author of the principal Epistles of the New Testament. As Saul of Tarsus, he was originally one of the most bitter persecutors of the early Christians, but he was converted by a vision on the road to Damascus. His missionary travels, described in the Acts of the Apostles, took him "in journeys often, in peril of rivers, in peril of robbers ... in perils in the sea, in perils among false brethren." He was finally beheaded at Rome. He is patron saint of preachers and tentmakers (see Acts 18:3). Originally called Saul, his name, according to tradition, was changed in honor of Sergius Paulus, whom he converted (Acts 13:6-12).

His symbols are a sword and open book, the former the instrument of his martyrdom, and the latter indicative of the new law propagated by him as the apostle of the Gentiles. He is represented of short stature, with bald head and gray, bushy beard; legend relates that when he was beheaded at Rome (A.D. 66), after having converted one of Nero's favorite concubines, milk instead of blood flowed from his veins. He is commemorated on June 30.

Paul, Elliot [Harold] (1891-1958). American writer and journalist. For a number of years an expatriate in France and Spain, he was one of the founders and editors of the avant-garde periodical Transition. His early novels, Indelible (1922), Impromptu (1923), and Imperterrible (1924), were hailed by a small circle of admirers. Perhaps his best book, The Life and Death of a Spanish Town (1937), is based on personal observation and tells the story of a Spanish town destroyed by Franco during the civil war. The nostalgic The Last Time I Saw Paris was his most popular work. In 1939, Paul published a burlesque detective novel, The Mysterious Mickey Finn, and its success seems to have led him to concentrate for a time on detective fiction. Among his crime novels were Hugger-Mugger in the Louvre (1940) and Mayhem in B-Flat (1940).

Paulding, James Kirke (1778-1850). American novelist, dramatist, and historian. Early in his life, Paulding became friendly with Washington Irving and his brother William; they formed the nucleus of a literary group whose most important production was Salmagundi; or The Whim-Whams and Opinions of Launcelot Langstaff, Esq., and Others. Paulding's early writings were satirical and violently anti-British. They include a second series of Salmagundi Papers (1819-1820), The Diverting History of John Bull and Brother Jonathan, and a sequel, The History of Uncle Sam and His Boys (1835). He also wrote a number of long poems and serious histories. Among his novels are Königsmarke, The Long Finne, and The Dutchman's Fireside.

Paul et Virginie (1787). An idyllic, highly successful romance by Bernardin de Saint-Pierre. Paul and Virginia, two fatherless children, are brought up on the Isle of France (now Mauritius) by their mothers in virtuous poverty and ignorance, far from corrupt civilization. They fall in love during their adolescence. When a long-forgotten aunt summons Virginia by letter to Paris, she is loath to leave Paul. She does go, however, remaining away from the island two years. Unable to adjust either to her aunt or to civilization, Virginia returns, but a storm sinks her ship, and she dies within sight of Paul, who himself dies of grief later. The nostalgic evocation of a lost paradise and the sumptuous descriptions of nature and landscapes have assured this work enduring success.

Paustovski, Konstantin Georgievich (1892- ). Russian short story writer and journalist. After his war service, Paustovski worked in Odessa, where he became a friend of Isaak Babel. Paustovski was encouraged in his literary career by Maksim Gorki, for whom he worked on a journal from 1929 to 1937. He is the author of many nature stories, tales for children, and a three-volume autobiography. He has been consistently outspoken in his defense of liberalism in Soviet literary policy, and was one of the chief defenders in 1956 of Vladimir Dudintsev, who was under attack for his novel, Not by Bread Alone.

pauvre Jacques (Fr., “poor Jacques”). The absent sweetheart of a lovelorn maiden. Marie Antoinette sent to Switzerland for a lass to attend the dairy of her “Swiss village” in miniature, which she arranged in the Little Trianon (Paris). Pavia. A city in northwestern Italy. It was the site of a famous battle (1525) between the French under Francis I and an imperial army composed of Spanish, German, and Italian troops. Member of an impoverished family, he was sent to college on funds raised by his father's friends; in less than a year, Payne returned to the New York theater. He created a sensation in his acting roles, and traveled to England, where he wrote and acted in plays. On the verge of bankruptcy, he wrote Brutus, or, The Fall of Tarquin (1818); later, in debtors' prison, he wrote Therese, Orphan of Geneva (1821), making enough money to gain his freedom. Payne's greatest triumph was his Clari, The Maid of Milan (1823). This play included the song Home, Sweet Home, with music by Sir Henry Bishop. It became highly popular, but Payne, having sold the play outright, was not able to collect royalties. He continued to write, but could never avoid poverty. In England, he courted Mary Shelley, widow of the poet, but his suit was unsuccessful. In America, theatrical benefit performances raised almost $10,000 for him. Daniel Webster and other friends obtained the post of consul in Tunis for Payne; he held this job off and on until his death. A member of the Knickerbocker School, Payne collaborated with his friend, Washington Irving, on a comedy called Charles II (pub. 1917).

The play ends with a great feast, demonstrating the joys of peace. It was written when Athens and Sparta had been long at war.

Satirical and critical in subject and often extravagant in style, his novels include Headlong Hall, Melmount (1817), Nightmare Abbey, Crotchety Castle, and Gavill Grange. Peacock caricatured contemporary figures by the device of bringing a group of thinly disguised eccentrics together and letting their conversation, often ridiculous, fill the book.

Peacock Throne. A throne built (1628 to 1635) at Delhi, India, for the Indian ruler, Shah Jehan. He also built the Taj Mahal. Each of its twelve pillars was decorated with two peacocks glittering with gems. A century later (1739), Nadir Shah took it to Persia.

Pearl. The illegitimate child of Arthur Dimmesdale and Hester Prynne in Hawthorne’s The Scarlet Letter.

Pearl, The (late 14th century). A poem by the so-called Pearl Poet. It combines the alliterative technique of Old English poetry with a complex metrical structure. There are 101 stanzas of 12 octosyllabic lines, arranged in groups of five stanzas with interlocking rhymes and refrains. The poet loses a beautiful white pearl, probably a symbol both of his two-year-old daughter and of theological purity or grace. Falling asleep at the scene of his loss, he dreams he has entered a shining world where he recognizes his loved one in the matured and pearl-decked maiden who speaks to him from across a river. She assuages his grief, describing her joyful state as one of the mystical brides of Christ. Finally the poet is permitted a glimpse of her abode, the New Jerusalem, and describes it in a vivid adaptation of the Scriptural Apocalypse. He tries to cross the river, but instead awakens to find himself filled with a new spiritual strength.

Pearl Poet, The (late 14th century). Supposed author of a manuscript containing four alliterative poems in a West Midland dialect of Middle English: The Pearl, Purity (or Cleanness), Patience, and Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, although it is not certain that Sir Gawain was actually composed by the same author as the first three. Purity and Patience are didactic poems drawing heavily on Biblical stories; there are indications that the Pearl Poet was also familiar with the French and Italian literature of the time.

The claim of Dr. Frederick Cook that he had reached the Pole on April 21, 1908, was later discredited, though the controversy has never been entirely stilled. Peary’s wife, Josephine Diebich Peary, who accompanied him on earlier expeditions, wrote The Snow Baby (1901), an account of her daughter, who was born farther north than any other white child.

Peasants (Muzhiki; 1897). A long story by Anton Chekhov. Its somber picture of peasant life in Russia stirred up a heated debate, generally divided according to political convictions, about the accuracy of Chekhov’s portrayal.

Each year the fishermen who live on the coast of Brittany make a voyage to the waters off the shores of Iceland for the long fishing season. Lotti describes the loneliness of this existence and the bitter struggle between the men and the sea from which they draw their livelihood. The element of romantic adventure which characterizes Lotti’s popular, earlier work is not absent, however, for the hero becomes involved in the war between France and China, and dies in Singapore before reaching home.

Peck, George Wilbur (1840–1916). American newspaperman and humorist. and justice despite his extensive powers. He brought the country peace and stability, though the early part of his reign was marked by civil war and difficulties with foreign nations. A man of considerable intellectual attainments, Pedro encouraged education and scholarship in Brazil. In his travels to Europe and the U.S., he avoided official circles and sought out writers and scientists such as Pasteur, Victor Hugo, Longfellow, and Whitier. Gradually, however, the monarchy lost the support of its principal allies; the army and the clergy were dissatisfied, and the abolition of slavery in 1888 alienated the powerful landowning class. In 1889, Pedro was forced to abdicate and was exiled to France, where he died.

He is the novel's single representative of a robust and active, rather than lax and decadent, life of the senses. He has a huge appetite and speaks in broken, incoherent sentences, which suggest that his basic energy defends all discipline. Under his influence, Hans Castorp begins to think of leaving the sanatorium and leading a normal life. But Peepkerkorn does not last long; deeply aware that he is past his physical prime, he soon commits suicide by poison.

Peeping Tom of Coventry. See Godiva, Lady.

Peer Gynt (1867). A verse-drama by Henrik Ibsen. A satiric fantasy, the play takes as its hero the legendary Peer Gynt of Norwegian folklore. The boastful, capricious, irresponsible Peer goes through life thinking quite well of himself, though there is no more reality to his personality than there is to an onion when one has peeled all the layers away. Peer has many amazing adventures in many lands, alternately ships missionaries and idols to China, makes and loses money, saves his own life in a shipwreck by letting another drown, and finally comes up before the Button Molder, who tries to melt him in his ladle. Peer is horrified at the idea of losing his precious identity, though he has no true self. However, he is saved by Solveig, who has always loved him, and in whose mind he has existed as a real personality.

Pegasus (Pegasos). In classic myth, the winged horse of the Muses. He was born of the sea foam and the blood of the slaughtered Medusa. He was caught by Bellerophon, who mounted him and destroyed the Chimaera. But when Bellerophon attempted to ascend to heaven, he was thrown from the horse, and Pegasus mounted alone to the skies to become the constellation of the same name. According to a highly embroidered version by Ovid, when the Muses contended with the daughters of Piers, Mount Heli- con rose heavenward with delight; but Pegasus gave it a kick, stopped its ascent, and brought out of the mountain the soul-inspiring waters of the fountain Hippocrene.

Péguy, Charles [Pierre] (1873-1914). French poet, essayist. Of peasant stock, he became an ardent polemicist for the causes of Catholicism, nationalism, and socialism. In Marcel (1898) he projected the idea of the perfect socialist state based on the harmonious union of Christianity and France. He founded the bimonthly review Cahiers de la quinzaine (1900-1914), which introduced a number of important new authors in addition to publishing Péguy's polemics on contemporary affairs, such as his defense of Dreyfus. He absorbed in his native Orleans the story of Joan of Arc, who became for him the symbol of the unity of the two mystiques, Catholicism and France, which he exalted in his poems Jeanne d'Arc (1897) and Le Mystère de la charité de Jeanne d'Arc (1909). Other poems include Le Porche du mystère de la deuxième vertu (1911), The Mystery of the Holy Innocents (1912), and Eve (1912). English collections of his work are Basic Verités: Prose and Poetry (1943), Men and Saints (1944), and God Speaks: Religious Poetry (1945).

Peg Woffington (1853). A novel by Charles Reade, first brought out as a drama entitled Marks and Faces (1852). Its heroine is the famous Irish actress Margaret Woffington (1714?-1760). In both play and novel, proof of her art is given in two extraordinary impersonations: she first imitates a famous tragic actress of the day so skillfully that she deceives an entire dramatic company, and she later substitutes her own face for the face of her portrait, which has been painted by James Triplet and is being inspected by a group of critics. The plot centers on the relations of Peg and Ernest Vane, a married man who falls in love with her during a sojourn in town. When she learns that he is already married and has no serious intentions, she determines on revenge but, won over by the naiveté and charm of Mrs. Vane, renounces her purpose.

Peirce, Charles Sanders (1839–1914). American logician, scientist, and philosopher. His early work in astronomy, gravity, and geodesics was original and competent, but did not attract much notice. Peirce studied under Louis Agassiz, lectured on the philosophy of science at Harvard, and published a number of papers on logic. In an article written for Popular Science Monthly, and called How to Make Our Ideas Clear (1878), he published the first full statement of pragmatism. William James, to whom pragmatism owes its fame as a movement, first used the term in 1898, crediting Peirce as the originator. Peirce's pragmatism, however, differs from James's; it is more like the idealism of Josiah Royce, and includes a belief in universals and an Absolute, which James and his followers rejected. The majority of Peirce's papers on logic, metaphysics, mathematics, religion, psychology, and many other subjects, were published posthumously. Charles Hartshorne and Paul Weiss edited the Collected Papers of Charles Sanders Peirce (6 v., 1931–1955). Never given much recognition, outside of a small professional group, during his lifetime, Peirce has since come to be regarded as one of the most brilliant men of his time, and an outstanding American philosopher.

Pelus. In Greek mythology, a son of Aeusus, king of Aegina. With his brother Telamon, he killed their half-brother Phocus to prevent his inheriting the kingdom. Banished, he became ruler of a part of Phthia, but accidentally killed his co-ruler Eurytion as they hunted the CALYDONIAN Boar. Fleeing to Iolcus, he rejected the advances of Acastus' wife Cretheis and she accused him of trying to violate her, but Chiron helped him escape Acastus' treacherous revenge. Hera arranged for him to marry Thetis and she bore him Achilles. As she was placing the child in the fire to immortalize him, Pelus fell out in horror and she deserted both in anger. Later Pelus sailed with the ARGONAUTS. He outlived his son and his grandson Neoptolemus. As an old man he appears in Euripides' tragedy ANDROMACHE, defending the heroine from persecution.

Pelias. In Greek mythology, a son of Poseidon. He seized the throne of Iolcus from his half-brother Aeson. When Aeson's son Jason claimed the throne, Pelias sent him with the ARGONAUTS to recover the GOLDEN FLEECE. Jason returned with Medea, who tricked Pelias' daughters into killing Pelias.

pelican. In Christian art, a symbol of charity. It is also an emblem of Jesus Christ, by "whose blood we are healed." St. Jerome gives the story of the pelican restoring its young ones destroyed by serpents, and his salvation by the blood of Christ. The old popular fallacy that pelicans fed their young with their blood arose from the fact that when the parent bird is about to feed its brood, it macerates small fish in the large bag against its breast, transfers the macerated food to the mouths of the young.

The medieval Bestiary explains that the pelican is very fond of its brood, but when the young ones begin to grow they rebel against the male bird and provoke his anger, so that he kills them; the mother returns to the nest in three days, sits on the dead birds, pours her blood over them and revives them, and they feed upon the blood.

The Pelican State. Louisiana, which has a pelican in its device.

Pelion and Ossa. Mountains in Thessaly. In Greek mythology, the giant sons of Alcous or Poseidon, Outus and Ephialtes, planned to pile Ossa on Mount Olympus, and Pelion on Ossa in order to carry on their somewhat obscure quarrel with the gods. Zeus, however, struck them down while they were still in their downy-cheeked youth. This story is told by Homer; later writers often confused them with the GIANTS and the TITANS, who also warned on heaven. "Heaping Pelion upon Ossa" has come to mean adding difficulty to difficulty.

Pelléas et Mélisande (1892). A drama by Maurice Maeterlinck. Mélisande is found wandering wretchedly about in the forest by Golaud, a grandson of King Arkel, who marries her and takes her to court, although she will disclose nothing about herself. Her sadness and charm win her first the sympathy and then the love of Pelléas, Golaud's brother. While talking with Pelléas she loses her wedding ring, and at that same moment Golaud meets with an accident, but she nurses him back to health. Golaud's little son Yniold, the child of a former marriage, unwittingly confirms his father's growing suspicions. Finally Pelléas and Mélisande decide to part and meet for a last interview, but the jealous Golaud kills Pelléas, and after the birth of her child, Mélisande dies. Claude Debussy made this play into a fine opera in 1902.

Pelles, King. In Malory's Morte d'Arthur (c. 1469), the father of Elaine, grandfather of Sir Galahad and related to Joseph of Arimathe.

Pellico, Silvio (1789–1854). Italian writer and patriot. The editor of IL CONCILIATORE, he was arrested as a suspected member of the CARBONARI in 1820, and was shuttled between prisons in Milan and Venice and the notorious Spielberg dungeon (Moravia) until his release in 1830. He narrated his prison experiences in Le Mie Prigioni (1832) wherein he tells how adversity confirmed his previously wavering Christian faith. A spirit of Christian forgiveness pervades the book so that Cesare Balbo observed that it was more damaging to Austria than the loss of a battle. He also wrote poetry, several verse tragedies, and made a translation of Byron's Manfred.

Pellinore, King. In Malory's Morte d'Arthur (c. 1469), the hunter of the Questing Beast. He is the father of Lamerok, Percival, Aggolve, Dornar, and Torre, all knights of the Round Table. Sir Gawain kills him in revenge for the death of his own father, King Lot.

fought in the war, considered the cause to be Athens' rise to greatness; later historians have thought that the conflict arose out of commercial rivalries involving Corinth. The Spartans won an important victory at the battle of Mantinea (418 B.C.). The defection of Alcibiades during the ill-advised expedition to Sicily (415 B.C.) gave Sparta increased strength. When the Athenian fleet was destroyed at Aegospotami (405 B.C.), Sparta succeeded in reducing Athens to its second-rate power. Most of our information about the war comes from Thucydides' history; the later years are related in Xenophon's Hellenica. Aristophanes lampooned warmongers and demagogues repeatedly in his comedies. Euripides' The Trojan Women was in part a protest against atrocities committed in the war.

Pelops. In Greek mythology, a son of Tantalus. The Peloponnesian was named after him. As an infant he was served at a banquet given by his father for the gods. Failing to notice, Demeter ate a part of his shoulder, but the other gods were horrified. They condemned Tantalus to torture in Hades, and revived Pelops by boiling him; Demeter gave him a new shoulder of ivory. Making the beautiful child his favorite, Poseidon took him to Olympus.

As a young man, Pelops sued for the hand of Hip- podamia, the daughter of Oenomaus, king of Pisa. Her suitors were required to flee with her in their chariots while Oenomaus pursued them, armed. Many had been killed thus, but Pelops persuaded Oenomaus' charioteer Myrtilus to place lincpins of wax in the chariot. Oenomaus was killed, but, when Myrtilus demanded the payment agreed on, a night with Hippodamia, Pelops killed him also, and was cursed by him.

Pelops subjugated much of the northern Pelopon- nese. Unable to subdue Styphalus, king of Arcadia, he invited him to a banquet, where he treacherously killed him. The crime caused a famine throughout Greece, which was ended only by the prayers of Aeacus. Hippodamia bore many children to Pelops, including Atreus and Thyestes (see the House of Atreus) and Pittheus. Through jealousy she caused the death of his son by the nymph Astyoche, Chry- sippus, whom Laius carried off to Thebes. The san- cuary of Pelops at Olympia was one of its most sacred spots.

Pémin, José María (1898— ). Spanish poet and dramatist. His verse, strongly Roman Catholic in its orientation, appears in the collections El barrio de Santa Cruz (1931) and Elegia a la tradición espa- ñola (1931). His dramas have been more successful, particularly El divino impaciente (A Saint in a Hurry, 1935), La Santa Virreina (1939), and Edipo (1954), considered his finest work.

penates. In ancient Rome, guardian deities of the household and of the state, usually referred to in the plural. They were like personifications of the natural powers, and whereas the Lares protected and warded off danger, it was the duty of the penates to bring wealth and plenty.

Penelope. The History of (1848-1850). A novel by William Makepeace Thackeray. The hero, Arthur Pendennis, known as Pen for short, is spoiled by his mother and by Laura Bell, a distant relative of his own age with whom he grows up. He goes through the university, enters London society, writes a successful novel, becomes editor of the Pall Mall Gazette, and is involved in love affairs of varying character with the actress Miss Fotheringay (stage name of Emily Costigan), with Fanny Bolten, a Lon- don porter's daughter, and with Blanche Amory, daughter of Lady Clavering. He finally marries Laura, who has always loved him, and whom he has grown to love. Pen's uncle, Major Arthur Pendennis, and his friend George Warrington play prominent roles.

Pendragon. An ancient British title, denoting chief leader or king. It was conferred on a chief when he was invested with the supreme power in times of danger, and is particularly identified with Uther Pendragon, father of King Arthur. The word is derived from the Welsh pen, "head" and dragon (the reference being to the war chief's dragon standard). It corresponds to the Roman dius bellum

Geoffrey of Monmouth recorded a legend describing the origin of the title. Aurelius, the British king, was poisoned by Ambron during the invasion of Pas- centius. As a consequence, "there appeared a star at Winchester of wonderful magnitude and brightness, darting forth a ray, at the end of which was a globe of fire in form of a dragon, out of whose mouth issued forth two rays, one of which extended to Gaul and the other to Ireland." Uther ordered two golden dragons to be made, one of which he presented to Winchester, and the other he carried with him as his royal standard, whence he received the title Pendragon.

Penelope. The wife of Odysseus and mother of Telemachus in the Odyssey. While Odysseus was away from Ithaca during the Trojan War and on his subsequent wanderings, Penelope was besieged by suitors. They put them off by various devices, the cleverest being to say that she would decide on which she would marry when she had finished weaving a shroud for her father-in-law. At night she revealed the work she had woven by day. The suitors eventu- ally discovered the ruse, but Odysseus fortunately returned to slay them all and rescue Penelope from her dilemma.

Peneus. A river in Thessaly. Also the name of the god of the river who was the father of Daphne.

Penguin Island (L'Ile des pingouins; 1908). A novel by Anatole France. It deals with French history in a satiric manner. The old Breton monk Saint Mael lands on an island and in his semiblindness fails to perceive that the inhabitants whom he baptizes are penguins and not men. They are, however, changed to men by God, and the island is carefully towed back to shore by the monk. A highly ironic and imaginative account of the development of civ- ilization comprises the remainder of the novel.

Penitentes. A religious order in New Mexico. It puts on an annual Passion Play in the course of which the practice of self-flagellation is indulged in. The Penitentes are Roman Catholics, though the practice is condemned by the Church. See Flagellants.

Penitential Psalms. Seven psalms expressive of con- tinuous. In the Christian tradition they have been recited together as a devotion. They are Psalms 7, 32, 38, 51, 102, 130, and 143. All except the first are one number lower in the Latin numbering.

Penn, William (1644-1718). English Quaker, founder of Pennsylvania. In 1681, Penn obtained a grant of land from James II where Quakers might live without fear of religious persecution. In the new colony, which was named Pennsylvania in honor of Penn's father, he established a liberal government, permitted religious freedom, and maintained friendly relations with the Indians. A prolific writer, Penn is best known for Some Fruits of Solitude (1693), a collection of religious and moral maxims.

Pennant, Thomas (1726-1798), English antiquary, traveler, and noted naturalist. He is the author of British Zoology (1766) and the History of Quadrupeds (1781). He appears as a correspondent of the author in Gilbert White's Natural History of Selborne (1789).

Penrod (1914). A novel by Booth Tarkington. This account of the humorous adventures and escapades of Penrod Schofield, a typical 12-year-old boy in a Midwestern community, has been widely read and highly popular; it was followed by Penrod and Sam (1916) and Penrod and Jasper (1931). All three were collected in the omnibus volume Penrod: His Complete Story (1931).

Pensées (Thoughts, 1844). A collection of reflections on religion by Blaise Pascal, found in fragmentary form after his death. The first edition (1670) abridged the Pensées in order to soften their strongly Jansenist tone, but the edition of 1844 is faithful to the original manuscript. It is Pascal's view that man—less than God yet more than the animals—is a helpless creature suspended between the great unknowns of past and future, birth and death. A frail reed in a vast universe, he is yet a thinking reed: "L'homme n'est qu'un roseau, le plus faible de la nature, mais c'est un roseau pensant." The Christian telling of man's fall from grace and the possibility of redemption must be true, because only thus can the contradictions in man's nature be explained. Faith cannot be gained by reason alone, for logic must be aided by God's grace, which speaks to the heart: "Le cœur a ses raisons que la raison ne connaît pas." (The heart has its reasons, which reason does not know.) A testament of religious faith, the fragmentary Pensées offer perceptive insights into the human condition, revealing Pascal's power of lucid reasoning and the depth of his Christian belief.

Penseroso, II (1632). A poem by John Milton. It celebrates the "pleasures" of melancholy, contemplation, solitude, and study. The thematic opposite of its companion piece L'Allegro, it shares the latter's qualities of style: rich verbal music and an extraordinary range and opulence of fancy.

pentameter. In prosody, a line of verse containing five metrical feet in any meter, usually identified together with the name of the meter, such as iambic pentameter, trochaic pentameter, etc. The iambic pentameter is the English heroic line; it is also the standard line in English blank verse, the heroic couplet, the sonnet, and other forms.

Pentateuch (from Gr. penta, "five," and teuchos, "a tool, a book"). The first 5 books of the Old Testament, also called the Law of Moses: Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy. The Pentateuch relates the history of the Jews from the Creation to the death of Moses. See Elohistic and Jehovistic Scriptures.

the Samaritan Pentateuch. The Hebrew text as preserved by the Samaritans; it is said to date from 400 B.C.

Pentecost (Gr. pentekostos, "fiftieth"). A Jewish festival on the fiftieth day after the second day of Passover, which commemorates the giving of the Tablets of the Law to Moses. It was adopted as a Christian festival, also called Whitsunday, to commemorate the descent of the Holy Ghost on the Apostles on the day of Pentecost (Acts 2).

Pentelic. Pertaining to Mount Pentelicus near Athens, Greece. The white marble used for the Parthenon came from the quarries of Mount Pentelicus. Hence, Pentelic came to connote the whiteness of marble.

Penthesilea (Penthesileia). In classic myth, a queen of the Amazons. She was slain by Achilles when she came to the aid of the Trojans after the death of Hector. Her beauty and courage won for her a sincere lament from her slayer.

Penthesilea (pub. 1808). A tragedy by Heinrich von Kleist, in which both Penthesilea and Achilles die. It was on the basis of this play that Goethe made his notoriously unfair judgment of Kleist as a "hypochondriac northerner," by which he meant that, in his opinion, Kleist concentrated too strongly on the violently passionate, tragic potentiality of human nature and overlooked possibilities for wholesome balance.

Pentheus. A king of Thebes, and grandson of Cadmus. His tragic fate is told in Euripides' play The Bacchans.

People of Seldwyla, The. See Leute von Seldwyla, Die.

People: Yes, The (1936). A poem by Carl Sandburg. It is composed in alternating passages of prose and free verse, narrative and homily, copybook English and slang. It celebrates the vigor of the American people and expresses hope for their progress, in spite of social injustice and economic inequality.

Pepys, Samuel (1633–1703). English politician, best known for his Diary. The son of a tailor, Pepys had as a patron Sir Edward Montagu, the earl of Sandwich, and was in a position to meet the outstanding personalities of his day. He was secretary of the admiralty from 1673 to 1688 and, also, served in Parliament and as president of the Royal Society. After the accession of William III, he lost all his offices and was briefly imprisoned for his Stuart sympathies.

Written in shorthand between 1660 and 1669 and not deciphered until 1825, when it was published in part, the Diary was never intended for the public eye. It not only presents a vivid picture of an age, but is a uniquely uninhibited and spontaneous revelation of its author's life and character.

Perceforest, King. A legendary king of Britain. Perceforest is the hero of an old romance first printed in Paris in 1528. According to the narrative, he was crowned king of Britain by the shipwrecked Alexander the Great. He was called Perceforest because he dared to pierce, almost alone, an enchanted forest, where women and children were most cruelly treated.

Percival, Perceval, or Percivale. In Arthurian legend, one of the most famous knights of the Round Table, figuring especially in the quest for the Grail. His first appearance in literature is in the French poem Perceval, ou le conte du Graal, written c. 1175, by Chrétien de Troyes. Peredur, Son of Efraug, a medieval Welsh tale of Arthurian romance included in the Mabinogion, is a parallel of Chrétien's Perceval. From the time of Chrétien on, he appears in almost all the Arthurian romances; he is Sir Percival in Malory's Mort d'Arthur (c. 1469) and the Parsifal or Parsifal of the German versions.

In general, his story begins with his boyhood in the forest and his complete ignorance of the ways of knights and warriors and of courtly manners. He then goes to King Arthur's court where he commits one gaucherie after another; he is trained as a knight, however, and goes on to become one of the best knights of the Round Table. His quest for the Grail is the main incident of the story and ends with his being awarded a sight of it. Late versions of his story usually present him as a virgin knight. Malory's Mort d'Arthur was Tennyson's source for his version in Idylls of the King (1889–1885).

Percival. In Virginia Woolf's novel The Waves, a character who does not appear but who acts as a unifying force, since the six leading characters all admire him deeply. He is killed by a fall from a horse in India, and his death serves as a symbol of all death. A completely unified character, he is symbol of all that his friends aspire to be; their final meeting at Hampton Court atones for an occasion when Bernard failed to meet Percival there.

Percy, Sir Henry. Known as Hotspur (1364–1403). English soldier, eldest son of Henry Percy, 1st earl of Northumberland. He joined Owen Glendower's rebellion against Henry IV and was killed at the battle of Shrewsbury. Called Hotspur because of his fiery and uncontrollable temper, he contrasts with the cool-headed Prince Hal in Shakespeare's Henry IV: Part I.

Percy, Bishop Thomas (1729–1811). English antiquarian, scholar, and poet. He is best known for his Reliques of Ancient English Poetry, the most important work in the 18th-century ballad revival. His achievement was more that of a popularizer than an editor; a capricious selection, Reliques includes old ballads, political songs from the 17th century, and ballads by Percy's contemporaries, as well as by himself. Nevertheless, his collection awakened a taste for English balladry and influenced the poetry of the romantics.

Perdita. The virtuous and beautiful daughter of Hermione and Leontes, king of Sicilia, in Shakespeare's Winter's Tale. As an infant she is abandoned by her father's orders and is raised by a shepherd as his daughter. Despite her supposedly humble birth, the nobility of her nature is apparent, and Polixenes says of her:

This is the prettiest low-born lass that ever Ran on the green-sord: nothing she does or seems
But smacks of something greater than herself;
Too noble for this place.

Mary Robinson, who played the role of Perdita at Drury Lane in 1779 and became the mistress of the prince of Wales, later George IV, adopted the name as a pseudonym.

Perdix. See Talus (2).

Pereda, José María de (1833–1906). Spanish novelist. An outstanding realist of conservative political and social views, Pereda wrote almost exclusively about his native Santander. His best-known works are Sotileza (1885), which has been called the finest Spanish novel about the sea, and Peñas arriba (1895), dealing with peasant life in the highlands, or montaña, of Santander. He also wrote El buey suelto (1878), an attack on bachelorhood; Don Gonzalo González de la Gonzalera (1879); El sabor de la tiercuta (1882); and two collections of short stories, Esencias montañesas (1864) and its continuation, Tipos y paisajes (1871).

Peredur, Son of Efraug. See Percival.

Père Goriot, Le (Father Goriot, 1834). A novel, part of La Comédie Humaine, by Honoré de Balzac. Père Goriot's consuming passion is his devotion to his two ungrateful daughters, Mme de Nuicen and Mme de Restaud. He deprives himself of everything for them, including his self-respect. Married to wealthy men, the two sisters are ashamed of their father's bourgeois manners, but they expect him to extricate them from financial difficulties. After sacrificing his last silver plate, Goriot dies of apoplexy.

In a characteristic gesture, the daughters send empty carriages to the funeral. See Eugène de Rastignac.

Peregrine Pickle, The Adventures of (1751). A picaresque novel by Tobias Smollett. The hero, an imaginative young man with a flair for practical jokes whose rascality often shades into villainy, grows up under the tutelage of his man-hunting spinster aunt, Grizzle Pickle, and his eccentric uncle, Commodore Hawser Truninnion. After an ignoble attempt to seduce his friend's sister, Amanda, he dissipates the fortune inherited from Truninnion on false friends and extravagances, and is reduced to poverty, jail, and misanthropy. Upon his father's death, however, he is left a second fortune, and he marries Amanda. See Perelman, Sidney J. Joseph (1904- ). American humorist. Perelman published his first book, Dawn Ginsbergh’s Revenge, in 1929; with that publication his fame was secured, and he moved to Hollywood to do gag- and script-writing. Most of Perelman’s work is first published in magazines such as The New Yorker before it appears in book form.

Although he has satirized almost every aspect of contemporary society, some of his most effective barbs have been directed against the entertainment and advertising industries. Among his books are Strictly from Hunger (1937), Westward Ho! or, Around the World in 80 clichés (1948), The Swiss Family Perelman (1950), The Road to Miltown, or, Under the Spreading Atrophy (1957), and The Rising Gorge (1961). His best-known play, One Touch of Venus (1943), was written in collaboration with Ogden Nash. A collection, The Most of S. J. Perelman, was published in 1958.

Pérez de Ayala, Ramón (1881–1962). Spanish poet, critic, and novelist. He is known for his charming combination of intellectualuity and warmth. This is apparent in his poetry, which includes the volumes El sendero innumerável (1916) and El sendero andante (1924). The best example of his criticism is the two-volume work Las máscaras (1917), which focuses upon contemporary Spanish drama. Pérez de Ayala, however, is best known as a distinguished novelist. His novels, which are pointed at the human condition and often reach a symbolic level, include Tinieblas en las cumbres (1907), A. M. D. G. (1910), which deals with life in a Jesuit boarding school, and Tres novelas poéticas: Prometeo, Luz de domingo, La caída de los Limones (Prometheus, Sunday Sunlight, and The Fall of the House of Limon, 1915).

Pérez Galdós, Benito (1842–1920). Spanish novelist and dramatist. A native of the Canary Islands, Pérez Galdós devoted himself to writing after the publication of his first novel, La fontana de oro, in 1870. Often compared to Balzac, he was an enlightened progressive who sought to reproduce in his work every facet of human existence.

In the 46 novels of his Episodios nacionales (1873–1912), he traced Spanish history from the battle of Trafalgar to the restoration of the monarchy in 1875. thoroughly documented, they reveal the author’s ability to evoke the spirit of a bygone age. Simultaneously, Pérez Galdós was writing several thesis novels which reflect his liberal, mildly anticlerical views. Among these are Dohá Perfecta (1876), showing the tragic effects of religious bigotry; Gloria (1877), about a Roman Catholic girl who is unable to marry the Jew she loves; and La familia de León Roch (1879), which describes a marriage ruined because of the religious differences between husband and wife. Some of Pérez Galdós’ finest works are in the series called Novelas españolas contemporáneas, which includes Fortunata y Jacinta (4 vols., 1887–1888), a masterly study of the bourgeoisie of Madrid; Angel Guerra (3 vols., 1891), an analysis of modern mysticism; and Misericordia (1897), about the underworld of Madrid.

With Realidad (1892), El abuelo (1897), and Casandra (1905), Pérez Galdós created a new genre, the dialogued novel, in which the author’s intrusions are totally suppressed and the characters portray themselves only by their words and deeds. Later he adapted these works for the stage. His other dramas include La loca de la casa (1893) and Electra (1901).

Perfectibilism. The doctrine of man’s individual and social perfectibility. In Thomas Love Peacock’s novel Headlong Hall there is a Mr. Foster who is represented as “perfectibilitian.”

Pergolesi, Giovanni Battista (1710–1736). Italian composer. His short life and sudden death from consumption shortly after his first success made many legends grow up about him, and led to the practice of ascribing to him works of other composers. For instance, nearly all the “works of Pergolesi” which Stravinsky used as the basis of his ballet Pulcinella are spurious. Pergolesi’s best works are an opera buffa, La Serva Padrona (The Maid as Mistress, 1733) and the Stabat Mater for women’s voices and orchestra (1736).

Peribáñez y el comendador de Ocaña (c. 1614). A drama by Lope de Vega. It takes place during the reign of Enrique III (1309–1406). The comendador, or governor, of Ocaña is attracted to Casilda, bride of the peasant Peribáñez, but she spurns his advances. After making Peribáñez captain of a peasant company and sending him away, the comendador tries to take Casilda by force but is surprised in the act by Peribáñez, who has returned unexpectedly. Peribáñez kills the comendador, then recounts the whole affair to the king, who pardons him.

Pericles (Perikles, c. 500–429 B.C.). An Athenian statesman. Pericles dominated Athens from about 460 B.C. to his death. Influenced by the philosopher Anaxagoras, he lost the superstitious beliefs held by many of his countrymen. His political ideal was a democratic Athens, leader of the Greek world. To this end he attempted to bring about a Greek union, but, when resisted by Sparta, he converted the Delian Confederacy into an Athenian empire. He pursued an imperialistic policy, while instituting democratic reform in Athens. A striking innovation was the payment of the archons and members of the Assembly. As a result of this reform, the qualification of wealth for the holding of public office could be dropped. Further, the Areopagus, or council of former archons, which had had the power of supervising the administration and judging crime, was relieved of these powers. Its censorial powers over the private lives of citizens were also abolished, and the wealthy and conservative institution was limited to duties without political significance.

In 430 B.C. Pericles was charged with misuse of public funds; it was thought that he used the treasury of the Delian League for the beautification of Athens. However, he was re-elected as general the following year, and died in 429 B.C., a victim of the plague. Athens owes the Parthenon, Propylaia, the long wall to Piraeus, and many temples to Pericles’ program of civic embellishment. He was also widely known for his eloquence, which is reported by Thucydides. The historian records Pericles’ Funeral Oration, supposedly delivered by the general in honor of the Athenians who died in the Battle of Samos (440 B.C.). The speech exhorts the Athenians to have courage. Pericles also led the Athenians in battle at the opening of the Peloponnesian War.

He took as mistress the hetaera, or courtesan, Aspasia (fl. 440 B.C.), who was famous for her beauty and intelligence. Her home became the center of the literary and philosophical life of Athens. It is said that she aided Pericles in matters of public policy, and helped to compose his speeches. She was condemned to death for impiety, but the eloquence of Pericles saved her life. Their son was later legitimized and made a citizen by the Athenians.

The period 460–429 B.C. is often referred to as The Periclean Age, or the Golden Age of Athens.

Pericles, Prince of Tyre (c. 1608). A drama by William Shakespeare and another author, presumably George Wilkins. The plot is believed to be derived from Lawrence Twine's Pattern of Painful Adventures (1576) and John Gower's Confessio Amantis (1390). Gower himself is a character in the play, appearing as the Chorus.

At Antioch, Pericles arouses the enmity of King Antiochus by guessing that the king has an incestuous love for his daughter. Pursued by the wrath of Antiochus, he is forced to leave Tyre and go on a journey. At Pentapolis, where he has been shipwrecked, he wins a tournament for the hand of King Simonides' daughter Thaisa, whom he marries. Hearing of Antiochus' death, Pericles sets sail for Tyre with his wife, who gives birth to a daughter during a storm at sea but falls into such a deep state of unconsciousness that she is presumed dead. Her body is placed in a chest which is thrown overboard and is later washed ashore at Ephesus. Thaisa is revived by Cerimon, an Ephesian lord, and, believing her husband to be dead, becomes a votress in the temple of Diana. Meanwhile, Pericles leaves his infant daughter Marina in Tarsus to be reared by Cleon and his wife Dionyza. Sixteen years later, the jealous Dionyza tries to kill Marina, but the girl is saved by pirates who place her in a brothel at Mytilene. Lysimachus, governor of the city, is so struck by her beauty and virtue that he purchases her freedom. Pericles, who has been told that Marina is dead, finds her in Mytilene and blesses her union with Lysimachus. Guided by the goddess Diana, who has appeared to him in a vision, Pericles then goes to Ephesus where he is finally reunited with Thaisa.

Perilous Castle. The border castle of the Scottish James Douglas. It was so called in the reign of Edward I because, during border warfare, Douglas destroyed several English garrisons stationed there and vowed to be revenged on anyone who dared to take possession of it. It is the location of Sir Walter Scott's novel Castle Dangerous.

Peripatetic School. The school of philosophy founded by Aristotle. It was so named because Aristotle used to walk about as he taught his disciples. The covered walk of the Lyceum was called the Peripatos. Theophrastus and Strato led the school after Aristotle's death, and gradually turned it wholly to scientific research. After 1 b.c., the Peripatetics produced expositions of Aristotle's work. Finally the school turned to Neoplatonism.

Periquillo sarmiento, El (Sp., “the mangy little parrot”; 1816). A picaresque novel by José Joaquín Fernández de Lizardi. Modeled on Alcaldan Gua- mán de Alfarache and Lesage's Gil Blas, the book relates the adventures of Periquillo, an engaging rogue, in a pungent, colloquial style; the result is a realistic picture of Mexican society on the eve of independence. Interspersed throughout the narrative are didactic essays in which Fernández denounced the sloth of the middle class, the abuses of the clergy, the defects of the educational system, and other evils.

Peri. See FABRE QUEENE, The.

Perkin Warbeck (c. 1633). A tragedy by John Ford, based on the rise and fall of the Yorkist pretender to the English throne. Perkin appeared during the reign of Henry VII and claimed to be Richard, son of Edward IV, whom Richard III was alleged to have murdered in the Tower. For a while, he enjoyed the backing of James IV of Scotland and enlisted considerable popular support in England. But his allies eventually deserted him, and he was captured by Henry and executed. In the play he maintains his claim to the very end. The real Perkin Warbeck (c. 1474–1499) was a Walloon of humble origin who became the tool of anti-Tudor forces; he confessed his true identity before he died.

Perrault, Charles (1628–1703). French writer and critic. Perrault took a leading role in the controversy between the ancients and the moderns. In the poem Le Siècle de Louis le Grand (The Century of Louis the Great, 1687) he asserted the superiority of the age of Louis XIV over that of the Roman emperor Augustus, and his Parallèles des Anciens et des Modernes (Parallels between the Ancients and the Moderns, 1688–1697) is a series of dialogues surveying the arts and pointing out the progress made by writers of Perrault's own day over those of the past. Perrault also collected and published a book of fairy tales, Les Contes de ma mère l'Oye.

Perry, Bliss (1860–1954). American educator and literary critic. At the turn of the century he was an editor of the Atlantic Monthly but left the magazine for Harvard, where he became one of the nation's most beloved teachers. His most important critical books are Walt Whitman: His Life and Works (1906) and Emerson Today (1931). And Gladly Teach (1935) is his autobiography.

Perry, Matthew Calbraith (1794–1858). American naval officer. Chosen by President Fillmore to negotiate a treaty with Japan, which at that time refused to have contact with the West, Perry arrived in Yedo Bay with his naval squadron in 1853 and succeeded in delivering a letter from Fillmore to the emperor. The following year he returned and concluded a treaty of peace, amity, and commerce, bringing about the entrance of Japan into world affairs.

Perry, Oliver Hazard (1785–1819). American naval officer. After serving in the Tripolitan War, Perry was given command of the U.S. naval forces on Lake Erie during the War of 1812. On Sept. 10, 1813 decisively defeated the British fleet on Lake Erie and announced the victory to Gen. W. H. Harrison in a famous message, "We have met the enemy and they are ours." Perry, who was the older brother of Matthew Calbraith Perry, died of yellow fever after concluding a diplomatic mission to Venezuela.

Perse, St. John. Pen name of Aléxis St. Léger Léger (1887— ). French poet and diplomat. His childhood on a family-owned island near Guadaloupe is reflected by the recurrence of sea imagery in his poems; his travels as ambassador to the Far East (1916-1921) and his studies in early pagan philosophy and in geology perhaps account somewhat for his works' exotic flavor, their colorful settings, such as the unspecified Asiatic lands in Anabase and the imaginary oriental kingdom by the sea in Sea-marks (Amers; 1957). The poems are written in lines of irregular length, ranging from a single word to a short paragraph, with a fluid, resonant rhythm like that of an incantation.

Indeed, Perse's work as a whole has a hymnlike tone of mystery and passion, although devoted not to God but to the vast scope of human experience and the triumphal joy of man's exploration and conquest of the universe and of himself.

The poet as creator is a dominant theme, as in Exil (1942), in which he is prince of lands which are void until he gives them existence in a poem. Panoramas of mankind's history and natural landscapes blend through a rich vocabulary and occasionally unusual syntax in a symphonic progression of images; the thematic unity of each piece is symbolized by one dominant image, as in Rains (Pluies; 1943), Snows (Neigés; 1944), Winds (Vents; 1946), Chronique (1960). Early poems include Eloges (1911; revised 1925, 1948) and Amitié du Prince (1924). Among others, T. S. Eliot and Archibald MacLeish have translated his poems into English, Rainer Maria Rilke into German.

The other half of Perse's "double life" is Aléxis Léger, who entered the French Foreign Service in 1914 and became a specialist in Far Eastern affairs. In 1940, he went into exile and lived in the U.S., working for the Library of Congress, until his return to France in 1959. Perse was awarded the Nobel Prize for Literature in 1960.

Persephone. Also known as Kore. In Greek mythology, both queen of the underworld and goddess of the reviving crops. In the latter capacity, she is identified as the daughter of Demeter, abducted by Hades. However, Hades himself was Plouton, a god of the wealth of the fertile earth which springs up from beneath the ground, so Persephone's two worlds are essentially the same. With her mother, she plays an important role in the Eleusinian Mysteries. Her Roman counterpart was called Proserpina.

Perseus. A hero of Ancient Greece. He was worshiped as divine at Athens. Epics relate that he was the son of Zeus by Danaë, daughter of King Acrisius of Argos. The Delphic oracle had predicted that Danaë would bear a son who would kill his grandfather, so Acrisius cast Danaë and Perseus adrift in a chest. Zeus caused the waves to carry them to the Isle of Seriphus, where Dictys, a fisherman and the brother of King Polydeuces, rescued them. When Perseus was a young man, Polydeuces desired Danaë and, wanting to get rid of her son, tricked him into promising the head of the Gorgon Medusa as a gift, a hopeless task. But Perseus, aided by the gods, killed Medusa and secured the head, which turned all who looked on it to stone. He rescued ANDROMEDA, with its help and, returning with her to Seriphus, turned Polydeuces and his friends to stone. Later, while taking part in the games at Larissa, he accidentally killed his grandfather Acrisius with a discus, thus bringing the early prophecy to pass. Perseus and Andromeda founded the family of the Perseids, from whom Hercules descended.

Pershing, John Joseph (1860-1948). American general. A graduate of West Point, Pershing served in Cuba during the Spanish-American War. In 1913 he suppressed an insurrection in the Philippines and in 1916 commanded the border campaign against the Mexican bandit and revolutionary Francisco Villa. That year he became a major general. In 1917 he was placed in command of the American Expeditionary Forces in France. When the great offensive of July, 1918, began, the American army under Pershing opened the way for the collapse of the German forces. He served as army chief of staff from 1921 until his retirement in 1924. In 1931 he published My Experiences in the World War (2 vols.), a work for which he received a Pulitzer Prize in history.

Persians, The (Persai, 472 B.C.). A tragedy by AESCHYLUS. In this play, Aeschylus relates the humiliating return of Xerxes to his capital of Susa after his defeat in the Persian wars. A principal figure in the play is Xerxes' mother Atossa. It is remarkable for its compassion that Aeschylus, who himself had fought the Persians, shows for his former enemies in their defeat, which he attributes to the pride and arrogance of Xerxes. The Persians is the only extant Greek tragedy that dealt with figures of recent history, instead of ancient myth.

Persian Wars, the (500-c. 449 B.C.). Wars between Persia and Greece. The Persian king Darius, enraged at the defiance of Athens and Eretria, which had delayed his conquest of the Ionian cities of Asia Minor, moved against the two cities in revenge. Hippias, the exiled son of Pisistratus, traitorously led 30,000 Persians to the plain of Marathon, terrain supposedly favorable to the Persian cavalry. There 11,000 Greeks under Miltiades, fighting in close array, won a glorious victory (490 B.C.). This battle ended the first Persian War, and Darius, busy putting down a revolt in Egypt, did not live to return to Greece. After his death in 485 B.C., his successor Xerxes spent three years preparing for the second Persian War. Athens was then under the leadership of Themistocles, and the Greek states had joined in a defensive confederation. At the invasion of Xerxes, the Spartan Leonidas and an army of 6,000 Greeks defended the narrow pass of Thermopylae (480 B.C.). Betrayed by the traitor Ephialtes, Leonidas detached most of his army, and with 300 Spartans and 700 Thespians, held back the Persians until all were slain. Simonides wrote a famous epitaph for the valorous Greeks. Upon hearing the news of the defeat at Thermopylae, the Greek fleet retired to Salamis. There they encountered the Persians, and routed them. See Thermopylae. After the defeat of Salamis, Xerxes left his army under the leadership of Mardonius. In 479 B.C., the Greeks won a complete victory in the battle of Plataea. Further battles were fought during the next thirty years, but the Greeks had assumed the aggressive position. Some mark the end of the Persian Wars at 479 B.C.; others consider the final date to be 449 B.C., when the Peace of Callias was established. Our knowledge of the Persian Wars comes from the history of Herodotus, which covers the course of the wars to 479 B.C.
Peter Bell

Persius. Full Latin name, Aulus Persius Flaccus (A.D. 34–62). Roman satiric poet. He was a friend of Lucan and greatly influenced by Horace. He is the author of six satires which expound the tenets of Stoicism.

Personae (1909). A volume of poems by Ezra Pound. The title, literally translated from the Latin, means “masks of the actor,” recalling Yeats’s demand that the poet objectify his experience through an imagined personality, a mask. The second book of his poems published, it also reveals Pound’s indebtedness to the monologues of Browning’s Men and Women. Pound also used Personae as the title for later collections of verse.

Personification. A figure of speech attributing human characteristics or feelings to nonhuman organisms, inanimate objects, or abstract ideas. Allegory frequently employs personifications; the Giant Despair in John Bunyan’s Pilgrim’s Progress, for example, is a personification; that is, the abstract concept of despair is represented as a person. But the use of personification is by no means confined to allegory. Keats, for example, personifies the Grecian urn in his Ode to a Grecian Urn as a “Sylvan historian,” an “unravished bride of quietness” and a “foster-child of silence and slow time.”

Persuasion (1818). A novel by Jane Austen. The heroine, Anne Elliott, and her lover, Captain Wentworth, were engaged for eight years before the story begins, but Anne broke the engagement in deference to family and friends. Upon being thrown into her company again, Wentworth realizes that he is still drawn to Anne. When he is certain that she, too, still loves him, he renews his offer of marriage and the two lovers are united. Anne is gentle, sensitive, and charming; the author wrote of her, “She is almost too good for me.”

Pertwee, Roland (1886–1963). English playwright and novelist. His works for the theater include Seein’ Reason (1913), Hell’s Loose (1929), and Heat Wave (1929). He also wrote for magazines and acted in the companies of H. B. Irving and Charles Hawtrey.

Perugino, Il. Real name, Pietro Vannucci (c. 1445–1523). Italian painter from Perugia. He was the teacher of Raphaël, who employed the same refinement of style and sweetness of manner. Among his best-known works are Apollo and Marsyas and Christ Handing the Keys to St. Peter (1482), one of the wall frescoes of the Sistine Chapel.

Pervigilium Veneris (Lat., “vigil of Venus”). A famous short Latin poem by an anonymous writer of the 2nd or 3rd century. It celebrates the spring festival in honor of Venus, goddess of love and increase. T. S. Eliot uses a plaintive quotation from this poem toward the end of The Waste Land: Quando fiam cell chelidon . . . (“When shall I become as the swallow?”).

Peshkov, Aleksei Maksimovich. See Maksim Gorki.

Pessôa, Fernando Antônio Nogueira (1888–1935). Portuguese poet. Reared and educated in South Africa, he wrote three volumes of English Poems (1921). Later he became an influential figure in the Portuguese modernista movement, publishing his verse in such reviews as Orfêu and Presença. He wrote under his own name and three pseudonyms—Alberto Caeiro, Ricardo Reis, and Alvaro de Campos—each of which supposedly represented a distinct facet of his personality. His Obras Completas were published from 1942 to 1956.

Pestalozzi, Johann Heinrich (1746–1827). Swiss educational reformer. His work influenced the methods of education in elementary schools in Europe and America.

Peste, La. See Plague, The.

Pétain, Henri Philippe (1856–1951). French general, later politician. Marshal of France (1918), Pétain won fame as commander in chief of the French army under Marshal Poch in World War II. The elderly war hero, serving as President du Conseil, signed an armistice with Germany in 1940. During the Occupation (1940–1944), he served as head of the Vichy government, collaborating with the Germans. Pétain was tried by a French tribunal at the end of the war and convicted of high treason, but the death sentence was commuted to life imprisonment.

Peter, St. One of the 12 disciples of Jesus, noted for his impulsive nature. More incidents are related of him in the Gospels than of any other disciple. He was first called Simon, but Jesus changed his name and addressed to him the words on which the authority of the Papacy is based, “Thou art Peter, and upon this rock (Lat. petra, rock) I will build my church; and the gates of Hades shall not prevail against it; I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of Heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in Heaven.” At the time of Jesus’ arrest, Peter denied three times that he knew him before the cock crew, as he had been warned that he would. After the crucifixion he became a principal and many of his missionary activities are related in the Acts. He figures in numerous popular tales as the keeper of the door to Heaven, to whom saints and sinners present themselves for admittance. Peter is the patron saint of fishermen, having been himself a fisherman. His day is June 29, and he is usually represented as an old man, bald, but with a flowing beard, dressed in a white mantle and blue tunic, and holding in his hand a book or scroll. His peculiar symbols are the keys and a sword. Tradition tells that he conferred Simon Magus, who was at Nero’s court as a magician, and that in 66 he was crucified with his head downward at his own request, as he said he was not worthy to suffer the same death as Jesus.

Peter, The General Epistles of. Two books of the New Testament. The first epistle, probably a genuine Petrine letter, gives encouragement to the Christians who were then suffering persecution. It was written prior to A.D. 65. The second letter was not written by Peter; it dates from the middle of the second century. It denounces moral laxity in the Church.

Peter Bell (1819). A poetical tale by William Wordsworth. The potter Peter Bell is about to steal an ass, which he sees standing alone by the river, but, upon approaching it, he discovers that the ass is watching the body of its drowned owner. Bell returns the ass to the poor man’s widow; on his way to her he has several experiences that cause him to change his outlook on life, hitherto one of insensitivity to human values and to beauty. The poem was written in 1798; Shelley burlesqued it as Peter Bell the Third.

Peter Ibbetson (1891). A novel by George du Maurier. It is the story of the strange, idealistic dream life of the incarcerated Peter Ibbetson, a deranged murderer. It was the basis of an opera by Deems Taylor.

Peterkin, Julia [Mood] (1880–1961). American novelist and short-story writer. She is noted for her books dealing, both realistically and sympathetically with the Gullah Negroes of South Carolina, her native state. Her best-known novel is Scarlet Sister Mary. Black April (1927) is the story of the title character’s domination over all the other Negroes on an isolated plantation. Her other books include Green Thursday (1924); Bright Skin (1932); Roll, Jordan, Roll (1933), a collection of photographs with text by Mrs. Peterkin; and Plantation Christmas (1934).

Peter Lombard. See Peter Lombard.

Peterloo Massacre. A riot at St. Peter’s Field, Manchester, England, on Aug. 16, 1819. An assembly of 60,000 men, women, and children, mostly from the laboring classes, had gathered to hear Henry Hunt speak on parliamentary reform and the repeal of corn laws. The military was sent out to break up the group, and charged on the crowd with drawn sabers, killing 11 and wounding over 400. The name Peterloo is ironic, referring to the fact that the same Tory government that claimed credit for Waterloo ordered the assault of the crowd at St. Peter’s Field. Shelley wrote an indignant poem, The Masque of Anarchy (pub., 1832) on the incident.

Peter Pan (1904). A children’s drama by J. M. Barrie. The boy hero, Peter Pan, has run away to the Never-Never-Land to escape growing up; here he lives in the trees with the fairies. One day he shows the Darling children, Wendy, Michael, and John, how to fly and persuades them to come home with him. They have many adventures, particularly at the hands of Peter’s enemy Captain Hook, leader of a band of pirates. The Indian princess, Tiger Lily, and Tinker Bell, the unseen fairy, protect the children. Finally the Darling children must go home, but Wendy promises to come again every spring. A long succession of actresses, notably Maude Adams, and including Pauline Chase, Cissie Loftus, Eva Le Gallienne, and Mary Martin, have played Peter.

Peter Porcupine. See William Cobbett.

Peter Quince at the Clavier (1923). A poem by Wallace Stevens. It is built on a musical analogy; the poet, seated at the clavier, retells part of the biblical story of Susanna and the Elders in the Apocalypse. He draws the conclusion that “beauty is momentary in the mind . . . / But in the flesh it is immortal.”

Peter Rugg, the Missing Man (1824). A story by William Austin (1778–1841), American lawyer, public official, and writer. It first appeared in the New England Galaxy, and has since been frequently anthologized. Peter Rugg, caught in a thunderstorm, swears that he will not stop and take shelter before he reaches Boston; he is condemned to roam about between Hartford and Boston forever. The tale bears resemblance to Rip Van Winkle and the story of the Wandering Jew. It is referred to in Nathaniel Hawthorne’s A Virtuoso’s Collection (1842), and both Louise Guiney and Amy Lowell used it as a basis for ballads.

Peter Schlemihls wundersame Geschichte (Peter Schlemihl’s Remarkable Story, 1814). A story by Adalbert von Chamisso. It tells, with both sympathy and humor, the adventures of a young man who gives up his shadow to a gray stranger in return for Fortunatus’ purse. The careful balance between the fantastic subject and the matter-of-fact style in which it is treated is the story’s chief merit. At the end, Peter renounces his ill-gotten wealth, luckily finds a pair of seven-league boots, and using this conveyance to make trips all over the world, devotes his life to scientific research. Schlemihl (lit., beloved of God) is a Yiddish word and refers commonly to a clumsy, unfortunate person for whom nothing ever seems to work out right.

Peter’s pence. Before the Reformation, an annual tribute to the Pope of a penny. It was paid by every English householder who held land of a certain value. The term is now used to denote voluntary contributions by Roman Catholics to the Papal Treasury.

Peter the Great or Peter I (Pietr Alekseyevich; 1672–1725). Czar of Russia (1689–1725). More than any previous ruler, Peter Europeanized Russia, when necessary forcibly imposing Western ideas and customs on his subjects. He visited western Europe in 1697–1698, gathering information and hiring teachers and technicians to take back to Russia. Peter’s energy was unlimited, and his interests covered a wide range. He founded the Russian navy, reorganized the army on Western lines, instituted obligatory service to the state by the gentry class, bound the administration of the church to that of the state, reformed the Russian alphabet, and gained Russian outposts on the Baltic Sea by driving out the Swedes. On the marshes at the mouth of the Neva River on the Baltic, he built Russia’s “window on the West,” St. Petersburg, making it the capital instead of Moscow. In 1721 the title of emperor was taken by Peter. The designation was also used by succeeding rulers.

Peter’s reforms created Russian civilization and set its direction for the next 200 years. His introduction of Western ways to the Russian gentry classes laid the basis for the split between the upper classes and the peasantry that was to plague Russian society until the 1917 revolution. Besides the far-reaching effects of his action on Russian society, Peter’s personality also has a strong impact. The chief response in literature to this impact is Pushkin’s poem The Bronze Horseman. Another of Pushkin’s poems, Polota, deals with Peter’s victory in 1709 over Charles XII of Sweden. The Czar is the subject of Aleksei Tolstoi’s historical novel, Piotr Pervyj (Peter the First).

Peter the Hermit. Known as Peter of Amiens and Pietro L’Eremita (1050?–1115). French monk. He was one of the instigators of the First Crusade (1096–1099), which he preached widely and enthusiastically. He actually led one segment of the Crusade to Asia Minor in 1096. He is introduced by Tasso in the epic Gerusalemme Liberata, where he advises and exhorts the Christian forces against the infidel armies. It is he who first proposes Goffredo (Godfrey of Bouillon) as the supreme commander. Later, revealing the genealogy of Rinaldo of Este, he describes the founding of the house of Este, Tasso’s patrons at Ferrara.
Petitioners and Abhorrens. Two political parties in the reign of Charles II, initially defined by their opposite attitudes on the issue of the right of English subjects to petition the king to assemble Parliament. The Petitioners, supporting the right to petition, were in favor of strong parliamentary government and opposed the succession of James II. They formed the nucleus of the Whig party. The Abhorrens, who disapproved of petitioning, maintained the royal prerogative of independent rule and favored James's succession. Their successors were the Tories and the Jacobites.

Petition of Right (1628). A declaration of Parliament reluctantly accepted by Charles I, providing that no forced loans or taxes were to be imposed without Parliament's consent. It also condemned arbitrary imprisonment and the billeting of troops in private houses. It is one of the chief documents of English constitutional government.

Petit Pierre, Le. See Anatole France.

Peto. In Shakespeare's Henry IV; Part I and Part II, an associate of Sir John Falstaff.

Petrarch. Ital., Francesco Petrarca (1304–1374). Italian poet and scholar. A major force in the development of the Renaissance and European culture generally, he was born at Arezzo and spent much of his early life at Avignon and Carpentras, the former city being the seat of the papacy during the so-called Babylonian captivity. Although he studied law at Bologna, his primary interests were in Latin and Greek literature and in writing. As scholar and poet, he soon grew famous enough to be crowned at Rome on April 8, 1341, with the coveted laurel, in a ceremony that had not been seen since ancient times. The latter part of his life was spent in wandering restlessly from city to city in northern Italy, despite the welcome he received everywhere as an international celebrity. Like his friend Boccaccio, he was avidly interested in classical antiquity and fostered its revival. His learning, sound scholarship, and critical spirit made him a founder of Renaissance humanism. Several factors set him apart from his medieval contemporaries and later earned him the designation of the first modern man: his love of nature, evidenced by the descriptions of Vaucluse in his writings and the then unusual feat of mountain climbing; his frank confession of and meditation on psychological conflicts; his preference for Plato over Aristotle; and, most of all, his human treatment of his love for Laura, which transcended the conventions of courtly love. A prolific correspondent, he wrote many important letters. Among his Latin works are De viris illustribus (On Illustrious Men); the epic poem Africa, which has Scipio Africanus as its hero and the love of Masinissa and Sophonisba as its key romantic episode; the dialogue Secretum, which reveals in a debate with St. Augustine Petrarch's "secret" conflict—his love of Laura and the laurel (fame) opposed to his spiritual yearnings; an incomplete treatise on the cardinal virtues, Resuam memorandarum libros; De vita solitaria (On the Solitary Life); De oti religioso (On the Virtue of the Religious Life); Bucolicum carmen, 12 eclogues; Insecta contra medicum (Insective Against Doctors); De Remediis utriusque fortunae (Remedies Against One and the Other Fortune), his most popular Latin prose work, translated into English in 1579 by Thomas Twyne; an Itinerarium, or guide book, to the Holy Land; De sui ipsius et multorum ignorantia (On His Own Ignorance and That of Others), against the Aristotelians.

Equally influential, especially during the Renaissance, were his Italian poems, collected in a canzoniere, or songbook. Usually called Rime o Rime sparse (Scattered Lyrics), they include sonnets, canzoni, sestine, ballate and madrigals, divided by later editors into two parts: In vita and In morte di Madonna Laura (During the Life and After the Death of My Lady Laura). Modern scholars no longer believe that Laura was a real woman, but it is admitted that she is more realistically presented than the conventional lady of the Provençal troubadours and the literature of courtly love, that she is less ethereal than the donna angelicata (angelic lady) of his immediate Italian predecessors, the stil-novisti (followers of Dante's "sweet new style"), and especially Beatrice. Some of the poems are addressed to friends; others deal with contemporary personages and affairs; still others are religious; but the dominant theme is Laura, whose beauty and actions enamour the poet and cause him both joy and despair, for she is unattainable, and the poet would be a lesser man and a lesser poet were his desire to be fulfilled. This conflict is recorded in detailed psychological terms, albeit formalized by figurative language and the other devices of literary style. Upon her death, the poet finds that his grief is as difficult to live with as was his former despair, but the mood and the tone become more spiritual and a consolatory note appears. These poems were the source of European Petrarchism, which everywhere dominated lyric poetry for centuries after. Petrarch's other vernacular work, the Triumphs, is in terza rima and partly inspired by Dante. It describes allegorical processes or "triumphs" of Love, Chastity, Death, Fame, Time, and Eternity, including historical and literary personages among whom Laura appears again. The poet was still revising the work when he died in 1374.

His immense influence in England began with Chaucer, who used for his Clerk's Tale Petrarch's translation into Latin of the Decameron, as well as a poem from the Rime for the cantus Troili in Troilus and Criseyde. Later, English Petrarchism started its long journey in the poems of Wyatt and Surrey, and from there continued to exert its power through the 19th century. During the English Renaissance, when every lyricist was touched by the Rime, there was also great interest in the Triumphs, as the translation of Henry Parker, Lord Morley, in 1550 reveals. Shelley's poem, The Triumph of Life, indicates its later impact. Among the Latin works, the De Remediis proved especially popular with English readers and authors.

Petrie, Sir Flinders (1853–1942). A world renowned English Egyptologist. His excavations in Egypt and Palestine led to many discoveries in archeology and anthropology. He was the author of numerous books on ancient civilizations.

Petrified Forest, The (1935). A play by Robert E. Sherwood. Set in the Arizona desert, the drama deals with Alan Squier, an unsuccessful New England author who is hitchhiking to California. Arriving at a gasoline station and cheap luncheon, he persuades a gangster to kill him, first revising his insurance policy. He makes the daughter of the lunchroom proprietor his beneficiary, so that she can escape from her sordid environment.

Petronius, Gaius (d. a.d. 66). Arbiter Elegantiæ (judge of elegance), as Tacitus calls him, at the court of Nero. Almost the only historical evidence of Petronius' existence is to be found in the 16th book of the Annals of Tacitus, where it is reported that he committed suicide to escape being put to death by Nero. He figures importantly in Quo Vadis (1896) by Sienkiewicz. See Trimalchio.

This story is the subject of Euripides' tragedy Hippolytus, Racine's masterpiece Phédre, and many other works, including Mary Renault's historical novel The Bull from the Sea. It is obviously based on the same widespread folk tale as that of Joseph and Potiphar's wife, Bellerophon was another Greek hero to suffer from the same revenge on the part of a woman whose advances he had scorned.

Oenone convinces the king that Hippolyte made advances to her mistress, and Theseus calls upon Neptune, his protector, to destroy his son. Hippolyte refuses to accuse the queen directly, but inflames her jealousy by declaring his love for Aricie, a captive princess (the character is Racine’s invention). The distracted Phileaster first offers his life to Arethusa and Bellario and then tries to kill them. He is arrested and sentenced to the custody of Arethusa, who saves his life by marrying. In the second part of Goethe’s Faust, Philemon and Baucis are an old couple who refuse to sell their home at any price. Because theirs is a part of the land that he is redeeming from the sea, Faust, with the aid of Mephistopheles, dispossesses them, and they die of the shock.

Philip II (382–336 B.C.). King of Macedon (359–336 B.C.). Philip assumed charge of the Macedonian government as regent for his nephew Amyntas, whom he later set aside. The first few years of his reign were marked by his successful dispersal of rivals for the throne. Philip reorganized the Macedonian army on the basis of the phalanx. He extended Macedonian territory to include the gold mines of Mt. Pangaeus. Attempting to push into Greece, he eased Athens out of her possessions on the Thermaic Gulf. He married Olympias, who gave birth to Alexander in 356 B.C.

On the capture of Olynthus, Athens sent envoys to Philip to negotiate the peace of Philocrates, which was disapproved by Demosthenes. Philip soon broke the treaty and overran Thrace. The combined forces of Thebes and Athens were defeated, but Philip, who admired the Athenians, was lenient in his treatment of prisoners. About to move against Persia, he was assassinated by an agent of Olympias, who was jealous of his new consort. It is said that Alexander knew of the plot. Philip’s reign marked the end of the city-state in Greece, paving the way for a Greek nation.

Philip’s aim, frustrated by his death, was to bring Greek culture to Macedon.
Philip II (1527-1598). King of Spain. The son of Charles V and Isabella of Portugal, Philip succeeded to the throne in 1556 upon his father's abdication. His first wife was Mary of Portugal, who died giving birth to the ill-starred Don Carlos; in 1554 he married Mary Tudor of England and upon her death (1558) was an unsuccessful suitor for the hand of Elizabeth I. He arrived in Spain in 1559, never again to leave the Iberian Peninsula.

The most powerful monarch in Christendom, Philip ruled not only Spain, but the Netherlands, Franche Comté, Sicily, Sardinia, Naples, and Milan, as well as the Spanish possessions in America. In 1580, upon the extinction of the Aviz dynasty, he also acquired the crown of Portugal. This vast empire he ruled virtually alone, making all decisions, whether trivial or important, himself.

Often pictured, especially by northern European writers, as a tyrannical religious bigot, Philip was determined to strengthen royal power in Spain and to unify the peninsula, a policy which led him to suppress religious heterodoxy there and to curtail the traditional "liberties" of Aragon. The outbreak of a serious Protestant revolt in the Netherlands in the 1560's led him to aim at the subjugation of England, a design that was thwarted by the astute diplomacy of Elizabeth and the defeat of the Spanish Armada in 1588. He also intervened actively in the religious and dynastic struggles of France, but his efforts to control that country were checked by the accession of Henry IV, though the latter's conversion to Catholicism represented a partial victory for Philip. He also warred with the powerful Ottoman Empire, winning a signal victory at Lepanto in 1571. The burden of paying for this ambitious foreign policy rested almost entirely on Spain, especially Castile, which continuously skirted financial disaster despite the influx of American treasure and suffered a serious economic decline.

A bibliophile and a patron of art, Philip amassed a fine collection of rare books and paintings at the Escorial, where he died and lies buried.

Philips, Ambrose (1675-1749). English poet and friend of Addison and Steele. Pope's spiteful attacks on him began when a writer for The Guardian praised Philips' Pastoral and ignored Pope's Pastoral, both works having appeared in the same volume of Jacob Tonson's Miscellany (1709). Pope referred to him as "Namby Pamby," a nickname originally conferred on Philips by Henry Carey, because he thought it fitted his "eminence in infantile style." Philips is best known for his play The Distrest Mother (1712), an adaptation of Racine's Andromaque.

Philips, John (1676-1709). English poet. He is chiefly known for The Splendid Shilling (1705), a learned "Miltonic" burlesque contrasting the pleasures of a rich man with the sorrows of a penniless poet.

Philip Sparrow (c. 1590). A long, quick-running, tenderly humorous elegy for a pet bird by John Skelton, employing fragments from the office for the dead. The poem was probably suggested by Catullus' dirge for a dead sparrow. Philip is the traditional name for sparrows, derived from the sound of the bird's chirp.

Philip the Apostle. One of the original 12 disciples. While he was active during the ministry of Jesus, Philip is not mentioned after the Resurrection. He is traditionally supposed to have preached in Hierapolis. During the Middle Ages, Philip the Apostle was confused with Philip the evangelist. The latter was one of the seven deacons ordained by the apostles as recorded in Acts.

Philistines. In the Old Testament, the inveterate enemies of the Israelites, fought against by Samson, David, and other Jewish heroes. In modern usage, the term refers to ignorant, ill-behaved persons lacking in culture or artistic appreciation and only concerned with materialistic values. Matthew Arnold first used the word in this sense by adapting it from the German Philister, the term applied by the university students to the townspeople, or "outsiders." This usage is said to have arisen at Jena, because after a "town and gown" row in 1689, which resulted in a number of deaths, the university preacher took for his text "The Philistines be upon thee" (Judg. 16).

Philips, David Graham. Pen name, John Graham (1867-1911). American journalist and novelist. He is known for his muckraking articles, especially the series entitled The Treasure of the Senate, which appeared in Cosmopolitan in 1906. Philips wrote numerous novels exposing political corruption and social problems, such as The Great God Success (1901), The Cost (1904), The Deluge (1905), and The Conflict (1911). Several of the novels, as well as his only play, The Worth of a Woman (1908), deal with his era's changing attitudes toward the feminine sex. His most important novel was Susan Lenox: Her Fall and Rise (1917), a realistic, well-documented account of a country girl who becomes a prostitute and later a successful businesswoman. Philips was murdered by a madman who thought that he had been maltreated and slandered by the author's The Fashionable Adventures of Joshua Craig (1909).

Phillips, Wendell (1811–1884). American abolitionist and reformer. Phillips dismayed the exalted Boston circles in which he moved by becoming an ardent antislavery agitator in the mid-1830's. A long-time ally of William Lloyd Garrison, Phillips was particularly noted as a superb speaker whose informal, direct delivery contrasted with the bombast then in vogue. After the Civil War, he devoted himself to economic reform, denouncing "the present system of finance, which robs labor and gorges capital...."

Philoctetes (Philoktetes). Greek hero in the Trojan War. On the way to Troy he was bitten by a serpent. The wound proved so noxious and Philoctetes' pain so great that his companions abandoned him on the island of Lemnos. He remained there for ten years, nursing his wound and his hatred of the Greeks. Ultimately, however, his former companions learned from the captured Trojan seer Helenus that Troy could fall only before the arrows of Heracles. These had descended to Philoctetes from his father Poes, who had received them for the service of lighting Heracles' funeral pyre. Odysseus and Neoptolemus (or Diomedes) sailed to Lemnos. According to Sophocles' tragedy Philoctetes, they would have tricked him into going with them or taken him by force except for the compassion of Neoptolemus. In the end, Heracles appeared and commanded Philoctetes to go. He was cured by Machaon, the son of Asclepius. Philoctetes then killed Paris with one of the arrows and Troy soon fell.

Philomela. In Greek legend, daughter of Pandion, king of Attica. According to one version of the story, Theseus, king of Thrace, brought Philomela to visit his wife, Proce, who was her sister. He dishonored her, and cut out her tongue that she might not reveal his conduct. Theseus told his wife that Philomela was dead, but Philomela made her story known by weaving it into a peplus, which she sent to Proce. In another version Theseus married Philomela, telling her that Proce was dead, and it was Proce whose tongue was cut out and who wove the telltale story. In each case the end is the same. Proce, in revenge, cut up her own son Irys, or Ilylus, and served the flesh to Theseus. The gods changed all three into birds; Theseus became the hoopoe, his wife the swallow, and Philomela the nightingale (in Latin versions), which is still called Philomel (lover of song) by the poets. Matthew Arnold's Philomela, Coleridge's Nightingale, and Swinburne's Ilylus are among the best-known poems based on the tale.

philosophers' stone. The hypothetical substance which, according to the medieval alchemists, would convert all baser metals into gold. Its discovery was the prime object of all the alchemists, and to the wide and unremitting search that went on for it we are indebted for the birth of the science of chemistry, as well as for many inventions. According to one legend, Noah was commanded to hang up the true and genuine philosophers' stone in the ark, to give light to every living creature therein. Another relates that Deucalion had it in a bag over his shoulder, but threw it away and lost it.

philosophes. A group of 18th century French thinkers, scientists, and men of letters. They held that human reason ought to be the supreme guide in human affairs and therefore opposed those institutions and creeds which they found irrational, constraining, or superstitious. Despite censorship difficulties, the philosophes were able to publish their great work, the Encyclopédie (1751–1766), a systematic classification of all human knowledge marked by its rigorous rationality, its utter contempt for superstition and its blunt skepticism toward religion. In addition to Diderot, who was chief director of the Encyclopédie, the most important philosophes were d'Alembert, Buffon,Condillac,Condorcet,Helvétius,h'D'Holbach,Marmontel,Morellet,Raynal,Rousseau,Turgot,andVoltaire,many of whom were at one time or another imprisoned or otherwise persecuted for expressing their views too freely.

It is to this bird that Shakespeare refers in Cymbeline (c. 1610) and in his poem, The Phoenix and the Turtle.

Physiocrats. Name given to a French school of economic theorists of the latter part of the 18th century. François Quesnay is considered to be the founder and leader of physiocracy, though many of his ideas are to be found in the writings of earlier French economists, such as Jean Claude Vincent, sieur de Gournay; Sébastien Vauban; and Pierre de Boisguilbert. Among other economists who subsequently elaborated on Quesnay's thought are the marquis de Mirabeau, Mercier de la Rivière, Anne Turgot, and Pierre Samuel Du Pont de Nemours.

The term "physiocrat" combines two Greek words meaning nature and rule, and implies the economic view that only natural resources constitute national wealth, that only agriculture and mining are really productive, and that industry and commerce, though not to be neglected, add nothing to national wealth. Agricultural methods, according to this doctrine, should be scientifically improved, since only abundant production coupled with fair prices can create prosperity. Absolute freedom of trade, and an economic policy of laissez faire (free competition) will establish a natural economy, from which all other benefits will flow. A single tax is to be levied at the very source of wealth, i.e., on the land, and any tax on manufacturers and traders would be futile, since they would pass their tax burden onto the farmer. Though physiocracy died partly because of its failures, and possibly because of ridicule on the part of contemporaries, it did influence the classical school of economists, notably Adam Smith. The founder of the single-tax movement in America, Henry George, was directly influenced by the physiocrats.

Physiologus (Physiologoi, 2d century). An anonymous Greek collection of allegories concerning animals and other things in nature. In the fifth century, Latin translations of the Physiologus became popular throughout Europe. They constitute the foundation of the bestiaries of the later Middle Ages.

Pia, Emilia (d. 1528). Italian lady. The widowed heiress of the noble Carpi family, she lived at Urbino, where the companion of its duchess Elisabetta Gonzaga, she has the nominal leadership of the discussions that form The Courteous of Castiglione.

Piazza Tales, The (1856). A collection of six long short stories by Herman Melville. His finest stories, they were all published individually in magazines. In The Bell Tower, the artist Bannadonna attempts to rival the power of God, but is destroyed by his own creation. Similar in theme, The Lightning-Rod Man is refused a sale; his unwilling customer believes that man, who cannot control God, should not fear Him. The Encantadas, or The Enchanted Isles is a collection of ten descriptive sketches based on Melville's 1841 voyage to the Galápagos Islands. Introducing the volume is a section called The Piazza. The Piazza Tales conclude with two excellent short stories, Benito Cereno and Bartleby the Scrivener.

Picaresque. An adjective from the Spanish pícaro (rogue) used to describe a genre of literature in which the life and adventures of a rogue are chronicled. Although the picaresque takes many forms—for example, memoirs, plays, ballads—its best expression is found in the novel.

The picaresque novel is typically a realistic depiction of the criminal element in society; it is usually an autobiographical account of a peripatetic rogue of "loose" morals. The retelling of his adventures in the service of a series of masters, and of his various ways of outwitting them, affords the author an opportunity to make humorous, satiric sketches of types in various levels of society. Moralizing, in greater and lesser degrees of serious intent, is also characteristic. Stylistically, the picaresque novel usually displays plainness of language and faithfulness to petty detail; the tone is often cynical. The structure is that of a series of loosely connected episodes; there being no plot, these could end at any time or go on endlessly, since neither character nor incident is treated developmentally. The hero, or picauro, who may be thought of as an anti-hero need not be a man; it may be a woman or an animal.

Picaresque elements are found in the Setvricon of Petronius, in the Metamorphoses of Apuleius, in the mediaeval fabliaux and animal epics, and in the work of François Villon. It was not established as a genre, however, until the publication of the anonymous La vida de Lazarillo de Tormes (1554), which was one of the most widely read books of the century. The next picaresque novel was Guzmán de Alfarache (1599-1605) by Mateo Alemán. Cervantes took up the manner with the stories El Coloquio de los perros and Rincone y Cortadillo in his Novelas ejemplares, and elements of the picaresque are to be found in Don Quixote. Historia de la vida del Buscón (1626) by Francisco de Quevedo is a further example of the genre.

The picaresque novel in Spain declined after the mid-17th century; the last of the Spanish series is usually given as Periáguilo el de las gallineras (1669). Early in the 18th century the picauro appeared in France, notably in Lesage's Gil Blas which was highly popular. Initially the genre was so firmly established as Spanish that the French writers gave their novels Spanish settings and their characters Spanish names, but inevitably the form underwent many modifications. By the time the English picked it up, in the 18th century, the picauro's criminality was often mere pranksiness; he was crafty and lived by his wits, and although hard-hearted, he was often lovable and essentially good. Outstanding examples of the English picaresque novel of the 18th century are Defoe's Moll Flanders and the novels of Smollett, notably The Adventures of Roderick Random and The Adventures of Peregrine Pickle; the middle section of Fielding's Tom Jones may also be Pablo Picasso, painter and sculptor, was probably the most influential and certainly the most famous artist of the 20th century. Born in Malaga, the son of a Basque drawing teacher, he learned the rudiments of his art from his father, and then studied in Barcelona and Madrid. In 1901 he held his first exhibition in Paris, having visited there for the first time a year previously, and in 1904 he settled permanently in the French capital. During the next decade, Paris was to witness the greatest art revolution in its history; the impressionists who had been accepted, if not approved of, and the search for a truly modern form of 20th-century art was in the hands of the post-impressionists.

Picasso's early work gives no hint of the break that he was shortly to make with tradition. Strictly representational in content, it is generally divided into a so-called blue period (1901-1904) and rose period (1904-1906)—the terms being derived from the basic tonality of color used at each time—and in both periods it reflects the influence of such French artists as Manet, Degas, and Toulouse-Lautrec and of the great Spanish masters. Then, in 1907, Picasso produced Les Demoiselles d'Avignon, his famous and influential canvas, which inspired by primitive African sculpture directly foreshadowed cubism, and from that moment on he was in the forefront of modern art.

A figure of protean diversity, Picasso has participated in most of the artistic styles and movements of the 20th century. Gradually moving away from cubism, after 1917 he began to explore the possibilities of neoclassicism. He returned to a modified form of cubism; then, in the middle 1920's, his work gradually became surrealist in style and content. In recent years he has seemed concerned with creating works of pure fantasy. Picasso has also constantly sought to extend the range of the artist's resources; in 1912, while experimenting with cubism, he evolved the new medium of collage. Extraordinarily prolific, he has done distinguished work in sculpture and in nearly every form of the graphic arts, as well as in such allied fields as ceramics, mosaics, and stage design. Among his most famous paintings are Guernica, The Three Musicians, and The Guitarist.

Piccadilly. A well-known London thoroughfare. It is named for Piccadilly Hall, a house that stood near the corner of Sackville Street in the early 17th century.

Pico or Piccini, Niccolò (1728-1800). Italian opera composer. He is remembered principally for a feud (1774-1780) between his followers (Picciniti), and the admirers of C. W. Gluck (Gluckists).

Pichette, Henri (1824-1886). French poet and dramatist. The avant-garde drama Nuècle (1952) presents his nightmare vision of hate and war, and his demanding dream of love and peace. His poetry includes A-poèmes (1947), Dents de lait, dents de loup (1959), and Odes à chacun (1961).
Piers Plowman. This psychological study of two brothers shares in the concentrated force of Maupassant's short stories.

Pierre Nozière. See Anatole France.

Pierre, or The Ambiguités (1852). A novel by Herman Melville. Pierre Glendinning, a young writer, leaves his ancestral home and rejects his mother and his fiancée, Lucy Tartan, in an effort to protect the interests of Isabel, a beautiful woman who has convinced him that she is his illegitimate sister. They move to New York, where Pierre's recognition of incestuous desires transforms him from an innocent to a stormy youth. Drowned and still in poverty, and struggling to write, he eventually commits suicide in prison. In pursuit of truth, he has caused the deaths of his mother, Isabel, and Lucy.

Pierrot (Fr., "Little Peter"). A favorite character of the old Italian drama and of pantomime, a sort of clown lover. Pierrot is traditionally played by a tall, thin young man with his face and hair covered with white powder or flour. He wears a white gown with very long sleeves and a row of big buttons down the front. Pierrot is the lover of Pierrette, or sometimes of Columbine. From the simple figure of the early pantomime, poets and artists have gradually evolved another, more romantic Pierrot, an artist-lover of soaring imagination who grimly hides his real passions behind a comic mask. Among many others, the French Gaspard Deburau, Charles Baude laire, Jules Laforgue, and Theophile Gautier, the English Ernest Dowson, and the Canadian Bliss Carman have written of this new Pierrot. Ernest Dowson's romantic fantasy, The Pierrots of the Minute, is the best known of several short plays on the subject. An interesting collection of poems on Pierrot (as well as Pierrette, Columbine, Harlequin, and others of the pantomime characters) is given in Mon Ami Pierrot, Songs and Fantaisie, compiled by Kendall Banning.

Piers Plowman. Full title: The Vision of William Concerning Piers Plowman (c. 1362–c. 1387). Middle English poem usually attributed in whole or in part to a hypothetical William Langland or Lang ley (c. 1332–c. 1400). Actually, there are three different versions of the poem (c. 1362, 1357–1359; c. 1377, 13514; c. 1387 or 1393, 1353 lines), by at least two and perhaps even five different writers. Although contemporary with Chaucer's work, it is written in alliterative verse like old English poetry and uses a deliberately rustic or archaic dialect.

It is an allegorical moral and social satire, written as a "vision" of the common medieval type. The poet falls asleep in the Malvern Hills and dreams that in a wilderness he comes upon the tower of Truth (God) set on a hill with theunge net Welt (the Devil) in the deep valley below, and a "fair field full of folk" (the world of living men) between them. He describes satirically all the different classes of people he sees there; then a lady named Holy Church rebukes him for sleeping and explains the meaning of all he sees. Further characters representing abstract personifications (Conscience, Law, Reason, etc.) enter the action; Conscience finally persuades many of the people to turn away from the Seven Deadly Sins and go in search of St. Truth, but they need a guide. Piers (Peter), a simple Plowman, appears and says that because of his common sense and clear conscience he knows the way and will show them if they help him plow his half-acre. Some of the company help, but some shirk; and Piers becomes identified with Christ, trying to get men to work toward their own spiritual salvation, as well as toward their own material relief from the current abuses of worldly power. In the last section of the poem, much less coherent, the dreamer goes on a rambling but unsuccessful summer-long quest, aided by Thought, Wit, and Study, in search of the men who are Do-Well, Do-Bet, and Do-Best.

pietism. The name given to a vague and widespread Protestant movement in 18th-century Germany, which stressed emotional piety and the pure Christian life, as opposed to rationalism and outward formalization in religion. The principal Pietistic sect was the Moravian Brethren.

Pietro d'Abano. See Pietro d'Abano.

Pierre de Mandiargues, André (1909– ). French poet. His prose poems, such as Soleil de Loups (1951), Le Lis de Mer (1956), and Feu de braise (1959), often resemble short stories.

pig in a poke. A blind bargain. The French phrase is acheter chat en poche ("to buy a cat in a pocket"). The reference is to a common trick in days gone by of trying to palm off on a greenhorn a cat for a suckling pig. If he opened the sack he "let the cat out of the bag," and the trick was disclosed.

Pigwiggen. A fairy knight in Drayton's Nymphidia, in love with Queen Mab. He combats the jealous Oberon with great fury.

Pilate, Pontius. A Roman procurator (governor) of Judaea in the first half of the 1st century, before whom Jesus was tried. Failing to persuade the mob of Christ's innocence, he yielded, washing his hands before them and condemning Jesus with the words, "Take ye him, and crucify him: for I find no fault in him" (John 19:6). Tradition has it that Pontius Pilate's later life was so full of misfortune that, during Caligula's time, he committed suicide in Rome. His body was cast into the Tiber, but it is said that because evil spirits disturbed the water, it had to be retrieved and taken to Vienna; there, it was thrown into the Rhone, eventually coming to rest in the recesses of a lake on Mount Pilatus opposite Lucerne. Another legend states that the suicide occurred so that he might escape the sentence of death passed on him by Tiberius because of his having ordered the crucifixion of Christ; and yet another, that both he and his wife became penitent, embraced Christianity, and died peaceably in the Faith.

Tradition gives the name Claudia Procula, or Procla, to Pilate's wife, and by some she has been identified with the Claudia of II Tim. 4:21.

Pilate's voice. A loud, ranting voice. In the old Mystery plays, all tyrants were made to speak in a rough, ranting manner.

Anatole France wrote a short story about Pilate's later life called The Procurator of Judaea (1892).

Pilgrimage. A series of 9 novels by Dorothy Richardson. Using the stream-of-consciousness technique, the novels in the series are: Pointed Roofs (1915), Backwater (1916), Honeycomb (1917), The Tunnel (1919), Interim (1919), Deadlock (1921), Revolving Lights (1923), The Trap (1923), Oberland (1927), Dawn's Left Hand (1931), Clear Horizon (1935), and Dimple Hill (1938).

Pilgrims. The name given to the English Puritans who sailed to America on the Mayflower, and by extension to any early Puritan settlers of New England. The Mayflower Pilgrims, unlike the other Puritans of Massachusetts, were Separatists, in that they sought complete independence from the Established Church of England. Originally from Scrooby, England, they first emigrated to the Netherlands (c. 1606), where they could worship freely. More than half of this group sailed to America on the Mayflower.

Pilgrim's Progress from This World to That Which Is to Come, The (Part I, 1678; Part II, 1684). A prose allegory by John Bunyan. The author purports to have a dream in which he sees Christian, who is weeping and wondering what to do to avoid the destruction of himself, his family, and his town that is prophesied in the Bible. Evangelist comes, warns Christian to flee, and tells him to journey to the Wicket-gate beneath the shining light in the distance. Closing his ears to the entreaties of his family and neighbors to remain, Christian flees the City of Destruction and sets out for the Celestial City beyond the Wicket-gate. He wanders into the Slough of Despond, from which he cannot get out because of the weight of the burden of sin on his back, until at last he is rescued by Help. He meets Mr. Worldly-Wiseman, who urges him to give up his dangerous journey, have his weighty burden removed by Mr. Legality, and settle down in the comfortable village of Morality nearby; Christian is ready to follow Mr. Worldly-Wiseman's counsel, but is rescued by Evangelist, who warns him against being led astray again. At the Wicket-gate, Christian is let in by Mr. Good-will and shown the straight and narrow way that leads to the Celestial City. He comes to the Cross, and his burden of sin falls from his back and rolls into the Holy Sepulchre nearby. Soon he comes upon three men, fettered and asleep, called Simple, Sloth, and Presumption; they give no heed to his warnings to awake and seek the Celestial City. Then he comes upon Hypocrisy and Formalist, climbing over the Wall to get on the narrow way; Christian warns them that they may be counted as thieves and trespassers because they have not come through the Wicket-gate. They go on together until they come to the Hill Difficulty; Christian takes the narrow road over the steep hill, while his two companions take the easier paths, called Danger and Destruction, around it. At the top of the Hill he meets Timorous and Mistrust, who turn back because they fear greater difficulties ahead. He rests at the House Beautiful, where he talks with the damsels Discretion, Prudence, Piety, and Charity. They show him the Delectable Mountains ahead, and send him on his way armed against attackers. He goes down into the Valley of Humiliation, where he meets the fiend Apollyon; they fight for more than half a day before Christian, himself wounded, vanquishes the enemy. He then must pass through the Valley of the Shadow of Death, which is full of Hobgoblins, Satyrs, and Dragons of the Pit. He meets a pilgrim named Faithful, and they describe their journeys to one another. Evangelist appears and predicts the troubles they will encounter in the town of Vanity, where a year-round fair sells all the empty things of the world. At Vanity Fair the two pilgrims lose a great hubbub by their refusal to buy anything and are arrested. Faithful is tried and sentenced to be burned at the stake, after which a heavenly Chariot carries him off into the clouds. Christian escapes and is joined by Hopeful, who had been converted by the example of Faithful. They come to the plain of Ease and beyond it the Hill of Lucr, where they are tempted to dally with a free silver mine. Soon they come to a pleasant river, which runs alongside the narrow way for a while, but before long the path goes away from the River and becomes rough, and Christian leads Hopeful into a more pleasant path nearby. Night falls and they become lost, and in the morning they are near the Doubting Castle, where they are caught by the Giant Despair. He locks them in a dungeon and beats them, until finally Christian remembers that he has a key called Promise which will unlock the door. They go back to the narrow way, which soon leads them to the Delectable Mountains, where they talk with the shepherds called Knowledge, Experience, Watchful, and Sincere. Going on, they enter the Enchanted Ground, on which they have been warned not to sleep, and they converse to stay off drowsiness. At length, they come to the country of Beulah, which is within sight of the Celestial City. Two angels tell them that to get to the City they must cross the River of Death; in the water Christian is afraid, but he is encouraged by Hopeful. On the other side they are met by angels who lead them to the gate of heaven.

The Pilgrim's Progress, with its vivid characterization, direct and colorful style, and beauty of language, has been one of the most widely read books in the English language. Because of its immense popularity Bunyan was encouraged to write a second part which, unfortunately, has not the power of the original book. Part II deals with the pilgrimage to the Celestial City of Christian's wife, Christiana; accompanying her are their children, Mercy, a neighbor, and Mr. Great-heart, who is given them for a guide.

Pillars of Hercules. Two opposite promontories at the entrance of the Mediterranean, one in Spain and the other in Africa. The tale is that they were bound together till Hercules tore them asunder in order to get to Gades (Cadiz). The ancients called them Calpe and Abyla; we call them Gibraltar and Mount Hacho.

I will follow you even to the pillars of Hercules. To the end of the world. The ancients supposed that these rocks marked the utmost limits of the habitable globe.

Pilnyak, Boris. Pen name of Boris Andreyevich Vogau (1894–1937). Russian novelist. One of the outstanding practitioners of the rich, ornamental prose style popular with Soviet writers in the 1920's, he was a victim of the purges in the 1930's. His first novel, Goby God (Naked Year; 1922), is an account of the revolution. Krasnoye derevo (Mahogany; 1929) depicted the period of the New Economic Policy (NEP) in 1921–1928, when a return to a limited form of capitalism was allowed in the Soviet Union. Pilnyak was reprimanded when Krasnoye derevo was published abroad before being approved by the Soviet authorities. He revised the work and included part of it in a longer novel, Volga vpadayet v kaspiiskoe more (The Volga Flows to the Caspian Sea; 1931), which dealt with the first Five Year Plan. Pilnyak was arrested in 1937 and sent to a labor camp. His subsequent fate is unknown.

Pilot, The (1823). A novel by James Fenimore Cooper. The first of Cooper's sea stories, the novel was written to prove that he could do better than Scott. The central character is Mr. Gray, modeled on John Paul Jones. The most fully drawn character in the book, however, is Long Tom Coffin, a nautical version of Natty Bumppo. The book, valued for its exciting portrayal of life and combat at sea, has maintained its popularity.

Piltdown man. An alleged extinct manlike primate. It was reconstructed from the remains of two skulls found early in the 20th century at Piltdown, near Lewes, in Sussex, England. It was exposed as a hoax in 1953. The skull was proved modern, and the jawbone an ape's.

Pinabello. In the Orlando Furioso of Lodovico Ariosto, a treacherous nephew of Gano of Maganza. He hurls the warrior maiden Bradamante from a cliff, but she survives and later kills him.
Pinafore, H.M.S., also known as The Lass That Loved a Sailor (1878). A comic opera by Gilbert and Sullivan. The plot hinges on the fact that Josephine, the daughter of the Captain of H.M.S. Pinafore, refuses the advances of the all-important Sir Joseph Porter because she loves a "common sailor" named Ralph Rackstraw. Finally Little Buttercup, the bumboat woman, confesses to having exchanged the two babies, Ralph Rackstraw and the Captain, as nurse long years before.

Pinch. In Shakespeare's Comedy of Errors, a schoolmaster and conjurer who tries to exorcise the supposedly insane Antipholus of Ephesus.

Pincherle, Alberto. See Alberto Moravia.

Pincher Martin (1956; in the U.S., The Two Deaths of Christopher Martin). A novel by William Golding about a shipwrecked man and his struggle to keep alive with a rock. He remembers his selfish past life with the "eat or be eaten" principles, and in his dying delirium imagines he is eaten himself (perhaps, ironically, by God). In a surprise ending Golding shows that his hero actually died in the wreck, so that the rock has been either a dream or a kind of purgatory. The name Pincher is from the slang "pinch," to steal.

Pinckney, Charles Cotesworth (1746-1825). American statesman. He was a member of the Constitutional Convention and was one of the three Americans involved in the XYZ Affair. When the French agents attempted to obtain bribes from him, he replied: "No! No! Not a sixpence!" Because of this reply, the slogan "Millions for defence, but not one cent for tribute" has been erroneously ascribed to him. In 1804 and 1808 he was the unsuccessful Federalist candidate for the presidency.

Pindar (Pindaros) (522 or 518-432 or 438 B.C.). Greek poet also known as the Dircean Swan. He was born near Thessaly, and his works, about one fourth of which survive, are mainly Epinicia composed on commission to celebrate famous victors at the Olympic, Pythian, Nemean, or Isthmian games. They were mainly intended to be sung by a chorus at some later celebration in honor of the victor, rather than immediately. Pindar was immensely admired both in his own day and in centuries to come.

His works combine gravity of manner with strikingly bold images. The onrushing best of his verse has been compared to that of Kipling. Pindar was aristocratic in his sympathies and conservative in both politics and religion. He refused, for example, to credit the famous story of Tantalus feeding his son Pelops to the gods, for he could not believe that the gods would be cannibals. Since Pindar's Epinica are generally concerned with mythical subjects, reserving praise of the moral victor for the end of the ode, his works are a fine source of legend. According to tradition, he was criticised by Corinna, a popular poet, for having failed to use myth in his first poem. In his next he used it so extravagantly that she warned him to "sow with the hand, not with the sack."

Pindar Peter. See John Wolcot.

Pinarius. In Shakespeare's Julius Caesar, a slave of Cassius, who had taken him prisoner in Parthia. He discharges Cassius' last command to kill him and flees from the battlefield.

Pinero, Sir Arthur Wing (1855-1934). English dramatist, actor, and essayist. He is chiefly remembered for his dramas dealing with social problems. He acted (1874-1881, 1885) both modern and Shakespearean roles. His plays include The Magistrate (1885), The Schoolmistress (1886), Sweet Lavender (1888), The Prodigal (1889), The Second Mrs. Tanqueray, The Notorious Mrs. Ebbsmith (1890), Trelawney of the Wells, The Gay Lord Quex (1899), Iris (1903), The Thunderbolt (1908), and Mid-Channel (1909). As a critic he wrote Browning as a Dramatist (1912) and Robert Louis Stevenson as a Dramatist (1914).

Pingen, Robert (1920- ). French novelist and dramatist of the New Wave. Pingen creates his absurd situations and farcical characters with reckless gaiety. His heroes, who resemble the tragicomic clowns of Samuel Beckett, are put through quick paces and given a colorful poetic jargon to speak. Among his works are Entre Fontaine et Agapa (1950), Malou ou le Matériau (1952), Baga (1956), Graal Flibuste (1957), and Le Fiston (1959).

Pin money. A lady's allowance of money for her own personal expenditure. At one time pins were a great expense to a woman, and in 14th- and 15th-century wills there are often special bequests for the express purpose of buying pins.

Pinocchio, The Adventures of (Le Avventure di Pinocchio; 1883). A children's story written by Collodi, the pen name of Carlo Lorenzini (1826-1890), a native of Florence, Italy. The hero of the tale is Pinocchio, a puppet come-to-life, whose many escapades serve to teach him (and his young readers) to distinguish right from wrong. Unique is the puppet's nose which grows larger when he tells a lie and returns to normal size when he tells the truth. Walt Disney produced a full-length animated cartoon of the story (1943).

Pinter, Harold (1930- ). English playwright. He is one of a number of young playwrights in England and America who have begun their careers writing for television. Pinter's plays are characterized by repetitive dialogue with an emphasis on the non sequiturs of conversation. His works include The Birthday Party (1958), A Slight Ache (television 1959), The Dwarf (television 1960), The Room (1960), The Dumbwaiter, The Caretaker (1960), and The Collection.

Pinturicchio or Pintoricchio, il. Real name, Bernardino di Betto (c. 1454-1513). Italian painter from Perugia. Known as "the Little Painter" because of his small stature, he excelled in large-scale decoration. His narrative scenes are characterized by a superb arrangement of figures and a mastery of space composition and landscape. These qualities, found also in Perugino and other Umbrian painters, influenced the art of Raphael. Pinturicchio's best-known works include the series of scenes from the life of Parish II in the library of the Siena cathedral; the decoration of the Borgia apartments of the Vatican; and the wall fresco of the Sistine Chapel, The Circumcision of the Sons of Moses.

appearance in print as an older man, who has witnessed the coming of civilization to the wilderness. The story takes place in upper New York State, in the village of Templeton, founded by Judge Temple. The central conflict in the book concerns the opposition between the laws of nature, upheld by Natty, and the laws of civilization. Symbolic of this opposition are two incidents; in the first, Natty kills a deer for food, in Indian fashion. The white settlement seeks to punish him for failing to respect the seasonal hunting laws it has established. On the other hand, there is the wholesale slaughter of pigeons by the civilized inhabitants of Templeton, with no purpose but sport. A second moral question involves the true ownership of Judge Temple's lands. The marriage of Elizabeth Temple and Edward Effingham, heir of the true owner, resolves the difficulty. Natty, like Huck Finn, heads for the far West to escape confining civilization. See Leatherstocking Tales, The.

Piovene, Guido (1907— ). Italian essayist, historian, and novelist. He is well known for his penetrating analysis of Italian and American cultural relations, De America (1953). An accomplished stylist, he produced his best novel in Letters of a Novice (Lettere di Una Novizia; 1941).

Pippa Passes (1841). A poetic drama by Robert Browning. Pippa is a poor child who works all year, except for one holiday on New Year's Day, in the silk mills at Asolo in Italy. The drama hinges on her chance appearance at "critical moments in the spiritual life-history of the leading characters in the play."

Pippa passes, singing some song, and her voice and words alter the destinies of the men and women who overhear her. Her own life is altered by her final song. Her famous first song, which ends, while often quoted as revealing naive optimism on Browning's part, is actually mainly an expression of Pippa's innocent and trusting character.

Pirandello, Luigi (1867–1936). Italian dramatist and novelist. He is known for his symbolic and psychological dramas and satires, which aroused much controversy because of their alleged obscenity during the 1920's. Six Characters in Search of an Author is his most celebrated play. Others are The Living Mask (Enrico IV; 1922), So It Is, If It Seems So (Così E' Se Vi Pare; 1916), As You Desire Me (Come Tu Mi Vuoi; 1931), Tonight We Improvise (Questa Sera Si Recita a Soggetto; 1932), and Tutto Per Bene (1937). His nontheatrical works include Il Fu Mattia Pascal (The Late Mattia Pascal; 1904), The Outcast (L'Eclusa; 1893), and One, None, and a Hundred Thousand (Uno, Nessuno, e Centomila; 1926), and the vast repertoire of short stories entitled Novelle Per Un Anno (1922–1936).

In both his dramas and his fiction Pirandello explored the many faces of reality. His characters are invariably confronted with the "problems" of several "truths" or "realities," depending upon the individual's way of interpreting what seems to him to be real and true. The relentless pessimism that pervades his work was best articulated by a character in the short story La Veglia (The Deathwatch): "I'm not suffering on my account, or on your account. I'm suffering because life is what it is."

Pirandello spent most of his early career as a professor of literature in an Italian girls' school. After his success as a writer for the stage, he founded his own theater in Rome and took his own acting company on tours with his plays throughout Europe. He was awarded the Nobel Prize for literature in 1934.

Pirates of Penzance, The (1878). A comic opera by Gilbert and Sullivan. It concerns the capers of a band of pirates, a bevy of girls, and a Major General.

Pirene, Henri (1862–1935). Belgian historian. Pirene's most famous work is his Histoire de Belgique (1900–1932), a seven-volume study. He is noted for the new emphasis he placed on economic, social, and religious factors in determining the course of history.

Pirithous (Perithoüs). King of the Lapiths in Thessaly, and friend of Theseus. He was the husband of Hippodamia, at whose wedding feast the Centaurs offered violence to the bride, thus causing a great battle.

Piron, Alexis (1689–1773). French poet, epigrammatist, satirist, and dramatist. His best-known comedy in verse is La Métromanie (1738), a satire on poets and poetasters. His vicious tongue and delectable gift for repartee made even the great Voltaire flinch.

Pisan Cantos, The (1948). Ten sections of the Cantos of Ezra Pound. Written while the poet was imprisoned in a U.S. army stockade in Italy as a result of his radio broadcasts for the Italian Fascists, The Pisan Cantos reflect this experience. Pound turns back to the essential things, to nature, to regain his lost emotional and spiritual balance. He frequently refers to his fellow prisoners, army guards, and the physical surroundings at Pisa. One of the most intense literary controversies of the 20th century was initiated when Pound, accused of treason, was awarded the Bollingen Prize in 1948.

Pisanello, II. Real name Antonio Pisano (c. 1395–1455). Italian painter and sculptor. He is noted for his easel paintings and his cast medallions, done in a style that embodies the transition between Gothic and Renaissance. The best known of the medallions are those of the Visconti and Gonzaga families; his paintings include the famous Vision of St. Eustace and St. George and the Princess of Trebizond, which reveal his skill in rendering animals with incompa- rable realism.

Pisanello. In Shakespeare's Cymbeline, the kindly servant of Posthumus Leonatus. Ordered to murder his master's wife Imogen, he allows her to escape and sends a bloody napkin to Posthumus as proof of the murder.

Pisano, Andrea (c. 1305–1349). Italian sculptor. He is noted for the reliefs he carved with Giotto on the campanile, or bell tower, of the Florence cathedral, and for the first of the famous series of three bronze doors in the baptistery of the same city. The other two doors were done by Ghiberti.
Pisano, Nicolò (c. 1220–c. 1278) and his son Giovanni (c. 1250–1320). Italian sculptors from Pisa. Working individually, the Pisani contributed many statues and reliefs to the leading churches of Pisa, Siena, and Pistoia. The style of Giovanni, though more Gothic and less inclined to imitate the antique than that of his father, attracted and influenced the youthful Michelangelo.

Pisarev, Dmitri Ivanovich (1840–1868). Russian radical journalist. Although born a member of the gentry class, Pisarev became a leading spokesman for the young nihilists of the 1860's. Most of the articles that established Pisarev's reputation were written while he was in prison, from 1862 to 1866, for publishing illegal pamphlets. Pisarev's ideas on literature and art were even more extreme than those of the radical critics Chernyshevski and Dobrolyubov. While these two men saw art as a worthy pursuit when it served a social purpose, Pisarev tended to deny any value at all to art. He attacked Pushkin's work as a waste of time and once claimed that a pair of boots was more important than a play by Shakespeare. Elements of the nihilist ideology remained in radical thinking, but the force of the movement began to lessen after Pisarev's accidental death by drowning in 1868.

Pisemski, Alexei Feofilaktovich (1820–1881). Russian novelist, dramatist, and short-story writer. The son of an impoverished nobleman, Pisemski spent his early life in the provinces. There he acquired the intimate knowledge of provincial life and of peasant character that became a prominent feature of his literary works. His interest in literature began early, and he was already writing stories before he finished secondary school. After graduation from Moscow University, he entered government service and remained a civil servant for most of his life. Pisemski's first published work was the short novel Tyufyak (The Muff, 1850), a soberly realistic study of a family tragedy. The combination of an objective narrative manner and a pessimistic attitude toward his subjects and toward life marked most of Pisemski's writings. His best-known works are Ocherki iz krestyanskogo byta (Sketches from Peasant Life, 1856), a collection of short stories; the novel A Thousand Souls; and the drama A Hard Lot.

Pisgah. In the Bible, the mountain in Moab, northeast of the Dead Sea, from which Moses, unable to enter Canaan, was allowed to view the Promised Land (Deut. 34:1). Mount Nebo was one of its summits.

Browning uses Pisgah-Sights (1876) as the title of a poem about a man viewing his whole life while in the throes of death.

Pisistratus (Pheidistratos, 612–527 B.C.). The greatest of the Tyrants of Athens. Although he respected and, for the most part, retained the constitution of his predecessor Solon, he made himself tyrant in 560 B.C. and, except for brief periods of exile, held that position for the rest of his life. His reign was characterized by stability, prosperity, and cultural advancement. He either instituted or significantly altered the festival called the Greater Panathenaia, at which he introduced contests of bards. Tradition says that he arranged for the editing of the works of Homer, which had many variant forms. Dramatic contests were added to the festival of Dionysia, and it may have been at this time that Thespis' plays were performed.

Piso's conspiracy (a.d. 65). A plot against the life of the tyrannical emperor Nero instigated by C. Calpurnius Piso. When the plot was discovered, Piso committed suicide. Many distinguished persons involved in the conspiracy, including Lucan and Seneca, were ordered to commit suicide and took their own lives.

Pissarro, Camille (1830–1903). French impressionist painter. Intended by his family for a career in business, Pissarro finally convinced his father of his absorbing interest in painting and went to Paris to study in 1855. He exhibited at the Salon des Refusés (1863) and remained loyal to the unpopular impressionist movement despite great personal hardship. His home at Louveciennes and all his paintings were destroyed by the Germans in 1871, while he was in London. Recognition did not come to Pissarro until he was nearly 60 years old. His early admiration for the delicate, dappled landscapes of Corot is reflected in his own work—Le Verger (the orchard) and Le Bûcheron (the woodcutter), for example. Never extreme or daring in technique, fine, small strokes and subtle tonal shading characterize his landscapes.

Pistol. A cowardly braggart, in the tradition of the capitanu of the commedia dell'arte, whose bombastic words are filled with quotations from old plays. He appears in Shakespeare's Henry IV; Part II and The Merry Wives of Windsor as Sir John Falstaff's ensign. He is promoted to lieutenant in Henry V. His wife is Mistress Nell Gwyn.

Pit, The (1903). A novel by Frank Norris. The second part of the unfinished trilogy Epic of the Wheat, of which Tint Octovus was the first, this posthumously published novel is composed of three elements: the adventures of Curtis Jadwin, who attempts to corner the Chicago wheat market in "the pit" of the stock exchange; the love story of Jadwin's wife Laura; and the story of the wheat itself, the life force which Norris intended as the great central theme of the trilogy.

Pit and the Pendulum, The (1842). A story by Edgar Allan Poe. The narrator, a victim of the Spanish Inquisition, is condemned to death by torture. He narrowly escapes death by falling into the pit, as he moves around his dark cell. Bound to a board, a pendulum swings a knife across his body. He escapes by enticing the prison rats to gnaw through his ropes. Then the walls of his cell become molten; as they close in around him, he is forced to the edge of the pit. Painting, about to fall, he is rescued by the successful opposing army.

Pitcairn Island. A Polynesian island. It was colonized by refugee mutineers from the H.M.S. Bounty (see MUTINY ON THE BOUNTY), who were the ancestors of its present natives. It was named after the British midshipman Robert Pitcairn (1747–1807) who first sighted the island (July 2, 1767) from H.M.S. Swallow.

Pitcher, Molly. See Mary McCayley.

Pitoeff, Georges (1886–1939). Russian-born French actor, director, and producer. In 1919 Pitoeff came to Paris with his Compagnie Pitoeff and produced Henri Lenormand's play Le Temps est un songe. In 1934 he and his actress wife established their company at the theater Les Mathurins. A stark simplicity in stage settings and subtle lighting effects placed the emphasis on the inner struggles of the characters. Pitoeff produced plays by modern Russian and French dramatists, with the works of Shaw, O'Neill, and Pirandello.

Pitt, William. 1st earl of Chatham. Called the Elder Pitt (1709–1778). English statesman and orator; “the Great Commoner.” He entered Parliament in 1733 as a Whig and was made paymaster-general under the duke of Newcastle. When Newcastle resigned (1756), George II asked Pitt to form a new government, but Pitt was unsuccessful. When Newcastle returned (1757) and Pitt was made secretary of state, success was achieved; Newcastle kept Parliament in line and Pitt vigorously pursued the Seven Years’ War. Pitt resigned in 1761, returned as head of government in 1766, but resigned (1768) because of ill health. Pitt recognized the foolishness of George III’s policies toward the American colonies, and while he did not wish to grant them their independence, tried to use his influence on their behalf.

Pitt, William. Called the Younger Pitt (1759–1806). English statesman, second son of William Pitt, 1st earl of Chatham, and considered by many to have been the greatest of England’s prime ministers. He entered Parliament in 1780; by 1782 he was chancellor of the exchequer, and leader of the House of Commons. In 1783 he became prime minister and remained in office until 1801, one of the longest ministries in English history. During this period he effected major reforms in financing the public debt, in customs duties, and in the administration of India, which he took out of the hands of the East India Company. He resigned in 1801, resumed office in 1804, and retired in 1806, just two weeks before his death.

Pitter, Ruth (1897– ). English poet. She is the author of delicate lyrics on nature, love, and religious themes. Her books include A Mad Lady’s Garland (1934) and Urania (1951).

Pitti Palace. A palace in Florence, Italy, completed in the 16th century by Cosimo de’ Medici. It is now one of the world’s outstanding art galleries.

Pius II. Real name, Enea Silvio de Piccolomini. Known as Aeneas Silvius (1405–1464). Pope (1458–1464), Sienese scholar and man of letters. He first came to prominence at the Council of Basel, which sent him on a mission to England and the Scottish court of James I. Later he took up secretarial duties at the court of Emperor Frederick III, where he produced several literary works, the most popular being his long novella, Historia de duobus amantibus (The History of Two Lovers). It was translated from the original Latin into Italian, French, German, and English. In 1458, he was elected to the papacy as Pius II; in referring to his former support of councils as superior to the popes in authority, he made the famous remark, “Hold to Pius, spit out Aeneas!” His series of Commentaries (Commentarii), on his life and times, are among the best and most valuable writings of the early Renaissance. The painter Pinturicchio recorded his visage and activities in several frescoes on the walls of the library of the cathedral of Siena.

pixie or pixy. A mischievous sprite or fairy. Pixies are especially prevalent in the folklore of Cornwall and Devon, where some hold them to be the spirits of infants who have died before baptism. The pixy monarch has his court like Oberon, and sends his subjects on their several tasks. The word is probably Celtic in origin, but its actual history is unknown.

Pizarro, Francisco (1470?–1541). Spanish conqueror of Peru. The illegitimate son of a Spanish army officer, Pizarro was a swineherd before he left for America, where he settled in Panama. In 1522 he formed a pact for the conquest of Peru with Diego de Almagro and Fernando de Luque, a priest. After two unsuccessful expeditions, Pizarro won the support of Charles V, who named him governor and captain-general of Peru while Almagro was relegated to a secondary position. In 1531 Pizarro left for Peru, leaving Almagro in Panama to recruit additional men. Reaching the city of Cajamarca, Pizarro and his men seized ATAHUALPA, the Inca emperor, and slew a large number of Indians. Although Atahualpa complied with Pizarro’s demand that he produce a huge ransom, he was later executed. By 1535, when Pizarro founded Lima, the Inca empire had been vanquished; however, he now had to contend with Almagro, who claimed the city of El Cuzco for himself. Almagro was defeated and killed at the battle of Las Salinas (1538), but partisans of his assassinated Pizarro in Lima three years later.

Placebo (Lat., “I shall please,” or “be acceptable”). The Vespers of the Dead, so called because this is the first word of the first antiphon of the service: Placebo Domino in regione vivorum (“I shall please the Lord in the land of the living”; Ps. cxvi, 9). In the Middle Ages, those who wished to get something out of the relatives of the deceased made a point of attending the service, so that the phrase “to sing Placebo” came to mean “to play the flatterer or sycophant.” Chaucer, who in the Merchant’s Tale gives this as a name to a parasite, has:

Flatterers been the deviles chapellyns that singen evere Placebo.—Parson’s Tale

place in the sun. A favorable position affording room for development, a share in what one believes one has a natural right to have. The phrase was popularized by Wilhelm II of Germany during the crisis of 1911. In his speech at Hamburg (Aug. 27), he spoke of the German nation taking steps that would make “sure that no one can dispute with us the place in the sun that is our due.”

The phrase had been used by Pascal some 200 years earlier.

Plague, The (La Peste; 1947). A novel by Albert CAMUS. The Algerian port of Oran is overwhelmed by an epidemic of bubonic plague, although modern medicine does its best to quarantine the city and isolate the stricken and the dead within. The emergency forces many to make character-revealing decisions; yet death plays no favorites, and life continues much the same after the calamity. The doctor Bernard Rieux represents those who, despite everything, simply do what they can for the cause of human life and hope for the possibility of occasional human joy.

Plaideurs, Les (The Litigants, 1668). A comedy by Jean Racine. The magistrate Dandin, driven mad by his mania for judging, is kept locked up.
by his son and hears cases from the attic and cellar windows, among them, those arising from neighborhood and household quarrels. The farcical highlight of the play is the trial of Dandin's own dog for eating a chicken. After an elaborate prosecution and defense, Dandin condemns the dog to death, but he commutes the sentence out of compassion for the pups. The play abounds in burlesques of the legal corruption and pomposity of Racine's day.

Plain Language From Truthful James (1870). A humorous poem by Bret Harte. Humorist Bill Nye and the mining camp character, "Truthful" James, attempt to get the better of a Chinese named Ah Sin in the card game, Euchre. Ah Sin is too good for them until they discover he has 24 Jacks up his sleeve. The poem has often been reprinted under the title The Heathen Chinee, and was unsuccessfully dramatized as Ah Sin by Harte and Mark Twain in 1877.

Planche, James Robinson (1796-1880). English dramatist and writer on heraldry and costumes. He is best remembered for his History of British Costumes (1834). He wrote, translated, and adapted over 150 burlesques, extravaganzas, and pantomimes.

Planck, Max [Karl Ernst Ludwig (1858-1947). German physicist whose introduction of the quantum theory greatly influenced modern physics. He received the Nobel Prize in 1918.

planets. The heavenly bodies that revolve around the sun in approximately circular orbits. They are so called because, to the ancients, they appeared to wander (Gr., planasthai, through Lat. and Offr., "to wander") among the stars, instead of having fixed places.

Only five of the planets were known to the ancients (the earth, of course, not being reckoned): Mercury, Venus, Mars, Jupiter, and Saturn; to these were added the sun and the moon, making seven in all. Among the astrologers and alchemists, the Sun (Apollo) represented gold, the Moon (Diana) represented silver, Mercury represented quicksilver, Venus represented copper, Mars represented iron, Jupiter represented tin, and Saturn represented lead. According to astrology, some planet, at the birth of every individual, presides over his destiny. Some of the planets, such as Jupiter, are lucky; others, such as Saturn, are unlucky.

Plantagenet (from O.Fr. planta genista "sprig of broom"). The surname, originally a nickname, of the Angevin line of English kings (1154-1399). As a family cognizance, it was first assumed by Geoffrey, count of Anjou (d. 1151), during a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, as a symbol of humility. By his wife Matilda, daughter of Henry I of England, he was father of Henry II, the first of the house of Plantagenet to occupy the throne.

Plato, August Graf von (1796-1835). German poet. His verse, though classicistic and highly form-conscious, often expresses a deep pessimism. His collected Gedichte (Poems, 1828, expanded 1834) include many sonnets and poems in Oriental forms. Heinrich Heine, in his Die Bäder von Lucca (The Baths of Lucca, 1830), uses Platen's homosexuality as the basis for a witty but vicious attack on him.

Platina [Bartolommeo Sacchi (1421-1481). Italian scholar, humanist, and academician. He is noted for his Vitae pontificum (Lives of the Popes).

Plato (Platon, c. 427-c. 348 B.C.). A Greek philosopher and prose writer. Born at Athens of a noble family, Plato aspired to political activity. Dismayed at the inequities of the Athenian tyranny, and later at the execution of his teacher Socrates under the democracy, he turned toward philosophy in search of an alternative to the unstable and unjust public life of the time. He also sought unity behind the changing impressions of the visible universe.

After Socrates' death, Plato went to Megara and possibly visited Egypt and Cyrene. During this decade the dialogues that emphasize the personality of Socrates are supposed to have been written. At the age of 40, Plato visited Sicily and Italy, and twice returned there later in life, hoping vainly to influence Dionysius II, tyrant of Syracuse, to establish a Platonic government. On his return to Athens Plato founded the Academy, at which discussion and research were stimulated in mathematical and astronomical fields, in practical legislation, in the art of definition, and in natural history.

All Plato's writing, except for the Apology and the Letters, are in the dialogue form. Of the 35 dialogues, 29 are considered genuine. In the earliest dialogues, Socrates is the principal figure. This group includes the Charmides, Crito, Euthyphro, Hippias Minor, Ion, Laches, and Lysis. The Apology records Socrates' defense at his trial. These dialogues are philosophically inconclusive, but are considered best to represent the historical Socrates. In a second group, Socrates is the spokesman for Plato's views or Plato's interpretation of Socrates. These include Alicibiades, Cratylus, Euthydemus, Gorgias, Menexenus, Meno, Parmenides, Phaedo, Phaedrus, Protagoras, Republic, Symposium, and Theaetetus. A third group of dialogues, written in Plato's later years, include Critias, Philebus, *Plato*us, Sophist, Timaeus, and Laws. The last was unpublished at Plato's death.

The dialogue, as Plato used it, is a literary form, not merely a vehicle for the expression of a philosophical system. Plato's philosophy emerges, not in a systematic or didactic way, but through the use of dramatic setting and myth. Therefore summary or paraphrase easily distorts Plato's thinking.

The core of his philosophy is the doctrine of ideas. Form and idea are used interchangeably to designate that which remains the same through all the manifestations of a material thing or a virtue. An idea for Plato, contrary to its common English usage, is something outside the mind. He posited a realm of truth or being in which the ideas reside, as distinct from the world of opinion, or Doxa. Through the soul, the mediator between the ideas and appearances, we may obtain knowledge.

Tradition has it that Plato was originally named Aristocles, and only later called Plato (broad) because of his wide forehead, his robust physique, the quality of his writing, or a variety of other explanations.

Platonic love. A popular term for spiritual comradeship or love between persons of opposite sexes; the friendship, usually of man and woman, without sexual implications. The phrase is founded on a misinterpretation of a passage toward the end of the Symposium in which Plato is extolling not the non-sexual love of a man for a woman, but the loving interest that Socrates took in young men—which was pure, and therefore noteworthy in ancient Greece of that period.

Plautus, Titus Maccius (254?-184 B.C.). The greatest comic playwright of Rome. Son of a peasant family, he worked as a stagehand in a traveling theatrical troupe. This job afforded him nothing but experience, and when the group disbanded, he was left penniless. He was obliged to return to Rome and work in a flour mill; here he found the time to compose his first verse comedies. He subsequently wrote and produced about 130 plays, of which 21 are still extant in more or less complete form. In them he Romанизed many of the plots and characters of New Greek Comedy (see Menander). Through his plays he introduced to the non-Greek world characters which have since become part of traditional Western European comedy, among them the braggart soldier (in his Miles Gloriosus) and the sly servant (in his Pseudolus). In his treatment of stock comic plots he displayed a mastery of language and meter, and a seemingly inexhaustible supply of wit—sometimes subtle, often humorously coarse. (See Tranio.)

Plautus' play the Menenchei was the source for Shakespeare's Comedy of Errors; and his comedy about the old miser and his pot of gold, the Aulalaria, supplied the model for Molière's L'Avare.

Playboy of the Western World, The (1907)
A play by John Millington Synge. Christie Mahon, a timid peasant boy, flees home, convinced that he has killed his father. His act is treated by the people to whom he flees as a piece of heroic audacity and the lioniization results in the transformation of his personality. The plot, however, is the mere backdrop for the most fertile and vigorous dialogue written for the stage since Shakespeare. The play, which contained some imagined insults to "Irish womanhood," met with a storm of protest, culminating in the "Playboy riots" that took place in Dublin in 1908 and later when it was produced in New York and Philadelphia.

Playfair, Sir Nigel (1874-1934). English actor and manager. He produced John Drinkwater's Abraham Lincoln (1919) and The Beggar's Opera by John Gay (1920).

plebicite. In Roman history, a law enacted by the comitia, or assembly of tribes. In modern political terminology, it is the direct vote of the whole body of citizens of a nation on a question phrased in definite terms.

Pléiade, la. A group, first known as the Brigade, of young 16th-century French poets. Led by Pierre de Ronsard, they boldly asserted themselves with the publication of Joachim Du Bellay's Défense et Illustration de la Langue Française. Condemning the poetry of the Rhétoriqueurs and of Clémens Marot, they sought to revitalize French literature through study and imitation of Greek and Roman writers. Later on they modified some of their principles, avoiding too servile an imitation of classical models, and by 1555 they were truly representative of French Renaissance poetry. The members of the Pléiade were Ronsard, Du Bellay, Jean Antoine de Baïs, Etienne Jodelle, Pontus de Tyard, Rémy Belleau, and Jean Dorat, their former teacher who had first revealed to the poets the treasures of classical literature.

Pleiades. The most prominent cluster of stars in the constellation Taurus. Especially, it includes the seven larger ones out of the great number that compose the cluster; so called by the Greeks, possibly from Gr. plein, "to sail" because they considered navigation safe at the return of the Pleiades, and never attempted it after those stars disappeared.

In Greek myth, the Pleiades were the seven dughters of Atlas and Pleione. They were transformed into stars, one of which is invisible and known as the lost Pleiad. Some say this star is Electra mourning over the destruction of the city and royal race of Troy. Others say it is Merope, ashamed to show herself because she married a mortal, Sisyphus.

Pletho, George Gemistus (1355-1452). Greek scholar. He came to Italy for the council held at Florence and Ferrara (1438-1439) to unify the Greek and Roman churches, and stayed to teach Platonism and Neoplatonism. Through the Florentine intellectual center stimulated by Cosimo de' Medici, he influenced the Revival of Learning and Italian Renaissance Humanism.

Pliny the Elder. Full Latin name, Caius Plinius Secundus (a.d. 23-79). Latin author. He is known for his Historia Naturalis (Natural History), which was regarded as a scientific source book during the Middle Ages. His zeal for scientific research led him to Pompeii, in a.d. 79, where he studied the eruptions of Mt. Vesuvius; here he died when the city was destroyed.

Pliny the Younger. Full Latin name, Caius Plinius Caecilius Secundus (a.d. 62-113). The nephew and adopted son of Pliny the Elder, he rose to a high and respected rank in imperial society.
His friends included Quintilian, Martial, Suetonius, Tacitus, and the emperor Trajan. His collected letters give a vivid account of the social, literary, and political life of his times.

Plomer, William (1903- ). South African novelist, short-story writer, poet, and traveler. Among his volumes of short stories are I Speak of Africa (1928) and Four Countries (1949). His novels Turrott Wolfe (1926) and Sado (1931) explore con-licts between different cultures. Museum Pieces (1952) is a satire on English society.

Pormnash, Thomas. In Charles Dickens' Little Dorrit, a plasterer whose trade renders him eternally lime-whitened. His young wife is somewhat slaternly and has been prematurely dragged by care and poverty into wrinkles.

Plotinus (Plotinos; c. 204-c. 270). A Greek philosopher of Neoplatonism. After studying in Alexandria with Ammonius Saccas, he settled in Rome. He persuaded his friend the Emperor Gal-lienus to build a city for philosophers, to be governed according to the laws of Plato. Plotinus' own philosophy had no political significance; he lived in a time of political chaos and mystery religions.
Porphyry, his biographer and student, relates that he refused to eat meat, and that he attained the state or mystical union with God four times while Porphyry knew him. The treatises, arranged into En-neads or groups of nine, were written during the last 17 years of Plotinus' life. He broke his vow of silence with regard to Ammonius’ doctrines only because other students were reporting them mistakenly. Plotinus is reported by Porphyry as ashamed of his bodily existence, and reticent about revealing biographical information.
Plowman, Piers

Plowman, Piers. See Pier PLOMAN.

Plumed Serpent, The (1926). A novel by D. H. Lawrence. It is a powerful, vivid evocation of Mexico and its ancient Aztec religion. Kate Leslie, an Irish visitor to Mexico, goes to a bullfight and is horrified by the vulgar cruelty of modern Mexico. But then she meets Don Ramón, a scholar and political leader, and General Cipriano, a military leader, and becomes involved in their resurrection of the ancient Mexican religion. For Lawrence, this religion is characterized by “blood consciousness,” emotional and symbolic depth, and sex awareness. It is marked by dominance of the male over the female and the political leader over the masses, a Nietzschean type of superman. Don Ramón, the sexual, political, and religious hero of the book, is regarded as the reincarnated Quetzalcoatl, the Plumed Serpent that the Aztecs used to worship. He rises to lead the people, drawing them away from “outworn” Christianity toward the Aztec religion. Eventually the cult spreads over the whole of Mexico and Kate, too, comes under its spell. She marries General Cipriano, who is regarded as Huitzilopochtli, god of war, and in spite of the rebelliousness of her European character, she passively submits to his male domination. The views Lawrence expresses in it are typical of his later period.

Pluralité des mondes, Entretiens sur la. See Bernard le Bovier de Fontenelle.

Plutarch (Plutarchos) (A.D. c. 46–c. 120). A Greek biographer. Except for some meager details—that he was born at Chaeronea, that he visited Rome and Athens, and possibly Alexandria, but spent most of his life in Chaeronea as a priest of the Delphic Apollo—nothing is known of his life. His biographical and philosophical writings show that he was one of the most erudite men of his age. His surviving works are confined to the Moralia, a book of essays on many subjects, and the famous Parallel Lives, arranged mainly in pairs in which a Greek and a Roman are contrasted. His subjects, who included Democles and Cicero, were statesmen or generals. In the process of writing about them, he described many important historical events with immense skill, if sometimes doubtful accuracy. His accounts are the livelier for the fact that he invents dialogue and describes the emotions of the personages involved. Shakespeare's Julius Caesar, Coriolanus, and Antony and Cleopatra are all based on Plutarch in the famous translation done by Thomas North in 1579. The Moralia is concerned with an amazing range of subjects including the education of children, advice on marriage, the oracles, the face in the moon, and the reasoning of animals.

Pluto. See HADES.

Plutus (Ploutos). In Greek mythology, the god of riches—originally the fertility of the earth. Hence the phrase rich as Plutus, and the term plutocrat, one who exercises influence or possesses power through his wealth. The legend is that he was blinded by Zeus so that his gifts should be equally distributed and not go only to those who merited them. Plutus was the name of Aristophanes’ last extant play.

Plymouth Rock. The ledge in the harbor of Plymouth, Mass., where the Mayflower Pilgrims landed (Dec. 21, 1620). They had previously landed at Provincetown, Mass., on Cape Cod.

Plyushkin. An incredibly miserly landowner in Nikolai Gogol's Dead Souls. After completing his business transactions with him, the hero Chichikov is almost subjected to the hospitality of the house: a year-old Easter cake that Plyushkin has been saving for a special occasion.

pnyx. See Old Comedy.

Pyrrhia. Athenian hill, approximately one quarter of a mile west of the Acropolis. The assembly held its meetings there in a large amphitheater with a capacity of 20,000 citizens. The hill was used for this purpose from the time of Cleisthenes (fl. 507 B.C.) until the end of the fourth century.

Pobedonostzev, Konstantin Petrovich (1827–1907). Russian jurist and government administrator. A firm believer in the principle of absolutism, he was a bulwark of political reaction under Czar Alexander III and Nicholas II. As Procurator of the Holy Synod, the highest lay office of the Orthodox Church, Pobedonostzev had immense influence, which he consistently used to uphold the old regime and to combat liberal tendencies in Russia.

Pociahontas (c. 1595–1617). Daughter of Powhatan, an Indian chief of Virginia. Her real name was Matoaka, Pocahontas being a pet name meaning “playful.” She is said to have rescued Captain John Smith when her father was about to kill him, although the authenticity of the event is still disputed. She later married John Rolfe (1585–1622), a Jamestown settler, bringing the colonists peace with the Indians for eight years. In 1616, baptized under the name of Rebecca, she was brought to England, presented at court as a princess, and became an object of curiosity and of frequent allusion in contemporary literature.

Pociahontas appears in numerous literary works, notably J. N. Barker’s drama, The Indian Princess (1808), and John Davis’s The First Settlers of Virginia (1805) and J. E. Cooke’s My Lady Pokahontas (1885), both novels.

The child of theatrical parents, Poe was orphaned early in life. He was taken into the home of John Allan, who did not adopt him, but became his godfather. From 1815 to 1820 the Allans lived in England, where Poe studied at a classical academy. During the next decade Poe and John Allan quarreled more and more frequently. When Mrs. Allan died, and her widower remarried, the two severed relations. Up to 1831, when he came to New York, Poe had...
Poem of Baal, The

Aqhat is born to his wife Danatya. Sometime thereafter the divine artisan Kosher-wa-Khash is entertained by Danel as the god is returning from his Egyptian forge with a load of new bows for the gods. In return, Kosher presents his host with one of the bows as a present for Aqhat.

Unfortunately, this bow had (as well as can be judged from the fragmentary remains of the poem) been intended for the goddess Anat, a warlike Canaanite counterpart of the Greek Artemis. She offers Aqhat (now a youth) wealth and immortality in return for the bow, but he spurns them. With threats she wins El's permission to take vengeance on Aqhat. Seductively, she lures the youth to the city of the moon god, and there her henchman Yatpan kills him. She then weeps for Aqhat and promises to revive him. The clumsy Yatpan drops and breaks the divine bow, so Anat's efforts have been in vain. Moreover, the murder has brought famine on the land, which lasts for seven years.

Danel learns of Aqhat's death. Shooting down the eagles that hover about, he finds his son's remains and buries them with proper ceremony, at the same time cursing the unknown murderer. After seven years of mourning, Aqhat's sister Paghat sets out to avenge him. Hiding clothes and weapons of a soldier under her dress, she seeks out the professional assassin Yatpan, who, under the influence of drink, reveals himself as the murderer of Aqhat.

Although the rest of the poem is lost, it is generally agreed, on the basis of numerous parallel myths of the death and resurrection of a young god, that Aqhat too was eventually revived.

Poem of Baal, The. A Canaanite epic poem of undetermined antiquity. Lengthy fragments of this poem were discovered at the site of ancient Ugarit (now Ras Shamra) in Syria in the early 1930s. The clay tablets on which it appears date from about the 14th century B.C., but the poem itself was probably several centuries older. It was written in cuneiform characters in a Semitic dialect that was deciphered within a few years after its discovery. The poem relates the myth that grew out of certain important Canaanite religious rituals. These myths include a combat between fertile and infertile seasons of the year, and the death and revival of a young god: elements common to most parts of the eastern Mediterranean area.

The epic begins with a fragmentary section that apparently describes rivalry for dominion over the earth between Yam, the dragon god of the sea and all inland waters, and Ashlar, the young god of artificial irrigation. Ignoring the warning of the sun goddess Shapash, Ashlar demands of the Bull God El (the supreme deity) that Yam be deposed in Ashlar's favor, but El confirms Yam's supremacy, on the grounds that Ashlar is inadequate to this exalted position. Soon, however, El's son Baal, the rain god and spirit of fertility, challenges the power of Yam. Emisaries from Yam to the divine assembly frighten the other gods, but Baal boasts that he will destroy Yam. Although El has to pacify Yam's messengers, Baal causes the divine smith, Kosher-wa-Khash, to make him two thunderbolts for weapons. In a protracted battle, Baal subdues Yam.

Baal now complains that, although he rules the earth, he has no palace there. After driving Yam entered and left several schools, including West Point, and had enlisted in the Army. He had already published Tamerlane and Other Poems, and Al Aaraaf.

In 1831, he published his Poems; content and preface show the influence of the English romantic poets. He won a story contest with MS. Found in a Bottle, and began to write the poetic drama Politian. His newly established reputation gained him the position of editor of the Southern Literary Messenger in Richmond. He contributed such stories as Berenice and Hans Pfad, and began the serialization of The Narrative of A. Gordon Ptm in 1837. Leaving the Messenger, he went to Philadelphia to work on Burton's Gentleman's Magazine.

In 1836, Poe married his 13-year-old cousin, Virginia Clemm. Eleven years after her death, he addressed the famous Annabel Lee to her. Issuing Tales of the Grotesque and Arabesque, he then began writing his tales of ratiocination.

Poe came to New York in 1845, and worked on the Evening Mirror, in which his poem The Raven was published. The poem established Poe's national reputation. He became co-editor, and then proprietor of his own paper, The Broadway Journal, which collapsed in 1846.

Virginia Clemm died of tuberculosis in 1847. Poe, cared for by Mrs. Clemm and his female admirers, continued to write several important pieces, among them The Philosophy of Composition, Ulalume, and Eureka. A series of drinking bouts left him exhausted. In October of 1849, he was found seriously ill by a friend, and he died several days later, at the age of 40.

Although Poe felt that he was primarily a poet, his tales of horror and ratiocination have become increasingly popular. He is respected for his books of criticism, as well as for the day-to-day newspaper reviews he turned out.

Poe exercised the greatest influence on the French poet, Charles Baudelaire, who wrote several articles about him, and translated his work. Through Baudelaire, his influence extended to Mallarmé, Valery, Rimbaud, and others of the symbolist school. Poem of Aqhat, The. A Canaanite epic poem. It was discovered during the excavation of the ancient city of Ugarit (now Ras Shamra) in the early 1930's. It was written in an early Semitic script in cuneiform characters on clay tablets dating from about the 14th century B.C. Though less clearly associated with religious ritual than The Poem of Baal, found in Ugarit at the same time, it nevertheless contains many of the basic elements commonly found in seasonal rites. It is also an astronomical myth similar to that of Orion, in which the physical juxtaposition of certain constellations apparently resulted in their association in legend.

At the beginning of the poem, an old chieftain named Danel (or Daniel) observes an elaborate rite beheading Baal to grant him a son. Baal intercedes with the chief deity El on his behalf and El consents. Danel celebrates his good fortune, and in due time back into the sea, the war-goddess Anat, Baal's ally, accompanies him to the abode of the mother of the gods, Asherah, El's consort, in order to present his plan. On their approach, Asherah is at first alarmed, but becomes friendly when she sees the rich gifts that they have brought, and promises Baal that his dominion will continue. After feasting her guests, Asherah presents Baal's case to El, who agrees that he may have his palace. Koshar-wa-Khasis plans the palace, but cannot persuade Baal to allow him to put windows in it, for Baal feels that Yam will steal away his young brides. When he has finally disposed of Yam, however, Baal consents to the windows. When he opens them, the windows of Heaven will open likewise and rain will fall on the earth, fertilizing it. Baal feasts the gods and makes a royal progress about his kingdom, the earth.

In his pride, Baal now challenges a more formidable enemy than Yam: Mot, the god of death and the underworld, and of aridity, which meant death to vegetation. He sends his messengers Cupan and Ugar (Vine and Field) to Mot's abode beyond the northern mountains to demand that he confine himself henceforward to the underworld and the deserts of the earth. Mot, however, invites Baal to banquet with him in the underworld. Though terrified at the prospect, Baal feels that he cannot refuse. By way of precaution, he smears himself with red ochre to warn off demons and gains strength (and a son) by copulating eighty-eight times with a heifer. He then descends into the underworld and is reported as dead.

El mourns for Baal in sackcloth and ashes, and even with self-mutilation. Anat does likewise, but afterwards she determines to seek him in the underworld. With the aid of Shapash (who, as the sun, visits there every night), she recovers Baal's body. His burial is accompanied with numerous animal sacrifices. Ashtar now sits on Baal's throne, but his feet do not reach the footstool and he realizes that he is not adequate to take Baal's place. Anat roams through the earth in search of Baal, and demands that Mot release him unharmed, but he repeatedly refuses. After some months she says Mot in a fury.

El dreams that Baal is alive and rejoices in his imminent return. On his orders, Anat sends Shapash to find Baal. Resurrected, Baal subdues his enemies, including the revived Mot, who at last surrenders. Anat takes savage vengeance on Mot's allies, but is finally persuaded by Baal, who again reigns supreme, that peace must be restored to earth and heaven.

Apart from its intrinsic interest, The Poem of Baal is of great importance for the light it sheds on primitive myth and ritual, and on certain hitherto obscure passages in the Old Testament. Considerable parts of the books of Joel and Zephaniah seem to have been deliberate stâres on Canaanite myth in ritual, which the Hebrews regarded as heathen. In other cases, they ascribed to Yalwâh feats that are here attributed to Baal, such as the conquering of the dragon of the sea by the storm-god: "Awake, awake, put on strength, O arm of the Lord; awake, as in the ancient days, in the generations of old. Art thou not it that hast cut Rahab, and wounded the dragon? Art thou not it which hath dried the sea, the waters of the great deep?" (Isaiah 51:9–10). There are shades of Greek myth too: the dominion over earth, sea, and underworld among Baal, Yam, and Mot, are identical with the division among Zeus, Poseidon, and Hades; Anat's mourning for the dead fertility god Baal is similar even in phraseology to the accounts of the mourning of Aphrodite for Adonis, or Demeter for Persephone. The unexplained hostility of El, Asherah, and many other gods toward Baal in the poem recalls the relegation of the older gods to positions of lesser importance when Cronos was conquered by Zeus in the resulting wars with Giants and Titans, offspring of Ge, who, like Asherah, was the mother of the gods.

Poetaster, The (1601). A satirical comedy by Ben Jonson. In it he attacked Thomas Dekker and John Marston during the WAR OF THE THEATRES.

Poetical Miscellanies. See TOTTLE'S MISCELLANY.

Poetic diction. The choice of words in poetry. Diction has always been of particular importance in poetry, since only a combination of the right words can make a poem memorable. Poetic diction should be distinguished from "poetic" diction, which has come to have a pejorative significance: the use of the archaisms and poetic clichés favored by poets.

Poetic Principle, The (1850). An essay by Edgar Allan Poe. The poet criticizes the didactic elements in poetry; beauty is the poem's proper province. The essay, published posthumously, includes 11 poems, English and American, as examples of fine poetry.

Poet, The (Peri Poetikeis, 335–322 B.C.). A treatise by ARISTOTLE. It was composed over a period of time. All the arts, says the philosopher, have their origin in imitation or mimesis. Poetry springs from this instinct for imitation and from the instinct for harmony and rhythm. Aristotle makes the famous observation that poetry is more philosophical than history, since it expresses universals rather than particulars.

The objects of imitation in poetry are men in action. If they are presented as better than they are in actual life, the genre is tragedy; if worse, it is comedy. Epic poetry and tragedy have the same characteristics, except that epic admits only the narrative meter. Further, epic has no limits of time, while tragedy confines itself to a single revolution of the sun. Tragedy excites the emotions of pity and fear, effects a release, or catharsis. Elements of the tragic plot are reversal of situation and recognition. The hero's fortunes fall from good to bad as a result of his tragic flaw, or hamartia. Aristotle disapproves of the use of the deus ex machina, saying that the unraveling of the plot must arise out of the action of the plot itself.

This exhaustive treatise, the first devoted wholly to literary criticism, has influenced all literatures, most notably the 17th-century French classical drama. Aristotle's definitions have become a part of our critical language.

Poet laureate. In England, an official court poet appointed by the sovereign. His duty was, in Jonson's time, to compose odes in honor of the sovereign's birthday and in celebration of state occasions of importance, in return for £200 a year and a butt of sack.

The first poet laureate, officially recognized as such, was Ben Jonson, for he was the first appointed to carry out the duties, but the first to bear the actual title was Sir William Davenport. In earlier times there had been an occasional Versificator Regis, and Chau-cgon, Skelton, Spenser, and Samuel Daniel were each called poet laureate, though not appointed to that office. The following is the complete list of poets laureate:

- Ben Jonson (1572–1637)
- Sir William Davenant (1606–1668)
- John Dryden (1631–1700)
- Thomas Shadwell (1632–1712)
- Nahum Tate (1652–1715)
- Nicholas Rowe (1687–1747)
- Laurence Sterne (1713–1768)
- Colly Cibber (1670–1757)
- William Whetstone (1697–1705)
- Thomas Warton (1755–1790)
- Henry James Pye (1790–1813)
- Robert Southey (1774–1843)
- William Wordsworth (1770–1850)
- Alfred Tennyson (1809–1892)
- Alfred Austin (1856–1913)
- Robert Bridges (1844–1930)
- John Masefield (1878–1967)

The term arose from the ancient custom in the universities of presenting a laurel wreath to graduates in rhetoric and poetry. There were at one time doctors laureate, bachelors laureate, etc.; in France, in modern times, authors of distinction continue to be "crowned" by the Academy.

Poetry: A Magazine of Verse. An American magazine founded in 1912 and devoted to the publication of poetry. Under the editorship of Harriet Monroe, it was one of the first little magazines and a part of "the Chicago Renaissance," early in the century. It published, and often introduced, the work of such leading American and English poets as Vachel Lindsay, Carl Sandburg, Ezra Pound, T. S. Eliot, and Hart Crane. Many important spokesmen for the new movement in American literature have served as associate, foreign, and contributing editors—e.g., Ezra Pound, Yvor Winters, and Wallace Fowlie. Other editors of the magazine, which is still in existence, have included Morton Zabel, Peter De Vries, Hayden Carruth, and Karl Shapiro. See IMAGISM.

Poet’s Corner. The southern end of the south transept of Westminster Abbey. It is said to have been first so called by Oliver Goldsmith because it has contained the tomb of Chaucer. Addison had previously (Spectator, No. 26, 1711) alluded to it as "the poetical Quarter." Besides Chaucer’s tomb, it contains that of Spenser, and either the tombs or monuments to Drayton, Ben Jonson, Shakespeare (a statue), Milton (a bust), Samuel Butler, Davenant, Cowley, Prior, Gay, Addison, Thomson, Goldsmith, Dryden, Dr. Johnson, Sheridan, Burns, Southey, Coleridge, Campbell, Macaulay, Longfellow, Dickens, Thackeray, Tennyson, and Browning.

Pogodin, Nikolai. Pen name of Nikolai Fedorovich Stukalov (1900–1962). Russian playwright. His early plays, such as Tempo (Temp; 1930) and Poem about an Axe (Poema o topoere; 1930), dealt with the problems encountered during the first Five-Year Plan. One of his most successful plays was Aristocrats (Aristokraty; 1934), about the rehabiliation of a band of outcasts and undesirables at a labor camp in northern Russia. Two plays portraying Lenin were Man with a Gun (Chelovek s ruzhiom; 1937) and The Kremlin Chimes (Kremlovskaya kuranty; 1941). A recent interesting play by Pogodin was Petryach’s Sonnet (Sonet Petryachkii), published during the period of the thaw after Stalin’s death. The play treats the question of love in Soviet society and broadly hints that there are areas, such as those of the emotional life of a person, that the Party would do well to keep away from.

Poictesme. An imaginary country of medieval Europe which is the scene of many of the romances of James Branch Cabell, notably Junoem, Figures of Earth, and Domnei. In The Cream of the Jest, the scene is laid partly in a Virginia town and partly in Poictesme.

Poincaré, Raymond (1860–1934). French statesman and writer. Appointed premier in 1912, Poincaré served as president of the Republic from 1913 to 1920 leading France through the war years. Reappointed premier during the reparations crisis, he held office from 1922 to 1924, and from 1926 to 1929. Poincaré was elected to the French academy in 1909; his chief work is Au Service de la France: Neuf années de souvenirs (1926).

Poins. In Shakespeare’s Henry IV: Part I and Part II, a companion of Prince Hal and Falstaff at the Boar’s Head Tavern.

Point Counter Point (1928). A novel by Aldous Huxley. It presents a satirical picture of London intellectuals and members of English upper-class society during the 1920s. Frequent allusions to literature, painting, music, and contemporary British politics occur throughout the book, and much scientific information is embodied in its background. The story is long and involved, with many characters; it concerns a series of broken marriages and love affairs, and a political assassination. The construction is elaborate, supposedly based on Bach’s Suite No. 2 in B Minor. It is also a novel within a novel. Philip Quares, a leading character in the novel, is himself planning a novel, which echoes or “counterpoints” the events going on around him. Quares is a critical portrait of Huxley himself. The only sympathetic characters in the novel are Mark Rampion and his wife Mary, idealized portraits of D. H. Lawrence and his wife Frieda. The diabolical, sexually depraved Spandrell is said to be based on Baudelaire, and Everard Webley, whom he assassinates, on Sir Oswald Mosley, leader of the British fascist movement. Denis Burlap and Beatrice Gilray are said to represent J. Middleton Murry and Katherine Mansfield.

Pointillism. See NEOIMPRESSIONISM.

Point of No Return (1949). A novel by John P. Marquand. Its theme is the ambition of a businessman, Charley Gray, to win promotion in the bank in which he is employed. While he waits anxiously for the announcement of the promotion, he revisits his home town, Clyde, Maine, where he relives his past.

Poirier, Louis. See Julien Gracq.

Polaris (North Star). See GREAT BEAR.

Pole, Reginald (1500–1558). English Roman Catholic prelate. A friend of Sir Thomas More, he opposed the divorce of Henry VIII. He was archbishop of Canterbury (from 1556) during the reign... of Queen Mary, and largely responsible for the persecutions of Protestants.

Polinesio. In the Orlando Furtivo of Lodovico Ariosto, the evil instigator of discord between Ginevra and Ariodante. Polinesio, who had hoped to win Ginevra himself, persuades Ariodante that his beloved is unfaithful, and is killed by Rinaldo when his plot is exposed.

Politian. See Angelo Poliziano.

Politian: A Tragedy (1835-1836). An unfinished poetic drama in blank verse, by Edgar Allan Poe. The story, based on the actual murder case known as the Kentucky Tragedy, takes place in Italy. A lover, not yet the husband of the injured heroine, takes revenge.

Politick Would-Be, Lady. An English noblewoman traveling in Venice with her husband, in Jonson’s comedy Volpone, or The Fox. In order to silence her maddening garrulity, Volpone tells her that her husband is dallying with Celia, the innocent wife of Corvino. Later, on the basis of no evidence, she testifies against Celia in court.

Politick Would-Be, Lord. An English nobleman residing in Venice in Jonson’s comedy Volpone, or The Fox. The principal figure in a subplot that is often omitted from modern performances of the play, he is a caricature of a pompous Englishman living abroad.

Polixenes. The king of Bohemia and the father of Florizel in Shakespeare’s Winter’s Tale. Polixenes shows dignity and mercy in the face of Leontes’ psychotic jealousy.

Poliziano, Angelo. Also known as Politian. Real name, Angelo Ambrogini (1454-1494). Italian poet and humanist. Called Poliziano after his birthplace, Montepulciano, he was a professor of Latin and Greek at the University of Florence, a tutor in the Medici household, and a member of the Florentine academy established by the Medici for the study of Greek philosophy. He also translated Latin and wrote verse in Latin and Italian. His best-known works are his Stanz per la Giostra (Stanzas for the Joust) and his short lyrics based on popular songs.

Polk, James K[nox] (1795-1849). 11th president of the U.S. (1845-1849). After serving in Congress (1825-1839) and as governor of Tennessee (1839-1841), Polk became the first “dark horse” presidential nominee and defeated Henry Clay, the Whig candidate, in 1844. Despite Polk’s campaign slogan of “54° 40’ or Fight,” the troublesome Oregon controversy with Great Britain was settled through compromise during his administration, and the Mexican War added over one million square miles of territory to the U.S. As he had promised in 1844, Polk declined to run for a second term.

Pollaiuolo or Pollajuolo, Antonio del (1432-1498). Italian painter, sculptor and goldsmith. He is noted for his landscapes and his treatment of the human form to which he imparted vivid movement. Such artists as Dürrer, Signorelli, and Verrocchio studied and were influenced by him. His best-known paintings are Portrait of a Man, Labors of Hercules, David, The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian, and Tobias and the Angel. His sculpture includes the Hercules and the tomb of Sixtus IV. His brother and collaborator Piero (1441-1496) is best remembered for his Portrait of a Lady.

Pollente. See Farrer Queene, The.

Pollio, Gaius Asinius (75 B.C.–A.D. 4). Roman poet, orator, and statesman. After an early career in politics and in the army (48-38 B.C.), he retired from public life to devote himself to the advancement of learning. As a patron of literature he is remembered for three accomplishments: He saved Virgil from being evicted from his ancestral farm in the land redistribution of 41 B.C. and introduced him to Macenae; he set up the first public library in Rome; and he introduced the practice of public recitation by writers of their works in progress.

Pollock, Channing (1880-1946). American playwright and critic. Pollock wrote drama reviews for various newspapers and magazines including Smart Set, published novels, essays, and several popular songs, including My Man for Pannie Brice, and was the author of more than 30 plays. He dramatized (1904) The Pit by Frank Norris and wrote such popular plays as The Sign on the Door (1919) and The Fool (1922). The Adventures of a Happy Man (1939; enlarged 1946) and Harvest of My Years (1943) are autobiographical.

Pollock, Jackson (1912-1956). American abstract painter. After 1940 he developed the controversial “drip” technique of splattering paint on the canvas, generally using subdued colors—black, brown, and white—and covering the canvas with an over-all design of rhythmic curves and textured surface.

Polux. See Castor and Polycleuces.

Pollyanna. A ballad-opera by John Gay (published 1729), a sequel to The Beggar’s Opera. It was not performed till 1777, and then only in an adaptation by Colman the elder, because of government resentment at Gay’s satire.

Pollyanna (1913). A novel by Eleanor H[ogeman] Porter (1868-1920), an American. The child heroine of the story is an expert at her favorite “Glad Game” of always looking at the bright side in her numerous trials. The word Pollyanna has become a synonym for the fatuous, irrepressible optimist who always makes the best of things for himself and other people. Mrs. Porter herself wrote Pollyanna Grows Up (1915), but several other sequels by other writers followed.

Polo, Marco (c. 1254-1324). Venetian traveler and adventurer. About 1263, Nicolò and Maffeo Polo (the father and uncle of Marco) visited the court of Kublai Khan, the first Europeans to do so. They returned to Venice in 1269 and, with Marco, left for the East again in 1271. After arriving at the mouth of the Persian Gulf, they abandoned their plan of traveling by sea and turned north, traversing Persia and Turkmen until they reached the Oxus river. They crossed the plain of Pamir and traveled on through the Gobi Desert until they reached Tan-gut, in the extreme northwest of China. Early in 1275 the three Polos were cordially received at Shangtu by the great Khan, who became especially fond of Marco. The young Polo studied the various native languages, and in 1277 he became a second-class commissioner in the Mongol bureaucracy. Traveling throughout the empire on missions for the Khan, he journeyed from Tibet to Burma and as far as the southern states of India.

So popular at court were the Polos that Kublai Khan would not tolerate their leaving his empire. However, in 1292 they escorted a Mongol princess to Persia. The journey by sea took two years. The Polos went on through Constantinople to Venice, arriving unrecognized late in 1295.

While engaged in a sea battle with the city of Genoa in 1298, Marco Polo was captured and spent nearly a year in prison, during which time he dictated his Book of Marco Polo to Rustichello of Pisa.

Polonius. In Shakespeare's Hamlet, a garrulous courtier, typical of the pompous, sententious old man. He is the father of Ophelia and Laertes and lord chamberlain to the king of Denmark. His advice to his son, however, is justly famous. The speech contains this admonition:

This above all: to thine own self be true,
And it must follow, as the night the day,
Thou canst not then be false to any man.

Polybius (Polybios, 202?-125 B.C.). A Greek historian of the Roman world. Taken as a hostage by the Romans in the Third Macedonian War, Polybius, a Greek statesman of prominence, became a tutor to the young Publius Scipio Aemilianus and his brothers. Though later free to return home, he accompanied Scipio to Carthage in the Third Punic War and was present when the city fell. He later saw the fall of Corinth. He wrote a reliable history of Rome from 262 B.C. to 120 B.C. in 40 books, of which only five are extant. Undistinguished as literature, this work is a sound source book for Roman history of this period.

Polycletus (Polykleitos, 5th c. B.C.). The name of two Greek sculptors often confused. The former lived in Sicyon, the latter in Argos. The most famous statue of the elder of the two was the Doryphorus (Spear-Bearer). Polycletus deduced a canon of the proportions of the human body and was immensely admired in his own day and long thereafter. The Argive Polycletus was also highly successful, but his works are less well known.

Polycrates (Polykrates, 6th century B.C.). A tyrant of Samos. He was known and feared for his unfailing success in all his ventures. He won a number of wars with other Greek islands and even withstood an attack from the combined forces of Sparta and Corinth. For a time he was allied with Amasis, the king of Egypt, but Amasis grew so uneasy at his success that (according to the legend) he superstitiously demanded that Polycrates deliberately throw away one of his most valued possessions. Polycrates obligingly threw his favorite ring into the sea, and in a few days received it back again in the belly of a fish. Amasis broke off their alliance. A patron of the arts, Polycrates is particularly known for his friendship with Anacreon. His luck finally broke when, lured to the mainland by the envious Oroetes, satrap of Sardis, he was ignominiously crucified.

Polydamas. A Grecian athlete of immense size and strength. He was an Olympic victor in 408 B.C. According to the legends that grew up about him, he killed a fierce lion without weapons, stopped a chariot in full career, lifted a mad bull, and died at last in attempting to stop a falling rock.

Polydeuces. See Castor and Polydeuces.

Polydorus (Polydoros). In classic myth, the youngest son of Priam and Hecuba. According to Homer (Iliad, xx. 470), he was killed by Achilles, but other legends state that he was committed to the care of Polymestor, king of Thrace, who treacherously slew him. His ghost appears in Euripides' tragedy Hecuba, which tells of her revenge on Polymestor.

Polyeucte (1641). A tragedy by Pierre Corneille. Derived from the Vitæ Sanctorum of the 16th-century monk Surius, the play is set in Armenia in the early Christian era. Polyeucte, a newly baptized Christian, reviles the pagans and is imprisoned. Desiring martyrdom, he surrenders his wife Pauline to her first lover Severus, but she refuses to comply if her husband dies. Severus bravely attempts to save Polyeucte, but Pauline's father Felix, the Roman governor of the province, orders the execution of his son-in-law. Polyeucte's martyrdom subsequently provokes the conversions to Christianity of both Pauline and the repentant Felix.

Polyhymnia. The Muse of lyric poetry, and inventor of the lyre.

Polyidus (Polyidos). A soothsayer. He advised Bellerophon to procure the horse Pegasus for his conflict with the Chimaera. For his other adventures, see Glaucus.

Polyneices (Polyneikes). In Greek legend, a son of Oedipus and Jocasta. See Seven against Thebes.

Polyolbion or Poly-Olbion (1612-1622). A long poem by Michael Drayton. Begun in 1598, it consists of a "description of all the tracts, rivers, mountains, forests, and other parts of this renowned isle of Great Britain, with intermixture of the most remarkable stories, antiquities, wonders, rarities, pleasures, and commodities of the same."

Polyphemus (Polyphemos). The best known of the Cyclops of Greek mythology. A cyclop had a single eye in the middle of his forehead. Odysseus landing in Sicily with his crew during their wanderings described in Homer's Odyssey, comes to Polyphemus' cave. The monster imprisons them by piling a stone against the entrance and dines on six of them. They manage to blind him and escape, holding on to the underside of Polyphemus' sheep. However, Polyphemus prays to his father Poseidon, and the god's enmity is the main cause of Odysseus' long wanderings. This story is humorously told in Euripides' satyr play Cyclops.

According to Ovid, this same Polyphemus was in love with the nymph Galatea, who, however, preferred the handsome Actae. Polyphemus crushed him under a rock, from which thereafter flowed the river Actae, near Mount Actae.

polyphonic prose. A type of free verse resembling prose in its thought sequence and published as a prose passage. Its use is outstanding in the poetry of Amy Lowell.

Polyxena. In classic myth, a daughter of Priam and Hecuba. The early poets say little about her, but according to later legends she is the heroine of a tragic love affair with Achilles the Greek hero. See Trojan Women, Thes.

Pomona. In Roman mythology, the goddess of fruit trees. She was wooed and won by Vertumnus, god of the seasons.

Pompadour, Marquise de. Jeanne Antoinette Poisson (1721–1764). Mistress of Louis XV. She was established at Versailles (1745) and given the estate of Pompadour. She had great influence over the king, especially in foreign affairs. Opposed to Richemont's foreign policy, she was instrumental in bringing on the Seven Years' War, which ended in disaster for France. She protected writers of the Encyclopédie and spent enormous sums to pay artists to decorate her residences.

Pompey the Great. Full Latin name, Gnaeus Pompeius Magnus (106–48 B.C.). Roman general and statesman. He organized the First Triumvirate with Julius Caesar and Crassus in 59 B.C. He became a champion of the Senatorial Party. When Caesar crossed the Rubicon, Pompey and his followers fled to Northern Greece; Caesar pressed them, and they were decisively defeated at Pharsalus (48). Pompey then fled to Egypt where Ptolemy had him murdered. The earliest English tragedy based on the story of Pompey is Pompey the Great, his faire Cornelius's Tragedy, a translation into blank verse by Thomas Kyd from the French of Garnier.

Pomponazzi, Pietro (1462–1525). Italian philosopher. Influenced by the naturalistic school of Padua, where he studied and taught, Pomponazzi's major work, De immortalitate animae, published at Bologna in 1516, stirred controversy because it argued against the soul's immortality as an unreasonable tenet. In justifying his skepticism he distinguished between objective truth and truth according to religion, a defense that echoed widely in the writings of Renaissance thinkers.

Ponce de León, Juan (c. 1460–1521). Spanish explorer. Ponce de León may have sailed to America on the second voyage of Christopher Columbus. In 1508 he conquered the island of Puerto Rico and subsequently became its governor. Seeking a legendary fountain of youth, supposedly located in a land called Bimini, he sighted the North American mainland on Easter Sunday, 1513, and upon landing called the region Florida, probably for Passa eolus ("Easter Easter"). After exploring much of the Florida coast, he returned to Puerto Rico. During a second expedition to Florida, he was wounded in a skirmish with the Indians and was taken to Cuba, where he died.

Ponderevo, Edward. The hero of H. G. Wells's novel Tono-Bungay. He invented and made a fortune from quack medicine.

Ponge, Francis (1899– ). French poet. His prose poems, such as those in Le Parti pris des Choses (1942) and Proèmes (1948), depict the world with cold precision in a philosophic approach to attempt the essence of objective reality.

Ponocrates (Gr., "strong"). In Rabelais' Gargantua and Pantagruel, the tutor who accompanies Gargantua when he goes to Paris to complete his education. After observing how Gargantua's former teachers had taught him nothing but lazy and sloppy manners and useless memorization from the breviary, Ponocrates institutes a new program of studies emphasizing first-hand observation in all fields of learning, physical exercise, and cleanliness.

Pons, Sylvain. See Cousin Pons, L.e.

Pons Asinorum (Lat., "the asses' bridge"). The fifth proposition, Bk. I, of Euclid. The first difficult theorem, which dunces rarely get over without stumbling.

Pontano, Giovanni. Also known as Jovianus Pontanus (1426–1503). Italian humanist and poet. Born in Umbria, he moved to Naples in 1447 to begin his career as author and public figure. He was a founder and leading light of the Neapolitan academy, and many of its members appear as interlocutors in his dialogues. Among his Latin prose and verse, the group of poems entitled De amore coniugali (On Married Life) is outstanding. His eclogues, sensual lyrics, and didactic poems were widely admired and imitated, notably in England by George Chapman. He is considered an outstanding humanist and the author of some of the most natural Latin writing of the Renaissance.

Ponte Vecchio. An ancient bridge over the Arno in Florence, Italy. A covered gallery at the top connected the Pitti Palace with the Uffizi Gallery. Small shops have clustered like barnacles on the side of the bridge since the 14th century.

Pontiac (1720–1769). American Ottawa chief. He participated in, and perhaps organized, the unsuccessful Indian uprising against the British known as Pontiac's War or Conspiracy (1763–1764). He is the subject of one of the first American dramas, Pontiac, or the Savages of America (1766), by Robert Rogers.

Pontiac's War or Conspiracy. See PONTIAC.

Pontifex, Ernest. See WAY OF ALL FLESH, THE.

Pontoppidan, Henrik (1857–1943). Danish novelist. Pontoppidan is most famous for his three series: Det forgyldet land (3 vols., 1891–1895); Lydke-Fer (8 vols., 1898–1904); and Dødes Rige (5 vols., 1912–1916). In his books he paints a somber, pessimistic portrait of Denmark and the Danish people. With Karl Gjellerup he received the Nobel Prize for literature in 1917.

Pontormo, Jacopo Carucci da (1494–1556). Italian painter. One of the leading mannerists and a disciple of Michelangelo and Dürer, he is known for a series of frescos on the Passion of Christ (1522–1524) at Valdema, near Florence. His individual paintings include Joseph in Egypt, The Resurrection, The Visitation, and the portrait of a Lady with a Lapdog. He best exemplifies the neurotic and discordant strain in MANNERISM in his antiquated treatment of figures, color, and space. See PARMIGIANINO; Rosso.

pony express. A privately owned American postal service of the 19th century. Riders carried mail between St. Joseph, Mo. and Sacramento, Calif. in 10 days, braving weather, isolation, and hostile Indians. At its height the service employed 125 riders, 400 station men and assistants, and 420 horses. Every 10 or 20 miles, the riders would change horses. At first the charge for delivery of each letter was five dollars; later, charges were reduced, although they never paid the costs of operation. Among the most famous of the riders were Buffalo Bill (William F. Cody) and Wild Bill Hickok.

Pooh. The toy-bear hero of the near classical children's stories by A. A. MILNE. Pooh is one of an imaginative cast of characters, which includes Eeyore the Donkey, Tigger the Tiger, Piglet, and Roo, a small kangaroo. A Latin translation of Winnie-the-Pooh, published in 1962, was a best seller. The Pooh Perplex (1963), by Frederick C. Crews, lampoons various fashionable critical approaches by parodying them in the form of commentaries on Winnie-the-Pooh.

pooka. See PHOOKA.

Poole, Ernest (1880–1950). American journalist and novelist. Poole lived in a settlement house in the slums of New York City and wrote articles for magazines exposing the horrible conditions of the workers. In 1905 he traveled to Russia to report on the abortive revolution there. His first novel, The Harbor, was immediately popular. His Family won a Pulitzer Prize. In 1917, Poole returned to Russia; from this trip came his accounts of Russian life, The Village (1918) and The Dark People (1918), and a volume of Russian tales and sketches, The Little Dark Man (1925).

Poole, William Frederick (1821–1894). American librarian. In 1848 Poole published a useful and famous work, Poole's Index to Periodical Literature. A forerunner of the Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, it was enlarged in later editions and continued after his death.

Poor Clares. Nuns of the Order founded by St. Clare of Assisi (1194–1253). It is the equivalent for women of the Friars Minor (Franciscans).

Poor Folk (Bednye lyudi) (1846). A short novel by Feodor DOSTOEVSKI. The author's first published fictional work, written in the form of an epistolary novel, it tells of the hopeless love of Makar Alekseyevich Devushkin, a poor, timid clerk, for Varvara Alekseyevna Dobrosoleva, a poor young girl who lives in the building across the way from him. Despite Devushkin's frantic efforts to save Varvara, interpersed with the clerk's despairing bouts of drunkenness, Varvara is married to a wealthy landowner who carries her away. The work is remarkable for the vivid characterizations, especially of Devushkin, solely by means of his letters to Varvara and her answers to him.

Poor Richard's Almanack. Composite name given to the almanacs issued from 1732 to 1787 by Benjamin FRANKLIN. From 1732 to 1747 their title was Poor Richard; the later numbers were called Poor Richard Improved. To Poor Richard are attributed most of Franklin's famous adages:

> Make haste slowly.
> God helps them that help themselves.
>
> Early to bed and early to rise,
>
> Makes a man healthy, wealthy, and wise.

See Richard SAUNDERS.

Poor Robin. A series of almanacs published in England from 1662 to 1828. The poet Robert Herrick is said to have assisted with the first numbers.

Poor White (1920). A novel by Sherwood ANDERSON. It describes the changes occurring in a Midwestern town when industrialism replaces the old agrarian, craft-centered society. The town itself is the protagonist of the early part of the book, and Anderson successfully depicts its shabbiness, isolation, and sterility. Hugh McVey, the central character, is an introverted inventor who does not become aware until it is too late that his own genius contributes to the corruption of his environment.

pope. The title of the spiritual ruler of the world's Roman Catholics. His other titles include bishop of Rome, Vicar of Christ, Supreme Pontiff of the Universal Church, Patriarch of the West, primate of Italy, archbishop and metropolitan of the Roman Province, and sovereign of the State of Vatican City.

The title "pope" came into use in the fourth century; until that time the usual title was bishop of Rome. According to tradition, St. Peter came from Antioch to Rome c. A.D. 41 and was martyred there c. 67. The papal see has since remained at Rome, except that in 1309 King Philip of France persuaded Clement V (who had been elected by a college of Cardinals dominated by the French) to move to Avignon; the "Babylonian captivity" of the popes, as the era is called, lasted until 1377.

For centuries, the popes were powerful temporal rulers. The Papal States, which grew out of a nucleus of land grants in the fourth century and eventually spread over vast areas of Italy, were finally absorbed in 1870 by Victor Emmanuel II. The Lateran Treaty of 1929, however, granted the popes full sovereignty over Vatican City, an enclave in the heart of Rome.
According to the theory of Petrine succession, the popes are the rulers of all Christendom, by virtue of their succession to the see of St. Peter, the vicar (vicegerent) of Christ. This claim has always been rejected by the Protestant churches, and was the principal reason for the disunion (schism) of the Church of Rome and the churches of the Eastern (Orthodox) rite, which became definite in 1054 when Pope Leo IX condemned the patriarch of Constantinople.

Popes are elected at an assembly of the college of cardinals, known as the conclave. Balloting ends when one name has received two thirds plus one of the votes cast. In theory any Catholic, even a layman, is eligible for election; in practice the cardinals have always selected one of their own number, and he has most often been an Italian. The last non-Italian pope was Adrian VI of Utrecht, elected in 1522; the sole English pope was Adrian IV (Nicholas Breakspear) elected in 1154.

A list of the popes follows, to which is appended a list of antipopes and doubtful popes.

The term "antipope" is applied to a claimant to the papal throne whose election was not in accordance with the Church's canon law. Some pretenders were promoted by European rulers as political pawns; others were elected by a rival faction of cardinals. The most famous antipope was Clement VII; he was named in 1378 after the death of Gregory XI, who had just moved the papal see back to Rome from Avignon. A conclave at Rome elected Urban VI as Gregory's successor; Clement was named a. few months later by the French cardinals. The resultant dispute, known as the Great Schism of the West, divided the Church. It was resolved in 1417 when the Council of Constance elected Martin V.

Pope, Alexander (1688-1744). English poet and satirist, literary dictator of his age and regarded as the epitome of English neoclassicism. He was born a Roman Catholic at a time when England was violently anti-Catholic, and was educated largely at home; a severe illness in boyhood caused permanent damage to his health and disfigurement of his body. Pope's metrical skill was apparent very early in his Pastoralis (1709; see Ambrose Philips) which he said he wrote when he was 16. Known for its skillful use of the heroic or closed couplet, his poetry is characterized by technical finish, invective, and wit; it is satiric, epigrammatic, and didactic. Pope's best-known works include Essay on Criticism, which made him famous at the age of 23; The Rape of the Lock; Messiah; a Vergilian paraphrase of the Book of Isaiah, first published in The Spectator in 1712; Windsor Forest (1713), in praise of the Tory peace of Utrecht; An Elegy to the Memory of an Unfortunate Lady and Epistle from Eloisa to Abelard (1717), two passionate though rhetorical poems; translations of the Iliad (1715-1720) and the Odyssey (1725-1726); an edition of Shakespeare (1725); The Dunciad; Moral Essays; An Essay on Man; Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot. The first complete edition of Pope's works was that published by William Warburton in 1751. In his Essay on the Writings and Genius of Pope (1756), Joseph Warthon argued that Pope's claim to poetic greatness was limited by his cultivation of didactic and wit, rather than of sublimity and pathos, and that "in the species of Poetry wherein Pope excelled, he is superior to all mankind." Pope was wont to attack his contemporaries, often spitefully, as, for example, his attack on Joseph Addison in Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot; because of this he was called the Wicked Wasp of Twickenham, from the name of the villa in which he lived. He was a Tory in politics, a friend of John Gay and Jonathan Swift, and a member of the Scriblerus Club.

Pope-Figs. An anglicism for the Papæfigus in Rabelais' Gargantua and Pantagruel. Once called Gaillardets (Fr., "Goodfellows"), they had been reduced to ruin by the Papimaniacs after they had "made the fig at," or ridiculed, a portrait of the pope.

Popeye. A character in William Paulkner's Sanctuary. An embodiment of pure evil, Popeye is a reptilian and perverted gangster and murderer who rapes Temple Drake and kills the half-wit Tommy. Popeye is finally hanged in Alabama for a murder he did not commit, having been busy, at the time of the supposed crime, murdering a man in Memphis. As repulsive as this degenerate representative of urban culture is, he, too, is in part the victim of his environment.

Poppea. The mistress and later the wife of the Roman emperor Nero. She is a character in Seneca's Latin tragedy Octavia, appears in Sienkiewicz's historical novel Quo Vadis (1896), and is the heroine of Monteverdi's opera L'Incoronazione di Poppea (1642).
Popular Front. A term of the later years of the 1930’s, during the Spanish Civil War (1936-1939) and again after the beginning of World War II (1939-1945). It signified an alliance between the capitalist democracies (especially the U.S. and Great Britain) and the U.S.S.R. against Nazi Germany, Fascist Italy, and, later, Japan. The Popular Front became a reality only after the German invasion of the U.S.S.R. in June 1941. The term is also applied to coalitions of certain progressive parties in Spain and France (after 1936), as those that supported the French cabinets of Léon Blum, Camille Chauteams, and Edouard Daladier, and opposed the Spanish insurgents in the early phases of the Civil war.

Populisme. A French literary movement. It advocated a literature written for and about the common working man. Essentially a revolt against manners, aristocratic literature, Populisme defined its aims in two manifestos, of August 1929 and January 1930. Naturalistic in their minutely descriptive method and in their humble subject matter, the chief writers of the school were Eugène Dabit, Léon Lemonnier (1892—), André Théıre (1891—), and Louis Guilloux (1899—). The novels that best embodied the goals of Populisme were Dabit’s Hôtel du Nord (1929), Femine sans péché (1931) by Lemonnier, Sans Ame (1928) and Le Charbon ardent (1929) by Thérie, and Guilloux’s Le Pain des Rêves. An annual Prix populiste is still awarded.

Populist or People’s Party. In U.S. history, a political party established in 1892 in Omaha, Neb., by farmers and laborers, primarily from the West, who were dissatisfied with Eastern financial and commercial policies. The Populists nominated James B. Weaver of Iowa as their presidential candidate and adopted a platform calling for the free and unlimited coinage of silver and gold at the ratio of 16 to 1; government ownership of transportation and communications facilities; direct election of U.S. senators; and a graduated income tax. Their aim was “to restore to the government of the Republic to the hands of the ‘plain people’, with which class it originated.” Weaver received over 1,000,000 votes in the election of 1892. In 1896 the Populists endorsed the candidacy of William Jennings Bryan, the Democratic nominee.

Porgy (1925). A novel by DuBois Heyward. Set in Charleston, S.C., it deals with Negroes along Catfish Row. Central to the story is Porgy, a crippled beggar who becomes involved in a murder. Other characters include Bess, Sportin’ Life, Crown, and Serena. With his wife, Dorothy, Heyward adapted the novel as a play (1927). The play in turn became the basis of George Gershwin’s Porgy and Bess (1935), a folk opera which has become an American classic.

Porgy, Captain. A comic character created by William Gilmore Simms. He appears in Simms’ trilogy about the American Revolution—The Partisan, Melchampe (1836), and Katherine Walton (1851)—and in The Forgers (1855) and Woolcraft. Porgy combines a Falstaffian paunch and love for food and drink with the more typical Southern virtues of bravery, gallantry, and generosity. He is bawdy, humorous, inventive, and a tireless practical joker. Many critics felt Simms was at his best when describing the exploits of Porgy, although others, notably Poe, found Porgy “an unsufferable bore.”

Porphyry (Porphyrios; Tyrian, Malchus; 233-c. 301). Greek Neoplatonist, the student and biographer of Plotinus. Porphyry is the source for all our information about his teacher. He arranged Plotinus’ treatises into six groups of nine treatises (Enneads), and seems to have faithfully respected the text. He also wrote a life of Pythagoras and an introduction to Aristotle’s Organon.

Porsena, Lars. In the 6th century b.c., king of Clusium in Etruria. He led an expedition against Rome, but was stopped from entering the city by the bravery of Horatius Cocles. After laying siege to Rome, he finally made peace on condition that the Romans give up some captured land and supply hostages.

This is the Roman legend. Scholars feel that it is an attempt to cover up a greater tragedy inflicted on Rome by the Etruscans as they, the Etruscans, moved southwest before the invading Celts, passing through Rome as they fled.

Porte étroite, La. See Strait Is the Gate.

Porteous Riot. A riot at Edinburgh in September, 1736. Captain Porteous was commander of the town guard, and, at the execution of a smuggler named Wilson, ordered the guard to fire on the mob, which had become disorderly. Six persons were killed, and eleven wounded. Porteous was condemned to death, but reprieved, whereupon the mob burst into the jail where he was confined, and, dragging him to the Grassmarket (the usual place of execution), hanged him by torchlight on a barber’s pole. As a result, Robert Walpole attempted to punish the Edinburgh populace too severely and was vehemently opposed. Sir Walter Scott introduces the riot in his Heart of Midlothian.

Porter, Cole (1893–1964). American composer of popular songs. His lyrics are often unusually witty. His best-known songs include Night and Day and Begin the Beguine. Kiss Me Kate (1948) is probably his most famous musical comedy.

Porter, Eleanor H. See Pollyanna.

Porter, Gen[e]va[va] Stratton (1863-1924). American novelist. She is noted for the enormous popularity of her sentimental romances, set in the great Limberlost Swamp of Indiana, notably Freckles (1904) and A Girl of the Limberlost (1908). Laddie (1913) is a fictional version of the author’s childhood in the Limberlost country. Keeper of the Bees (1925) was published posthumously.

Porter, Jane (1776-1850). English novelist. She is known for her popular romances Thaddeus of Warsaw (1803) and a very early historical novel, The Scottish Chiefs (1810), which was a forerunner to the romantic novels of her childhood friend, Sir Walter Scott.

Porter, Katherine Anne (1890— ). American short-story writer and novelist. Miss Porter’s stories are rich in psychological insight and symbolic import. Two well-known collections of her short stories are Flowering Judas and The Leaning Tower (1944), Pale Horse, Pale Rider is a collection of three short novels, Ship of Fools, a novel Miss Porter had worked on for 20 years, was hailed as a major achievement by many reviewers. Her essays on life and art were collected in The Days Before
Porter, William Sydney

(1952). Other books by Miss Porter are Hacienda (1934), a collection of short stories, and Noon Wine and Old Mortality, short novels.

Porter, William Sydney. See O. Henry.

Porthos. One of the famous trio in Dumas’ The Three Musketeers, and a prominent character in its sequels Twenty Years After and The Viscount of Bragelonne. In physical stature the good-hearted Porthos is a giant, but in mental stature he is somewhat less grand.

Portia. (1) The clever and wise young heroine of Shakespeare’s Merchant of Venice. Disguised as Balthazar, a young lawyer, she defends Antonio against Shylock’s demand for a pound of his flesh. At first she tries to soften Shylock by pleading for mercy:

The quality of mercy is not strain’d,
It droppeth as the gentle rain from heaven
Upon the place beneath: it is twice bless’d;
It blesteth him that gives and him that takes.

Although this appeal fails to move Shylock, she manages to outwit him and win the case for Antonio. See Bassanio.

(2) In Shakespeare’s Julius Caesar, the courageous and noble wife of Brutus and daughter of Cato. When Brutus is forced to flee from Rome after Caesar’s assassination, she commits suicide by swallowing hot coals.

portmanteau word. A completely new word combining parts of two or more words. The word thus created expresses a combination of the meanings of its parts, as in the now common word brunch, created by combining the “br” of breakfast with the “unch” of lunch. Lewis Carroll introduced portmanteau words in Through the Looking-Glass; he says slithy means lithe and slimy, mimsy is flimsy and miserable, etc. Carroll called these portmanteau words because in them two meanings were “packed up” in one bag, as it were. Modern writers have made liberal use of such words, notably James Joyce in his Finnegans Wake.

Portolá, Caspar de (1723–21784). Spanish governor of the Californias who marched 1,000 miles (1769) from Lower to Upper California, where he founded San Diego and Monterey. Father Junipero Sierra was one of the diarists of the expedition.

Porto-Riche, Georges de (1849–1930). French dramatist, born of Italian-Jewish parentage. Porto-Riche won fame with his masterpiece Amoureuse (1891), a cynical comedy marked by great psychological insight. His later plays, Le Pisé (1897), Le Vieil Homme (1911), and Le Marchand d’estampes (1917), never matched his initial success.

Portrait of a Lady (1917). A poem by T. S. Eliot. It is about the lack of communication between a woman and a man who are trapped by the conventions of a dying social order. Both are conscious of their isolation, yet are equally unable to escape it. The lady of the poem is driven by her loneliness to reach out to the man, but realizes that she has nothing left to give. Her life, she knows, is an empty shell determined by empty forms and devitalized social rituals. He, evading her demands, seeks solace in humdrum habits and conventions.

Portrait of a Lady, The (1881). A novel by Henry James. The motives that lead Isabel Archer, a romantic New England girl who inherits an English fortune, to refuse other suitors and marry Gilbert Osmond are skillfully analyzed, and her subsequent disillusionment is traced in devastating detail. Osmond is a dilettante, an impoverished gentleman living in retirement in Italy with his daughter, Pansy, because his exquisite tastes and sensibilities make him scornful of the crudities of the modern struggle for existence. After Isabel’s marriage she discovers that she has only served the purposes of her quasi-friend, Madame Merle, who, as Osmond’s mistress and the mother of Pansy, brought the two together for the sake of Isabel’s fortune. Osmond’s fine sensibilities are likewise seen to be but the expression of an intensely egocentric, unpleasant nature. The novel has been generally considered one of James’s finest works.

Portrait of a Man with Red Hair (1925). A novel by Hugh Walpole. It is a horror story and romance about two men, a girl, and a red-haired, sadistic madman.

Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man, A (1916). A largely autobiographical novel by James Joyce. It portrays the childhood, school days, adolescence, and early manhood of Stephen Dedalus, later one of the leading characters in Ulysses. Stephen’s growing self-awareness as an artist forces him to reject the whole narrow world in which he has been brought up, including family ties, nationalism, and the Catholic religion. The novel ends when, having decided to become a writer, he is about to leave Dublin for Paris. Rather than following a clear narrative progression, the book revolves around experiences that are crucial to Stephen’s development as an artist; at the end of each chapter Stephen makes some assertion of identity. Through his use of the stream-of-consciousness technique, Joyce reveals the actual materials of his hero’s world, the components of his thought processes. Stephen Hero, the first version of the book, was written in about 1904 and published posthumously. It is longer and more conventional in form.

Port-Royal. A French Cistercian convent near Versailles, which in the 17th century became the center of Jansenism. Its teachings greatly influenced both religion and literature, and Jesuit rivals induced Pope Innocent X to condemn certain Jansenist doctrines. In 1660, Louis XIV suppressed the community. Springing again into prominence, Port-Royal was razed in 1710, and permanently condemned three years later in the papal bull Unigenitus of Clement XI.

Posa. The Indian king in Jean Racine’s tragedy ALEXANDRE LE GRAND.

Posada, José Guadalupe (1852–1913). Mexican graphic artist, folk illustrator, and political cartoonist. A fierce supporter of the downtrodden, he depicted horrors and tragedies in bold black and white, and did a series of popular satirical woodcuts of skeletons acting out daily activities.

Poseidon. The chief sea god of the ancient Greeks. According to the usual story, he was the son of Crones and brother of Zeus, Hades, and other gods. When dominion over the universe was divided among these three gods, Poseidon was given the sea. He was also a god of horses, and may even have had a horse shape originally, and of earthquakes. He was married to Amphitrite. Inclined to be ill-tempered, it was Poseidon whose anger at Odysseus for killing his son Polyphemus so long prevented that hero's return to Ithaca, in the Odyssey. It was enmity against Priam's father Laomedon, who had refused to pay Poseidon and Apollo for building the walls of Troy, that made the god side with the Greeks in the Trojan War. In a contest with Athena for the patronship of Athens, Poseidon lost when the goddess' gift of the olive tree was judged a more valuable boon than Poseidon's horse.

Positivism. A philosophical movement of the 19th century. It was developed under the influence of the new discoveries in the science of the period, particularly outstanding in the thought of Auguste Comte, regarded as its founder. Its chief principles call for: a study of the various sciences and an arrangement of them in a "scale of subordination," with those of greater complexity placed near the top of an ascending series; the assignment of sociology, with its study of past history and contemporary society and its attempts to solve persistent social problems, to a position at the summit of hierarchy; and a belief in the progress of mankind toward a superior state of civilization by means of the science of sociology itself. In the later years of his career, Comte, turning toward mysticism, attempted to convert sociology into a literal Religion of Humanity, with a set creed, rituals, and ceremonies for private and public use, the worship of great men and women of the past, saints' days, etc. As a church, Positivism lasted in France down through the 20th century, although this development of his philosophy alienated a number of early admirers from the side of Comte. J. S. Mill and G. H. Lewes were among the leading disciples of early Positivism in England. George Eliot's poem The Choir Invisible expresses its aspiration. Herbert Croly, first editor of the New Republic, was the first American child to be christened in the faith.

Possessed, The, or The Devils or The Demons (Besy; 1871-1872). A novel by Feodor Dostoevskii. It has two plot lines, one depicting the revolutionary movement in Russia and the other tracing the strange career of Nikolai Stavrogin, the enigmatic central character of the novel. Stavrogin is a brilliant, attractive, but emotionally sterile young nobleman, afflicted with a genuine spiritual nihilism as contrasted to the affected nihilism of the revolutionaries portrayed in the book. Stavrogin indulge in crime and debauchery, infects Shatov and Kirilov with ideas in which he himself does not believe, and accepts the love of Lizaveta Nikolayevna Tushina without being able to return it. On a whim he marries the crippled Marya Timofeyevna Lebyadkin. The leader of the small revolutionary group, Pyotr Verkhovenski, whose character was modeled on that of Sergei Nechayev, tries to persuade Stavrogin to join the conspiracy, knowing what an attraction Stavrogin would be as a figurehead. Verkhovenski manages the murder of Shatov, who has belonged to the revolutionary group and is attempting to break with it. This incident was based on one of Nechayev's notorious exploits. See SHATOV.

The ending of the novel is bloody, with Marya Timofeyevna Lebyadkin and her brother being murdered and their home burned, ostensibly by the terrorists, Lizaveta a victim of mob vengeance, and both Kirilov and Stavrogin committing suicide.

Dostoevski intended the novel to show how lack of organic ties with the Russian people and adherence to Western political ideas wreak havoc with the Russian upper classes, represented by Stavrogin and the hapless revolutionaries. This aim was in part realized, that is, with Stavrogin but not with the revolutionary group who are a caricature, not a portrayal, of the reality in Russia at the time. Dostoevski's own hope for the salvation of his country is expressed by Shatov. The aristocracy must return to the Orthodox faith, which the people have never abandoned, and must lead the people in attaining the high destiny assigned to Russia: saving the world by revealing to it the "new word" of universal love and brotherhood contained in Orthodoxy.

Although he satirized the nihilists, Dostoevski also feared their effect and took them seriously. The epigraph to the novel from which the title comes refers to the demons cast out by Christ into the Gadarene swine. The nihilists in this case are regarded as the swine into which the demons haunting Russian society are cast.

A revolutionary of another generation, Stepan Trofimovich Verkhovenski, Pyotr's father, is dealt with in a more genial manner than the nihilists. Stepan, who lives on the charity of Stavrogin's mother, Vavara Petrovna, typifies the milder radical of the 1840's, the time in which Dostoevski himself was a young Utopian socialist. Stepan is made ridiculous by his perpetual assertions that he is about to be arrested as a dangerous radical, although it is certain that no one fears him. The implication is plain, however, that such harmless drawing-room socialists as Stepan have figuratively, if not literally, fathered the more dangerous generation of nihilists.

One other satirical portrait in the book, that of the writer Karmazinov, is an instance of Dostoevski paying off an old personal foe, the novelist Ivan Turgenev, on whom the characterization was obviously based. Karmazinov is depicted as a dandy worshipper of Western culture, a foppish egoist and poseur. His ostentatious farewell to literature, "Merci," read at a local literary evening, is reminiscent of similar proclamations occasionally issued by Turgenev.

Post, Emily [Price] (1873-1950). American writer on etiquette. Born to wealth and social position, she is best known for Etiquette (1922), which established her as an arbiter of polite American manners.

Post, Melville Davison (1871-1930). American detective-story writer. A lawyer by profession, he is best known for his literate detective stories about Uncle Abner, a shrewd Virginia squire who protects the innocent and rights the wrongs of his community. The best of them were published as Uncle Abner, Master of Mysteries (1918).

Posthumus Leonatus. In Shakespeare's Cymbeline, a "poor but worthy gentleman" who is secretly married to Cymbeline's daughter Imogen. His name comes from the fact that he was born just after his mother died in childbirth.

postimpressionism. A term coined by Roger Fry to denote a movement in modern art. It does not refer to a school, but to artists who sought independent self-expression and a pictorial reality distinct from the impressionist concentration on light effects. Among the most important postimpressionist painters are Cézanne, Gauguin, van Gogh, and Matisse.

Postl, Karl. See Charles Sealsfield.

Postumus. The friend of the poet Horace, to whom, in Ode 14 of Book 2, he addresses the famous words: Eheu fugaces, Postume, Postume, labuntur anni! ("Alas! Postumus, Postumus, the flying years glide by").

Potash and Perlmutter (1910). The first collection of tales by Montague Glass. Dealing with two partners in the cloak-and-suit business, and written in vernacular, the tales were immensely popular and were followed by Abe and Maurrus (1911), Potash and Perlmutter Settle Things (1919), and other volumes. Several of them were successfully dramatized.

Pot-blower. A literary or critical term meaning an inferior piece of work (e.g., a story or a painting) done merely for the sake of money: in other words, to keep the pot boiling, that is, to eat.

Potemkin, Grigori Aleksandrovich (1739-1791). A Russian field marshal and favorite of Empress Catherine of Russia, influential in her councils.

Potiphar Papers (1853). A series of satires by New York society by George William Curtis (1824-1892). The Papers relate the adventures of the newly rich Mr. and Mrs. Potiphar. They were dramatized as Our Best People in 1854. The most popular character was Mrs. Potiphar's friend and adviser, the Reverend Cream Cheese. Curtis, a Rhode Island-born essayist and editor, also wrote True and I (1856), a collection of essays on the theme that wealth is not a requisite of happiness.

Potiphar's wife. In the Old Testament and the Koran, the wife of Joseph's master in Egypt. Joseph fled from her advances, leaving his robe behind him, whereupon she accused him of evil and had him cast into prison (Gen. 34). Some Arabian commentators have called her Rahib, others Zuleika. The theme of this story is familiar in the myth and folklore of many lands, notably in the myth of Pheasdra.

Potocka. Countess Anna. Born Anna Tyczkiewicz (1776-1867). A Polish writer. Her Memoirs are valuable as historic source material. They cover the period from 1794 to 1820 and give an account of Napoleon's stay in Warsaw (1806-1807).

Pot of Earth, The (1925). A long poem by Archibald MacLeish. It is based on the description of an ancient fertility rite in Sir James Frazer's The Golden Bough. Several themes are woven into the story, including that of the sexual maturation, marriage, and death in childbirth of a contemporary girl.

Potter, Beatrix (1866-1943). English writer and illustrator of inimitable stories for children. Her subjects were the rabbits, ducks, squirrels, hedgehogs, and cats that she observed in and near her home in the Lake District. As a young woman, she was kept by her father as a virtual recluse. After her marriage to William Heelas, she lived at Sawrey. Her painted backgrounds are said to have had the emotional feeling of a Constable. Her books include The Tale of Peter Rabbit (privately printed in 1900, published in 1902); The Tale of Benjamin Bunny (1904); The Tale of Tom Kitten (1907); The Roly-Poly Pudding (1908); Jemima Puddleduck (1910). She is the subject of a biography, The Tale of Beatrix Potter, by Margaret Lane (1946).

Potter, Stephen (1900— ). English humorist. He is the author of Theory and Practice of Gamesmanship (1947), Some Notes on Lifemanship (1950), and One-Upmanship.

Potterism (1920). A novel by Rose Macaulay. The work satirizes vulgarity, commercialism, and cheap journalism; hence the word has become a synonym for humbug and hypocrisy.

Poulenc, Francis (1899-1963). A French composer, one of Les Six, known especially for his songs, choral works, and operas. The songs include settings of texts by Apollinaire and Ronsard; operas are based on plays by Apollinaire (Les Mamelles de Tiresias; 1947), Cocteau (La Voix Humaine; 1959), and Bernanos (Les dialogues des Carmélites; 1957); choral works include a Maso in G (1937) for double chorus; Stabat Mater (1951) for soprano solo, chorus, and orchestra; and a striking Gloria (1959) for the same forces.

Poulter's measure. In prosody, a meter consisting of alternate Alexandrines and Fourteeners, that is 12-syllable and 14-syllable lines. The name was given to this meter by George Gascoigne in the 16th century because it was said that poulterers—then called poulterers—used sometimes to give 12 to the dozen, sometimes 14. It was a common measure in Elizabethan times.

Pound, Ezra [Loomis] (1885— ). American poet, editor, and critic. One of the most influential literary figures in modern literature, he was born in Hailey, Idaho, of New England stock. After graduate work at the University of Pennsylvania, Pound went to live in Europe: first in Italy, then in England and France, and finally in Italy again. His first book, a small collection of poems entitled A Lume Spento (1908), was published in Venice. In England he was the guiding spirit and chief promoter of Imagism, a poetic movement that stressed the direct expression of the object without unnecessary rhetoric, the free verse rather than the forced metric, and utter clarity of image and metaphor. During his years in England, Pound edited the first anthology of imagist poetry (1914), founded and edited the vorticist magazine, Blast, served as foreign editor of Poetry and as London editor (1917-1919) of the Little Review. The most influential man of letters of his generation, his importance in the development of modern poetry can scarcely be overstated. He sought publishers for the early works of T. S. Eliot, Wyndham Lewis, James Joyce, William Carlos Williams, and many others. His own poetry during this period was published in Exulltations (1909), Personae, Venetia (1910), Cannoni (1911), Riposte (1912), and Lustra.

Abhorring war and increasingly dissatisfied with the world around him, Pound eventually left England altogether, settling first in France and then in Italy. In the meantime, he had become interested in Chinese poetry, publishing in Cathay (1915) his adaptations of Ernest Fenollosa's translations of the poems of Li Po. He also made a study of Japanese classical drama, publishing Noh, Or Accomplishment in 1916. In 1919 appeared Homage to Sextus Propertius, a broad adaptation of Propertius and a very influential work. Henry Selwyn Mauberley marked Pound's farewell to England and to a period in his own life, expressing his hatred of war, dissatisfaction with the commercialism he felt prevalent in the arts, and growing concern with economic questions. These concerns are also felt in the Cantos, Pound's epic work which he began in 1917—publishing the first sections in Cantos I–XVI (1925)—and continued to write and publish thereafter throughout the years.

Pound's concern with economic problems grew stronger throughout the 1920's and 1930's. Stemming from social credit theories, his views eventually propelled him into an acceptance of Mussolini and fascism. During World War II he started to broadcast fascist propaganda to the U.S. from Rome, an act which led to his arrest in May, 1945, by American forces, his confinement at Pisa (see Tina Pisan Canvros), and his trial in the U.S. Judged insane, Pound was committed to St. Elizabeth's Hospital in Washington, D.C. He remained there from 1946 to 1958, when he was finally released; charges against him were dropped, and he was allowed to return to Italy.

Pound's essays and works of criticism are almost as important as his poetic output. A voluminous contributor to magazines, he has published numerous prose volumes since The Spirit of Romance (1910; rev. 1953). Although literary and cultural questions are raised throughout these publications, from the early 20's on he has spent a growing amount of energy on purely polemical works on economic questions. Pound's prose works include Pavannes and Divisions (1918), Instigations (1920), Indiscretions (1923), Antheil and the Treatise on Harmony (1924), How to Read (1931), ABC of Reading (1934), Polite Essays (1937), Guide to Kulchar (1938; rev. 1951), and The Literary Essays of Ezra Pound, with an introduction by T. S. Eliot (1954).

Although Pound's erudition has often been attacked—from the layman's viewpoint that it is obscure and from the scholar's that it is not without occasional flaws—there is no question but that he has been instrumental in promoting a renewed general interest in the poetry of those periods with which he has been especially concerned, including those of medieval Provence and Anglo-Saxon England.

As has already been noted, Pound's importance is in his total effect as literary critic, essayist, promoter, editor, and adviser, as well as creator, practicing craftsman, and originator.

Poussin, Nicolas (1594–1665). French painter. The great master of the classical school, he worked chiefly at the studio he established in Rome. In his rational, clearly composed paintings of mythological, historical, and religious scenes, he imitated the measured gestures of antique sculpture and the clean draftsmanship and effortless order of Raphael. His work, which exerted an enormous influence on the course of art, embodies the ideal of the classical school, but his principles were later turned into sterile academism by his imitators.

Powell, Anthony [Dymoke] (1905— ). English novelist. His books are comedies of manners and mild social satires directed against the chic world of fashion, the arts, and the upper, moneyed classes. His chief work is a long sequence of novels, a history of our own times, called A Dance to the Music of Time. Other novels by Anthony Powell are Venusberg (1932), a satire on totalitarian government; Afternoon Men (1931), Agents and Patients (1936); and What's Become of Waring? (1939).

Powell, Dawn (1897— ). American novelist. Some of her witty novels are laid in small towns in the West; others deftly satirize the literary and entertainment world of Manhattan. They include Whither (1925), The Bride's House (1929), The Tenth Moon (1932), The Locusts Have No King (1948), Cage for Lovers (1957), and Golden Spur (1962).

Power of Darkness, The (Vlast' t'moy; 1886). A tragedy by Count Leo Tolstoi. The play's epigraph "when one claw is caught, the whole bird is doomed," refers to Nikita, a young peasant, who perpetrates a series of crimes. He seduces a young girl, Marina; poisons Peter, a wealthy peasant, and marries Peter's wife Anisya. He then seduces Anisya's stepdaughter, Akulina, and, when Akulina gives birth to his child, he kills the baby and buries it in the cellar. His conscience finally impels him to make a public confession of his crimes.

One of the outstanding peasant dramas in Russian literature, the play demonstrates that, despite Tolstoi's love for the peasants, he was not blind to their faults. The only character free from the crime and vice so vividly presented is Akim, Nikita's father; he is described as "God-fearing."

Power of Sympathy, The (1789). A novel generally regarded as the first to be written in the U.S. Long attributed to Sarah Wentworth Morton because a subplot resembles an incident in her sister's life, it was probably written by William Hill Brown. In a series of letters it tells how Harrington, the hero, is prevented from marrying the charming but socially inferior Harriot Pawcett by the discovery that she is his half sister. The shock of the discovery kills Harriot and Harrington commits suicide. Brown's purpose was to illustrate "the dangerous Consequences of Seduction" and "the Advantages of Female Education."

Powys, [John] [cowper] (1872–1963). English novelist, essayist, and poet. He was the elder brother of Theodore Francis Powys and Llewelyn Powys, both writers; all three brothers felt a mystical love for nature. John Cowper was a friend and disciple of Thomas Hardy; in the novel Wolf Solvœn the romantic hero retreats from the city to find happiness in the Dorset countryside. He was the author of more than 40 volumes, including The Religion of a Sceptic (1925); A Glastonbury Romance (1932); Autobiography (1934); Enjoyment of Literature (1938); Owen Glendower (1940), a historical romance; The Inmates (1952), a love story set in an insane asylum; and All or Nothing (1960).

Powys, Llewelyn (1884–1939). English essayist. He wrote sketches based on his experiences in East Africa (Ebony and Ivory, 1923), in Swiss tuberculosis sanatoria (Skin for Skin, 1925), and in Israel, the U.S., and Dorset. Earth Memories (1934) and Dorset Essays (1935) are among his best collections. See John Cowper Powys.
Powys, T[heodore] F[rancis] (1875–1953). English novelist and short-story writer, the most original and best remembered of the three Powys brothers (see John Cowper Powys). Powys, who spent his whole life in the same Dorset village, wrote of village life with realism, grim humor, and a sense of life's tragedy, oddness, and mystery. Among his novels are The Left Leg (1923), Mr. Tasker's Gods (1925), Mr. Westron's Good Wine, Uncal (1931), and The Two Thieves (1932). God's Eyes A-Twinkle (1947) is a collection of short stories.

Praetor. In Jonathan Swift's Journal to Stella, a cryptic abbreviation and pet name for Stella. It recurs throughout James Joyce's Finnegans Wake, where H. C. Earwicker uses it as a pet name for his daughter Isobel. See Pr ess to.

Praho. The national museum of painting and sculpture in Madrid, Spain. It is next to the famous fashionable promenade of the same name. The word means "meadow."

Praho, Nicolas (1632–1698). French playwright. His Phèdre et Hippolyte (Phaedra and Hippolytus, 1677), written and produced as part of an intrigue against the Phèdre of Racine, influenced the latter to abandon the theater.

Praed, Winthrop Mackworth (1802–1839). English poet and parliamentarian. As the schoolboy editor of the Etonian (1820), in which some of his best poems appeared, Praed early achieved a minor literary reputation. He was elected to Commons in 1830, enlarging on his Cambridge reputation for brilliant oratory. Much of his verse is political; it is witty, but too topical to retain much interest. His best work is his graceful, amusing vers de société, published in numerous periodicals and collected in his Poems (1864).

praetor. In ancient Rome, one of 8 magistrates whose duty was to administer justice. They correspond roughly to modern Supreme Court justices. After his year in office, the praetor often went as pro praetor to govern a province. See curatus honorum.

Praetorian Guard. In Roman history, the imperial bodyguard. It was organized by Augustus on the basis of the older praetorian cohorts, the bodyguards of the praetors. The Praetorian Guard grew more and more powerful, and many emperors were hardly more than its puppets. It survived to the time of Constantine the Great.

Praga, Emilio (1839–1875). Italian poet, painter, and short-story writer. A member of the Scapigliatura circle of young writers, Praga recounted personal experiences and depicted scenes with the eye of an impressionist painter in both his prose and verse. His poetry was published in collections whose titles indicate its coloristic quality: Easel (Tavolozza; 1862); Pale Shades (Penombre; 1864), Transparencies (Trasparenze; 1875), and Fiabe e Leggende (1867). His most successful prose work, Le Memorie del Presbitero, Scene di Provincia (1877), narrates the author's eventful stay in a priest's home in a remote Alpine village. The diary-novel was left unfinished at the time of Praga's death.

pragmatism (from Gr. pragma, "deed"). The philosophical doctrine that the only test of the truth of human cognitions or philosophical principles is their practical results. It does not admit "absolute" truth, as all truths change their trueness as their practical utility increases or decreases. The word was introduced in this connection about 1875 by the American logician C. S. Peirce, and was popularized by William James, whose Pragmatism: A New Name for Some Old Ways of Thinking, lectures delivered at the Lowell Institute and Columbia University (1906–1907), was published in 1907.

Prairie, The (1827). A novel by James Fenimore Cooper, in the Leatherstocking Tales series. The story centers around the death of the aged Natty Bumppo. Cooper contrasts the noble, disinterested Natty with the squatter Ishmael Bush and his family. Lawless and self-seeking, the squatters portend ill for the future of democracy. Cooper's prairie descriptions, which include an effective buffalo stampede and prairie fire, are derived from the Journals of Lewis and Clark.

Prasilico. A Babylonian knight in the Orlando Innamorato of Matteo Maria Boiardo. He fights beside his friend Iroldo at the siege of Albraccia. Earlier, he has fallen in love with Tisbina, Iroldo's wife. To divert him from suicide, she promises her love if he can fulfill certain impossible tasks. When he actually accomplishes them, Tisbina and Iroldo decide to take poison as the only honorable solution. Prasilico resolves to do the same, but the poison turns out to be harmless. Now Iroldo nobly decides to give up Tisbina and leave. Later, Prasilico flies to rescue his friend and risks his own life to save him.

Prater. A famous Viennese park. It is located on an island formed by the Danube and the Danube Canal. It was opened to the public in 1766 by Emperor Joseph II. The name (like Prado, derived from Lat. pratum, meadow) is often used for the amusement park, which is actually but a small part of the Prater.

Pratolini, Vasco (1913– ). Italian novelist. His novels, which reflect the socialist ideology of his political convictions, characteristically describe the working-class quarters of his native Florence. Among his best-known works are The Naked Streets (Il Quartiere; 1945), Cronaca Familiare (1947), A Tale of Poor Lovers (Cronache di Poveri Amanti; 1947), A Hero of Our Time (Un Eroe del Nostro Tempo; 1949), and Le Ragazze di San Frediano (1961). He also wrote a trilogy called Una Storia Italiana, composed of the novels Metello (1955), Lo Scialo (The Shawl, 1960), and La Costanza della Ragione (1963).

Pratt, Edwin John (1883–1964). Canadian poet. A native of Newfoundland, Pratt is best known for his heroic narratives. The most famous of these, Brebeuf and His Brethren (1940), deals with the Jesuit martyrs of North America. His other epics include The Witch's Brew (1925), The Roosevelt and the Antinö (1930), and Towards the Last Spike (1952). They are concerned, respectively, with alcoholic prohibition, a rescue at sea, and the construction of Canada's first transcontinental railway.

prayer wheel. A device used by the Tibetan Buddhists as an aid to or substitute for prayer. The use of the prayer wheel is said to be founded on a misinterpretation of the Buddha's instructions to his followers that they should "turn the wheel of the law"—that is, preach Buddhism incessantly. A prayer wheel consists of a pasteboard cylinder inscribed with or containing the mystic formula om mani padme hum and other prayers. Each revolution represents one repetition of the prayers.

Prescher, the. The author of the Old Testament book Ecclesiastes, once reputed to be Solomon.

Précieuses Ridicules, Les (The Ridiculous Snobs, 1659). A 1-act prose comedy by Molière. The first of Molière’s satires on a foible of contemporary society, it narrates how Madelon and Cathos, daughters of a provincial bourgeois and ardent admirers of the affectations of Parisian society, reject their suitors as insuffisamment ornate in speech and dress; they will have no proposals without the garish and flamboyance described in the novels of Madeleine de Scudéry. The suitors avenge themselves by sending their valets to call on the ladies disguised as a marquis and a viscomte. The ladies are ravished by the extravagant behavior of their visitors, whom they take for men of the highest fashion, but when the trickery is revealed they are suitably mortified.

Precious Bane (1925). A novel by Mary Webb. Set in the English county of Shropshire, it is a story of harsh farming life, and fierce, morose country people. Prudence Sarn, the narrator, finds a husband who appreciates her in spite of her bare lip. The novel became extremely popular when Stanley Baldwin, then prime minister, wrote an introduction to it in 1928. See also Cold Comfort Farm. The title is from Milton’s Paradise Lost:

Let none admire That riches grow in Hell; that soil may best Deserve the precious bane.

Prelude, The (1850). A long autobiographical poem by William Wordsworth. It shows the growth of a poet’s mind by tracing his own life from childhood on. Completed in 1805, it underwent many revisions before it was published. Wordsworth originally dedicated the poem to his friend Samuel Taylor Coleridge.

Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood. A group of artists and poets formed in London in 1848 originally consisting of Holman Hunt, John Everett Millais, and Dante Gabriel Rossetti. The discovery, in reproductions, of early Italian paintings led them to adopt the title of Pre-Raphaelites and thus to stress their rejection of academism, which they traced to Raphael and the High Renaissance. The Brotherhood’s publication, The Germ, was started in 1850 under the editorship of William Michael Rossetti, but only four numbers were published. Its object was “to enforce and encourage an entire adherence to the simplicity of nature,” a principle applied to the writing of poetry as well as painting.

The artists in the brotherhood painted scenes of the childhood of Christ and the Virgin and represented contemporary scenes with a moral message; as a whole, the group had a strongly religious and moralizing cast. Accepted when they first exhibited in 1849, they were bitterly attacked the following year, notably by Charles Dickens, and thereafter became the target of raging criticism. They gained the powerful support of John Ruskin, who seriously advocated their principles. The group broke up in 1854, but enjoyed a brief revival through the young William Morris and Edward Burne-Jones in 1856 at Oxford. See Fleshy School of Poetry.

Presbyterian. Pertaining to one of the Churches of Calvinistic origin. In it, as in the early Christian Church, the presbyter or elders are the medium through which the members govern the church.

Prescott, William Hickling (1796–1859). American historian. Prescott lost the use of his left eye in his junior year at Harvard when it was struck with a hard crust of bread thrown by a playful classmate. Shortly after his graduation, his right eye was seriously impaired. Wealthy enough to pay assistants and aided by a device called a noctograph, he was able to devote his life to historical research and composition. Prescott’s high standards of scholarship and his ability to write dramatic, exciting narrative are most evident in the History of the Conquest of Mexico (1843) and History of the Conquest of Peru (1847), the works for which he is best known. He also wrote History of the Reign of Ferdinand and Isabella (1838) and History of the Reign of Philip the Second (1855–1858).

President of the U.S. The chief executive of the U.S. According to the Constitution, he must be a native-born American and must be at least 35 years of age. The original document did not impose restrictions on the number of four-year terms a president might serve, but no president had served more than two until Franklin Delano Roosevelt violated the tradition in 1940 by running for and winning a third term; as a result of the ratification (1947) of the 22nd amendment, the president is now limited to two terms.

Presster John (John the Presbyter). A legendary Christian king and priest, supposed in medieval times to have reigned in the 12th century over a wonderful country somewhere in the heart of Asia. He appears in Ariosto's Orlando Furioso (1516), having furnished materials for a host of medieval legends including that of the Holy Grail.

According to Sir John Mandeville, he was a lineal descendant of Ogier the Dane, who penetrated into the north of India with 15 of his barons, among whom he divided the land. John was made sovereign of Teneduc and was called Prester because he converted the natives. Another tradition says he had 70 kings for his vassals, and was seen by his subjects only three times a year. So firm was the belief in his existence that Pope Alexander III (d. 1181), sent him letters by a special messenger. The messenger never returned. It is possible that the legend of Prester John rose from travelers' reports of colonies of Nestorian Christians encountered in Asia.

Prester the Old Pretender. James Francis Edward Stuart (1688–1766), only son of James II. He played one of the principal roles in the Jacobite cause. He appears as a character in Thackeray's Henry Esmond. See Fifteen, The; Warming Pans.

The Young Pretender. Charles Edward Louis Philip Casimir Stuart (1720–1788), son of the Old Pretender and grandson of James II, sometimes called "the Chevalier" or "Bonnie Prince Charlie." As a result of his unsuccessful attempt to seize the Hanoverian throne (see the Forty-Five), the hereditary jurisdiction of the Highland chiefs was taken away. He appears as a character in Scott's Waverly, and again in Red Gauntlets, disguised as Father Buona-ventura.

Prevert, Jacques (1900– ). French poet and screenwriter. Sometimes the lyricism of Prevert is turned to a mockingly satiric purpose; sometimes it is tender, wistful, evocative of gentle melancholy. In his popular Connaître le Spectacle (1946) and Spectacle (1951) he ridicules the conformity and conventions of his world, while he praises the simple joys of love, of color and smell and sound. Prevert wrote scenarios for the films of Marcel Carné, among them Les Enfants du Paradis and Les Portes de la Nuit.

Prévost d'Exiles, Antoine François, known as Abbé Prévo (1697–1763). French novelist and journalist. Prévoit vacillated in his youth between a career in the army and one in the church, but, after entering the Benedictine order, his taste for a worldly life won. He feared ecclesiastical reprimands and fled to Holland (1729) and to England (1733), but returned to France in 1734. In order to earn money he wrote the seven-volume work Mémoires et aventures d'un homme de qualité (1728), the last volume of which contains his most famous story L'Histoire du Chevalier des Grieux et de Manon Lescaut (1731). From 1733 to 1740, he published a periodical journal Le Pour et le contre. His other works include the romantic novel Histoire de M. Cleveland (1732–39) and Le Doyen de Killerine (1735). Through his translations of several of Richardson's novels, Prévoit helped to introduce English literature into France.

Priam (Priamos). In Greek legend, king of Troy when that city was sacked by the Greeks, husband of Hecuba, and father of fifty children. Among the children were Hector, Helenus, Paris, Deiphobus, Pylxena, Troilus, Cassandra, and Polydorus. When Hector was slain, the old king went to the tent of Achilles and made a successful plea for the body of his dead son. After the gates of Troy were thrown open by the Greeks concealed in the wooden horse, Pyrrhus, the son of Achilles, slew the aged Priam. See Trojan War.

Priamide. See Faerie Queene, The.

Priapos (Priapos). In Greek mythology, the ithyphallic god of reproductive power and fertility (hence of gardens) and protector of shepherds, fishermen, and farmers. In later times he was regarded as the chief deity of lasciviousness and obscenity.

Price, Fanny. See Mansfield Park.

Prichard, Katherine [Susannah] (1884– ). Australian novelist. Although born in Fiji, she was brought to Tasmania at the age of 3, and in time became the most distinctively Australian of writers. She taught in outback schools of Victoria and New South Wales, and spent six years in London, where the condition of the working class deeply stirred her sympathies. Because of these observations she became an apostle of what one critic called "extreme democracy." Her book Wild Oats of Han (1928) is largely autobiographical. During a literary period of 36 years, she published nine novels, two volumes of short stories and several plays. Her books include The Pioneers (1915), which won the 1,000-pound prize in an all-British novel competition; Black Opal (1921), a study of social relationships of the opal mining community; Working Bullocks (1926), considered her best novel; Coomaardo (1929), a story of the relations between whites and the unspoilt blacks at an isolated northwestern station; Hazby's Circus (1930); and Intimate Strangers (1937).

Prick of Conscience, The (early 14th century). A Middle English religious poem, of 9624 lines in rhymed couplets. Long attributed to Richard Rolle of Hampole, it was the most popular poem in 14th-century England, describing the wretched nature of man and his inevitable sentence to the tortures of Hell or the joys of Heaven.

Pride, Thomas. See Pride's Purge.

Pride and Prejudice (1813). A novel by Jane Austen. The story concerns the middle-class household of the Bennets. The empty-headed and garrulous Mrs. Bennet has but one aim in life: to find a good match for each of her five daughters. Mr. Bennet, a mild and indolent man given to witty cynisms, refuses to take this vulgar project seriously; he ridicules his wife instead of giving her support in her schemes. One of the daughters, Elizabeth, becomes prejudiced against her future suitor, Darcy, because of his arrogance and his uncalled-for interference with his friend Bingley's courtship of her sister Jane. In interfering with Jane and Bingley, Darcy is influenced by Mrs. Bennet's undisguised husband-hunt and her impropriety in general; he mistakenly believes that Jane is only seeking an advantageous match and that her feelings are not sincere. In spite of his disapproval of the Bennet family, Darcy cannot keep himself from falling in love with Elizabeth and he proposes to her. The tone of the proposal (it is evident that his love for Elizabeth is a blow to his pride) and her own prejudice cause Elizabeth coldly to reject him. His subsequent support of a renewal of Bingley's suit with Jane and his sensitive assistance throughout the foolish elopement of young Lydia Bennet with an officer, Wickham, show Darcy's ability to recognize and correct his own false pride, and Elizabeth's prejudice dissolves. The two are reconciled and the book ends with their marriage and the marriage of Bingley and Jane. The novel contains two of Jane Austen's best-known minor characters, Mr. Collins and Lady Catherine de Bourgh.

Pride's Purge (1648). The forcible expulsion from the LONG PARLIAMENT of over 100 members who were inclined to compromise with the Royalist party. Acting under orders from the Parliamentary army, two regiments of soldiers led by Thomas Pride (d. 1658) entered the House of Commons and ousted the offending members. The remainder, about 60 in number, became known as the RUMP PARLIAMENT.

Priest, Judge. A well-known character appearing in a number of stories by Irvin S. Cobb. A wise Kentucky judge, Priest acts as a local Solomon in getting people out of trouble and solving their problems with deep insight into human nature. Old Judge Priest (1915), the first of these books, was followed by Down Yonder with Judge Priest and Irvin S. Cobb (1932). J. Poindexter, Colored (1922) is a novel about the judge's servant Jeff. Judge Priest Turns Detective was published in 1937.

Priestley, [J(hen)] B(oynton) (1894— ). English novelist, playwright, and essayist. Priestley is best known as the author of the novel THE GOOD COMPANIONS. He is a fervent believer in the goodness of life, people, England, and humor, and many of his most successful works are happy comedies, full of Dickensian characters. Among his novels are Be-nighted (1927, U.S. title The Old Dark House), Farthing Hall (1929, with Hugh Walpole), Angel Pavement, Faraway (1932), Wonder Hero (1933), The Doomsday Man (1938), Let the People Sing (1940), Bright Day (1946), and Festival at Farbrige (1951, U.S. title Festival).

Priestley's plays fall into two groups. Some are middle-class domestic comedies with some mild social commentary: DANGEROUS CORNER, Laburnam Grove (1933), Eden End (1933), and An Inspector Calls (1946). Others, influenced by the time theories of John William Dunne, are experimental dramas concerned with problems of time: I Have Been Here Before (1937), Time and the Conways, and Johnson Over Jordan. They Came to a City (1943) is a fable about a utopia and the reactions of various persons to it.

Other works by Priestley are books of criticism, including The English Comic Characters (1925) and Literature and Western Man (1960). His social and political books include English Journey (1934), an account of some mining and industrial areas during the depression, and The Arts Under Socialism (1947). Among his volumes of autobiography and essays are Midnight in the Desert (1937), an evocation of a winter in Arizona: Room Upon Godshill (1939); and Journey Down a Rainbow (1955), an account of New Mexico, written in collaboration with his third wife, Jaqueta Hawkes.

Priestley, Joseph (1733–1804). English clergyman, chemist, and philosopher who pursued fruitful investigations into the nature of electrical discharges and discovered what is now called oxygen (1774). His theory of government, as set forth in his Essay on the First Principles of Government (1768), stipulates that the happiness of the majority is the great standard of all good government. He also published several works on religion, notably History of the Corruption of Christianity (1782) which was burned (1785) by order of the authorities. He spent the last decade of his life in the U.S. after his home in Birmingham, England, had been burned by a mob infuriated because of his sympathies with the French Revolution.

Primaticcio, Francesco (1504–1570). Italian painter from Bologna. A follower of the mannerists PONTORMO and Rosso, he took his skill in large-scale decoration to France, where he founded the so-called School of Fontainebleau with Rosso and Niccolò dell'Abbate (1509–1571). This importation of Italian Renaissance style influenced French artists who studied the decoration, in fresco and stucco, of the great Fontainebleau château.

primitivism. Term applied to a persistent tendency in European literature, art, and thought since the 18th century, stimulated by the acquisition of foreign colonies of low cultural development and by new discoveries in scholarship and the social sciences, to attribute superior virtue to primitive, non-European civilizations. J. J. Rousseau was the first notable primitivist, with his doctrine of the natural man, and the widespread 18th-century veneration of the NOBLE SAVAGE had an important influence on the romantic movement. See ROMANTICISM. The American Indian was a favorite early exemplar of the Noble Savage. Later, primitivism expanded to include among the objects of its enthusiasm the violent, the crude, undeveloped, ignorant, naive, nonintellectual or subintelligent of any kind, such as peasants, children, and idiots.

The following are literary figures of the 18th, 19th, and 20th centuries whose work embodies primitivism in one or another of its aspects: Macpherson (pseu-

Dossian poems); Blake (innocence, childhood); Wordsworth (peasants, children, idiot boys); Chateaubriand and James Fenimore Cooper (the American Indian); Richard Wagner (pre-Christian religion and myth); Feodor Dostoevski (children, idiots); Tolstoi (peasants); Rimbaud (sadism, violence, the occult); Huysmans and the Decadents (sadism, violence, the cult of sensation); Pierre Loti (South Sea Islands); D. H. Lawrence (the mystical role of sex, the cult of sensation, primitive religion and ritual); Sherwood Anderson and Carl Van Vechten (the American Negro); and Ernest Hemingway (violence, cult of sensation). Primitivists in painting include Millet and van Gogh (peasants), and Henri Rouseau, a naive, self-taught painter, was a favorite among primitivist art groups in the early part of the 20th century.

Primrose, Dr. Charles. The hero of Oliver Goldsmith's novel THE VICAR OF WAKEFIELD. He is a guileless, charitable, and unworlly clergyman.

Mrs. Deborah Primrose. The vicar's wife, full of motherly vanity, desirous to appear genteel, and ambitious for her two daughters.
primum mobile

George Primrose. The Oxford-bred son of the vicar. He becomes Captain Primrose and marries Arabella Wilmor, an heiress.

Olivia Primrose. The eldest daughter of the vicar. Pretty, enthusiastic, eager for adventure, she elopes with the unprincipled Squire Thornhill, who then abandons her after what seems to be a false marriage.

Sophia Primrose. The second daughter of Dr. Primrose. She is twice rescued by Sir William Thornhill: once, when she is thrown from her horse into a deep stream; and, once, when she is abducted by her nephew's design.

primum mobile. \(\text{Lat., the first moving thing.}\)
In the Ptolemaic system of astronomy, the ninth (later the tenth) sphere. It was supposed to revolve around the earth from east to west in 24 hours, carrying with it all the other spheres.

Prince, The (II Principe). A controversial political treatise by Niccolò Machiavelli. Written during an enforced exile and dedicated to the Medici, it was completed by 1517 in 26 chapters. The opening chapters discuss the various types of principalities and in particular the difficulties of maintaining power in a newly acquired state. Examples of how rulers of the past and present handled new conquests suggest that one must often be ruthlessly despotic as well as cunningly magnanimous to keep corrupt human nature in obedience. Caesar Borgia is offered as a model prince; through the exercise of virtù (personal dynamism) and the adoption of force and fraud, he was able to maintain territories originally obtained through the influence of his father, Pope Alexander VI. His eventual failure is attributed to malign fortune, which influences the affairs of men even though it would be better to act on the assumption that it does not.

The importance of the soldiery and the use of citizen soldiers instead of militia and auxiliaries are defended in the middle chapters. Then the author takes up the character of the ruler, asserting that, although it is desirable to have a reputation for virtue, it is foolish to act in such a way that public applause comes before retention of power. Cruelty is sometimes mercy in disguise; it is much safer to be feared than loved. It is laudable to keep faith, but if necessary one must combine the cunning of the fox and the violence of the lion. A prudent prince avoids flatterers and sycophants.

In his final chapter, Machiavelli exhorts the princes of Italy to unite and expel the barbarians who are occupying its land.

Prince and the Pauper, The (1881). A novel by Mark Twain. Edward VI of England and a little pauper change places a few days before Henry VIII's death. The prince wanders in rags, while Tom Canty suffers the horrors of princesdom. At the last moment, the mistake is rectified. The book, dedicated to Twain's two daughters, is a favorite among children.

Prince of Parthia, The (pub. 1765). A tragedy in blank verse by Thomas Godfrey. The first play written by an American, it was produced at the Southwark Theatre in Philadelphia on April 24, 1767. The plot deals with a villainous Parthian prince who murders his father and deprives his elder brother of the throne.

princeps (Lat., "first citizen"). The title assumed by Augustus Caesar upon establishing his new government in Rome in 27 B.C. Instead of adopting a more pretentious title, he chose princeps which was in good republican tradition, thus concealing his absolute authority behind a façade of republicanism. The term principate, derived from this, is applied to the form of government prevailing between 27 B.C. and A.D. 284.

Prince's Progress, The (1866). An allegorical poem by Christina Rossetti about a procrastinating Prince Charming who reaches his princess-bride to find she has died of despair while waiting for him.

Princess, The (1847). A long narrative poem by Alfred Tennyson, especially noted for the songs introduced. Its general subject is the new woman, and its heroine, Ida, becomes the founder of a university to which only women are admitted. The Gilbert and Sullivan comic opera, Princess Ida (1884), is a "respectable operatic perversion" of The Princess.

Princess Casamassima, The (1886). A novel by Henry James. The Princess Casamassima is the former Christina Light, who appears in Roderick Hudson; now, unhappily married, she decides to make a first-hand study of poverty and radicalism in London. The hero of the book is Hyacinth Robinson, the illegitimate son of an English nobleman and a Frenchwoman; though brought up in the London slums and a member of a radical underground movement, he makes his way into upper-class society, meets the princess, and is selected by the revolutionaries to commit an assassination.

Princesse de Clèves, La (1678). A novel by the comtesse de La FAYETTE. It deals with the struggle of the princess of Clèves to remain loyal to her husband though drawn to the duc de Nemours. She eventually confesses her feelings to the prince, who dies in bitterness and despair. Focusing upon the characters' states of mind, the book is a precursor of the psychological novel and, as such, is of considerable importance in French literary history.

Princip, Gavriol (1893–1918). A Serbian student. He assassinated the Austrian Archduke Francis Ferdinand at Sarajevo (June 28, 1914), precipitating the first World War.

principate. See Princeps.

Principia (1687). A work by Sir Isaac NEWTON. Its full title is Philosophiae Naturalis Principia Mathematica (Lat., "the mathematical principles of natural philosophy"). The book is divided into three parts: "The Motion of Bodies," "The Motion of Bodies in Resisting Media," and "The System of the World." Because of its presentation of the law of gravitation and of Newton's rules for reasoning from physical events, its appearance signified the beginning of a new era in scientific investigation.

printer's devil. A printer's boy. Formerly a boy was employed to remove each newly printed sheet from a cylinder of the press. A 17th-century writer said, "They do so commonly so black and bedaub themselves that the workmen do jovocely call them devils." The black slave employed by Aldo Manuzio, a Venetian printer, was thought to be an imp, and Manuzio found it necessary in 1490 to issue a proclamation which read:
I, Aldo Manuzio, printer to the Doge, have this day made public exposure of the printer’s devil. All who think he is not flesh and blood may come and pinch him.

Prinz Friedrich von Homburg (1821). A play by Heinrich von Kleist. Prince Friedrich, cavalry general under the elector of Brandenburg in a war against the Swedes, dreams on the night before a crucial battle that he will be crowned with glory and will win the hand of the elector’s niece Natalie. In the battle itself, however, he is confused and excited by the apparent nearness of his greatest desires; he attacks before the order is given, and though his charge carries the day, he is condemned to death for insubordination. He breaks down and begs for pardon, but when the decision about his fate is put in his own hands, he realizes the justice of the sentence and resigns himself to death. It is then that he is pardoned and, in a nearly exact repetition of the first dream scene, his dreams come true.

Prior, Matthew (1664–1721). English poet and diplomat, known chiefly for his epigrams, satires, and “society” verse. While still at Cambridge, Prior wrote with his friend Charles Montagu a clever attack on John Dryden, The Hind and the Panther Transversed, or The Story of the Country-Mouse and the City-Mouse (1687). His major works include Alma: Or, the Progress of the Soul, a long philosophical poem on worldly vanity in the form of a dialogue between Prior and his friend Richard Shelton; Henry and Emma, a paraphrase of the sixteenth-century Nut-Brown Maid; Solomon on the Vanity of the World; Down-Hall (1723), a ballad concerning a journey through Essex; Carmen Saeculare (1700), an “occasional” piece on William III; The Secretary (1696), a long poem recalling his experiences in diplomacy; and several prose works. Prior took part in several important European treaty negotiations of his time, including the Treaty of Ryswick (1697) and the Peace of Utrecht (1713), known as Matt’s peace.

Prioresse’s Tale, The. One of the Canterbury Tales of Geoffrey Chaucer, a legendary miracle of the Virgin told in Rhyme Royal. After an invocation to the Virgin Mary, the Prioresse piously tells the story of a seven-year-old schoolboy who learns a hymn in honor of Mary and sings it on his way through the Jewish ghetto to school. Satan inspires the Jews to cut his throat and cast him in a pit; but Christ and Mary take pity on his anxious mother, and the child miraculously begins to sing again, so that his body is found and the murderers are hanged. The boy explains that Mary has laid a grain upon his tongue and commanded him to sing until it is removed, when she will take him to her. The abbot removes the grain, and the martyr gives up the ghost and is buried. The Prioresse concludes with an allusion to the slaying of Hugh of Lincoln.

Priscian (fl. A.D. 500). A Latin grammarian at Constantinople. He is the author of Institutionis Grammaticae, which was so highly regarded as authoritative in the Middle Ages that the Latin phrase diminuere Prisciani caput (“to break Priscian’s head”) came into use when speaking of a violation of the rules of grammar.

Prisoner of Chillon, The (1816). A poem by Lord Byron. It is freely based on the imprisonment of François de Bonnivard, a 16th-century Genevan prelate and politician, in the dungeon of Chillon on the edge of Lake Leman. In the poem, he and his two brothers, victims of religious persecution, are chained in a lightless cell. The brothers die, are buried in the floor of the cell; years later the survivor is released—it hardly matters to him:

My very chains and I grew friends,
So much a long communion tends To make us what we are—even I Gain’d my freedom with a sigh.

Prisoner of Grace, A (1952). The first novel in a trilogy by Joyce Cary. The story of Chester Nimmo, dynamic liberal politician, is told by his wife Nina, who is completely under his spell. Except the Lord (1953) is Nimmo’s own story of his early struggles and ideals. Not Honour More (1955) is an account of Nimmo by Nina’s second husband, Jim Latter, who thinks that his predecessor has really been a ruthless, time-serving hypocrite.

Prisoner of Zenda, The (1894). A popular romance by Anthony Hope Hawkins. For three months the English hero, Rudolf Rassendyll, impersonates the king of Ruritania, who is being held captive in the castle of Zenda. Rudolf finally secures the king’s release, surrendering the crown and the hand of his beloved Princess Flavia to the rightful ruler. Though not the first novel of its kind, The Prisoner of Zenda began a trend of best-seller romances of high political adventure, a trend that lasted for 10 years.

Prisonnière, L. See Remembrance of Things Past.

Pritchett, V[ictor] S[awdon] (1900– ). English novelist, short-story writer, and literary critic. His early stories, such as Marching Spain (1928), were set in Spain, while his later works are often Dickensian comedies about working-class types. Among his books are Mr. Bellocque (1951), a satire of suburban life, and When My Girl Comes Home (1961), a collection of short stories. Pritchett is literary editor of the New Statesman and Nation.

Private Life of the Master Race (Furcht und Elend des Dritten Reiches; 1938). A loose collection of realistic dramatic scenes by Bertolt Brecht. It is an open attack on Nazism, the literal translation of its German title being “Fear and Misery of the Third Reich.”

Private Papers of Henry Ryecroft, The (1903). A novel by George Gissing. The first part of the book is a brief biography of Ryecroft, whose diary Gissing is ostensibly publishing. The diary itself is divided into four sections: Spring, Summer, Autumn, and Winter, which contain reflections or penses on the human condition.

Privy Council. The council chosen by the English sovereign originally to administer public affairs. By the 20th century it was never summoned as a whole except to proclaim the successor to the Crown on the death of the sovereign. The business of the Privy Council is now performed by committees (of which the Cabinet is technically one), such as the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and the great departments of State, such as the Board of Trade, Local Government Board, and Board of Education. All these are, in theory, merely committees of the Privy Council.
Prix Goncourt.
The most sought-after and highly respected French literary prize. Established in 1903 under the terms of the will of Edmond Goncourt, it is given annually to the best volume of imaginative work in prose published during the year. In cases of a tie, novels are to be given preference over collections of short stories or sketches. The awarding of the prize is decided by the Académie Goncourt, an institution founded in 1903 in compliance with Goncourt's specifications. Consisting of 10 members, whose annual salary of 60 francs has never varied, the academy attempts to recognize and reward originality of talent and new and daring efforts in thought and form. The Goncourt prize is only 50 new francs, but it assures, on the average, a sale of 150,000 copies and royalties of 200,000 new francs to author and publisher alike. The record sale for a Goncourt winner was set by Robert Merle's Week-end à Zuydcoote, which printed 235,000 copies. Though the Prix Goncourt has established the reputation of numerous young writers, from Henri Barbusse (1914) to André Malraux (1955), it has not prevented that other recipients from falling into oblivion even during their lifetime—e.g., for example, André Saviolle (1912), Henri Deberly (1926), Marius Grout (1943) and Paul Colin (1950). The recipients of the Goncourt prize since its inception are:

Proclus (Proklos; c. 410–485). A Greek Neoplatonic philosopher. Also known as the Successor because of his position as head of the Platonist Academy, Proclus presented the fullest systematization and extension of the Neoplatonic position. The last important pagan Greek philosopher, Proclus’ life was related by his student Marinus. Forty-four years after Proclus died, the Emperor Justinian closed the schools of philosophy.

Proene. In classic myth the sister of Philomela and wife of Teresus.

Procopius. A Byzantine historian who was private secretary (a.d. 527) to Belisarius, general of Justinian I, and accompanied him on his campaigns in the Persian, Vandal, and Gothic wars.

Procris. In classic myth, the jealous wife of Cephalus.

Procrustes (Prokoustes). In Greek legend, a robber of Attica. He placed all who fell into his arms upon an iron bed. If they were longer than the bed he cut off the redundant part; if shorter, he stretched them till they fitted it. He was slain by Theseus. He is also called Damastes.

Procter, Bryan Waller. Pen name: Barry Cornwall (1787–1874). English poet, author, better known for his friendship with many 19th-century authors than for his own work. He was close to such figures as Lamb, Leigh Hunt, Hazlitt, Scott, and later, Browning, Dickens, Thackeray, and Swinburne. A few lyrics of his Poetical Works (1822) survive, as does his biography, Charles Lamb (1866). His daughter Adelaide Anne Procter (1825–1864) is remembered for her poem The Lost Chord.

prodigal son. A repentant sinner from the parable of the prodigal son who “wasted his substance with riotous living” in a far country, but returned to his father’s house and was forgiven (Luke 15.11–32). It has become a familiar motif in literature, as evidenced, for example, in Prince Hal’s repentant behavior in Shakespeare’s Henry IV, Part II (1598). It is the title of an oratorio by Arthur Sullivan (1869).

Professor, The (1938). A novel by Rex Warner. It is a political allegory about an idealistic, impractical president who is used as a tool by the extreme right and left in his government and is finally destroyed.

Professor Bernhardt (1912). A play by Arthur Schnitzler. In order to prevent a young girl from learning prematurely of her impending death, a Jewish medical professor prevents a priest from going to see her. The play is concerned with the religious and political consequences of this action, and develops into a critique of many trends in the society of the time, including anti-Semitism.

Professor's House, The (1925). A novel by Willa Cather. The central character is Godfrey St. Peter, a middle-aged professor who is victimized by his wife's ambition and his daughter's desire for a higher social position. The Southwest, in which Miss Cather had become increasingly interested, contributes numerous incidents and motifs, and her characters find the cliff dwellers' homes beautiful and deeply significant.

Progress and Poverty (1879). A treatise on economics by Henry George. The author tries to analyze why there is an increase in poverty with the increasing prosperity of a nation and attributes the cause to private ownership of land and the rising rate of rent in proportion to the rising value of the land. George's proposed solution is his famous single tax, by which only the return from rented land is made subject to taxation.

Progressive Party. In U.S. history, the name of three political parties. (1) The Progressive Party of 1912, also known as the Bull Moose Party, consisted of Republicans who had withdrawn from their party when it nominated W. H. Taft and not Theodore Roosevelt for president. In the ensuing election, Woodrow Wilson, the Democratic candidate, became president, but Roosevelt, with 88 electoral votes, ran ahead of Taft.

(2) The Progressive Party of 1924 represented dissident agrarian and labor groups. It nominated Robert La Follette for president on a platform of radical character. He received over five million votes in the election:

(3) The Progressive Party of 1948 consisted mainly of Democrats opposed to the election of Harry S. Truman. It nominated Henry A. Wallace for the presidency on a platform of friendship for Russia and of numerous radical doctrines. Wallace polled over a million votes.

Prokofiev, Sergei Sergeyevitch (1891-1953). Russian composer and pianist. His best-known works include the Classical Symphony (1917), the opera Love for Three Oranges (1921; based on a comedy by Carlo Gozzi), and a fairy tale for narrator and orchestra Peter and the Wolf (1936). His later works are mostly unsuccessful attempts to comply with the Soviet ideal of "socialist realism."

Prokosch, Frederic (1908- ). American poet and novelist. His poetry is marked by rich, sensuous imagery and an atmosphere of decay; his novels at first inclined toward the poetic, later becoming more sharply realistic. The Assassins (1936), The Carnival (1938), Death at Sea (1940), and Chosen Poems (1947) are books of his verse. His novels include The D'Asiaties (1935), The Seven Who Died (1937), The Idols of the Cave (1946), and Nine Days to Makkala (1953). A Tale for Midnight (1955) is a study of the Cenci.

proletarian literature. A type of literature, at the height of its influence during the 1930's, especially in the U.S., which had as its aim a sympathetic portrayal of the lives and sufferings of the proletariat. Some of the leading writers of proletarian literature were Communists or Communist sympathizers, but to a large degree their work was a sincere response to an era of economic depression and to obvious social injustices.

In subject-matter and sympathetic approach to its characters, proletarian literature had its forerunners among the humanitarian novelists of the 19th century, such as Mrs. Gaskell, Dickens, George Eliot, Charles Kingsley, Victor Hugo, Harriet Beecher Stowe, Rebecca H. Davis, and Jack London, and such humanitarian poets as Thomas Hood, Elizabeth Barrett Browning, and Edward Markham. In its social perspective, it was preceded by the naturalists (Flaubert, the Goncourts, Zola) and by their American disciples, Stephen Crane and Frank Norris; by the Muckrakers; and by such "problem" novelists as W. D. Howells, Robert Herrick, and D. G. Phillips. Its technique is derived from that of the naturalists and the unaffiliated realists, such as Joseph Kirkland, E. W. Howe, and Hamlin Garland. The spirit of bitter or idealistic rebellion that animates its most characteristic examples had a precedent among the English and American romantics—Robert Burns, the early Wordsworth, Shelley, Emerson, Thoreau, and Walt Whitman. Whitman's exaltation of the "common man" was continued particularly by American proletarian poets.

Proletarian writers in the fields of fiction and theater include the following: Maxim Gorki, the early Gerhart Hauptmann, Liam O'Flaherty, Nexo, John Dos Passos, James T. Farrell, Barbusse, Erskine Caldwell, John Steinbeck, André Malraux, Clifford Odets, John Howard Lawson, Irwin Shaw, Marc Blitzstein, Albert Halper, Meyer Levin, Albert Marz, Grace Lumpkin, Meridel Le Sueur, Henry Roth, Richard Wright, Waldo Frank, and Leane Zugsmith. Among proletarian poets are Carl Sandburg, Bertolt Brecht, Hugh MacDiarmid, Stephen Spender, Kenneth Fearing, Alfred Hayes, Muriel Rukyeyer, Horace Gregory. Characteristic proletarian novels are Man's Fate, In Dubious Battle, and Grapes of Wrath. Waiting for Lefty and Let Freedom Ring are effective proletarian plays.

With the growth of the international ambitions of Nazi Germany and Fascist Italy, anti-Nazi and anti-Fascist works by such writers as Ralph Bates and Ignazio Silone came to be included in the category of proletarian. Leading organs of proletarian literature were the magazines New Masses, The Anvil, and Partisan Review, the last-named in its early period of publication only. A school of proletarian criticism also developed which sought to advance the notion that literature should concern itself with social and economic injustice and participate actively in the "class struggle," impelling its readers to "action" rather than causing them pleasure or turning them toward contemplation. It vigorously condemned theories of art for art's sake. Many of the above-mentioned writers abandoned their preoccupation with proletarian themes after the Second World War.

Unfortunately, few examples of proletarian literature reached a high level of art. Perhaps the most memorable were Silone's Fontamara and Steinbeck's Grapes of Wrath.

Promessi Sposi, I (The Betrothed, 1827). A romantic historical novel by Alessandro Manzoni, often considered the greatest Italian novel of modern times. The story tells of the attempts of Renzo and Lucia, two peasants in 17th-century Lombardy, to marry despite the bullying threats of a local grandee, Don Rodrigo. The lovers are assisted in their plight by their saintly confessor, Frà Cristoforo, and by Cardinal Borromeo who personifies Manzoni's ideal of the moral perfection of Catholic doctrine and practice. Their situation is worsened by the cowardice of their parish priest Don Abbondio, who typifies what the author considers a common type of human failing. The Nun of Monza figures as the willful sinner whose maliciousness harms the lovers and confirms her own moral turpitude. The "Unnamed" Signore (L'Innominato) represents the repentant sinner whose conversion protects Renzo and Lucia from Don Rodrigo and facilitates their marriage and the book's happy outcome.

The author's stated purpose in the novel is to show the workings of divine providence in history, specifically, in the day-to-day events in the life of a common man; hence the obvious moralizing of the text and the moral lessons implicit in the personalities of the characters. Among the many remarkable scenes in the book is that describing the plague in Milan.

Prometheus (Gr. "foreshought"). In Greek mythology, a son of Iapetus and Themis, Asia, or Clymene. He stole fire from heaven. A champion of men against the gods, he tricked Zeus into choosing fat and bone as the god's portion of sacrifices, leaving the flesh for men. Angrily Zeus withheld fire from men, but Prometheus stole it in a fennel stock. As a punishment, Prometheus was nailed to a mountain, where an eagle tore out his liver by day and it grew again by night. Eventually Heracles rescued him, or he was saved by Zeus himself. Man, meanwhile, had been afflicted with Zeus with innumerable ills through PANDORA. According to some stories, Prometheus was the creator of man, molding him of mud. It is likely that he was a pre-Hellenic fire-god who was replaced by Hephaestus. In Aeschylus' PROMETHEUS BOUND, he is a heroic figure, as he was in Shelley's narrative poem PROMETHEUS UNBOUND.

Prometheus Bound (Prometheus Desmotes). A tragedy of unknown date by Aeschylus. Prometheus, who has stolen fire from heaven for man, is punished by Zeus by being fastened to a Scythian mountain by HEPHAESTUS. He tells a chorus of sympathetic ocean nymphs how he had once helped Zeus in his war with the Titans. The old god Oceanus enters, riding a strange, winged animal, and advises Prometheus to defy Zeus no longer. Io, now a heifer, enters and tells of her sorrow. Prometheus foretells a happy outcome after her further wanderings. He then says that Zeus himself will be destroyed by a son yet to be born to him, but only Prometheus knows who will be its mother. When Io is gone, Hermes tries to force Prometheus to reveal his secret, but he refuses unless he is released. With lightning and an earthquake, Zeus plunges Prometheus into Tartarus.

In this monumental play, Aeschylus deals with the theme of men's relation to the gods. PROMETHEUS Bound was the first play of a trilogy. The other two, PROMETHEUS UNBOUND (P. Lyomenos) and PROMETHEUS, the Fire-Bearer (P. Pyrphoros), are lost, but a fragment of the second shows that Prometheus remained in Tartarus for 30,000 years.

Prometheus Unbound (1820). A lyrical drama by Percy Bysshe Shelley, inspired by the Greek myth of PROMETHEUS. In Shelley's work, the chained and tormented Prometheus is a symbol of humanity; Jupiter, the usurper, represents the tyranny of kings and civil institutions; Demogorgon, the son of Jupiter and Thetis, is the Primal Power of the world and the spirit of Necessity or Destiny; Asia, Prometheus's wife, is ideal Love or Nature. Demogorgon drives Jupiter from his throne. Prometheus is released by Hercules (Strength) and reunited with Asia, and a golden age, where love and beauty reign, begins.

Promised Land. CANAAN or Palestine, so called because God promised Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob that their offspring should possess it (Gen. 12:7, 26:3; 28:13).

The expression has frequently been used in connection with the promise of the Balfour Declaration that the Jews should have a homeland in Palestine.

Promised Land, The (1912). An autobiography by Mary Antin (1881-1945), Russian-born American writer. It describes her life in Polotsk as the child of Russian Jews, her emigration to America at the age of 13, and her school days in Boston, where she found friends and opportunity.

Propertius, Sextus (49-15 B.C.). Roman poet and master of elegiac verse. His three books of poetry deal with his experiences in love as well as etiological myths and Roman history. The 20th-century American poet Ezra Pound made several modern imitations of him in Homage to Sextus Propertius.

Prophecy of Famine, The, a Scots Pastoral (1763). A satirical poem by Charles Churchill chiefly attacking the taking over of important administrative offices in England by the Scots. It begins with a condemnation of the artificialities of English pastoral poetry and it parodies, in the dialogue between the Pessimist, Sawney, and the Optimist, Jockey, the first scene of The Gentle Shepherd by Allan Ramsay.

Prophet, the. In the Koran, the special title of MUHAMMAD. According to the Muslims, there have been 200,000 prophets, or interpreters of God's will, but only six of them, Adam, Noah, Abraham, Moses, Jesus, and Muhammad, have brought new laws.

Kahlil Gibran wrote a book called The Prophet (1923), which presents his mystical faith in the form of a prose poem.

The Great or Major Prophets. In the Old Testament, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Daniel; so called because their writings are more extensive than the writings of the other twelve.

Prophetess, the. A title of Ayeshah, the second and beloved wife of Muhammad. Like Sultana, it is used as a title of honor.

Proserpina or Proserpine. The Roman counterpart of the Greek goddess PERSEPHONE.

prosody. The broad study or science of how language is handled in the composition of poetry.
The term encompasses versification (meter, rhyme, traditional forms); Anglo-Saxon poems; syllable-count methods and forms; free verse; distortion and dissonance applied to traditional methods; sprung rhythm; and any specific stylistic rules or requirements of special poetic movements, as, for example, those of the imagists (see imagism).

Proserpine. The rightful duke of Milan who reigns over an enchanted island in Shakespeare's The Tempest. Almost superhuman in his attributes, he is wise, firm, and philosophical, meting out justice to friend and enemy. His magical skills symbolize the power that man may attain by the use of his mind, though he is often impeded by the baser aspects of his nature. His is one of the most famous of Shakespeare's speeches:

Our revels now are ended. These our actors,
As I foretold you, were all spirits and
Are melted into air, into thin air:
And, like the baseless fabric of this vision,
The cloud-capp'd towers, the gorgeous palaces,
The solemn temples, the great globe itself,
Yea, all which it inherit, shall dissolve,
And like an unsubstantial pageant faded,
Leave not a rack behind. We are such stuff
As dreams are made on; and our little life
Is rounded with a sleep.

Proserpine is often said to embody the philosophy at which the dramatist arrived toward the end of his life.

Propoie (1864). A poem by Robert Browning. Written soon after his wife's death, it expresses an optimistic and courageous attitude toward death. The title, taken from Latin, states the theme: "Look forward!"

Protagoras of Abdera (c. 490–420 B.C.). A Greek Sophist. His best-known statement, one of the two fragments of his works that have been preserved, is: "Of all things the measure is man, of the things that are that they are, and of the things that are not that they are not." Plato and Aristotle both regarded the comment as giving to appearances the status of truth. Protagoras also said that there is no way of knowing about the gods. He held that there are two accounts of everything and was able to teach the art of making the weaker account equally convincing.

Proteus. A Greek hero. His story, which grew out of the episode in which he eluded the gods, was used by Shakespeare in The Tempest, and by Racine in his play Phèdre. The word "proteus" is derived from the Greek word for "many" and is used to describe someone who is changeable or unpredictable.

Proteus (Protesilaos). The first Greek to die in the Trojan War. At the siege of Troy an oracle prophesied that the first Greek to step on land would be killed. Protesilaus took the honor upon himself and was promptly slain. His faithful wife Laodameia, who had kept a wax statue of him always beside her, now prayed that he should return for a brief while. His ghost appeared to animate the statue for three hours, but she willingly returned with him to Hades at the end of that time. According to another story, she killed herself when her father took away the statue.

Proteus. (1) In Greek legend, Poseidon's herdsman, an old man and a prophet. He was famous for his power of assuming different shapes at will. When caught, however, he was helpful to many Greek heroes by his foreknowledge. Proteus lived in a vast cave, and his custom was to tell over his herds of sea-calves at noon, and then go to sleep. There was no way of catching him but by stealing upon him at this time and binding him; otherwise he would elude anyone by a rapid change in shape. In Euripides' Helen he is referred to as a former king of Egypt.

(2) In Shakespeare's Two Gentlemen of Verona, the inconstant friend of Valentine. Although he betrays Valentine and Julia, to whom he had vowed eternal love, he is forgiven by both of them and repents of his unfaithfulness. See Faerie Queene, The.

Prothalamion (1596). Lyric poem by Edmund Spenser. It was written to celebrate the double wedding of Lady Elizabeth and Lady Katherine Somerset, daughters of the earl of Worcester.

Proudhon, Pierre Joseph (1809–1865). French socialist and anarchist. His most famous work, What Is Property? (Qu'est-ce que la propriété?, 1840) denounces private property as an institution which perpetuates inequality and injustice. A fiery reformer, Proudhon fled France in 1858 when his La Justice dans la Révolution et dans l'Eglise (1858), a work violently critical of church and state, was angrily received.

Proudie, Bishop and Mrs. Two of the best-known characters in Anthony Trollope's Chronicles of Barsetshire. Mrs. Proudie is a formidable woman who propels her husband through life with unrelenting vigor. See Barchester Towers.

Proust, Marcel (1871–1922). French novelist. Son of an eminent Catholic doctor and his Jewish wife, Proust grew up in their permanent home in Paris near the Champs-Elysées. His memories of visits to relatives in Auteuil and in Illiers were the material for the imaginary village of Combray, the setting for the early part of his long and most important novel, Remembrance of Things Past. He suffered his first attack of asthma when he was nine; thereafter, his summer visits were to shore resorts on the English Channel, which he combined into the Balbec of the novel.

In 1889 he joined the army for a year as a sub-officer. The following year, to satisfy his father's insistence that he should have a regular career, he entered the Sorbonne as a student of both law and political science. His real interest was philosophy, however; he was much influenced by the lectures of Paul Desjardins and of Henri Bergson, whose theories about time as subjectively lived contributed to Proust's.

At the Lycée Condorcet, where he had studied philosophy under Marie Alphonse Darlu, his schoolfellows and he had produced in 1887–1888 a number of ephemeral handwritten little magazines. Now, in 1892, the same group founded the printed review Le Banquet, which lasted for eight issues. Proust was one of the most prolific contributors of sketches and short stories, but his artificial although graceful style did not impress even his colleagues, except as revealing his apparently snobbish fascination with titled society. And indeed, the young Proust was steadily and deliberately making his way, despite his bourgeois origins, into higher and higher circles.
of the Faubourg St. Germain, the social elite of Paris. Similarly, although Anatole France wrote an introduction for Pleasures and Days (Les Plaisirs et les jours; 1896), a collection of sketches, stories, and poems in a variety of imitative styles, the book was received as the elegant but slight work of a literary dilettante.

In 1899, Proust began working on a long novel, which was published posthumously as Jean Santeuil, finally abandoning it about 1899. These were also the years of the Dreyfus Case, during which Proust with Anatole France and other intellectuals actively protested the miscarriage of justice and demanded a retrial.

The aesthetic theories of John Ruskin attracted Proust who, in 1899, began a serious study of his works, translating The Bible of Amiens (La Bible d’Amiens: 1904) and Sesame and Lilies (Sézame et les lys; 1906) with notes and prefaces. Ruskin’s descriptions of architecture also inspired Proust to make a number of trips to see the important buildings of France, Holland, and Venice.

After his father died in 1903 and his mother in 1905, Proust began to relinquish almost all his social ties, although he continued to travel a bit and to write for newspapers and reviews. In 1907 he moved to the apartment on Boulevard Haussmann famous for the cork-lined bedroom from which, in later years, he almost never stirred, partly to prevent serious asthmatic or nervous attacks, partly to avoid being distracted from his writing. By 1908 he had conceived and begun writing his life work, Remembrance of Things Past. The narrator of the novel is very like Proust in character and background. A neurotic, hypersensitive, asthmatic young man, who is even called in one place “Marcel,” he courts fashionable society and romantic experiences, records his observations in great detail, introspectively analyzes his responses to them, and finally discovers his vocation in the writing of this novel. In shaping the narrator’s personality, Proust omitted his own Jewish background, homosexuality, and hypochondria. All these attributes, transposed to other characters, are extensively analyzed, however, and the narrator’s generalized conclusions about love, snobbery, art, literature, etc., are assumed to be Proust’s own.

The only significant interruption to direct work on his masterpiece, was the writing (1908–1910) of Contre Sainte-Beuve (1914). Proust began this as a critical study, but it soon digressed into an analysis of his own processes of memory, thought, and emotion, and thus like Jean Santeuil was an exploratory preparation for his masterpiece. The first draft of Remembrance of Things Past was completed by 1912, and the first volume in print by 1913, but World War I delayed further publication, giving Proust time for “revisions” that expanded the work to nearly twice its original length: Proust died before the last three books were published.

Proverbs. The 20th book of the Old Testament, appearing directly after the Psalms. It contains, as the title indicates a collection of maxims and pithy statements, a considerable section of which were formerly ascribed to Solomon.

Provincetown Players. A group of actors, producers, and playwrights. It is known for its encouragement of native writers and its part in promoting a resurgence in the American theater after World War I. The group started as an acting company in Provincetown, Mass., under the direction of George Crum Cook. It produced plays by Cook and by his wife, Susan Glaspell, and also by other dramatists, notably Eugene O’Neill. The Players was organized in 1915; after moving to New York, the group continued to work until 1929. O’Neill was its most important discovery, but it eventually produced almost 100 plays by some of the most famous playwrights of the period.

Prozess, Der. See Trial, The.

Prussian Officer, The (1914). A short story by D. H. Lawrence. It is about a sadistic Prussian army officer and his victim, a young orderly, who is finally driven to kill his tormentor.

Pymne, Hester. The heroine of Hawthorne’s The Scarlet Letter.

Pymne, William (1600–1669). English Puritan lawyer, pamphleteer, and statesman, known for his attacks on popular amusements. His Histrionismata (1633), a long diatribe against actors and stage plays, contained indirect criticism of the royal family. As a result, he was expelled from his profession by the Star Chamber, sentenced to life imprisonment, and placed in the pillory, where he lost both his ears. He was released from prison in 1640 by the Long Parliament.

Psalm of Life, A (1839). A poem by Henry Wadsworth Longfellow. Widely anthologized, though didactic and sentimental, the poem contains the well-known line: “Life is real! Life is earnest!”

Psalms. The 19th book of the Old Testament, containing 150 hymns, or songs to God. Many of them are ascribed to David, who was called “the sweet psalmist of Israel” (II Sam. 23:1).

Psellus, Michael Constantine. Called Psellus the Younger (11th century), Byzantine philosopher and statesman. He revived the study of Plato, was powerful at court from about 1042 to 1078, becoming prime minister under his pupil Michael VII, and wrote voluminously on history and politics, music, mathematics, science, etc.

Pseudodoxia Epidemica. See Vulgar Errors.

Psycarpax (Gr. "granary mouse"). In the Greek Mythology, the son of Troxartaeus, the king of the Mice. The Frog-king offers to carry the young prince over a lake, but scarcely has he reached midway, when a water-hydra appears and King Frog, to save himself, dives under water. The mouse, being thus left on the surface, is drowned, and this catastrophe brings about the battle of the Frogs and Mice.

Psyche (Gr. breath; hence, life or soul). The heroine of the myth of Cupid (Eros) and Psyche, an episode in the Golden Ass of Apuleius, second century A.D. She was a beautiful maiden beloved by Cupid, who visited her every night, but left her at sunrise. Cupid bade her never to seek to know who he was, but one night curiosity overcame her prudence; she lit the lamp to look at him, a drop of hot oil fell on his shoulder, and he awoke and fled. The abandoned Psyche wandered far and wide in search of her lover. She became the slave of Venus, who imposed on her heartless tasks and treated her most cruelly. But ultimately she was united to Cupid and became immortal. The kernel of the story, the theme of the lover who must not be named, is a common theme in folklore.

Psychoanalysis. A 20th-century method of psychiatric treatment attributing the greater part of human activity to motives of the unconscious mind. It endeavors, partly through analysis of the symbolic value of dreams, to bring "suppressed desires" into the sphere of consciousness and to strip them of their power or set them free to work in more normal channels. The prime mover in the field of psychoanalysis was Dr. Sigmund Freud, who identified the libido—that is, the energy or driving force in living creatures—with the sex instinct. Freud's disciple and later rival Carl Jung rejected such a restriction. Further deviations from Freud's system were developed by Alfred Adler, Karen Horney, Harry Stack Sullivan, and others.

Psychoanalysis and particularly the theories of Freud and Jung have had enormous influence on literature. Prominent among the innumerable writers who have been affected by them are James Joyce, Eugene O'Neill, Thomas Mann, and T. S. Eliot. Stream of consciousness techniques of narration, though in use earlier, were given added intensity and precision by writers who had studied Freud. Psychoanalytic theories have also been widely used in literary criticism.

Ptah. In Egyptian religion, the chief god of Memphis worshiped as the creative force of the world and molder of men. He was identified with the Greek Hephaestus and the Roman Vulcan.

Ptolemy. Full Latin name, Claudius Ptolemaeus (2nd century). Alexandrian astronomer and geographer. In his Almagest he described a new system of astronomy that was accepted until the 16th century. The Ptolemaic system, as it is called, stipulates that the sun, the planets, and the stars revolve around the earth. The movements of the heavenly bodies were plotted by a complicated arrangement of epicycles (small circles with their centers on the circumference of a larger one). Whenever a planet or star was observed moving out of its prescribed path, it was assumed that it had entered a new series of epicycles. By continually adding epicycles, the Ptolemaic system was made to work; however, it had become insanely complex with dozens of epicycles for a single planet when Copernicus advanced his uncomplicated theory of heliocentricity in 1530.

Public Occurrences, Boston. See Boston Public Occurrences.

Pucci, Antonio (1310-1388). Florentine poet. The author of humorous sonnets, he is well-known for his public recitation of his works. He especially excelled in the tailed sonnet and in the use of terza rima. The latter is used in his Noie (Amoyances), a poem of a hundred tercets, each describing briefly something that galls the poet; it is related to the Provencal enueg.

Puccini, Giacomo (1858–1924). Italian composer of opera. Born into a musical family, Puccini was sent to the local conservatory of music; he was organist at a nearby church at 17 and, with a stipend from the queen, was able to attend the Milan Conservatory where he studied under Amilcare Ponchielli. Verdi regarded Puccini as the most talented Italian composer of his time, and, in the first quarter of this century, Puccini's popularity rivaled that of Verdi. Among Puccini's operas are Manon (1893); La Bohème (1896); La Tosca (1900), which brought him recognition as Verdi's successor; Madama Butterfly (1904)—at its première, Puccini's worst failure, only to become within the year one of his best-loved works; The Girl of the Golden West (1907); Il Tritto (1918), a trilogy of one-act operas including Il tabarro, Suor Angelica, and Gianni Schicchi; and Turandot, first performed in 1926.

I–12, 1656; 12 additional cantos, 1882) and of a mock-heroic poem by Voltaire. Chapellen treats his subject reverently, but the work is critically considered as a failure; Voltaire's poem, adroit, derogatory, and scathingly obscene, uses Joan as an instrument to assail superstition and credulity, and has often been attacked as tasteless and defamatory—a verdict with which many of Voltaire's admirers concur.

Puck. A mischievous sprite of popular folklore, also called Robin Goodfellow. Originally an evil demon, he was transformed and popularized in his present form by Shakespeare, who depicts him in A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM as a merry wanderer of the night, "rough, knurly-limbed, faun-faced, and shock-pated, a very Shetlander among the gossamer-winged" fairies around him.

Pudd'nhead Wilson, The Tragedy of (1894). A novel by Mark Twain. David Wilson is called "Pudd'nhead" by the townspeople, who fail to understand his combination of wisdom and eccentricity. He redeems himself by simultaneously solving a murder mystery and a case of transposed identities.

Two children, a white boy and a mulatto, are born on the same day. Roxy, mother of the mulatto, is given charge of the children; in fear that her son will be sold, she exchanges the babies.

The mulatto, though he grows up as a white boy, turns out to be a scoundrel. He sells his mother, and murders and robs his uncle. He accuses Luigi, one of a pair of twins, of the murder; Pudd'nhead, a lawyer, undertakes Luigi's defense. On the basis of fingerprint evidence, he exposes the real murderer, and the white boy takes his rightful place.

The book implicitly condemns a society that allows slavery. It concludes with a series of witty aphorisms from Pudd'nhead's calendar.

Pudovkin, Vsevolod Ilarionovich (1893–1953). Russian motion-picture director. He was an innovator in film technique. Along with Sergei Eisenstein, he was one of the chief factors in the development of motion pictures in the early Soviet era. Among his films are The Mechanism of the Brain, Chess Fever, Storm over Asia (1929), and General Sworov. He wrote two books, Film Technique (1933) and Film Acting (1935), in which he explored the possibilities of the motion pictures as an art form.

Pugachev, Emelyan Ivanovich (1743–1775). Russian Cossack soldier who led an uprising against Catherine the Great. In 1773, posing as Catherine's late husband, Peter III, Pugachev formed an army of Cossacks, peasants, and escaped convicts. The band swept through southern Russia, capturing a number of important towns and cities along the Volga River. In 1774 the government forces finally broke the revolt and captured Pugachev. He was executed in Moscow in 1775. The poet Pushkin used the revolt as the basis for his novel, The Captain's Daughter (Kapitanskaya dochka).

Pugin, Augustus Welby Northmore (1812–1852). English architect and designer. Instrumental in reviving the Gothic style in England, he was responsible for the architectural decoration of the House of Parliament in London.

Pulchérie. In Pierre Corneille's tragedy Héraclius, the daughter of the murdered Emperor of the East. She is almost forced by the usurper Phocas to marry Héraclius, her own brother.

Pulci, Luigi (1432–1484). Florentine poet. A member of the circle around Lorenzo de' Medici, he served both the Medici family and the Condottiere Roberto Sanseverino while writing his comic masterpiece, the Morgante Maggiore. It is a mainly burlesque treatment of the epic material involving Charlemagne, Roland and the other paladins; it takes its title from one of the characters, the giant Morgante, and is called maggiore (greater) because a later edition (1483) had 5 more cantos added to the original 23. It influenced Folengo and Rabelais; in modern times, Byron translated the first canto superbly, and George Borrow used it in his Lavengro and Romany Rye.

Pulitzer, Joseph (1847–1911). Hungarian-born American journalist. Pulitzer began his career in 1868 as a reporter for the German daily Westliche Post in St. Louis and soon became its part-owner. He was also a lawyer active in politics, first as a Liberal Republican and later as a Democrat. In 1878 he bought the St. Louis Dispatch, which was soon merged with the Evening Post to become the Post-Dispatch. He bought the New York World in 1883, founded the Evening World in 1887, and made both of them prosperous enterprises. Their prestige and circulation declined after a sordid war with the dailies of William Randolph Hearst in the late 1890's. Pulitzer had retired from active control in 1890 because of ill health, but his directives eventually restored the papers to respectability. See Pulitzer Prizes.

Pulitzer Prizes. Annual awards in journalism and letters made by the trustees of Columbia University. They were endowed by the will of Joseph Pulitzer, who also left money to found the University's School of Journalism. The nominees are screened by juries appointed in each category, and recommended to the trustees by the Advisory Board on the Pulitzer Prizes.

There are eight journalism awards: to a newspaper, for public service, and for "distinguished examples" of editorial writing, cartooning, news photography, and national, international, local spot news, and local investigative reporting. In letters, the awards are for distinguished works by American authors in the fields of fiction, U.S. history and biography, drama, poetry, and (since 1962) for a work not eligible in any other existing category. There is also a prize for a larger musical work, and four fellowships. Literary works awarded the Pulitzer Prize:

Pumblechook, Uncle. In Charles Dickens's Great Expectations, Joe Gargery's uncle. He is patronizing to Pip until Pip comes into his fortune; then Pumblechook is extremely servile.

pun. A word-play in which two meanings appear in one word or in two words of identical sound. Used as a rather low form of wit, often in playful humor, a pun sometimes has deeply serious implications.

Punch and Judy. The hero and heroine—and the title—of countless English puppet shows. In the traditional story, Punch, in a fit of rage, kills his infant child and bludgeons Judy, his wife, to death; although he is imprisoned, he manages to escape. Later he encounters and outwits several other characters, including the Devil. The irascible, hump-backed, hook-nosed Punch is thought to be derived from Pulcinella, the slow-witted servant of the commedia dell'arte, who was also a great favorite in Italian puppet shows. By about 1650, this character was appearing in puppet shows in France; transformed into the witty Polchinelle reaching England at the time of the Restoration, he became known as Punchinello or Punch. In their present form, Punch and his wife Judy, who was originally called Joan, date from about 1800.

Punchinello. See Punch and Judy.

Punic faith (Lat., Punicæ fideis). Treachery, violation of faith, the faith of the Carthaginians. The Latin word Punicus, earlier Poenicus, meaning Phoenician, was applied to the Carthaginians, who were of Phoenician descent. The Carthaginians were accused by the Romans of breaking faith with them, a most extraordinary instance of the pot calling the kettle black; for whatever infidelity they were guilty of, it could scarcely equal that of their accusers.

Punic Wars. The three wars fought between Rome and Carthage in the third and second cen-ties b.c. The First Punic War (264–241 B.C.) was waged by Rome to prevent Carthaginian supremacy in Sicily. The second (218–202 B.C.) was fought over the Carthaginian advances in Spain, and it was during this war that Hannibal crossed the Alps with his army and ravaged Italy for nearly 15 years. At its conclusion Carthage was stripped of all its territories except its own city, and Rome was left mistress of the Mediterranean. The Third Punic War (149–146 B.C.) ended in the complete destruction of Carthage. See Cato the Elder.

Puranas (Sansk. old material). A class of Sanskrit works, written around 500 B.C. serving as the secondary scriptures of Hinduism and containing the history and legends of the pantheon.

Purcell, Henry (1659–1695). The outstanding English Baroque composer. Purcell's early work consisted largely of church music. During the last few years of his life he turned his attention almost exclusively to music for the stage, and wrote one true opera Dido and Aeneas (1689), libretto by Nahum Tate, and several so-called "English Operas," which are full-length musicodramatic works with spoken dialogue and elaborate scenic effects, similar to masques. These works include: King Arthur (1691, libretto by Dryden); The Fairy Queen (1692, adapted from Shakespeare's Midsummer Night's Dream); The Tempest (1695, adapted from Shakespeare by Shadwell); and The Indian Queen (1695, libretto by Dryden and Sir Thomas Howard). Purcell also composed incidental music, ranging from one song to long scenes, for 43 plays, including works by Aphra Behn ( Abdelazer, 1695), Dryden (Amphitryon, 1690; Aureng-Zebe, 1692; Love Triumphant, 1694; The Spanish Friar, 1694–1695; four others), Congreve (The Double Dealer, 1693; The Old Bachelor, 1693), and works by 14 other playwrights.

Purchas, Samuel (1575–1626). English author and clergyman, known for his editions of Elizabethan travel literature. His outstanding works are Purchas His Pilgrimage, or Relations of the World and the Religions Observed in All Ages (1613); Purchas His Pilgrim: Microcosmus, or the Histories of Man (1619); and Hakluytus Posthumus, or Purchas His Pilgrims, Containing a History of the World in Sea Voyages and Land Travel by Englishmen and Others (1625). The last-named work was compiled in part from material left by Richard Hakluyt. Coleridge is said to have used the narratives assembled by Purchas in his famous poems The Rime of the Ancient Mariner (1798) and Kubla Khan (1816).

Purdy, James (1923– ). American novelist and short-story writer. Purdy's Don't Call Me by My Rightful Name, a collection of short stories, and 63: Dream Palace, a novel, were privately published in 1956. Purdy was recognized as a writer of considerable talent, and in 1957 a commercial publisher combined the two privately printed books and issued them under the title Color of Darkness. Purdy employed the satiric and macabre fantasy he used in many of his short stories in his first novel, Malcolm (1959), a weird, picaresque tale that was highly praised by critics. The Nephew (1960) is a novel set in a region like the rural Ohio in which Purdy grew up; it deals with a retired schoolteacher who attempts to write a memorial booklet for her beloved nephew, who she fears has been killed.

Purgatorio (Purgatory). Part II of the Divine Comedy by Dante. Vergil conducts Dante up the mountain of Purgatory, or purification. At the foot in Ante-Purgatory are the negligent who for some reason delayed repentance for their sins and must wait as long as they delayed before beginning their ascent. A terrace makes an ascending spiral up the mountain, and repentant spirits toll forward on it, bowed beneath burdens appropriate to the sins of which they must be purged, and learning the corresponding virtues. The higher on the mountain the spirit is climbing, the less grievous the sin of which he is being cleansed, and the easier his progress, until at last he will be ready to join the blessed in Paradise. Dante must join in the labors of this ascent—although his progress is much more rapid than others—and he meets successively those doing penance for pride, envy, sloth, avarice, lust, and lust. Vergil explains that an instinct to love and desire is natural in man, and properly leads the soul to God. The first three sins are perversions of that instinct; sloth is the failure to pursue it; and the last three sins, although exercising the instinct, deflect it toward worldly objects and thus, at least temporarily away from God.
Having guided Dante as far as human intellect can go, Vergil leaves him at the entrance to the Earthly Paradise. Here Matilda, representing the perfect active life, conducts him through an Eden-like garden to Beatrice, who represents the perfect contemplative life, or divine grace and revelation. After a series of allegorical appearances and adventures, representing the crises of the Roman Catholic Church, Beatrice prepares Dante for the ascent to Paradise.

Purgatory (1829). A short verse play by William Butler Yeats. For Yeats, purgatory is the condition of a spirit so obsessed by remorse or some other emotion that it constantly relives the crisis of its life in its old home. An old man and his son watch the ghost of the old man's mother in such a purgatory. The conversation between father and son reveals the family history and melodrama; at the end, the father kills his son in order to give his mother peace and put an end to the family's polluted blood.

Purgon. A quack doctor in Molière's comedy Le Malade Imaginaire. His favorite remedy, as his name suggests, is a purge.

Purism. See Le Corbusier.

Puritans. Originally, seceders from the Church of England in the time of Queen Elizabeth I. They were so called because as radical, or Calvinistic, Protestants, who acknowledged only the authority of the "pure Word of God" as expressed in the Bible, they wished to "purify" the church of its Catholic heritage of doctrines, rites, and organization. Early persecution drove them to emigrate in large numbers to Europe and New England; later they played a major role in the social and religious conflicts of the 17th century. In both England and America the rigid morals of the Puritans and their stern suppression of various forms of recreation and art have made the word puritanical synonymous with narrow-mindedness.

Purloined Letter, The (1845). A story by Edgar Allan Poe. A woman of royal rank is blackmailed by a cabinet minister on the basis of a compromising letter. The police, failing in the search, turn to the amateur, C. Auguste Dupin, who is able to locate the purloined letter.

Purple Cow, The. A famous quatrains by Gelett Burgess that first appeared in the Lark (1895).

I never saw a PURPLE COW,
I never HOPE to see one;
But I can tell you, anyhow,
I'd rather SEE than BE one.

Some years later, for obvious reasons, he recorded his sentiments with,

Ah! Yes! I wrote the PURPLE COW—
I'm sorry, now, I wrote it!
But I can tell you anyhow,
I'll kill you if you quote it!

Purple patches. Highly colored or ornate passages in a literary work that is generally speaking, otherwise undistinguished. The allusion is to Horace's De Arte Poetica:

Inceptis gravibus plumoque et magna professis,
 Purpureus, late qui splendeat, unus et alter
 Adsuitur pannus.

(Often to weighty enterprises and such as profess great objects, one or two purple patches are sewed on to make a fine display in the distance.)

Pursuit of Diarmuid and Gráinne, The. An early Irish tale from the Fenian Cycle. It is a variant of the Deirdre story and an early parallel to the Tristan and Isolde legend. Diarmuid, nephew of Finn mac Cumhaill, runs off with Finn's second wife Gráinne. The major part of the story concerns the life of the lovers in the wilderness, fleeing from Finn and his forces, and finally being caught by Finn.

Furu. In Hindu legend, the founder of the lunar dynasty.

Pururavas and Urvasi. A Hindu myth similar to those of Cupid and Psyche or Apollo and Daphne. King Pururavas fell in love with Urvasi, the heavenly nymph born as a result of the churning of the waters by the gods searching for the lost nectar of immortality, and she consented to become his wife on certain conditions. When these conditions were violated, she disappeared, and Pururavas, inconsolable, wandered everywhere to find her. Ultimately he succeeded, and they were indissolubly united. The best-known version of the story is found in Kalidasa's third century Sanskrit play, Vikrama and Urvashi.

Pusey, Edward [dward] Bouvierie (1800-1882). Anglican theologian, associated with John Keble and John Henry Newman in the Oxford Movement. Perhaps the staunchest controversialist and most learned theologian in the movement, Pusey became its virtual leader after Newman's conversion to Roman Catholicism, affecting many changes in the churches of England, such as the establishment of Anglican nunneries and the revival of private confession. His works consist mainly of controversies or doctrinal writings. See Tracts for the Times.

Pushkin, Aleksandr Sergeyevich (1799-1837). Russian poet, dramatist, novelist, and short-story writer. Russia's greatest poet, whose standing in his own country is equivalent to Shakespeare's in England or Goethe's in Germany, Pushkin almost single-handedly created a classical literary heritage for Russian writers, producing the first good examples of work in almost every major genre.

Pushkin was a descendant on his father's side of an ancient noble family. On his mother's side he was a great-great-grandson of an Abyssinian Negro, Ganibal, who served under Peter the Great. Pushkin's poetry attracted attention even before he graduated from the Lyceum in 1817. He obtained a sinecure in the foreign ministry in St. Petersburg, led a fast-paced social life, and wrote Ruslan i Lyudmila (Ruslan and Ludmilla, 1820), a long poem based on folklore motifs. The work established him as one of the outstanding younger poets. Because of some politically discreet verses, Pushkin was transferred in 1820 to southern Russia. He traveled in the Caucasus, served in Bessarabia and Odessa, and continued his poetic works, which at this period show the influence of Byron in theme and treatment: Kabaku zik Plennik (The Captive of the Caucasus, 1822), Bakchisarai Tekst (The Fountain of Bakchisaray, 1824), and Tsygany (The Gypsies, 1827). He also began his greatest work, Eugene Onegin, a novel in verse.

Pushkin's trouble with the authorities continued. In 1824 he was expelled from government service and banished to his family estate. While there he wrote his famous historical tragedy, Boris Godunov. Pushkin was on the family estate when the Decembrist revolt of 1825 took place. Several of his friends were involved in the affair, but he apparently had no connection with it. In 1826, Pushkin was given permission by Czar Nicholas I to return to St. Petersburg, where he resumed the active social life interrupted six years before. In 1829 he met 16-year-old Natalya Goncharova, whom he married two years later. In the autumn of 1830, while stranded by a plague quarantine on his country estate at Boldino, Pushkin wrote Tales of Belkin, begun the Little Tragedies, a cycle of four tragedies in verse, and completed his masterpiece, Eugene Onegin. After his marriage, he had little peace for such intense creative activity. His wife's frivolous social life was a constant source of irritation, and a growing family necessitated added income. In 1836 he founded the literary journal Sovremennik (The Contemporary). Jealousy over his wife's attachment to a guards officer, Baron Georges D'Anthes, led to a duel, in January, 1837, in which Pushkin was fatally wounded.

Besides the poems mentioned, Pushkin produced a large body of lyric verse, as well as numerous long poems, including Graf Nulin (Count Nulin, 1825), Domik v Kolomne (The Little House in Kolomna, 1830), Poltava (1828), and The Bronze Horseman. His prose work includes, besides the Belkin tales, Dubrouski (1832–1833), The Queen of Spades, and Kapitanšiška dochka (The Captain's Daughter, 1836), an account of the Pugachev rebellion of the 1770s.

Much of Pushkin's work had an immense influence on later Russian literature. He was the master for all the poets who came after him in both lyric and narrative poetry. His character Ivan Belkin, the narrator of the Belkin tales and of the prose fragment litoriya sela Goryukhina (History of the Village of Goryukhina, 1830), is one of the initial models of a caricature depiction of character in Russian literature. Eugene Onegin is one of the original superfluous men of Russian literature, the ancestor of Lermontov's Pechorin and of many of Turgenev's heroes. Tatyana, the heroine of Onegin, has been regarded as the ideal of Russian womanhood, and many later writers, again notably Turgenev, have modeled their heroines after her.

Pushkin's early poetic style was influenced by the classical styles of such 18th-century French writers as Voltaire, Evarest Parny, and André Chenier. The smoothness and balance of Pushkin's diction in his early works were learned from these authors and from his own compatriots who imitated them: Zhukovski and Konstantin Nikolayevich Batyushkov (1787–1855). The Prisoner of the Caucasus and The Fountain of Bakchisarai are perhaps the best examples of Pushkin's early manner. In a letter of 1823, Pushkin wrote, "I don't like grafting European graces and French subleties onto our old language. Roughness and simplicity suit it better." Pushkin's poetic style from this time on reflects these thoughts. His language becomes more concise than before, and it loses its mellifluent qualities, reaching the limits of simplicity in such late works as Poltava (1828–1829) and The Bronze Horseman. The shift in poetic style was accompanied by a change in Pushkin's relationship to his work: from that of a narrator who is sometimes subjectively involved in the work to that of an objective creator who is always outside the work. This objectivity is particularly evident in Pushkin's prose works. In these works, the language is extremely simple and straightforward, and instances can be found in the prose where Pushkin changed the ordinary Russian word order to make the language even more simple than it would be normally. Although many of his prose pieces—such as the Belkin tales, The Queen of Spades, and The Captain's Daughter—have been very influential in Russian literature because of their themes and characterizations, Pushkin's prose language was too experimental a medium to be more than a starting point for later writers.

Puss in Boots. A famous tale with many sources. It is best known from Charles Perrault's tale Le Chat Botté (1697). The cat is marvelously accomplished, and by ready wit or ingenious tricks secures a fortunate and royal wife for his master, a penniless young miller, who passes under the name of the marquis de Carabas. In the Italian tale, Puss is called "Constantine's cat." Ludwig Tieck's play Der gestielte Kater (pub. 1797) also treats this theme.

Putain respectueuse, La. See Respeeful Prostitute, The.

Putnam, George Palmer (1814–1872). American publisher. Putnam educated himself while working as an errand boy in a New York book store; in 1833, he began to work for the publishing firm of Wiley and Long; in 1840, the name was changed to Wiley and Putnam. He then opened an agency in London for the sale of American books, and wrote a volume called American Facts (1845) to instruct the British. In 1853, Putnam began the publication of Putnam's Monthly Magazine, one of the best of the mid-century American periodicals; he did not pirate English works unprotected by copyright, but encouraged and paid for the original work of American authors. A lifelong friend and admirer of Washington Irving, he published "Recollections of Irving" in The Atlantic Monthly (November, 1860). In 1866, Putnam established the publishing firm of G. P. Putnam, later changing it to G. P. Putnam & Sons (1871). Argue in the fight for an international copyright law, he sponsored the cause of a native American literature.

Putnam, Israel (1718–1790). American army officer. He was commander-in-chief of the Revolutionary forces during the battle of Long Island (1776), though there is uncertainty over the extent of his responsibility for the disastrous American defeat.

Putsch (Ger., "uprising"). A small armed revolt, such as the Kapp Putsch or Beer-Hall Putsch.

Puttenham, George (d. 1590). English author. He is known for The Arte of English Poesie (1589), a thoroughgoing analysis of the types and techniques of Tudor and Elizabethan poetry. Much esteemed in its day, the treatise is still regarded as a sourcebook of poetic theory of the English Renaissance. The work is sometimes attributed to George's brother, Richard Puttenham (1520–1601?).
Put Yourself in His Place (1870). A novel by Charles Reade. The hero, Henry Little, a laborer and inventor, struggles against the jealous antagonisms of the British trade unions, and his efforts to effect a reconciliation between them form the body of the narrative. The title is derived from the favorite saying of the philanthropist Dr. Amboyne, one of the book’s important characters.

Pye, Henry James (1745–1813). English poet laureate (1790) who wrote occasional and ineffectual patriotic verse. His epic Alfred (1801) is considered his best work.

Pygmalion. A sculptor and king of Cyprus in Greek legend, who, though he hated women, fell in love with his own ivory statue of Aphrodite. At his earnest prayer the goddess gave life to the statue and he married his own creation.

The story is told in Ovid’s Metamorphoses, and appeared in English in John Marston’s Metamorphosis of Pygmalion’s Image (1598). William Morris retold it in The Earthly Paradise (1868). In W. S. Gilbert’s comedy, Pygmalion and Galatea (1871), the sculptor is a married man and his wife Cynisca is jealous of the animated statue Galatea, which, after considerable trouble returns to its original state. George Bernard Shaw’s play Pygmalion takes its name from this legendary figure.

Pygmalion (1913). A play by George Bernard Shaw. Based on the classical legend, Shaw’s work is about human relations and the delicate modern social order. The Pygmalion of the play is Professor Henry Higgins, a teacher of phonetics. He takes on Eliza Doolittle, a Cockney flower girl, as his student. She is transformed from a guttersnipe into an elegant woman, but then, like the statue of the legend, having come to life, she falls in love with Higgins. His is the responsibility for having made her a lady; she cannot return to her former life, but Shaw makes it clear that she does not marry the professor. Pygmalion was made into a successful musical comedy, My Fair Lady (1956).

Pygmies (from Gr. pygmē, the length of the arm from elbow to knuckles). The name used by Homer and other classical writers for a supposed race of dwarfs. They were said to dwell somewhere in Ethiopia. Fable has it that every spring the cranes made war on these creatures and devoured them. The pygmies required axes to cut down cornstalks. When Heracles went to the country, they climbed up his goblet by ladders to drink from it, and while he was asleep two whole armies of them fell upon his right hand, and two upon his left. They were rolled up by Heracles in his lion’s skin. Jonathan Swift used this legend in his Gulliver’s Travels.

The term is now applied to certain dwarfish races of Central Africa, unknown until late in the 19th century, and of Malaysia.

Pythias. The son of Strophius and loyal friend of Orestes. He appears in several Greek dramas about Orestes, often as a mute character, but plays a noble role in Euripides’ Iphigenia in Tauris. He married Electra. His friendship for Orestes, like that of Damon and Pythias, is proverbial. See Iphigenia and the House of Atreus.

Pyle, Ernest (1890–1945). American war correspondent. Pyle’s dispatches from the front during World War II were admired by soldiers and civilians alike for their honesty and warmth. He was killed by Japanese gunfire on a small island off the coast of Okinawa. Some of his columns were collected in Here Is Your War (1943) and Brave Men (1944).

Pym, John (1584–1643). English Parliamentary statesman and orator. As leader of the anti-Royalist extremists in the Long Parliament, he prosecuted the case against the earl of Strafford and sponsored the Grand Remonstrance. His intransigence contributed to the outbreak of the Civil War.

Pynchon. The name of the Salem family who built and lived in The House of the Seven Gables in Hawthorne’s novel of that name.

Pynson, Richard (d. 1530). English printer. With Wynkyn de Worde, he succeeded William Caxton as king’s printer. He introduced Roman type into England, and printed Alexander Barclay’s Ship of Fools (1509) and an edition of Chaucer (1526).

Pyramus. A Babylonian youth in classical story (Ovid’s Metamorphoses), the lover of Thisbe. Thisbe was to meet him at the white mulberry-tree near the tomb of Ninus, but she was scared by a lion and fled, leaving her veil, which the lion smeared with blood. Pyramus, thinking she had been killed committed suicide. When Thisbe returned she found her lover dead and stabbed herself. The legend says that their blood stained the white fruit of the mulberry-tree to its present color.

The “tedious brief scene” and “very tragic mirth” presented by the rustic tradesmen in Shakespeare’s Midsummer Night’s Dream is a travesty of this legend.

Pyrocles. See Faerie Queene, The.

Pyrrha. The wife of Deucalion in Greek legend. They were the sole survivors of the deluge sent by Zeus to destroy the whole human race, and repopulated the world by casting stones behind them. (See Deucalion’s Flood.)

Pyrrhonism. A school of Greek philosophy named after Pyrrho (c. 365–275 B.C.). Pyrrho believed that virtue is the only good, and all other things are indifferent. Realizing the eternal nature of good helped him to achieve a tranquil state calledataraxy. In the field of action, Pyrrho relied upon convention and custom; only in the sphere of truth did he refuse to rely on human cognition. The attitude of Pyrrho was later refined, and referred to as Skepticism.

Pythagoras (fl. 540-510 B.C.). A Greek philosopher and mathematician. Almost nothing is known of his life, except that he was born on the island of Samos; it is probable that he studied with Pherecydes and he may have visited Egypt. Reliable information even on his teachings is scant, but he is known to have been interested in mathematics, especially in relation to weights and measures, and musical theory. He is best known for his doctrine of the transmigration of souls and the harmony of the spheres, although the proof of the so-called Pythagorean theorem (the 47th proposition of Euclid, Book One) is also attributed to him. He founded a semi-monastic school of philosophy in Crotona, Italy, where he apparently practiced divination, among other arts. He was regarded by his contemporaries with mingled awe and suspicion, and many wild tales grew up of his supernatural powers. The meeting place of Pythagoras' secret society was set afire and the sect suppressed almost everywhere. Whether Pythagoras himself died at this time or later is uncertain. Among the tales told of him are that he had a golden thigh, that he recalled previous existences, including one as Euphorbus, who fought at Troy, and that he was an incarnation of the Hyperborean Apollo.

Pythagoreans. Followers of Pythagoras. They lived almost monastic lives, observing many ascetical practices. In later times their doctrines became associated with Orphism.

Pythia. The title of the priestess of the famous Delphic Oracle.

Pythian games. One of the four great national Greek festivals. These games were celebrated every four years at Delphi in honor of Apollo. The games were supposed to have been instituted by Apollo in commemoration of his slaying of the serpent Python. Prizes were also given for music, poetry, sculpture, and painting. See Delphic Oracle.

Python. The monster serpent hatched from the mud of Deucalion's Flood. It was slain near Delphi by Apollo. It was the ancient guardian of the shrine of the Delphic Oracle and probably an oracular serpent.
Q.

Quadrivium (Lat. quadrī, four, and via, way). The collective name of the Schoolmen of the Middle Ages for the four liberal arts, arithmetic, music, geometry, and astronomy. The quadrivium was the fourfold way to knowledge. The threefold way to eloquence, the trivium (Lat. tres, three, and via), consisted of grammar, rhetoric, and logic. Together the quadrivium and trivium comprised the seven liberal arts.

Quadruple Alliance. An international alliance for offensive or defensive purposes.

1. In 1718, England, France, the Holy Roman Emperor, and the Netherlands formed such an alliance when Philip V of Spain sought to rescind the peace settlements reached after the War of the Spanish Succession.

2. The best-known Quadruple Alliance was formed in 1814 by Great Britain, Austria, Prussia, and Russia to strengthen the coalition against Napoleon I; after Napoleon's final defeat, the alliance was renewed in order to insure the execution of the Treaty of Paris of 1815.

3. In 1834, Great Britain, France, Spain, and Portugal formed an alliance in order to strengthen the constitutional government of Spain and the throne of Isabella II against the Carlists.

Quakers. A familiar name for members of the Society of Friends, an evangelical Christian religious sect founded by George Fox. They have no definite creed and no regular ministry, but are guided by their doctrine of INNER LIGHT. Their tenets include pacifism, a refusal to take oaths, and originally a characteristic simplicity in dress and speech (i.e., use of the archaic "Thee" and "Thou"). "Justice Bennett of Derby," says Fox, "was the first to call us Quakers, because I bade him quake and tremble at the word of the Lord."

Quality Street (1901). A drama by J. M. Barrie. When she sees that her lover, Valentine Brown, finds her disappointingly like a mousy spinster on his return from a long absence, Phoebe Throsell transforms herself into the younger, gayer girl that she was, calling herself Livvy, niece of Phoebe, and thus reconquers her love.

Quarles, Francis (1592–1644). English poet of the METAPHYSICAL SCHOOL. His religious poetry, similar to that of George Herbert, is marked by an elliptical, colloquial, or hortatory style and by striking imagery chosen from the everyday pursuits and interests of his time. He is best known for Emblems (1635), a book of poems accompanied by appropriate pictures, which won enormous popularity in its day. His other works include A Feast for Worms (1620), Argalus and Parthenia (1629), History of Samson (1631), Divine Fancies (1632), and Hieroglyphics (1638). See EMBLEM BOOKS.

Quasimodo. The deformed bell ringer of Notre Dame in Victor Hugo's novel. The HUNCHBACK OF NOTRE DAME.

Quasimodo, Salvatore (1901– ). Italian poet. He was awarded the Nobel Prize for literature in 1959. His work falls into two periods: a pre-World War II "hermetic" period characterized by a recon- dite style and metaphysical content (see HERMETICISM) and a postwar "engaged" period concerned with the interpretation of contemporary history, social conditions, and the aspirations of the common man. His verse of the first period includes the collections Waters and Land (Acque e Terre; 1929), Sunken Boat (Ogge Sommerso; 1932), Aretio and Apollion (Erato e Apollion; 1936), and Poésie (1938). Postwar works include Ed E' Sabito Sera (1954), Day After Day (Giorno Dopo Giorno; 1947), Il Falso e Vero Verde (1956), and the songbook Tutte Le Poesie (1960). He has also translated Greek lyrics and the works of Molière, Shakespeare, and E. E. Cummings into Italian.

Quatrain. In prosody, a stanza containing four lines in any meter, especially the ballad stanza, the In Memoriam stanza, which rhymes a-b-b-a, and the Rubaiyat stanza, which rhymes a-a-b-a.

Quattrocento (It., "the four hundreds"). The Italian way of designating the 15th century. The term thus refers to the early RENAISSANCE, the age of HUMANISM, and the period of the REVIVAL OF ANTIQUITY, and in art history, to the century and the style of such artists as Masaccio, Botticelli, Fra Angelico, Ghirlandaio, Brunelleschi, and Donatello.

Queen, Ellery. Pen name of Frederic Dannay (1905– ) and Manfred B. Lee (1905– ). American detective-story writers and editors. The two are cousins whose fictional sleuth Ellery Queen has exercised his ratiocinative powers in numerous successful novels and stories since he made his first appearance in The Roman Hat Mystery (1929). Under the pseudonym Barnaby Ross, they also occasionally write about detective Drury Lane. Among their books are Drury Lane's Last Case (1933), The Four of Hearts (1938), and The Origin of Evil (1951). In 1941, they began to edit Ellery Queen's Mystery Magazine, making it the finest and best-known periodical in the field.
Queen Mab. See Percy Bysshe Shelley.

Queen of Hearts. A character in Lewis Carroll's Alice's Adventures in Wonderland. Every time she is crossed or defeated during her mad croquet match, the queen shouts "Off with his head!" at the1 officer. When Alice points out that the trial of the Knave of Hearts, alleged to have stolen some tarts, is being absurdly conducted, the queen replies irrefutably, "Off with her head!"

Queen of Spades, The (Pikovaya damas; 1833). A short story by Aleksandr Pushkin. Although it belongs to the Gothic tradition of horror the tale is unusual for the calm, matter-of-fact manner in which the breakdown of the gambler Germann is related. Pushkin's prose style in this story is at its barest and most simple. Tchaikovsky based an opera on the story.

Queffélec, Henri (1910– ). French novelist. Concerned with crises of conscience and religious faith, he usually sets his novels in his native Brittany, often among the fishermen, as in Island Priest (Un recteur de l'île de Sein; 1941), filmed as God Needs Men) and The Kingdom Under the Sea (Un Royaume sous la mer; 1957). His other works include Saint Anthony of the Desert (1950) and Frontier of the Unknown (Combat contre l'invisible; 1958, also translated as The Men of Damesan).

Queróz, José María Eça de. See José María Eça de Queiroz.

Quem quaeritis (Whom seek ye?) trope. A text in the medieval Easter liturgy. It was in the form of a dialogue between the women and the angel at the empty tomb of the risen Christ. At about the beginning of the 11th century it began to be acted out during the service of Matins. The brief scene was gradually expanded, with priests, nuns, and choirboys taking the parts. From this simple beginning grew the medieval drama. See MYSTERY PLAYS.

Queneau, Raymond (1903– ). French novelist, poet, and critic. Queneau is best known for his acid wit in such novels as Skin of Dreams (Lein de Rassel; 1944), and Zazie (1959). His parents, Charles Henry Quennell (1872–1935) and Marjorie Quennell (1884– ), published a noteworthy series of popular educational books, including A History of Everyday Things in England (1918–1934; 4 vols.).

Quental, Antero Tárquínio de (1842–1891). Portuguese poet. Born in the Azores, he studied at the university of Coimbra, where he became a leader of the "Coimbra generation" of students who sought to revivify Portuguese literature. His famous pamphlet Do bom senso e bom gosto (1866) sparked the questão Coimbra, a bitter literary dispute in which the younger generation rebelled against the sterile romanticism divorced from contemporary reality, that was exemplified by the works of the blind poet António Castilho. Influenced by Hegel and Proudhon, Quental was a socialist for a time but failed to find a creed that would satisfy his spiritual and moral aspirations. Having retired from public life in 1874, he returned in 1891 to his native island, where he took his own life in a public park.

As a poet Quental is best known for his sonnets, which constitute a spiritual autobiography of his tortured existence. About 150 of these are collected in Sonetos Completos (1866). He also wrote Ritos de Extinta Luz (1859–1863) and Primaveras Românticas (1871), poems representative of his early romantic phase, and Osus Modernus (1865), in which he gave expression to his revolutionary views.

Quentin Durward (1823). A romantic novel by Sir Walter Scott set in 15th-century France. Durward, a gallant young member of Louis XI's Scottish Guards, seeks the hand of Isabella, countess of Croye. His suit prospers when he saves the king'slife in a boar hunt.

Querelle des anciens et des modernes (Quarrel of the Ancients and the Moderns). A French literary battle of the late 17th century between the ancients (classicists), who believed that literature should adhere to models and even to themes of antiquity, and the modernists, who did not wish literature to be thus restricted. The first leading spokesman for the modernists, Desmarests, was promptly condemned by Boileau. The ensuing dispute engaged the entire world of French letters and ended at the turn of the century with Boileau's partial capitulation.

Quessay, François (1694–1774). Physician to Louis XV of France. As an economist, he contributed articles to the Encyclopédie, which, along with his Tableau économique (1758), were the basis for the theory adopted by the Physiocrats. His thought influenced, among others, Adam Smith.

Quenu, Pasquier (1634–1719). French theologian. Quenu was the chief spokesman after the death of Arnauld for the Jansenists in their dispute with the Jesuits. His enormously popular Réflexions morales sur le Nouveau Testament (Moral Reflections on the New Testament, 1671) was condemned in the papal bull Unigenitus (1713).

Quetzalcoatl. The nature god of various Indian tribes in Mexico prior to the Spanish conquest. His symbol was the quetzal or royal bird, known abroad as the emblem of Guatemala.

Querzado, [y Villegas], Francisco Gómez de (1580–1645). Spanish satirist, moralist, and poet. Born in Madrid of a good family, Quevedo studied at Alcalá. After a hasty flight from Spain to escape the consequences of a duel in which he had slain a noble (1611), Quevedo entered the service of the duke of Osuna in Italy. When Osuna fell from favor, Quevedo was exiled to his estate in La Mancha. In 1639 he was accused of having slipped into the king's napkin a sataric poem against the royal favorite, the count-duke of Olivares, and was imprisoned in the monastery of San Marcos in Leon. He was released in 1643, his health shattered.

A prolific writer who essayed nearly every genre, Quevedo is remembered mainly for his vitriolic satires, in which he mercilessly exposed the follies and vices of mankind. The best known are the picaresque novel El Buscón and the Suenos, a series of burlesque descriptions of Hell. His other prose works include Política de Dios (1626), a treatise on Chris-ian rule; Marco Bruto (1644), a commentary on Plutarch's life of Brutus; a life of St. Paul (1644); and translations from Seneca, Epictetus, and St. François de Sales.

In poetry as in prose Quevedo excelled as a satirist. Over 800 of his poems have been preserved, but the best of these are the picaresque ballads and light verses that enable him to display his wit and familiar-

Quintilian. Full Latin name, Marcus Fabius Quintilianus c. A.D. 35-99). Spanish-born rhet-

Quintilian proposes to give an educational schedule for the training of the ideal orator. Throughout, he emphasizes the importance of personal integrity and honest conviction in the art of public persuasion. The book is a valuable source for us today for it describes, in minute detail, the educational advantages available to the well-to-do Roman youth of the first century, and includes, as good and bad examples, selections from the works of Latin authors whose writings would otherwise have been entirely lost.

Quirinus. See Romulus.

Quiróga, Horacio (1878–1937). Uruguayan short-story writer. Quiróga wrote poetry and novels, including Historia de un amor turbio (1908), but he was most successful in the short-story form. Although he never lost his initial tendencies toward modernism, his prose became clearer and his narrative technique more realistic. His best-known stories are set in the jungles of Misiones territory in Argentina where he spent many years. In some, such as those collected in Cuentos de la selva (1918) and Anaconda (1921), the protagonists are animals. The stories are characterized by haunting, imaginative depictions of the forces of nature, which seem to dwarf the fears and passions of his characters. Other collections include Cuentos de amor, de locura y de muerte (1917) and La gallina degollada y otros cuentos (1925).

Quisling, Vidkun (1887–1945). Norwegian political figure. He actively collaborated in the German conquest of Norway (1940) and became head of the State Council under the Nazis. After the German defeat he was tried and executed. His name has become a synonym for traitor.

Quo Vadis? (1895). A historical novel by H. Sienkiewicz. It deals with the Rome of Nero and the early Christian martyrs. The Roman noble, Petronius, a worthy representative of the dying paganism, is perhaps the most interesting figure, and the struggle between Christianity and paganism supplies the central plot, but the canvas is large. A succession of characters and episodes and, above all, the richly colorful, decadent life of ancient Rome give the novel its chief interest. The beautiful Christian Lygia is the object of unwelcome attentions from Vinicius, one of the Emperor’s guards, and when she refuses to yield to his importunities, she is denounced and thrown to the wild beasts of the arena. She escapes and eventually marries Vinicius, whom Peter and Paul have converted to Christianity. Quo Vadis? has been translated into nearly every language.
Ra. In ancient Egyptian religion, one of the most frequent names given to the sun god, the supposed ancestor of all the Pharaohs. He was worshiped as the creator and protector of men and the vanquisher of evil; it was said that men and women were made from his tears. He is usually represented with the head of a falcon and crowned with the solar disk and ureus, the symbol of power over life and death. See AMEN; APHIS.

Raabe, Wilhelm (1831–1910). German realistic novelist. He is known for the pessimistic irony and cultural criticism found in the three novels that established his fame: Der Hungerpastor (The Hunger-Pastor, 1864), Abu Telfan (1868), and Der Schöderrump (1870). His style, however, often shows a benign, forgiving humor about his characters. In his later works, for example Stopftütchen (1891), he began to experiment more with the form of the novel, and often created complicated time-structures.

Rab and his Friends (1859). A dog story by Dr. John Brown. Rab is described as "old, gray, brindled, as big as a little Highland bull," extraordinarily faithful and affectionate.

Rabbi Ben Ezra (1855). A famous poem on old age by Robert Browning. First published in the collection Dramatis Personae (1864), it opens with the well-known lines:

Grow old along with me
The best is yet to be,
The last of life, for which the first was made.

The supposed speaker, Rabbi Ben Ezra (c. 1090–1168), was one of the most distinguished Jewish literati of the Middle Ages.

Rabble in Arms (1933). A historical novel by Kenneth Roberts. It continues the history of the Revolution which Roberts began in ABUNDEL. Rabble in Arms describes the defeat of Burgoyne's invasion by Benedict Arnold. Both stories undertake to humanize the Revolution by exploring the factual basis that underlies its myths.

Rabelais, Francois (1494–1553). French scholar, humanist, physician, and author of the robust and outspoken GARGANTUA and PANTAGRUEL. Having first entered the Franciscan and then the Benedictine orders, he left the confining environment of the monastery to study, practice, and teach medicine in Montpellier and Lyons. Twice he accompanied Jean du Bellay, bishop of Paris and later cardinal, to Rome, where he made archeological and botanical studies. From 1550 to 1553, Rabelais, who is sometimes known as "the curate of Meudon," held the parishes of Saint-Martin-de-Meudon and of Saint-Christophe-du-Jambet in the diocese of Mans, though he probably did not reside there. Throughout his life he published various works on medicine and translations in addition to his literary masterpiece. Gar- gantua and Pantagruel is filled with allusions to Rabelais' personal life, as well as to the contemporary French scene, humanistic studies which interested him, and observations, he had made on his visits to Italy.

Rabelaisian. Coarsely and boisterously satirical in the Gallic comic tradition; grotesque, extravagant, and licentious in language; reminiscent of the literary style of Rabelais.

Rabicane or Rabicano. Argalia's horse in the Orlando poems of Matteo Maria Boiardo and Lodovico Ariosto (see ORLANDO FURIOSO). Argalia, the brother of Angelica, the princess of Cathay who enamors the paladins of Charlemagne, is killed by Ferragù.

Rabinowitz, Solomon J. See Sholem ALEICHEM.

Rachel. In the Old Testament, the daughter of Laban, wife of Jacob, and mother of Joseph and Benjamin. Jacob had promised her hand in marriage if he worked seven years for her father. At the end of that time, he was tricked into marrying her sister Leah and was forced to serve another seven years for Rachel (Gen. 29–33). The phrase "Rachel weeping for her children and would not be comforted, because they are not" occurs in the New Testament in allusion to Herod's Massacre of the Innocents after the birth of Christ (Matt. 2:18).

Rachel or Mademoiselle Rachel. The stage name of Elisabeth Félix (1820–1858), a celebrated 19th-century actress of the Comédie Française.

Rachel. An actress in Marcel Proust's REMEMBERANCE OF THINGS PAST. At first offered to the narrator as a prostitute, she becomes the demanding mistress of Robert de Saint-Loup. At that time she is scorned by society, but later she is launched as a great actress by the duchesse de Guermantes.

Rachmaninoff, Sergey Vassilievitch (1873–1943). Russian-born composer and pianist. His music, often rhapsodic and impassioned, is very popular on the concert stage, especially his Prelude in C-sharp minor (1892) and the piano concertos. Although an expatriate after 1917, he was greatly admired in the Soviet Union.

Racine, Jean (1639–1699). French playwright. Born at La Ferté-Milon, near Soissons, the son of a petty official, Racine was orphaned at an early age and left in the care of a Jansenist grandmother who sent him in 1655 to the schools of Port-Royal. There he acquired a thorough education in doctrine, as well as in classical literature, and the combination of the Jansenist concept of original sin with the Greek concept of Fate was to exert considerable influence upon his later work. In 1658, Racine went to the College d'Hancourt, part of the university of Paris, where he discovered and delighted in the profane world of actors and the theater. He became a protégé of Chapelain and, after writing an ode on the marriage of Louis XIV—La Nympe de la Seine (The Nymph of the Seine, 1660)—he managed to obtain a small pension. Fearful for the state of his soul and hoping to persuade him to enter the church, his family sent him to Uzès to live with a clergyman uncle, but Racine returned to Paris in 1662 to publish further odes and to cultivate the friendship of such men as Boileau, Molière, and La Fontaine. Molière produced Racine's first two tragedies: La Thébaïde (The Theban Woman, 1664) andAlexandre le Grand. Though not his finest work, these plays established Racine's reputation. Andromaque achieved as great a success as Corneille's Le Cid, and after the comedy les Plaisdeurs, a satire on the judiciary and one of his few treatments of a contemporary subject, Racine challenged Corneille with Britannicus, a historico-political tragedy very much in the older playwright's genre, and Bérénice, based on the same subject as Corneille's Tite et Bérénice and appearing at virtually the same time. The public held Racine the victor in the contest, and the young playwright, now at the height of his powers and of his career, went on to produce his greatest plays: Bajazet, Mithridate, Iphigénie en Aulide, and Phèdre (1677). Racine was elected to the French Academy in 1673. In 1677, the year of his marriage, he retired from the theater, discouraged by the elaborate intrigue conducted by his enemies against Phèdre, tempted by an appointment to the post of historiographer to Louis XIV, and reconciled with the Jansenists of Port-Royal. Racine devoted himself fully to his new duties, and aside from two biblical plays, Esther (1689) and Athalie (1691), commissioned by Madame de Maintenon for the schoolgirls of St. Cyr, he never again wrote for the theater. The works of his last years include four Cantiques Spirituels (Spiritual Hymns) and the Abrégé de l'Histoire de Port-Royal, published after his death.

Racine's tragedies resemble those of Corneille in their rigid adherence to a single theme, shorn of all irrelevancies, in their loyalty to the classical unities, and in their careful exposition of character and depiction of powerful spiritual conflicts. He was no mere imitator, however, but rather the inheritor and modifier of a tradition. Though Racine's Hellenism is apparent in his frequent culling of themes from Greek originals, his main thematic preoccupations are passion and women. His depiction of the emotions and especially of the subverting, destructive power of love was severely criticized during his lifetime as being unnecessarily realistic. Compared to Corneille's, Racine's characters are ordinary beings, subject to superhuman passions but also to human doubts and fears; far from possessing the extraordinary determination of, for example, Corneille's Cid, they are subject to the fluctuations of feeble and uncertain wills, and in this respect reveal the influence of Racine's Jansenist upbringing. His most memorable characters are the fierce and tender women of his great tragedies; in these creatures, Racine accomplished the humanization of classical French drama. Many might agree with La Bruyère, but few would regard his remark as condemnation, when he said that Corneille showed men "as they ought to be" and Racine "as they are." More would perhaps echo Brunetière, who praised Racine as the first to write "the literature of the passions of the heart."

Radelife, Mrs. Ann. Born Ann Ward (1764–1823). English novelist, known for her tales of terror in the convention of the Gothic novel. Her books include The Romance of the Forest (1791); The Mysteries of Udolpho, her most popular novel; A Sicilian Romance (1790); An Italian Romance (1791); and The Italian, or the Confessional of the Black Penitents (1797), whose best-drawn character, the implacable, villainous monk Schedoni, is one of the prototypes of the Byronic hero.

Radhakrishnan, Sarvepalli (1888– ). Indian educator and statesman. Radhakrishnan was professor of philosophy at Presidency College, Madras (1916–1917), and at Calcutta University (1921–1931, 1939–1941). He later served as ambassador to Russia and as vice president of India. In 1962 he became president of the country. He wrote The Hindu View of Life and Indian Philosophy (1923–1927) and edited and translated The Bhagavad-Gita (1948).

Radiguet, Raymond (1903–1923). French novelist and poet. At once lyrical and cynical in his accounts of the adolescent's emotional initiation, Radiguet showed his skill in such novels as The Devil in the Flesh (Le Diable au corps; 1923) and Count d'Orgel (Le Bal du Comte d'Orgel; 1924).

Radio City. Popular designation of Rockefeller Center, a group of buildings in New York City. Built between 1931 and 1940, they were specially designed to house the city's leading commercial enterprises. The term is derived from the R. C. A. (Radio Corporation of America) Building, which is the center of the group and contains the studios of the National Broadcasting Company. Included in the group are a sunken plaza, landscaped gardens, outdoor sculpture, shops, restaurants, and a theater.

Radishchev, Aleksandr Nikolayevich (1749–1802). Russian writer. Radishchev's politically liberal book, A Journey from Petersburg to Moscow (Puteshištviye iz Peterburga v Moskvu; 1790), created a sensation during the reign of Catherine the Great. Radishchev had been educated at the University of Leipzig, where he picked up the liberal ideas prevalent in Europe at the time. He returned to Russia and became a customs official. His book, describing an imaginary trip between the two Russian cities, was an outspoken indictment of serfdom and the government. The Empress, already upset by the French Revolution, was outraged at the exposures and ordered Radishchev sentenced to death, but this was commuted to exile in Siberia. He was released on the accession of Paul I in 1801. Broken in physical and mental health, he committed suicide the following year. Radishchev was also the author of some technically fine poetry, including an Ode to Liberty (1781–1783) which forcefully expressed the liberal sentiments of his book.

Ragnarok. In Scandinavian mythology, the Twilights of the Gods, or day of doom. It will result in the destruction of the universe; the heavens will disappear, the earth will be swallowed up by the sea, and fire will consume the elements. There will be a final battle between the gods of evil, Lok, Hel, Fenris and the Midgard serpent, and the good gods, Odin and his companions, during which all will be slaughtered. After Ragnarok there will be a regeneration of all things; a new world will arise repopulated by Lif and Lifthrasir. Ragnarok is translated into German as Götterdämmerung, which is the title of the fourth work in Wagner's Ring der Nibelungen. See Bilrost; Val.

Rahab. In the Old Testament, the woman of Jericho who protected the two Israelite spies sent by Joshua and managed their escape (Josh. 2). When the city was later to be destroyed, Joshua commanded that “only Rahab the harlot shall live; she and all that are with her in the house” (Josh. 6:18). She lived among the Israelites for a long time afterward.

Rain. The demon who, according to Hindu legend, causes eclipses. He drank some of the nectar of immortality one day, but was discovered by the Sun and Moon, who informed against him, and Vishnu cut off his head. But he had already taken some of the nectar into his mouth, as a result of which the head was immortal; ever afterward he hunted the Sun and Moon, causing eclipses when he occasionally caught them.

Raimund, Ferdinand (1790–1836). Austrian playwright, associated with the highly successful People's Theater of Vienna. Many of his plays, such as Der Alpenkönig und der Menschenfeind (The Alp-King and the Misanthrope, 1828), were popular primarily because of their light-hearted humor and songs; but some, such as Der Verschwender (The Squanderer, 1834), lay more stress on serious moral teachings.

Rain. See Miss Thompson.

Rainbow, The (1915). A novel by D. H. Lawrence. It is about the emotional life and loves of three generations of the Brangwen family, farmers and craftsmen of Nottinghamshire, Lawrence's childhood home. Tom Brangwen, a farm youth, marries Lydia Lensky, a Polish widow of a political exile. Anna, Lydia's daughter by her first marriage, grows up as Tom's own child and marries her cousin, Will Brangwen, a strong-willed, morose man with a passion for wood carving. Most of the novel is about Ursula, daughter of Anna and Will. A sensitive, high-spirited rebel, she escapes from her confining environment, as Lawrence himself did, by going to college and becoming a teacher. Her emotional life consists of a love affair with Anton Skrebensky, a Polish exile and officer in the British army, and an intense attraction to Winifred Inger, an older teacher. Winifred, an athletic, intellectual woman, and a feminist, marries Ursula's uncle; Ursula rejects Skrebensky. Ursula's story is continued in Women in Love, a sequel. When The Rainbow was published it was denounced as obscene, and a whole edition was destroyed by court order.

The sultan of Morocco met his ransom demands to avoid war with the powers involved. An American slogan of the time ran “Perdicaris alive or Raisuli dead!”

Rake's Progress, The. A series of engravings by William Hogarth. Depicting the career of a wealthy, foolish young gentleman that carries him through the pleasure-houses of London to the madhouse of Bedlam, the engravings served as the basis of the libretto that W. H. Auden and Chester Kallman wrote for Igor Stravinsky's opera The Rake's Progress (1951).

Some are hideously ugly, but others, especially the female spirits, allure by their beauty.

Raleigh or Ralegh, Sir Walter (1552–1618). English explorer, courtier, poet, and prose writer. One of the favorites of Queen Elizabeth between 1581 and 1592, Raleigh helped his friend Edmund Spenser arrange for the publication of the first three books of The Faerie Queene; also during this period he sent several expeditions to North America, though the Queen would not allow him to make the voyages himself. He fell from Elizabeth's favor in 1592, according to legend, because of his seduction of one of her maids of honor. He took advantage of being in the Queen’s bad graces by making in 1595 an expeditionary voyage to South America, which he described in the colorful (and fanciful) Discovery of Guiana. He was reinstated at court during the last years of Elizabeth's reign, but at the accession of James I he was imprisoned on a flimsy charge of treason.
narrowly escaped execution, and was detained in the Tower (though in reasonable comfort) for the next thirteen years. In 1616 he was released on his promise to James I to discover gold in South America, providing that he neither intruded on Spanish possessions or pirated Spanish ships. Unfortunately, Raleigh attacked a Spanish settlement, and on his return to England was condemned and executed.

A true courtier poet, Raleigh did not publish his poetry but had it circulated in manuscript. As a result, only a few of his poems have come down to the present day. Cynthia, a long poem in honor of the Queen, was highly praised by Spenser, but only a fragment has survived. Among his best-known poems are The Nymph's Reply to the Shepherd, an answer to Christopher Marlowe's Passionate Shepherd; The Lie; The Passionate Man's Pilgrimage; and the sonnet beginning "Methought I saw the grave where Laura lay," prefixed to Spenser's Faerie Queene. In addition to a prose History of the World (of which only one volume was completed), Raleigh wrote a narrative of the sea-battle between the Revenge and a Spanish warship in which his cousin, Sir Richard Grenville, was killed; Tennyson's ballad The Revenge is largely based on Raleigh's account. The legend of the courteous Sir Walter spreading his cloak over a puddle that the Queen might cross dry-shod is mentioned by Sir Walter Scott in Kenilworth.

Ralph Roister Doister (performed c. 1553; published 1566). The earliest English comedy, written by Nicholas Udall. Based on Latin models, it has five acts and is written in rhymed doggerel. The titular hero is a swaggering, blustering fellow who, urged on by Mathew Merygrecke, tries unsuccessfully to win Dame Christian Custance, a rich widow.

Rama. The seventh incarnation of Vishnu. Rama performed many wonderful exploits, such as killing giants, demons, and other monsters. He won Sita as his wife because he was able to bend the bow of Shiva in the court of Sita's father. He is the hero of the great Hindu epic, the Ramayana. A clever retelling of the Rama story, in the nature of a spoof, is The Ramayana (1954) by Aubrey Menen.

Ramachandra. See Vishnu.

Ramadan or Ramazan. The ninth month of the Muslim year, considered to be the Muslim Holy Month. From sunrise to sundown during this period, a strict fast is observed by all pious Muslims; only the sick, infirm, or pregnant are temporarily excused. See BÁBRÁM; KADR, ÁL.

Raman, Sir Chandrasekhara Venkata (1887–). Indian scientist. He discovered the light wave phenomenon known as the Raman Effect in 1928, was knighted in 1929, and received the Nobel Prize for Physics in 1930. He was awarded the Franklin Medal of America in 1951 and the Bharat Ratna, the highest government honor in India, in 1954.

Ramayana (Sansk., "Relating to Rama"). The history of Rama, the great epic poet of ancient India, ranking with the Mahabharata. It is ascribed to the poet Valmiki, and, as now known, consists of 24,000 stanzas in seven books. Parts of the Ramayana date from 500 B.C. The young hero, Rama, an incarnation (avatar) of the deity Vishnu, wins his bride, Sita, by bending the great bow that had belonged to the god Rudra. When about to be named heir-apparent of Ayodhya, Rama is exiled for 14 years through the jealousy of Kaikeyi, one of his father's wives, who desires the throne for her son, Bharata. Sita is carried off by Ravana, the demon-king of Ceylon. A great part of the narrative is concerned with Rama's efforts to win her back. He secures the assistance of Vibhishana, Ravana's own brother and of Hanuman, the great monkey-god, whose monkeys construct a bridge to Ceylon. After this alliance rescues Sita, Rama is welcomed back as the monarch of Ayodhya. But both Rama and the people fear that Sita has been defiled by her sojourn with the demon-king, and although she successfully undergoes an ordeal by fire, Rama sends her away. She wanders into the forest, finds shelter in the hut of Valmiki, and there gives birth to Rama's two sons, whom she brings up to be brave and noble youths. Eventually she is found by Rama and received back as his wife.

Rambler, The (1750–1752). A series of semi-weekly essays written by Samuel Johnson, dealing with mores and literature. They were thought, at first, too difficult for a public trained on Addison’s Spectator. Some even found them dull, as did Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, who remarked that the Rambler “follows the Spectator with the same pace that a pack horse would a hunter.”

Rambouillet, Hôtel de. The house in Paris where the marquise de Rambouillet founded the salon (c. 1615) out of which grew the Académie française. The members included Mme de Sévigné, Des cartes, Richelieu, Bossuet, and La Rochefoucauld. Disgusted with the immoral and puerile tone of the times, they sought to restore delicacy and refinement to life and literature. Gradually they developed a language of their own, calling common things by uncommon names. The women became known as les précieuses and the men as esprits doux. Although the coterie performed a good and lasting service, the growth of preciseness, pedantry, and affectation led to its disruption. Mollière hastened its fall with two telling satires: Les Précieuses Ridicules (1659) and Les Femmes Savantes (1672).

Rameau, Jean Philippe (1683–1764). The most important French composer of the 18th century, whose works include the operas Castor et Pollux (1737) and Dardanus (1739); the opera-ballets Les Indes galantes (1735) and Les Fêtes d’Hébé (1739); two books of harpsichord pieces (1706 and 1741); he is also an important writer on musical theory; his Traité de l’Harmonie réduite à ses Principes Naturels (1722) laid the foundation for modern harmonic theory.

Rameau's Nephew. See NEVEU DE RAMEAU, LE.

Ramos, Graciliano (1892–1953). Brazilian novelist. Sometimes considered the finest Brazilian novelist since Machado de Assis, Ramos wrote about the northeastern state of Alagoas, where he was a merchant and public official. His first novel, Caetés (1933), was written in the mid-1920’s and was published after the vivid style and sardonic tone of one of his official reports had won him national attention. Later, his radical political views brought him persecution and imprisonment. He spent his last years as a proofreader for a newspaper in Rio de Janeiro.

Ramos’ novels are characterized by acute, though dispasionate, insight into the human mind and awareness of the inequities of social and economic conditions in northeast Brazil. São Bernardo (1934) is a first-person account of an unfeeling parvenu in the cane-growing littoral of Alagoas. In Angústia (Anguish, 1936), he utilized a stream-of-consciousness technique to weave the story of a man who is led to destruction through thwarted sexual desire. Set on the aridsertão, or backcountry, of Alagoas, Vidas Sétas (1938) is an episodic work about a cowherd whose lot is difficult but who is uncontaminated by the corruption of the littoral.

He put together many collections of Scottish poetry, among them being The Ever Green (1724) and The Tea-Table Miscellany (1724–1727). His original works include Patie and Roger (1720) and Jenny and Meggy (1723), humorous pastorals, and The Gentle Shepherd (1725), a pastoral drama. Ramsey was also the first to have a circulating library in Scotland. His eldest son, Allan Ramsay was a prominent portrait painter in Edinburgh.

A professor of philosophy in the Collège de France (1543), his anti-Aristotelian doctrine of logic, known as Ramism, became current in the English universities, principally at Cambridge. He was a victim of the massacre of St. Bartholomew.

Ramuz, Charles [Ferdinand] (1878–1947). Swiss novelist. Ramuz stylized the peasant speech and life of his native region, analyzing the primitive emotions and spiritual climate of its people. He is best known for The Reign of the Evil One (Le Règne de l’esprit malin; 1922), The End of All Men (Présence de la mort; 1922, also translated as The Triumph of Death), and When the Mountain Fell (Derozene; 1936).

Ran or Rana. In Norse mythology, goddess of the sea, wife of Aegir, and mother of nine daughters of the waves. Her name signifies robbery, and it was she who caught seafarers in her net and drew them down to her dwelling beneath the water.

Rand, Ayn (1905-1982). Russian-born American novelist. Her novels, Anthem (1936), The Fountainhead, Atlas Shrugged (1957), and We the Living (1959), are polemical and melodramatic vehicles for her ideas. In her so-called objectivist philosophy, she defends capitalism and attacks government controls because they may frustrate the self-interested, supermanlike individual whom she has pictured in her novels and explicated on further in For the New Intellectual: The Philosophy of Ayn Rand (1961). She is also the author of a mystery play The Night of January 16th (1935).

Randall, James Ryder (1839–1908). American journalist, teacher, and poet. At the outbreak of the Civil War, Randall, inspired by Baltimore anti-Union sentiment, wrote his famous poem, Maryland, My Maryland. A volume of Poems was published posthumously (1910).

Randolph, John. Known as John Randolph of Roanoake (1773–1833). American statesman and orator. A brilliant nonconformist whose eccentricity often bordered on insanity, Randolph was descended from a prominent Virginia family. He was elected to the first of his many terms in Congress in 1799 and became chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee at the age of 28. Although he initially supported the policies of Jefferson, he broke with the administration over its measures to acquire Florida, dubbing the president “St. Thomas of Captivity.” In succeeding administrations he opposed the War of 1812 and the chartering of the second U.S. Bank; during the Missouri controversy, he emerged as a sectional leader. His attacks on the alliance of John Quincy Adams and Henry Clay led the latter to challenge him to a duel (1826), in which neither was hurt. Randolph was appointed minister to Russia in 1830 but resigned shortly because of poor health. He was buried facing the West so that, it is said, he might keep his eye on Henry Clay.

Randolph, Thomas (1605-1635). English poet and dramatist. A brilliant scholar at Cambridge and a friend of Ben Jonson, Randolph wrote plays deeply influenced by classical drama. His Hey for Honesty (pub. 1651) is an adaptation of Aristophanes' Plutus; and his other plays, such as Aristippus (1630), The Jealous Lovers (1632), and The Muses' Looking-Glass (1638), reflect his academic background. He is best known for a few poems of a witty and intimate tone, such as An Ode to Master Anthony Stafford and A Congratulatory to Mr. Ben Jonson from his Poems (1638).

Random, Roderick. See Roderick Random.

Ranjit Singh (1780-1839). Indian maharaja. With the help of the British, he established a Sikh kingdom in the Punjab. He is known as the "Lion of the Punjab."

Ranke, Leopold von (1795-1886). German historian. Outstanding for his scientific approach to history, he relied entirely on contemporary, firsthand sources, which he subjected to the most rigorous analysis. His best-known work is His History of the Popes (Die römischen Päpste; 1834-1839).

Ransom, John Crowe (1888- ). American poet and critic. Ransom attended and later taught at Vanderbilt University, where he was a member of the group known as the Fugitives; a staunch believer in Southern agrarianism, he also contributed to the symposium I'll Take My Stand (1930). (See Agrarians.) In 1937 he went to teach at Kenyon College where he became the founder and editor of the Kenyon Review. As a critic, he gave currency to the term New Criticism in a book by that title (1941). His literary essays appear in God Without Thunder (1930), The World's Body (1938), and Poems and Essays (1955).

Ransom's poetry, broadly showing the influence of the metaphysical poets, is marked by irony, criticism of the 20th-century industrial world, and nostalgia for the past, especially the aristocratic society of the South before the Civil War. His books of poetry include Poems About God (1919), Chills and Fever (1924), Grace After Meat (1924), Two Gentlemen in Bonds (1927), and Selected Poems (1945).

Rao, Raja (1909- ). Indian novelist writing in English. He studied at the University of Montpellier and at the Sorbonne and has published stories in French. He wrote Kanthapura (1938), Cow of the Barricades (1947), The Serpent and the Rope (1960).

Rape of the Lock, The (1714). A mock-heroic poem, often considered the best in the English language, by Alexander Pope. The first sketch of two cantos was published in 1712; the final version was in five cantos. The poem was based on a real incident: Lord Petre, in a thoughtless moment of frolic gallantry, cut off a lock of Arabella Fermor's hair, and this liberty gave rise to a feud between the two families. In his treatment of the incident, Pope employed an elaborate and elevated style from the classical epic: the description of a card-game as a battle, the final combat between beaux and belles, and the journey to the Cave of Spleen. The heroine, called Belinda, indignantly demands back the ringlet, but after a fruitless charge it is affirmed that it has been transported to heaven, and henceforth shall "midst the stars inscribe Belinda's name."

Raphael. One of the principal angels of Jewish angelology. According to the apocryphal book of Tobit, he traveled with Tobias, instructing him how to marry Sara and drive away the wicked spirit, Asmodeus. In his Paradise Lost (1667) Milton calls him "the sociable spirit" and "affable archangel," and it is he who is sent by God to advise Adam of his danger. Raphael is usually distinguished in art by a pilgrim's staff, or is shown carrying a fish; this alludes to the fish he helped Tobias catch which miraculously cured Tobit's blindness.

Raphael. Real name, Raffaello Sanzio or Santi (1483-1520). Italian painter. With Leonardo and Michelangelo forming the greatest trio of artists ever produced by a single age, Raphael was born in Urbino, and settled in Rome where he worked mainly at the Vatican. A versatile artist, he painted frescoes illustrating historical and mythological scenes, and executed many portraits, altar pieces, and delicate small paintings. As an architect, he designed the Villa Madama and the Palazzo Cafarelli in Rome, and was for a time in charge of the construction of
RAPP

St. Peter's. But he remains famous as a painter of precision and lyrical grace, a master of composition, and the leading exponent of the Renaissance conception of human nobility. The most popular of his works are undoubtedly the many gentle Madonnas he painted, especially the Madonna del Cardellino (1505), the Belle Jardinière (1507), and the Sistine Madonna (1518). His best work, however, is his decoration of the Vatican Stanze, or rooms, for Pope Julius II from 1508 on. These frescoes include The School of Athens, Parnassus, The Disputation on the Sacramento, The Mass of Bolsena, and The Expulsion of Heliodorus. Among his superb portraits are those of Castiglione, Pope Julius II, Pope Leo X, and Bindo Altoviti. Of future importance were his decoration of the Logge of Bramante at the Vatican, in which the grotesque style was introduced; and his painting Galatea, which anticipated the Baroque style. Of his series of cartoons for tapestries, commissioned by Pope Leo X, seven are now in the Victoria and Albert Museum, London. His huge output belies the fact of his death at the youthful age of 37.

RAPP. The initials of the Russian Association of Proletarian Writers, an organization that virtually controlled Soviet literature from 1929 to 1932. The group had been first formed in 1923 as VAPP (All-Russian Association of Proletarian Writers) and then was changed in 1928 to RAPP. The organization hounded writers with orders to heed and fulfill the "social command" with their work, that is, to produce works that reflected the times. After the first Five-Year Plan was over, RAPP had its power taken away when the Union of Soviet Writers was formed.

Rappaccini's Daughter (1844). A story by Nathaniel Hawthorne. Rappaccini, a doctor and devoted man of science, nourishes his beautiful daughter, Beatrice, on poisons, so that she, invulnerable, may aid him in his experiments with dangerous plants. Physically deadly, but pure in spirit, Beatrice drinks the antidote given her by a faithless suitor, knowing it will kill her. She reproaches her father for subordinating heart to head, depriving her of human existence. This theme is frequent in Hawthorne's work.

Rasa. (1) In Hindu legend, a mythical river in the sky.
(2) A theory of dramatic purpose and effect as propounded by Bharata.
(3) The central principle of Hindu esthetics. In the Aitareya Upanishad the sentence Raso vai soh (The well-carved is the well-loved in the sense that Perfect alone is delectable) suggests the ineffable nature of rasa. The rasālī is the dance of the divinely inspired gopīs who, in honor of Krishna with whom they desire union, perform to his delighting in the moonlight.

Raskolnikov. See Crime and Punishment.

Rasmussen, Knud Johan Victor (1879-1933). Danish Arctic explorer. He made ethnological expeditions to North Greenland and developed the theory that Eskimos and North American Indians descended from the same Asian migratory tribes. Rasmussen was the author of The People of the Polar North (1908), Myths and Legends from Greenland (Myter og Sagn fra Gronland; 1921-1925), and Across Arctic America (1927).

Rasputin, Grigori Efimovich (1871-1916). Russian monk in the household of Czar Nicholas II. Despite his notoriously bad reputation, Rasputin wielded power at the court through his influence over the Czarina. He was assassinated by a group of Russian nobles on Dec. 30, 1916.

Rasselas, Prince of Abyssinia, History of (1759). A philosophical romance by Samuel Johnson, hastily written within a month of his mother's death to meet her funeral expenses. Rasselas is the youngest son of an Oriental despot who confines his children in the Happy Valley, a paradise. Rasselas, longing for the novelty of the world outside, escapes with his sister, Ne kayah, and his mentor, Imlac. They go to Cairo where Rasselas is warned by one example after another that romantic reverie, romantic love, the flights of the imagination, the daring speculations of philosophy, the great discoveries of science, all harm man by giving him an unrealistic estimate of what life has to offer and by encouraging false hopes. Ranging through all that nature and society have to offer, they find nothing that promises the happiness they expected, and they return to the Happy Valley.

The attack in Rasselas is directed against the optimism of the 18th century or, more generally, against all simple formulas that profess to lead man to happiness, against all glib generalizations about the goodness of nature and the satisfactions of solitude, learning, or social life. Rasselas has often been compared with Voltaire's Candide; the two works were published only a few weeks apart.

Ras Shamra. See Ugarit.

Rastignac, Eugène de. One of Balzac's best-known characters, appearing in several of the novels of La Comédie Humaine, notably Le Père Goriot and La Cousine Bette. Introduced as a struggling young law student who has come to Paris to make his fortune, Rastignac quickly acquires practicality. He determines to conquer society by giving up his ideals and taking advantage of circumstances. By installing himself as the lover of Mme de Nucingen, the daughter of his fellow-boarder Père Goriot, he manages to better his fortunes. Later, he marries Augusta de Nucingen, the daughter of his former mistress, and becomes a prominent statesman, peer, and millionaire. Rastignac finally epitomizes ruthless, cynical ambition.

Rats, The (Die Ratten; 1911). A drama by Gerhart Hauptmann. A woman buys a child to satisfy her maternal instincts, pretends to her husband that it is her own, and, when threatened by the child’s real mother, has the woman killed. Eventually, when the child is taken from her, she kills herself. While this is going on, an actor of “the old school” continually laments the disappearance of tragedy from the modern world.

Räuber, Die. See ROBBERS, THE.

Ravana. The king of Lanka (Ceylon) and the 10-faced demon of Hindu legend. He was fastened between heaven and earth for 10,000 years by Shiva’s leg, because he audaciously attempted to move the hill of heaven to Lanka. In the epic the RAMAYANA, he abducted Rama’s wife, Sita.

Ravel, Maurice [Joseph] (1875–1937). French impressionist composer. Some of his best-known works are the song cycle Shéhérazade (1903; text by Tristan Klingsor), the operas L’Heure Espagnole (The Spanish Hour, 1910; libretto by Franc-Nohain) and L’Enfant et les Sortilèges (The Child and the Enchantments, 1925; libretto by Colette), and the ballets Daphnis et Chloé (1912) and Boléro (1928).

raven. A bird of ill omen. It is fabled to forebode death and bring infection and bad luck generally. The former notion arises from their following an army under the expectation of finding dead bodies to raven on; the latter notion is a mere offshoot of the former, since it was noted that pestilence kills as fast as the sword. In Christian art, the raven is an emblem of God’s Providence, in allusion to the ravens that fed Elijah.

The fatal raven, consecrated to Odin, the Danish war god, was the emblem on the Danish standard, Landejda (the desolation of the country), and was said to have been woven and embroidered in one night by the daughters of Regner Lodbrok, son of Sigurd, that dauntless warrior who chanted his death song (the Kraakul) while being stung to death in a horrible pit filled with deadly serpents. If the Danish arms were destined to defeat, the raven hung its wings; if victory was to attend them, he stood erect and soaring as if inviting the warriors to follow.

Raven, The (1845). A poem by Edgar Allan Poe. Lost in melancholy memories of his dead love, the poet is startled by a tapping at his chamber door. A raven enters, and perching on the bust of Pallas Athene, answers the tormented questions of the bereaved lover with the mysterious, unchanging “Nevermore.” Nevermore will he be reunited with his lost love. Poe’s most famous poem, The Raven is the subject of his essay The Philosophy of Composition.

She described the region where she lived in Cross Creek (1942).

Raw Youth, The (Podrostok; 1875). A novel by Feodor Dostoevski. In this book the author examines directly the reasons for what he sees as the “chemical decomposition” of Russian society in the late 19th century. The central character is Arkadi Makarovich Dolgoruki, a young man in his early 20s, who is trying to find something solid to cling to in the disorder and chaos of the times. He settles on the idea of becoming a Rothschild, as he terms it: of amassing vast wealth, not for the sake of the money’s monetary value, but for the sense of power it will give him.

Arkadi is the illegitimate son of the nobleman Versilov, who has been living with Arkadi’s mother for some years. His nominal father, Makar Dolgoruki, has become a religious pilgrim. The youthful Arkadi goes to St. Petersburg to see Versilov, full of mixed love and hatred for his father. The nobleman—a brilliant, twisted product of the acceptance of Western ideas—charms the boy. Their closeness is short-lived, however, when Arkadi learns that his father is his rival for Katerina Nikolayevna Akhmankova. After a siege of brain fever, the anguished Arkadi begins to find peace, when the pilgrim Makar Dolgoruki arrives for a visit. The old man preaches love for all of God’s creation and the need for all men to strive for seamlessness in their relations with themselves and one another. Arkadi abandons his idea of becoming a Rothschild for the goal of attaining seamlessness.

In Torquato Tasso’s Gerusalemme Liberata he appears as Raimondo di Tolosa, one of the leading veterans among the Crusaders, especially noted for his Nestor-like wisdom. At one point in the story Tancred (Tancred) breaks off his duel with Argante to seek Clorinda his beloved. Raimondo takes Tancred’s place, despite his age, but an angel appears to protect him from the furious blows of the infidel champion. Later it is he who kills King Aladino of Jerusalem and plants the Christian standard on the tower of David. He also appears in Sir Walter Scott’s novel Count Robert of Paris.

Read, Sir Herbert [Edward] (1893- ). English poet and literary and art critic. He is best known for his books explaining movements in modern art (he published A Concise History of Modern Painting in 1959), and for his championship of art in education, industry, and society generally. His early poetry was imagistic and his later poetry more metaphysical; his volumes of Collected Poems appeared in 1946 and 1953. Read's literary criticism has been influential in spreading his enthusiasm for romanticism and "organic form," as in Form and Modern Poetry (1932). He was a supporter of both surrealism and communism, but turned from Marxism to anarchism on deciding that the Marxist system represented an imposed, not organic, political form. He is the author of Poetry and Anarchism (1938) and other books on literature in society. His literary criticism is also characterized by its psychoanalytic bent, notably in his study of Wordsworth (1930). He has also written The Green Child (1935), a novel, and Annals of Innocence and Experience (1940), an autobiography. Among his important later studies are The Philosophy of Modern Art (1952) and The True Voice of Feeling (1953).

Reading Gaol, The Ballad of. See Ballad of Reading Gaol, THE.

Realism. In philosophy, one of two rival doctrines in the disputes of the medieval Schoolmen (see Scholasticism). Derived from the theories of Plato, it held that only universal concepts, such as roundness, beauty, and the like, have reality, since they exist before any particular circle or beautiful object. See nominalism; Pierre Abélard.

The term realism is also used to describe literature that attempts to depict life in an entirely objective manner, without idealization or glamour, and without didactic or moral ends. Realism may be said to have begun with such early English novelists as Defoe, Fielding, and Smollett, and to have become a definite literary trend in the 19th century. In America, realism became an important movement in the 1880's, with William Dean Howells as its leading theorizer and Henry James as one of its main practitioners. It contributed to the growth of naturalism, with which it is sometimes identified, at the turn of the century. At present it is such a pervasive element in literature that it scarcely retains any distinct import.

Rebecca. In Scott's Ivanhoe, the real heroine, daughter of Isaac the Jew. She loves Ivanhoe, who has shown great kindness to her and her father. When Ivanhoe marries Rowena, both Rebecca and her father leave England for the Continent.

Rebecca and Rowena (1850). A burlesque continuation of Scott's Ivanhoe by William Makepeace Thackeray. Ivanhoe is now a henpecked husband and Rowena makes him promise never to marry a Jewess, but after Rowena's death Rebecca becomes a Christian and she and Ivanhoe finally marry.

Rebecca of Sunnybrook Farm (1903). A story for girls by Kate Douglas Woorin. The 10-year-old heroine, Rebecca Randall, leaves her widowed mother and brothers and sisters to go to live with her two old-maid aunts, Miranda and Jane. Aunt Miranda, particularly, is a great trial, but Rebecca finds a friend in Emma Jane Perkins and a hero and admirer in Adam Ladd, whom she calls Mr. Aladdin. The book ends with her graduation from Wareham Academy in Maine. There was a sequel, New Chronicles of Rebecca, in 1907.

Rebekah. In the Old Testament, the wife of Isaac and mother of Jacob and Esau. The meeting at the well between Rebekah and Abraham's servant, sent to seek a wife for Isaac, is one of the celebrated pastoral love stories (Gen. 24). It was Rebekah who helped her favorite son Jacob secure the birthright that should have been Esau's (Gen. 27:6).

Rebel, The (L'Homme Révolté; 1951). A long philosophical essay by Albert Camus. It expands the theory of the absurd first treated in The Myth of Sisyphus and explores the possible responses man can make in attitude and in action, rejecting equally suicidal despair and all promises of complete personal or social salvation. Camus distinguishes between philosophical rebellion, proper to the man of the absurd, and historical or political revolution, which promises salvation but consists merely of murder and a new tyranny.

Récamier, Mme Jeanne Françoise Julie Adelaïde. Born Bernard (1777-1849). French leader of society. The wife of a Paris banker and close friend of Mme de Stael, she was known for her wit and beauty. Mme Récamier's salons were filled with the most important people of her time, both in the arts and in politics. In later years, Chateaubriand became the indisputed center of this group and the object of Mme Récamier's devotion.

Recessional (1897). A famous poem by Rudyard Kipling. It was written to celebrate the 60th anniversary of the reign of Queen Victoria. The title refers to the hymn that is sung at the close of a church service, while the choir is leaving the chancel and proceeding to the robing room. The poem includes a warning to the British people not to become over-confident, but to remember their obligations during their hour of greatest glory.

Recherche de l'absolu, La (1834). A novel, part of La Comédie Humaine, by Honoré de Balzac. The main character, Balthazar Claes-Molina, spends a huge fortune and neglects his family in his monomaniacal quest for "the absolute," a philosopher's stone that will yield unending wealth.
Red Badge of Courage, The: An Episode of the American Civil War (1895). A novel by Stephen Crane. More the story of the battle that rages inside the hero, Henry Fleming, than of that between Confederate and Union soldiers, the novel is, as its author said, a psychological study of fear. Fleming has romantic notions of the hero he will be when he enters his first battle, but his illusions are soon destroyed and he turns and runs. Ironically, he receives his “red badge” when a fellow soldier strikes his head with the butt of a gun. He sees his friend Jim Conklin die and tries to find security in a secluded spot in the forest. After attempting to stop the advancing troops he thinks are doomed, Fleming returns to his comrades. During the battle on the next day, he gives up his illusions, merges with the great body of soldiers, and becomes, temporarily at least, a hero.

Crane's realism is remarkable, especially in view of the fact that he had not seen a battle at the time he wrote the book. His insight into the feelings and fears of soldiers provided a new experience to a public accustomed to reading about the conventional aspects of war. The Red Badge of Courage established Crane’s reputation and remains his most popular book.

Red Book of Hergest. A Welsh manuscript of the 14th century. Its contents, highly interesting to the scholar, are used in the Mabinogion.

Redburn (1849). A novel by Herman Melville. Young Redburn, on his first voyage as a sailor, discovers the thinly veiled selfishness behind the actions of most people. The whole enterprise proves a fiasco, and Redgauntlet escapes abroad to become a prior. Two notable characters are Peter Peebles, a strange, unbalanced lawyer, and Wandering Willie, a blind fiddler.

Red Jacket. Indian name Sagoyewatha (1758–1830). American Indian chief of the Senecas. He received his name from the bright red jacket he wore, a gift of the British. Redon, Odilon (1840–1916). French painter and lithographer. He is known for his beautiful and delicate flower studies and for the deep blacks of his drawings and lithographs. Often depicting fantastic creatures and bizarre visions never quite completely divorced from reality, he was in close contact with Mallarmé and other symbolist writers who recognized affinities with his mystical, poetic work.

Red Rock (1898). A novel by Thomas Nelson Page. Page pictures the effect of war and Reconstruction on two old Southern families. The beginnings of the Ku Klux Klan are described, and its motives and actions justified. Red Rock is the old Gray estate, which the hero, Jacquelin Gray, is forced to see in the possession of another man after the Civil War. He gradually wins back the plantation and the love of his old playmate, Blair Cary.

Reed, John (1887–1920). American journalist and poet. Although he came from a wealthy Oregon family, Reed developed a serious interest in social problems, became friendly with Lincoln Steffens, and joined the staff of The Masses. His experiences as a correspondent during the Mexican Revolution furnished the material for his first book, Insurgent Mexico (1914). He covered the Eastern Front during World War I, then went to Russia, where he became an active supporter of the Bolsheviks. His eloquent eye-witness account of the Russian Revolution, Ten Days That Shook the World (1919), is considered his best work. After helping to found the Communist Party in America, Reed returned to Russia and remained there until his death.

Reed, Walter (1851–1902). American army surgeon. He headed a commission with James Carroll, Jesse Lazear, and Aristides Agramonte to investigate yellow fever in Cuba (1900). Their experiments with volunteers proved earlier contentions that the disease was transmitted by mosquitoes and defined the dangerous type. Sidney Howard's play Yellow Jack (1934) depicts their work.

Reese, Lizette Woodworth (1856–1935). American poet. For many years a high school teacher in Baltimore, she published several volumes of verse, from A Branch of May (1887) and A Handful of Lavender (1891) to Pastures and Other Poems (1933) and The Old House in the Country (1936). Her sonnet Tears became extremely popular.

Reeve's Tale, The. One of the Canterbury Tales of Geoffrey Chaucer, based on a French fabliau. Oswald the Reeve takes the Miller's Tale as a personal insult, for he is also a carpenter, and retaliates in kind with his tale. The young scholars John and Alan resolve to watch carefully and stop the Miller Simkin's gross cheating of their college. But Simkin lets loose their horse, so that they give chase, and proceeds to steal more grain than ever. When they return late, he scornfully offers them a bed for the night in the same room with his family. But in the dark Alan steals over to the lovely daughter's bed, and John, by moving the infant's cradle, tricks the wife into his own bed. The daughter tells Alan where the stolen grain is hidden, and he goes to wake John and boast of his exploits, but is also misled by the cradle and wakes Simkin instead. In the confused fight that follows, the wife knocks out Simkin by mistake, and the scholars escape with all their grain and a little more.

referendum. The submission to the people in general of any act of legislature. In the U.S. about half the states can exercise the referendum as to state matters. In municipal affairs about 300 cities use this principle of action.

Reflections on the French Revolution (1790). A treatise by Edmund Burke, written in the form of a letter to a Frenchman. It attacks the leaders and principles of the French Revolution for their violence and excesses, and urges reform, rather than rebellion, as a means of correcting social and political abuses. This work was, in turn, attacked by Thomas Paine. Burke had interpreted the Glorious Revolution (1688) and the American Revolution as just assertions of rights guaranteed by the British Constitution; he opposed the French Revolution because, he thought, it broke the framework of tradition altogether.

Reformation. The great 16th century movement against the authority of the Roman Catholic Church that brought about the establishment of Protestantism. The chief religious leaders of the Reformation were Martin Luther, John Calvin, Ulrich Zwingli, and John Knox. Although the movement originated as a protest against religious abuses, it had profound political implications as well. See Thirty Years War.

Reform Bill. In English history, a bill that enlarges the number of voters in elections for the House of Commons, reducing inequalities in representation. The first of these, the Reform Bill of 1832, disfranchised boroughs of very few inhabitants (called rotten boroughs), giving increased representation to large towns and extending the number of holders of the county and borough franchise. The Reform Bill of 1867 went further in the same direction, and the Franchise Bill (1884) extended suffrage to nearly all men. In 1918 suffrage was given to all men over 21 and to women over 30; in 1928, all persons over 21 were eligible to vote. The background of George Eliot's Middlemarch in the Reform Bill of 1832.

Régnard, Jean François (1655–1709). French comic dramatist. He was once captured by pirates and sold as a slave in Constantinople. He traveled extensively, settling finally in Paris where he wrote his autobiographical Voyages (1731). His fortune permitted him to live and entertain lavishly. Among his more celebrated comedies in verse are Le Joueur (The Gambler, 1696), Les Folies amoureuses (Amorous Folies, 1704), Les Ménagères (1705), and his masterpiece, Le Légataire universel (1708). Régnard's plays are simply gay, witty, and sparkling, with no attempt at being profound; indeed, human sympathy is conspicuously absent. Régnard was long regarded as the closest successor to Molière.

Régnier, Henri de (1864–1936). French poet and novelist. As a member of the symbolists and a disciple of Mallarmé, Régnier wrote verse, such as that published in Tel qu'en songe (1892) and Les Jeux rustiques et divins (1897), which was musical and skillful in its use of vers libre. In his later work—such volumes as Les Médailles d'argile (1900) and La Sandale allée (1906)—he returned to classical forms and sought themes for his poetry in antiquity. Régnier's best-known novel is La Double Maitresse (1900).

Rehoboam. A Hebrew king in the Old Testament, the son and successor of Solomon. During his leadership, the northern tribes revolted and, retaining the name Israel, formed a new kingdom under Jeroboam. His remark, "My father . . . chastised you with whips, but I will chastise you with scorpions" (1 Kings 12:14), cost him the allegiance of the greater part of his kingdom; only the tribe of Judah and part of the tribe of Benjamin remained loyal.

Reid, Forrest (1875–1947). Irish novelist, biographer, and critic. Particularly sensitive to the thought and spirit of children, he wrote about them in the novels Spring Song (1916), Pirates of the Spring (1919), and Young Tom (1944). Reid also wrote a biography of Walter de la Mare (1929).

Reign of Terror. A term applied to the period of anarchy, bloodshed, and confiscation in the French Revolution. It may be considered to have begun on Jan. 21, 1793, with the execution of Louis XVI, or after May 31, 1793, when the Girondists fell; it extended to the overthrow of Robespierre and his accomplices on July 27, 1794. During this period thousands of persons were put to death. The name is also applied to similar cataclysms in the histories of other nations, such as the Red Terror of the Russian Revolution (March–Sept., 1917).

Reinecke Fuchs (1794). An epic poem in hexameters by Johann Wolfgang von Goethe, which tells the story of Reynard the Fox. Goethe lays stress upon the fact that the amoral man, even though his crimes may be harmful to others, is still useful to society because of his superior resourcefulness, and necessary to society as a balance to the gradual stultification of unchallenged morality.

Austrian stage director and producer specializing in mass effects; he is best known for Sumurun (New York, 1912), The Miracle (London, 1911), and Oedipus Rex. He toured the U.S. in 1923, producing his pageant-play, The Miracle. Regularly every year at Salzburg he produced the mystery play Everyman. Upon Hitler's coming to power, Reinhardt left the continent; worked in England and America; became a film director in Hollywood, and, in 1937, put on Werfel's Eternal Road in New York City.

Relations des Jésuites (Accounts of the Jesuits, 1632–1672). The reports of the French Jesuit missionaries to Canada, distributed in Paris under the title Relations de ce qui est passé en nouvelle France (Accounts of What Has Happened in New France). They remain to this day an invaluable source of information on early Canadian history.

Religio Laici (1682). A poem by John Dayman in defense of the Anglican religion. It preceded his famous defense of Catholicism, The Hind and the Panther, by only three years. The work is a witty and cogent argument for the middle way of Anglicanism.

Religio Medici (Lat., “a doctor's religion”; 1643). The best-known work of Sir Thomas Browne, who called it "a private Exercise directed to myself." Published only after a pirated edition had appeared, it represents Browne's attempt to arrive at a warm and vital faith, one without cant or a spirit of exclusiveness, acceptable to a scientist. It is one of the great achievements in the ornate style of English prose.

Reliques of Ancient English Poetry (1765). A collection of ballads, sonnets, historical songs, and romances published by Thomas Percy; more properly, it is one of the earliest histories of literature. It contains metrical romances and traditional ballads from the 15th and 18th centuries, all arranged in chronological order. In it appeared for the first time such famous ballads as Sir Patrick Spens and Edward, Edward.

Remarque, Erich Maria (1898– ). German journalist and novelist. He left Germany in 1932 because of Nazism, came to the U.S. in 1937, and has been a citizen since 1947.

Rembrandt Harmenszoon van Rijn (1606–1669). Dutch painter and etcher. Born in Leyden, he settled in Amsterdam in 1631 and quickly established himself as the finest portrait painter of the city. His wife died in 1642, leaving him a considerable fortune, but his popularity declined as his art became increasingly divergent from popular taste, and he sank into financial difficulties. A declaration of bankruptcy, in 1656, was followed by the sale of his property, including his art collection. His faithful
Remember the Maine

The Maine, a French battleship, was sunk by a German U-boat in 1918. The story of its sinking and the lives of its crew is the basis for Marcel Proust's novel "Remembrance of Things Past." Proust's novel is a seminal work of modernism, exploring themes of memory, time, and the human experience. The Maine's sinking serves as a metaphor for the disintegration of the grandeur and nobility of French society, leading to the fall of the French monarchy and the rise of the Republic. Proust's treatment of the Maine's story reflects his deep concern with the nature of reality, the nature of art, and the nature of the self. His novel is a complex exploration of these themes, intricately woven into the fabric of French history and culture.
the personal relationships that increasingly connect these families and the ways of life they represent. Eventually, even the superficial appearances of difference degenerate and take new shapes, until Swann’s daughter—by a cocotte whom the Guermantes had formerly refused to meet—has married a Guermantes and offers her daughter by this marriage to the narrator as a mistress.

The analysis of love includes male and female homosexual relationships, showing their essential similarity to heterosexual ones. The analysis of snobbery exposes pathetic self-delusion as much as deliberate hypocrisy. In regard to artists and their work, as to everything else, anticipated pleasure always exceeds the actual pleasure at first meeting; but, after assimilation of the work of the actress Berma, the writer Bergotte, the painter Vinteuil, and the painter Elstir, the narrator does conclude that art can occasionally—as can dreams, but never life—express the associations that make perceptible the world of essential reality, which lies outside of lived Time.

Swann’s Way (Du côté de chez Swann). After the Overture introduces most of the themes of the entire novel, the narrator recalls his childhood at home in Paris and with his relatives at Combray. He includes his idealized love for Swann’s daughter, Gilberte. He then recounts the story of Swann’s love for Odette many years before, which is intertwined with the beginning of the rise of the Verdurins.

Within a Budding Grove (A lombre des jeunes filles en fleur). In Paris the narrator’s love for Gilberte slowly ends. Two years later, when he is at Balbec, he falls in love with a little band of frolicsome girls and particularly with Albertine.

The Guermantes Way (Le Côté de Guermantes). The narrator, whose family have been tenants in the large Guermantes home in Paris, conducts his laborous ascent to the summit of high society, finally attending the duchesse de Guermantes’ reception. He also describes Saint-Loup’s passion for Rachel, and the death of his own beloved grandmother.

Cities of the Plain (Sodome et Gomorrhe). The narrator discovers Baron Charlus’ homosexuality and the changing nature of socially fashionable opinions—regarding the Dreyfus Case, for instance. After a reception given by the princesse de Guermantes, he returns to Balbec, where Charlus is launching Morel at the Verdurins’ soirées. He is about to break with Albertine when suspicions of her lesbian tastes arouse his horror and jealousy, and revive his love.

The Captive (La Prisonnière). Albertine is living in the narrator’s Paris home, where he attempts to keep complete watch on her activities. The Verdurins provoke a scandalous rupture between Morel and Charlus. Albertine suddenly flees, just as the narrator is ready to dismiss her.

The Sweet Cheat Gone (Albertine disparue). The narrator seeks the return of Albertine, but after her death he observes the gradual encroachment of oblivion on grief until, on a trip to Venice, he finds his pain completely cured. Gilberte has become the social-climbing Mlle. de Forcheville; she marries Saint-Loup, who is now Morel’s lover.

The Puck Reaptured (Le Temps retrouvé). World War I accelerates the kaleidoscopic changes in society. The narrator attends a reception of the new princesse de Guermantes, actually the former Mme. Verdurin, and finds most of his acquaintances almost unrecognizable. He has enjoyed three “privileged moments” of memory, and in contemplating them discovers that his vocation is to be the shaping of his experiences into a literary work of art.

Remington, Frederic [Cackrider] (1861–1909). American painter and illustrator. He is best known for his scenes of the American West and for his tense, animated drawings and sculptures of horses.

Remizov, Aleksei Mikhailovich (1877–1957). Russian novelist. Remizov, whose ornate prose style influenced such Soviet writers as Boris Pasternak, Isaak Babel, and Yevgeni Zamiatyat, left Russia in 1921 and lived in Paris for the remainder of his life. His works include The Pond (Prvod; 1907), The Fifth Pestilence (Pyataya chuma; 1912), and Flaming Russia (Plamennaya Rossiya; 1921).

Remus. See Romulus.

Renaissance, the. From the French word for rebirth. First used by 19th-century historians, it is a label for the period dating approximately from the mid-14th century to the end of the 16th century. During the period itself, the idea of a revival or rebirth of culture after the barbarism of the Dark Ages and the medieval period was a favorite notion of the Humanists; but they did not use the word itself. It was used at the time by such art historians as Vasari, whose reference was exclusively to the fine arts. With Michelet and Burckhardt, the term and the concept of the Renaissance came into general use. Since their day, controversy has centered on denigration of the Middle Ages, on the chronological limits of the period, on its applicability to science and philosophy of the time, on its causes, and even on its value as a term for widely differing phenomena in Europe, especially outside Italy. There is essential agreement, however, on the main ingredients of the era. These include the Revival of Antiquity, the Revival of Learning, the activity of the Humanists, the increased secularization of social life, the burst of creativity in the fine arts, the cultivation of the arts, the growth of individualism in private as well as public life, the expansion of scientific and philosophical horizons, the creation of new social, political, and economic institutions, and the arrival of a new view of man and his world. In the literary sphere, the men of letters and the works of the period, from Petrarch to Shakespeare, represent an impressive roster unmatched before or since. There is a continuity of themes and forms as the wave of inspiration passed from Italy to France and Spain, then to England, where the novelle of Boccaccio and the sonnets of Petrarch were being read and imitated two centuries after their composition. See French Renaissance; Humanism.

Renan, Ernest (1823–1892). French critic, writer, and scholar. Raised in poverty, Renan was a student preparing for the priesthood when he lost his faith in orthodox religion due to the influence of German philosophy and Semitic philology. Unlike a relativist. From a tolerant, skeptical point of view, he realized that no one system of religious, scientific, or historical knowledge could claim absolute truth. A professor of Hebrew at the Collège de France, Renan’s major influence was felt in the field of religion. In 1863 he published La Vie de Jésus (The Life of Jesus), the first work in a series called Histoire des Origines du Christianisme (History of the Origins of Christianity, 1866–1881). This study offered a new perspective on religious history, approaching the subject matter not merely in a factual, historical manner but as biography and psychology. Renan also published Histoire du Peuple d’Israël (History of the People of Israel, 1887–95), Histoire générale des Langues Semitiques (General History of the Semitic Languages, 1895), and Dialogues Philosophiques (1876). Anatole France, Paul Bourget, and Maurice Barrès were influenced by his work.

Renascence (1912). A poem by Edna St. Vincent Millay. It was first published in Mitchell Kennerley’s The Lyric Year, an anthology of prize-winning poems which was part of the resurgence of poetry in the early 20th century. Renault, Mary. Pen name of Mary Challans (1905– ). British novelist. Réne. A romance by François René de Chateaubriand, published first in Le Génie du Christianisme (1802), and as a separate volume in 1805. Set in America, the story’s hero is a violently unhappy, morbidly introspective youth whose posture is typically romantic.

Réne, Le bon roi (1408–1480). Duc d’Anjou, comte de Provence, son of the French King Louis II. His daughter, Margaret of Anjou, married the English King Henry VI. Devoted to knight-errantry and hunting, and a patron of musicians and poets, Réne was more generous than his income warranted. He appears in Sir Walter Scott’s Anne of Geierstein, and as Regnier in Shakespeare’s Henry VI.

René, Guido (1575–1642). Italian painter. A product of the Bologna school of Eclecticism founded by the Carracci, he was the most famous painter of his day. A skillful designer, his ability may have been seen in such works as the Apollo and Marsyas, the Aurora (1613), and the popular Massacre of the Innocents (1611), a key work of the Counter-Reformation style. His series of episodes from the life of Samson, especially the noteworthy Triumph of Samson (c. 1611), may be seen today in the Vatican.

Rem, Ludwig. Pen name of Arnold Vieth von Golssenau (1889– ). German novelist. He is best known for his works on war, including: Krieg (War, 1928) and Vor grossen Wandiungen (translated as Death Without Battle, 1936).

Renoir, [Pierre] Auguste (1841–1919). French painter. One of the great masters of modern French painting, Renoir was born in Limoges. A leading impressionist, he painted pure luminous landscapes, nudes, still lifes, and many groups and portraits, e.g., Madame Charpentier and her daughters in the Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York. After a brief period in the 1880’s during which he enclosed his forms in a precise line, he resumed his earlier style, painting women and nudes with even greater freedom and vigor, and never abandoning his sensuous, visual delight in life and the world around him.

Renoir, Jean (1894– ). French motion-picture director. Among the most notable of his many films are Grand Illusion (1937), The Rules of the Game (1939), and The River (1950). Among her many collections are Books and Men (1888), Essays in Miniature (1892), and Compromises (1904). In Pursuit of Laughter (1936) was in effect a history of humor. She also wrote biographies of Roman Catholic subjects.

Representative Men (1850). A series of biographical sketches by Ralph Waldo Emerson. The men discussed are Shakespeare, the Poet; Plato, the Philosopher; Goethe, the Writer; Swedenborg, the Mystic; Napoleon, the Man of the World; and Montaigne, the Skeptic. The essays are preceded by an introduction dealing with the “uses of great men.” The book is modeled on Carlyle’s On Heroes, Hero Worship and the Heroic in History. The two volumes reveal the difference in their author’s feelings about democracy. Unlike Carlyle, Emerson believed that great men are representative of their time, rather than apart from it.

Republic, The. A dialogue by Plato. In it Socrates’ interlocutors are Cephalus, Polemarthos, Thrasymachus, and Plato’s brothers, Glaucon and Adeimantus. The dialogue begins with an attempt at the definition of justice. Socrates remarks that before justice can be found in the individual, it must be sought in the state. Describing the ideal state, Plato’s Socrates divides the citizens into three classes: the guardians, the soldiers, and the workers or producers. Democracy and tyranny are both rejected. Temperance and restraint must characterize all three classes. Political justice would confine each to his proper function.

Requiem for a Nun (1951). A novel by William Faulkner. Written in three prose sections, which provide the background, and three acts which present the drama in the courthouse and the jail, the novel centers on Temple Drake, one of the main characters of Sanctuary. Resolution and Independence (1807). A poem by William Wordsworth. Sentimentally portraying the sad lot of an old and crippled leech-gatherer whom the poet encounters on one of his country walks, it was originally entitled The Leech-gatherer. It was parodied by Edward Lear in Incidents in the Life of My Uncle Arly and by Lewis Carroll in The White Knight's Ballad.

Respectful prostitute, The (La Putain respectueuse; 1946). A play by Jean Paul Sartre. It is set in the American South. Lizzie does not want to lie to help build a case against an innocent Negro. Restif or Ré Risf de la Bretonne, Nicolas Edme (1734-1806). French novelist and dramatist, often labelled as the "Rousseau of the Gutter," or the "Voltaire of Chambermaids." He wrote some 250 volumes, many of which describe peasant life and lower-class women. To gather material for his works he was wont to prowl around Paris at night. In 1775 he published Le Paysan perverti ou les dangers de la ville, a four-volume novel about the corrupting influences of Paris on a young peasant. From 1780 to 1785 he published his 42-volume work on the lives of contemporary women, Les Contemporaines ou Aventures des plus jolies femmes de l'age present. His intimate knowledge of women is reflected in his self-appraisal: "Without women, I was a nonentity, without vigor, without energy, in a word, without a soul." La Vie de mon père (1779, 2 vols.) is perhaps his masterpiece. He also wrote a series of works under the general title of Les Idées singulières (1769-89), in which he advocated reforms in education, prostitution, the theater, and spelling. In his novels Restif presents a faithful picture of the last 30 years of the French monarchy, but some readers find his style coarse and the subject matter melodramatic and sometimes obscene.

Restoration. In English history, the period after the fall of the Commonwealth, when the Stuart dynasty returned to England in the person of Charles II, who became king in 1660. In its reaction to Puritan austerity and its imitation of French manners, the period gained a reputation for licentiousness and frivolity. It is marked in the field of English letters by characteristic developments in the drama (Dryden, Congreve, Wycherly, Farquhar), particularly in the prose comedy of manners; by the flourishing of song and verse satire (Dryden, Rochester); and by the productions of numerous diarists ( Pepys, Evelyn). These forms, though they confirm the worldliness and dissoluteness of the Restoration, are only a partial expression of the age, which also saw remarkable accomplishments in prose composition, science, philosophy, and religion.

Resurrection (Voskresenie; 1899). A novel by Count Leo Tolstoi. The story deals with the spiritual regeneration of a young nobleman, Prince Neklyudov. In his earlier years, he seduced a young girl, Kat'yusha Maslova. She became a prostitute and later became involved with a man whom she is accused of poisoning. Neklyudov, serving on the jury, recognizes her and decides that he is morally guilty for her predicament. He decides to marry her, and when she is convicted he follows her to Siberia to accomplish his aim. Maslova is repelled by his reforming zeal. She marries another prisoner, but is finally convinced of Neklyudov's sincerity and accepts his friendship.

The novel, which is the weakest of Tolstoi's three large works, was very popular at the time of its publication. Tolstoi used the money received from it to help the Russian religious sect of Dukhobors to emigrate to Canada.

Resurrection man, also called body snatcher. A purloiner or snatcher of newly buried bodies. Such bodies were sold to surgeons for dissection. The first instance on record of robbing a grave was in 1777, when the body of Mrs. Jane Salisbury was "resurrected" from the burial ground near Gray's Inn Lane. The term "resurrection men" was first applied in 1829 to two men who stole bodies for dissection and even murdered for this purpose. Jerry CRUNCHER in Dickens' A Tale of Two Cities is a resurrection man.

Retablo de Maese Pedro, El (Master Peter's Puppet Show, 1923). A one-act opera by Manuel de FALLA. It is based on a scene in Cervantes' Don Quixote in which the melancholy knight watches a puppet show in an inn-yard. of Syria, are attacked by Osmans and take refuge in one of the Sporades, placing themselves under the protection of the knights of Rhodes. The knights betray them, slaying all the sheiks except Djabal, who is saved by Maani. Djabal conceives the plan of revenging his people and leading them back to Syria, and to this end he proclaims himself Hakim, the incarnate god returned to earth, and thus becomes leader of the exiled Druses. The Druses bargain with Venice to betray the island in exchange for a convey for their own return. Aneal, a young Druse woman, stabs the prefect of the island, but dies of bitter disappointment when she discovers that Djabal is a mere impostor. His fraud exposed, Djabal stabs himself, and Loys, a Breton count, leads the exiles back to Lebanon.

Return of the Native, The (1878). A novel by Thomas Hardy. Clym Yeobright, tired of city life, returns from Paris to open a school on Egdon Heath, and in spite of the opposition of his mother, marries Eustacia Vye, a passionate, pleasure-loving girl who hopes to persuade him to return to Paris. She has been in love with reckless Damon Wildewe, who, to spite her, married Clym's cousin, Thomasin. Clym's eyesight fails and he becomes, for the time being, a furze cutter. With the idea of becoming reconciled to her son, Mrs. Yeobright walks over the heath to his cottage, but Eustacia, entertaining Wildewe, does not answer the door until Clym's mother leaves in despair. Overcome with fatigue, she sinks down and is found by Clym, unconscious and dying of an adder bite. Clym learns enough to blame Eustacia, who subsequently drowns herself at a midnight rendezvous with Wildewe, who also drowns attempting to rescue her. Thomasin later marries Digory Venn, the red- dleman, and Clym becomes an itinerant preacher.

Reunion in Vienna (1931). A play by Robert E. Sherwood. An exiled Hapsburg archduke returning to Vienna arranges a rendezvous with his former mistress, who has married a psychiatrist in his absence. Reuter, Baron Paul Julius von. Original name Israel Beer Josaphat (1816–1899). German-born English capitalist. He established in Aachen (1849) a telegraphic and pigeon post bureau for the collection and transmission of news. This was the beginning of Reuter's News Agency, which established its headquarters in London in 1851.

revenons à nos moutons (Fr.). Literally, “let us come back to our sheep,” a phrase used to express, “Let us return to our subject.” It is taken from the 14th-century French comedy La Force de Maître Pathelin, or L'Avocat Pathelin (line 1282), in which a woollen-draper charges a shepherd with ill-treating his sheep. In telling his story he keeps running away from his subject, and to throw discredit on the defendant's attorney (Pathelin), accuses him of stealing a piece of cloth. The judge must pull him up every moment with, “Mais mon ami, revenons à nos moutons.” The phrase is frequently quoted by Rabelais.

Reverdy, Pierre (1889–1960). French poet. A friend of Apollinaire and those who were to form the surrealistic movement, he employs a technique that makes use of fantastic, illogical, disturbing images. His early work (1915–1922) is collected in Plupart du Temps (1945), his later work in Main-d’oeuvre (1949). Reverdy's poetic theories are explained in Le Gant de crin (1926).

A successful silversmith by trade, Revere is best remembered for his midnight ride from Boston to Lexington on April 18–19, 1775, to warn the colonists that British soldiers were on the march. Revere's exploit is described in Longfellow's popular, though inaccurate, ballad The Midnight Ride of Paul Revere (1863).

Reverie at the Boar's Head Tavern in Eastcheap, A (1760). A dream-rite written by Oliver Goldsmith in which the dreamer is transplanted back in time and recounts the history of the Boar's Head Tavern.

Reveries of a Bachelor, or, A Book of the Heart (1850). A book by I. k Marvel (Donald Grant Mitchell). The four mildly sentimental reveries reveal a bachelor's thoughts on love and marriage.

Revival of Antiquity. One of the key aspects of the Renaissance and a leading activity of the advocates of Humanism in Italy during the 14th and 15th centuries. It refers specifically to the search for lost manuscripts, the recovery of statues, medallions, coins, and other artifacts of classical civilization, a renewed interest in the available remains of Greek and Roman art, especially its sculpture and architecture, its philosophy, and its literature. Finally, the term refers to the putting into practice of classical precepts and ideals in education, in political and social life, and in the creation of works of art and literature.
Reynolds, Joshua

Revival of Learning. Sometimes identified with the Renaissance and Humanism. More accurately, the term refers to the quickening pace of activity in philology, scholarship, criticism, and education that occurred in Italy from the mid-14th through the 16th century, and in other European countries shortly thereafter. Modern theory attributes the revival to the economic and political conditions of the Italian city-states and petty kingdoms, where a craving for culture was a characteristic of the individual as well as the society.

Revolutionary calendar. The calendar of the first French republic. Dated from Sept. 22, 1792, it divided the year into 12 months of 30 days each, with 5 (6, every leap year) additional days of celebration. The old system was restored by Napoleon on Dec. 31, 1805. See BRUMAIRE; THERMIDOR.

Rexroth, Kenneth (1905–). American poet. Rexroth has published many collections of his poetry, among them The Phoenix and the Tortoise (1944), The Art of Worldly Wisdom (1949), Signature of All Things (1950), and In Defense of Earth (1956). A self-educated linguist, he has made excellent translations of Oriental poetry and collected them in One Hundred Poems from the Japanese (1955) and One Hundred Poems from the Chinese (1956). Bird in the Bush (1959) and Assays (1962) are collections of essays. His ballet Original Sin was performed in 1961 by the San Francisco Ballet.

Reyes, Alfonso (1889–1959). Mexican essayist and poet. One of the young Mexican intellectuals who formed the circle known as the Ateneo de la Juventud, Reyes left his homeland soon after receiving his law degree in 1913. He lived in Spain until 1924 and subsequently served as Mexican minister or ambassador to France, Argentina, and Brazil. He returned permanently to Mexico in 1939.

Often considered the finest prose stylist of Spanish America since Rodó, Reyes was also an authority on the literature of Spain's golden age. He eschewed pedantry, however, and his work is remarkable for its subtlety, grace, and insight. His best-known book is probably Visión de Anahuac, 1519 (1917), a depiction of Aztec civilization just before the Spanish Conquest. His collections of essays include Capítulos de literatura española (1939; 1945), Pasado inmediato y otros ensayos (1941), Ultima Tule (1942), and Tentativas y orientaciones (1944). He also wrote El deslinde (1944), an introduction to literary theory; Letrar de la Nueva España (1948), on the culture of colonial Mexico; and La X en la frente (1952), an interpretation of Mexico. Igienia cruel (1924) is a dramatic poem based on the classical legend.

Reyes, Carlos (1868–1938). Uruguayan novelist. Independently wealthy, Reyes was able to devote his life to writing and other intellectual pursuits. His early novels are naturalistic and emphasize psychological analysis. Among these works are Beba (1894), about the evil effects of consanguinity on both men and animals; La raza de Cán (1900), a study in abnormal psychology; and El terruño (1916), which reflects the author's familiarity with rural life. His best-known work is probably El embrijo de Sevilla (Castanets, 1922), a sensuous, lyrical novel, in which the Andalusian city itself is the dominant figure. He also wrote El gaucho florido (1932), another realistic portrayal of rural life.

Reymont, Władysław Stanisław (1868–1925). A Polish novelist, chiefly known for his four-volume masterpiece, The Peasants, for which he received the Nobel prize for literature (1924).

Reynaldo. In Shakespeare's Hamlet, a servant to Polonius. Polonius asks him to report on the conduct of his son Laertes, who is a student in Paris.

Reynard the Fox. A medieval beast-fable in French, Flemish, and German literature. It satirizes contemporary life by endowing animals with human personality traits, the major plot concerning the struggle for power between the cunning fox Reynard and the physically powerful wolf Isengrim (or Ysengrim): sly wit usually wins. Other characters for Reynard to outwit include King Noble the lion, Sir Bruin the bear, Tibert the cat, and Chanticleer the cock.

The ever-changing cycles of episodes derived from the countless animal fables circulating in Europe, Aesop's and others, as in Marie de France's Ysopet. (See ECREIS CAPITVL.) From the 12th to the 14th century the tales were circulated in numerous forms, with constant additions and changes. The Latin clerical satire Ysengrinus (1148) was a direct ancestor of the French Roman de Renart, which had been begun by 1180, when it was adapted by the German Heinrich der Glichezare as Rinhart Fuchs. Other related French works include Renart le Nouvel, by Jacquemart Geleé (13th century), and Renart le Contrefet (early 14th century). The expanded French Roman of 1210 was the basis of the Flemish Van den vos Reinarde (1250–1270). This was revised about 1380 with further borrowings from kindred collections, and a later Dutch version was probably the basis for William Caxton's English translation Reynart the foxe (1481). A Low German version called Reink de Vos appeared in 1498, and others followed. By now the folk tale quality and often the humor were being subordinated to each author's specific didactic purpose; a gloss would accompany the text, explaining the political significance of the characters and events, interpreting the power struggle, for instance, as that between the Church, the Barons, and the King. Goethe published a modern German version, REINEKE FUCHS (1794), as did Jacob Grimm in 1834.

Before Caxton's translation, portions of the tale had been known in England as Vox and the Wolf (13th century), and Chaucer used part of the French material in his Nun's Priest's Tale.

Reynolds, Jeremiah N. (1799–1858). American writer. The propagandizer of an extraordinary theory about the construction of the world's polar regions, he is credited with influencing the writings of Herman Melville and Edgar Allan Poe. Reynolds's story of Mocha Dick (1839), a fierce white whale, is said to have been the source of Melville's Moby Dick. Poe introduced Reynolds' polar theories in his Unparalleled Adventures of One Hans Pfaal (1835) and championed them in other stories.

Reynolds, Sir Joshua (1723–1792). English portrait painter, working in the tradition of Titian and Rhodamantys

Van Dyck. A very successful artist, he was a founding member of the Royal Academy and became its first president (1768). His famous 15 presidential Discourses were concerned with the education of the painter. He is admired for his paintings of women and children, and his portraits of men possess an admirable vigor. He was a friend and portrait of Samuel Johnson, Edmund Burke, Oliver Goldsmith, David Garrick, and Richard Sheridan, and it was at his suggestion that the Literary Club was founded in 1764.

Rhodamantys. In Greek mythology, son of Zeus and Europa and brother of Minos. He reigned in the Cyclades with such impartiality that at death he was made one of the judges of the infernal regions, with Minos and Aeacus.

Rhea. In Greek mythology, the wife and sister of Cronos, and mother of Zeus and other Olympians. One of the Titans, born of Ge (earth) and Uranus (sky), Rhea married her brother Titan Cronos and gave birth to Hestia, Demeter, Hera, and Poseidon. Cronos, having learned from his mother that one of his sons would dethrone him, swallowed them as soon as they were born. In order to avoid this fate for Zeus, Rhea bore him secretly and gave him to Ge, who arranged for his bringing up in Crete. Rhea, meanwhile, gave Cronos a stone wrapped in swaddling clothes, which he swallowed in place of Zeus.

Though a somewhat shadowy figure herself, Rhea was widely worshiped under other names, or identified with local earth-mother goddesses with similar functions. Her most famous counterpart is the Asian goddess Cibele.

Rheingold, Das (The Rhine Gold). An opera by Richard Wagner. It is a long one-act prologue to the Ring des Nibelungen.

Rhétoriqueurs, les Grands. A school of French poets which originated in the duchy of Burgundy toward the end of the 15th century and extended as a medieval anachronism well into the Renaissance of the 16th century. Its representatives were the last to compose on the medieval themes of courtly love and chivalry, but medieval poetic lyricism having died out with the passing of knighthood, the apparatus of allegory and mythology served now only to cloak banal moralising by such poets as Olivier de la Marche (c. 1422–1502) or Georges Chastellain (c. 1405/15–1475). This degeneration in content was accompanied by increasing complexity of technique. The Art de rhétorique vulgaire (1493) by Jean Molinet (1435–1507) and the Grand et tray art de pleine rhétorique (1521) by Pierre Fabry described the infinite variations in rhythm and rhyme scheme then in fashion. These handbooks gave a definite and complete formulation of the aims of the Rhétoriqueurs as found in the now long-forgotten Jean Meschinot, Guillaume Crétat, and their colleagues. Yet sterile as their preoccupation with technique proved to be, the Rhétoriqueurs were the first group of poets, before the Pléiade, to consider poetry as an exacting art worthy of respect in its own right.

Rhinoceros, The (1595). A play by Eugène Ionesco. The central character is a man caught by the fear of remaining a human being when his fellow citizens are achieving animalistic conformity by turning into rhinoceroses.

Rhoda Fleming (1865). A novel by George Meredith. The plot concerns the tireless efforts of the titular heroine, aided by her lover Robert Armstrong, to set right the affairs of her sister, Dahlia, who has been seduced by Edward Blanvay, an irresponsible young nobleman. Rhoda obstinately believes in her innocence through a long series of revealing episodes, and, when she learns the truth, as obstinately forces her sister to marry a worthless man under the conviction that her only hope lies in becoming a married woman.

Rhodes, Cecil John (1853–1902). British financier. He amalgamated the diamond mines around Kimberley in South Africa under a corporation called the De Beers Consolidated Mines (1888). As prime minister of Cape Colony (1890–1896) he sought to establish a federal South African dominion under Great Britain. He instigated the Jameson Raid (1895) in pursuit of his imperialistic aims. Its failure compelled him to resign as premier, but in spite of this he is remembered in South Africa as a great figure. He founded the Rhodes scholarships, which have enabled young men from all over the British Empire, from the U.S., and from Germany to study at Oxford University.

Rhyme. In English prosody, the repetition of identical or similar accented sound or sounds. Full or perfect rhyme occurs when differing consonant sounds are followed by identical, accented vowel sounds, and any sounds that may come after are also identical. Poe, toe; meet, fleet; buffer, rougher are perfect rhymes.

Rhyme is classified according to the number of syllables contained in the rhyme as follows: masculine rhyme, in which the final syllables are accented and, after the differing initial consonant sounds are identical (lark, stark; support, resort); feminine rhyme, in which accented, rhyming syllables are followed by identical, unaccented syllables (revival, arrival; flutter, butter); and triple rhyme, a kind of feminine rhyme in which accented, rhyming syllables are followed by two identical syllables (machinery, scenery; tenderly, slantly). Rhyme is also distinguished according to its position in the poem as follows: end rhyme, in which the rhyme occurs at the ends of lines; internal rhyme, in which at least one rhyme occurs within the line (as in Wilde’s “Each narrow cell in which we dwell”); initial rhyme, in which the rhyme occurs as the first word or syllable of the line; cross rhyme, in which the rhyme occurs at the end of one line and in the middle of the next; and random rhyme, in which the rhymes seem to occur accidentally in any combination of the foregoing, often mixed with unrhymed lines.

Near rhyme or slant rhyme is the repetition of similar sounds instead of identical sounds or the coupling of accented-unaccented sounds that would be perfect rhymes if they were both accented. Because they involve degrees of identity of sound combinations, alliteration, assonance, and consonance are considered to be near rhymes.

Historically, rhyme is a late-comer to poetry, having first come into use in the Western world around A.D. 200 in the Church Latin of North Africa; rhyme was unknown in classical prosody. It first became popular in medieval Latin poetry. The word rhyme comes from Provençal rim and was originally spelled rime, and still often is. The usual English spelling, rhyme, comes from a false identification with the Greek rhythmos, rhythm.

Rhyme royal. In prosody, a stanza form containing seven lines of heroic (i.e. iambic pentameter) verse rhymed a-b-a-b-b-c-c. It is also known as the Troilus stanza because Geoffrey Chaucer popularized it in his poem Troilus and Criseyde; Chaucer also used it in his Ballad of Good Counsel and part of the Canterbury Tales. Written in later periods by Shakespeare and others, it supposedly received its name after James I of Scotland, who was both king and poet.

Rhymer’s Club, The. A club in London. It was founded by William Butler Yeats and his friends in 1891. Pre-Raphaelite in character, its aims were to promote pure poetry and the aesthetic cult of Walter Pater. Its chief members were Yeats, Ernest Dowson, Lionel Johnson, and Arthur Symons.

Rhyming slang. A kind of slang popular in Great Britain in the early 20th century, in which the word intended was replaced by one that rhymed with it, as “Charley Prescott” for waistcoat, or “plates of meat” for feet. When the rhyme was a compound word, the rhyming part was almost invariably dropped, leaving one who did not know the idiom somewhat in the dark. Thus Chivy (Chevy) Chase rhymes with “face”; by dropping the “chase,” chivy remains, and becomes the accepted slang word. Similarly, daisies become boots, thus: daisy-roots will rhyme with boots; drop the rhyme and daisy remains. By the same process, sky is slang for pocket, the compound word which gave birth to it being sky-rocket. “Christmas,” a railway guard, as “ask the Christmas,” is, of course, from “Christmas-card”; and “raspberry,” heart, is “raspberry-tart.”

Rialto (From vivo alto). A famous commercial district in Venice, Italy. Shakespeare mentions it in The Merchant of Venice. It is also the name of a marble bridge in Venice built (c. 1590) across the Grand Canal.

Ribaut or Ribault, Jean (c. 1520–1565). French Huguenot navigator and colonist. With the support of Admiral Coligny, he tried unsuccessfully to establish a colony for French Protestants near Port Royal, S.C., having first laid claim to the territory of Florida for France in 1562. In 1565, he arrived at Fort Caroline, a new colony on the St. John’s River in Florida, but he and most of the settlers were killed by Spaniards.

Ribbentrop, Joachim von (1893–1946). Diplomat in Nazi Germany. Ambassador to Great Britain (1936–1938) and foreign minister during World War II, he was sentenced to death at the Nuremberg Trials.

Ricardo, David (1772–1823). English economist. It was reading Adam Smith’s Wealth of Nations that caused Ricardo to devote himself to the study of political economy. Principles of Political Economy and Taxation (1817) is the most systematic exposition of his theory of rent, property, and wages, as well as the quantity theory of money. He wrote several earlier important economic studies, of which particularly the pamphlet The High Price of Bullion (1810) caused great discussion at the time of its publication.

Ricciardetto. In the Morgante Maggiore of Luigi Pulci and the Orlando Furioso of Lodovico Ariosto, a Christian knight and twin brother of the warrior maiden Bradamante. Out of love for Bradamante, the pagan knight Ruggiero saves his life.

Riccoboni, Marie Jeanne (1713–1792). French comedienne, novelist. She wrote numerous sentimental romances, such as Lettres de mistress Fanny Butler (1756), Lettres de milady Juliette Caterby (1759), and a continuation of Marivaux’s La Vie de Marianne (1731).

Rice. The basic cereal food of warm climates. The custom of throwing rice after a bride comes from India, rice being, with the Hindus, an emblem of fecundity. The bridegroom throws three handfuls over the bride, and the bride does the same over the groom. Among Americans, the rice is thrown by neighbors and friends.

Rice, Alice Hegan (1870–1942). American novelist. The author of more than a dozen novels, she is remembered mainly for her immensely popular Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch and its sequel Lovey Mary (1903).

Rice, Elmer (1892– ). American playwright. He is known for his use of experimental technique, his realism, and his portrayal of the problems of his time, especially social injustice. Trained as a lawyer, Rice gave his first play, On Trial (1914), a legal setting, as he did his later Counselor-at-Law (1931). He is better known, however, for the expressionistic The Adding Machine and for the realistic Street Scene. The Left Bank (1931) deals with American expatriates. The depression and the Nazi and Soviet menace provided subjects for We, the People (1933), Judgment Day (1934), Between Two Worlds (1934), Two on an Island (1940), and Flight to the West (1940). Dream Girl (1945) and the operatic version of Street Scene, for which Kurt Weill supplied the music (1947), were notably successful with the public. Rice, also a novelist, wrote A Voyage to Purilla (1930), Imperial City (1937), The Show Must Go On (1949), and other fiction.

Rice Christians. Converts to Christianity for worldly benefits, such as a supply of rice to East Indians. The term implies a profession of Christianity caused not by faith, but for profit.

Rich, John (16827–1761). English actor, called “the father of Harlequins,” and noted as a pantomime player. He was manager of the Lincoln’s Inn Fields (1713–1732), the theater at which John Gay’s The Beggar’s Opera was produced with such resounding success that it was said to have made “Rich gay and Gay rich.”

Rich, Penelope, born Devereux (1562–1607). Beloved of Sir Philip Sidney, the “Stella” of his sonnet sequence Astrophel and Stella (1591).

Rich, Robert (fl. 1609–1610). English adventurer. His Neues from Virginia (1610), a well-known ballad based upon his shipwreck in the Bermudas and his adventures in the Virginia colony, is said to have suggested to Shakespeare certain scenes in The Tempest.

Richard I, called Coeur de Lion or the Lion-Hearted, also Richard Yea and Nay (1157–1199). King of England (after 1189), son of Henry II and Eleanor of Aquitaine. He spent only six months of his ten-year reign in England, but the troubadours and later writers glorified his courage, romanticizing his exploits as leader of the Third Crusade (1190–
Richard II

Woodcut from the romance Richard Coeur de Lion (1528).

Richard II (1367–1400). King of England (1377–1399). The son of Edward the Black Prince, he succeeded his grandfather Edward III while still a child. During his minority, the country was governed by his uncles, John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster, and Thomas of Woodstock, duke of Gloucester. He is remembered for the bravery and presence of mind he displayed when he faced an angry mob during the Peasants' Revolt of 1381. Overthrown by Henry Bolingbroke, John of Gaunt's son and later Henry IV, Richard was probably murdered at Henry's castle of Pontefract. In Shakespeare's Richard II, he is depicted as an engaging man but an ineffective ruler.

Richard III (1452–1485). King of England (1483–1485). The third son of Richard, duke of York, and brother of Edward IV, he took an active part in the Wars of the Roses. Upon Edward's death in 1483, he seized his nephews, the young Edward V and his brother Richard, and had himself declared protector. Later he assumed the crown, announcing that the two princes had died in the Tower of London. Richard was defeated and killed at the battle of Bosworth Field by Henry Tudor, earl of Richmond (later Henry VII).

One of the most controversial figures in English history, Richard was often denigrated, especially in works of the Tudor era, such as Thomas More's History of Richard III, which was a source of Shakespeare's Richard III. Horace Walpole sought to vindicate him in Historic Doubts on the Life and Death of Richard III (1768). He now tends to be regarded, not as a blood-thirsty monster, but as a capable ruler who often behaved ruthlessly in a ruthless age.

Richard II, The Tragedy of (c. 1595). A historical tragedy by William Shakespeare. The action begins with a conflict between Henry Bolingbroke and Thomas Mowbray, which King Richard resolves by banishing both. Upon the death of Bolingbroke's father, John of Gaunt, Richard confiscates Henry's inheritance to finance the Irish war. While Richard is in Ireland, Bolingbroke boldly invades England and upon Richard's return, imprisons him. After Bolingbroke's coronation as Henry IV, Richard is murdered by Sir Pierce of Exton, acting on a hint from the new king. Professing horror at the deed, Henry plans a pilgrimage to the Holy Land to do penance. The play is based upon the account in Holinshed's Chronicles (1577).

Richard III, The Tragedy of King (c. 1594). A historical tragedy by William Shakespeare. A scheming Richard, duke of Gloucester and younger brother of Edward IV of the house of York, resolves to inherit the crown of the ailing king and systematically plans the extermination of all who hinder his succession. He causes the death of his brother George, duke of Clarence, and marries the Lady Anne, daughter-in-law of Henry VI. When Edward dies, Richard imprisons the two young sons of the late king in the Tower of London and, with the help of the duke of Buckingham, seizes power. In order to strengthen his position, he orders the murder of the princes and, after disposing of his wife, sues for the hand of Elizabeth, daughter of Edward IV. Meanwhile, the earl of Richmond, the representative of the rival house of Lancaster, has invaded England. At Bosworth Field, Richard's forces are defeated by Richmond; his horse having been killed, Richard fights desperately on foot, shouting "A horse! A horse! My kingdom for a horse!" He is slain by Richmond, who is recognized as Henry VII and announces his intention of marrying Elizabeth, thus ending 30 years of conflict between the houses of York and Lancaster.

Shakespeare depicts Richard as a crafty villain whose soul is as deformed as his body, though the blackness of the portrait is relieved somewhat by Richard's courage, his wit, and his freedom from self-delusion. Written while Elizabeth, the granddaughter of Henry VII, ruled England, the play was enormously popular in its day and is largely responsible for the ill-repute in which Richard has long been held. It is Colley Cibber's alteration (1700) of the play that contains the line "Off with his head! so much for Buckingham!" which is often searched for in vain in the Shakespearean version.

Richard Carvel (1899). A historical novel by Winston Churchill. One of the most popular novels ever written about the American Revolution, Richard Carvel is an account, narrated by the hero, of his adventures aboard a slaver from which he is rescued by John Paul Jones. The book describes sea warfare, a London interlude, and a successful love affair.

Richard Coeur de Lion. See Richard I.

Richards, [vor] A[mstrong] (1893– ). English literary critic, aesthetician, and poet. He is notable as one of the pioneers in the analytical method of criticism of the Cambridge critics and the New Criticism. He published his influential Principles of Literary Criticism in 1924. Richards based his ideas on his studies in semantics, such as those presented in The Meaning of Meaning (1923), with C. K. Ogden as co-author. In his book Science and Poetry (1925) he argued that scientific discourse deals with truth, but that poetry makes pseudo-statements and should not be read for the facts it may convey but should be analyzed for its implications and connotations. In pursuit of the language of science and fact, Richards became interested in Basic English. He wrote Basic English and its Uses (1943) and a Basic English translation of The Republic of Plato (1942). He applied the study of semantics and of the exact meaning of words to literary criticism at the same time as the logical positivists were applying it to philosophy. One of Richards’ other important aesthetic theories is that poetry is valuable in a scientific society because its complexity and depth can help to give psychological balance to its readers. His other works include Practical Criticism (1929) and How to Read a Page (1942), demonstrations of his method of analytical criticism, and Coleridge on Imagination (1934). Among his collections of poetry is The Screens and other Poems (1960).

Richardson, Dorothy (1873–1957). English novelist. She was a pioneer and outstanding exemplar of the stream-of-consciousness school. Her novels are grouped together under the general title of Pilgrimage. Expressing above all the feminine sensibility, Dorothy Richardson’s novels describe the thoughts, sense impressions, memories, and feelings that the heroine experiences.

Richardson, Henry Handel. Pen name of Henrietta Richardson; original name Ethel Florence Lindesay Richardson; married name Robertson (1870–1946). Australian novelist. Born in Melbourne and trained as a pianist, she devoted herself to her first love, writing, after her marriage. Her first books, beginning with Maurice Guest (1908), were influenced by her readings in French and Russian literature, particularly Flaubert, Tolstoi, and Dostoevski. With her third novel, Australia Felix (1917) her style became both more noticeably English and more surely her own. This was the first of a trilogy of novels with the general title The Fortunes of Richard Mahony, finished in 1930, which were regarded by many critics as an outstanding achievement.

Richardson, Samuel (1689–1761). English novelist. He is known for his expansion of the novel, for his interest in the psychological aspects of character, and for his highly emotional tone. He was one of the most successful printers of his day, having risen from an apprenticeship as a boy. In 1739, while working on a manual of letter-writing that two booksellers had asked him to prepare, Richardson took time off to write Pamela, or Virtue Rewarded. Pamela is generally considered to be the first modern English novel. Clarissa Harlowe and Sir Charles Grandison are his two other major novels; all three are epistolary in form.

Richard the Lion-Hearted. See Richard I.

Richelieu, duc de Armand Jean du Plessis, known as Cardinal Richelieu (1585–1642). French statesman and prelate. As chief minister under Louis XIII, he was largely responsible for the downfall of Protestantism and for the entrenchment of monarchic autocracy in France. An undistinguished writer himself (as is seen in Testament Politique), he was a patron of the literary arts, founding the Académie française (1635) and employing five authors (see cinq auteurs), among them Corneille, to write plays under his direction. Richelieu appears as a character in de Vigny’s Cin Quinze Merci (The Fifth of March, 1826), in Bulwer-Lytton’s historical drama Richelieu, or the Conspiracy (1838), and in Dumas’ Les Trois Mousquetaires (The Three Musketeers, 1844). See Dupes, Day of.

Richter, Conrad [Michael] (1890– ). American novelist and short-story writer. Richter’s first novel, The Sea of Grass (1937), is the story of a cattle baron of the old Southwest and his hopeless battle against progress. His most ambitious work is a trilogy depicting a pioneer family over the years: The Trees (1940), The Fields (1946), and The Town (1950), which won a Pulitzer Prize. He is also the author of The Light in the Forest (1952), about a Pennsylvania boy brought up by Indians, and The Water of Kronos (1960), a symbolic fantasy.

Richter, Jean Paul Friedrich (1763–1825). Pen name, Jean Paul. Popular German novelist and aesthetician. Both the ironic humor of his style and the sometimes excessive sentimentality of his stories show the influence of Laurence Sterne. Also like Sterne, he often tinkered with the novel’s structure by placing the author’s preface in the middle, inserting long digressions, or weaving complex time-structures with multiple flashbacks. With his Vor schule der Ästhetik (Introduction to Aesthetics, 1804) he became one of the first theorists of the novel. He rejected both Weimar classicism and romanticism; the former because he felt it to be too cold, the latter because of its one-sided emotional idealism and failure to take the whole man into account. In turn, he was himself coolly received by both groups. His best-known novels are Leben des vergnügten Schulmeisters Maria Wus (Life of the Complacent Little Schoolmaster Maria Wus, 1790), Siebenbürgen (1796–1797), Titan (1800–1803), and Fliegelfahrer (Years of Indiscretion, 1804–1805).

Ridge, Lola (1883–1941). American poet, born in Ireland and raised in Australia. Her poetic tech nique owed much to imagism but also showed the influence of Walt Whitman. Her most famous poem was The Ghetto; published in the New Republic 1918 and the title poem of her first collection that same year, it gave a pitiless picture of the New York slums. Sun-Up (1920) contained memories of Australia; Red Flag (1927) was a sonnet sequence; Firehead (1929) was an account of the Crucifixion inspired by the Sacco-Vanzetti case. She also published Dance of Fire (1935).

Ridler, Anne, born Bradley (1912– ). English poet. She writes poems on domestic and religious subjects, and religious poetic dramas. Among her works are The Shadow Factory, a Nativity Play (1946) and The Golden Bird and other Poems (1951).

Ridley, Nicholas (1560–1555). English bishop and Protestant martyr. Once chaplain to Henry VIII, Ridley helped Thomas Cranmer in the preparation of the two Prayer Books of Edward VI. He signed Edward's request that the crown be given to Lady Jane Grey and denounced Mary and Elizabeth as illegitimate. When Lady Jane was imprisoned he asked Mary's pardon for his denunciation of her, but he was arrested. With Hugh Latimer, he was burned at the stake for heresy.

Ridruejo, Dionisio (1912– ). Spanish poet. A poet of simple but wide-ranging expression, he wrote Plural (1935), En la soledad del tiempo (1944), and the poems collected under the title En once años, which brought him the Premio Nacional de Literatura in 1950.

Rienzi, Cola di. Real name Niccolo Gabrini (1313–1354). Italian patriot, often called "the last of the Romans," who, for a time, restored the old Roman system of government, but failed and went to his death. He is the hero of Bulwer-Lytton's historical romance Rienzi, The Last of the Tribunes (1835) and Wagner's opera Rienzi founded on the novel (1841).

Biggs, Lynn (1899–1954). American playwright. His plays deal with life in Oklahoma and Texas, making special use of folk themes of that region. Among them are Born in Texas, a romantic comedy written in Paris on a Guggenheim fellowship and produced on the stage as Roadside (1930); Green Grow the Lilacs (1931), a folk drama that formed the basis for Rodgers' and Hammerstein's Oklahoma; The Cherokee Night (1936), a tragedy dealing with the decline of the Cherokee Indians in Oklahoma. He is also the author of The Iron Dish (1930), a volume of poetry.

Right, Declaration of (1689). An instrument submitted to William and Mary and accepted by them, setting forth the fundamental principles of the English constitution and limiting royal power. According to its provisions, the Crown cannot levy taxes without the consent of Parliament, nor keep a standing army in times of peace. In addition, Roman Catholics are barred from the throne. The document was confirmed by Parliament as the Bill of Rights.

Rights of Man, The (1791–1792). A political work by Thomas Paine, defending the French Revolution against attacks made on it by Edmund Burke. In it Paine argues that civil government exists only through a contract with a majority of the people for the safe-guarding of the individual, and that if man's "natural rights" are interfered with by the government, revolution is permissible. As a result of this tract, Paine was forced to flee to France and was tried in England in absentia as a traitor.

Rigoletto. An opera by Giuseppe Verdi (1851) based on Victor Hugo's drama Le Roi S'amuse (The King Amuses Himself). The opera scene is laid in 16th-century Mantua instead of the court of Francis I of France, and the principal character becomes Rigoletto instead of Triboulet.

Rig Veda. See Vedas.

Riis, Jacob [Augustus] (1849–1914). Danish-born American journalist and reformer. Arriving in America at the age of 21, Riis worked at odd jobs and learned at first hand of the squalor of New York slums. Later he became a police reporter for the N.Y. Tribune, and waged a single-handed battle against the terrible conditions in the New York City tenements. Finally his book, How the Other Half Lives (1890) attracted the attention of Theodore Roosevelt; the result was an improved water supply, child labor laws, playgrounds, the closing of police lodging-houses, and the elimination of the worst slum, the notorious Mulberry Bend. The Making of an American (1901) is Riis' own account of his life and crusades; it is his most famous book. Other works include The Children of the Poor (1892), The Battle with the Slum (1902), Children of the Tenements (1903), and Is There a Santa Claus? (1904).

Riley, James Whitcomb (1849–1916). American poet, lecturer, and newspaperman. Riley's real education was acquired not in school, but as a journalist in his native Indiana. He had an ear for the local Hoosier speech and published a series of poems in dialect in the Indianapolis Journal. The poems were collected as The Old Swimmin' Hole and 'Leven More Poems in 1883, and made him not only famous, but the richest American writer of his time. He increased his income by lecturing and writing humorous sketches. He is remembered for his dialect poems, among them Little Orphant Annie, The Raggedy Man, and When The Frost is on the Punkin, which have been called "comforting, familiar platitudes restated in verse."

Rilke, Rainer Maria (1875–1926). German poet. He is considered the most significant figure in 20th-century German lyric poetry. His early works, culminating in Das Stundenbuch (The Book of Hours, 1905), a collection of poems written in the person of a monk, show a strong tendency to seek escape from the real world in a highly subjective realm of half-religious, half-aesthetic anguish and ecstasy. His elevation of art to a personal religion, at this stage, reflects the strong influence of both German and French romanticism. But Rilke felt a very strong need to break away from his youthful subjectivity, and did so in his Neue Gedichte (New Poems, 1907), a collection which contains the most perfect examples of a relatively new type of poem called in German the Dinnosong (thing-poem). His friendship with the sculptor Auguste Rodin, to whom he dedicated Der neuen Gedichte anderer Teil (The Second Part of the New Poems, 1908), significantly influenced the meticulous accuracy of observation reflected in his poems of this period. In his last and most famous works, including the Duineser Elegien and The Sonnets to Orpheus, Rilke developed a highly individualized style in which the minutest shades of meaning, not only in every word but even in prefixes, suffixes, and individual sounds, are carefully considered and made to contribute to the structure of the poem. Rilke's novel, The Notebooks of Malte Laurids Brigge, abounds in the same kind of radically daring but impressively accurate imagery that characterizes his poetry, and was, in its time, a bold experiment in narrative technique.

Rimbaud, Arthur (1854–1891). French poet. Rimbaud, a member of the SYMBOLISTS, became a forerunner of the surrealist school. His poetry is characterized by dramatic and imaginative vision, particularly in the realm of hallucination. Subtle and infinitely suggestive, his work uses words for tone-color, as in his famous Soumet des Voyelles, and is partially written in free verse. Stylistically the poetry is marked by a distortion of common meaning and syntax, and by the grouping of images about a single central metaphor. His best known works are Les Illuminations (1885), Le Bateau Ivre (The Drunken Boat, 1871) and Une Saison en Enfer (A Season in Hell). A striking and enigmatic personality, Rimbaud was raised in a poor and strictly religious home by his mother. He was an industrious, quiet, and irreproachably mannered student in a provincial school until the age of 15. Then suddenly, in savage rebellion, he ran away to Paris. He studied occult writings, Plato, the cabbala, and Buddhist scriptures, in order to make himself a seer. Believing the role of poetry to be one of mystic revelation, he deliberately debauched himself in order to reach a transcendent world through sin and suffering. For years, he was closely associated with Paul Verlaine and had a powerful influence—morally corruptive but aesthetically fruitful—on the older poet. All of Rimbaud's known poetry was written prior to the age of 20, and he apparently spent the remainder of his short life as a trader in Africa. A poetic prodigy, Rimbaud is of vital import to 20th-century poetry.

Rime of the Ancient Mariner, The (1798). A poem by Samuel Taylor COLERIDGE. It deals with the supernatural punishment and penance of a seaman who heartlessly shot an albatross, a bird of good omen, in the Antarctic regions. The story is told by the Mariner himself—part of his penance is its periodic repetition—to the reluctant, fascinated listener, a man who was on his way to a wedding.

Rimmon or Ramman. A Babylonian storm-god. He was it who was worshiped by NAAMAN before his conversion to the worship of Yahweh. In Paradise Lost, Milton identifies Rimmon as one of the fallen angels.

Rimsky-Korsakov, Nicolai Andreyevich (1844– 1908). Russian composer, a member of the nationalist “FIVE.” He was a professor of composition (1871) at the St. Petersburg Conservatory. He wrote a treatise on orchestration, and his memoirs. In 1902 he met Stravinsky, who became his pupil. He is best known for his symphonic suites Antar and Scheherazade, and the Russian Easter overture. His operas based on Russian legends, include La Coq d'Or.

Rinaldo or Ranaldo. One of the great heroes of medieval romance (also called Renault of Monta uban, Regnault, Reynold, etc.), a paladin of Charlemagne and cousin of Orlando. One of the four sons of Aymon, he rides the famous horse Biairdo, or Bayardo. Though brave and ingenious, he is often given to violent and unscrupulous behavior. His rapacious instincts often lead him to act like a common plunderer.

He appears in Luigi Pulci's Morgante Maggiore, in Matteo Maria Boiardo's Orlando Innamorato, and in Lodovico Ariosto's Orlando Furioso. In Ariosto, he is the son of the fourth marquis of Este, lord of Mount Auan or Albano, eldest son of Amon or Aymon, nephew of Charlemagne, and brother to Bradamante. Like his cousin Orlando he falls in love with the fair Angelica, who detests him. The subsequent haggling of the two cousins over Angelica weakens the Christian camp against the pagan forces.

In the Jerusalem Delivered of Torquato Tasso, he appears as Rinaldo d'Este, son of Bertoldo and Sophia, nephew of Guelfo. Craving fame rather than gold or power, he joins the First Crusade as an adventurer, though only 15. After slaying Gernando, his rival for a position of command, he is summoned to public trial by Goffredo, the leader of the Crusaders. In anger he deserts the Christian camp, as Achilles left the Greek army, to avenge his father. He then falls into the power of the enchantress Armida, who detains him in her castle until Goffredo sends for him. Returned to the wars, he leads the Crusaders in a final assault on the city, which results in its capture.

Rinconete y Cortadillo. One of the tales in Cervantes' Novelas ejemplares. Containing many elements of the picareque, it deals with two youths who travel to Seville, where they receive thorough training in crime and roguery at the thieves' school of Monipodo.

Rinehart, Mary Roberts (1876–1958). American detective-story writer. The Circular Staircase (1908) and The Man in Lower Ten (1909) established her reputation as a writer of detective stories that combined humor with ingenuity; the former novel was successfully dramatized by the author and Avery Hopwood as The Bat (1920). She also wrote numerous stories about a dauntless spinster called Tish and her two middle-aged cronies, Aggie and Lizzie; included in the series are The Amazing Adventures of Letitia Carberry (1911) and Tish (1916). One critic has called Mrs. Rinehart's autobiography, My Story (1931; rev., 1948), her finest book.

Ring and the Book, The (1868–1869). A long poem in 12 books by Robert BROWNING. Based on an Italian murder case of 1698, the story is presented in dramatic monologues spoken by 12 characters, each of whom approaches it from a different point of view. Guido Franceschini, a Florentine nobleman of shattered fortune, marries Pompilia Compani, whom he believes to be an heiress. Pietro and Violante Comparini, learning that Guido is not wealthy as they believed, sue for the return of Pompilia's dowry, claiming that she is not really their daughter. Guido treats her so brutally that Pompilia, who is about to have a child, flees to Rome under the protection of Count Gonsaschi. A young priest, they are caught by her husband, and Caponsacchi, charged with adultery, is banished for three years; Pompilia is sent to a nunnery. Two weeks after her child is born, Pompilia and her supposed parents are murdered by Guido. He is arrested and admits his crime, and, though he claims that Pompilia's alleged adultery justified him, he is condemned and executed.
The "Book" of the title is an ancient record of the case which Browning found in Florence. The "Ring" refers to an Etruscan ring that had belonged to Mrs. Browning. In order to shape it an alloy had been added to the gold; when the ring was finished the alloy was burned off with an acid, and the pure gold remained. Thus, the facts of the case in the old manuscript were the gold that could be given form only when mixed with a "baser metal," the poet's imagination and interpretative fancy.

Rheingold. See Nibelungen, Der. A prologue and three music-dramas or operas by Richard Wagner. They are based on Scandinavian legends and were first performed together at Bayreuth in 1876. Although Wagner's principal source was not the Nibelungenlied but the Volsunga Saga, the Nibelungenlied, the Elder and Younger Eddas, and the Eckehard were also drawn upon for material. The interest centers about the magic ring made from the Rhine gold and the curse it brought to all who owned it.

The four operas may be briefly summarized as follows:

1. Das Rheingold (The Rhinegold, 1869). In the bottom of the Rhine is a hoard of gold guarded by the Rhine Maidens. Alberich, the dwarf, forgives love to gain this hoard, which confers boundless power upon its possessor. From it he makes a magic ring. Meantime Wotan, chief of the gods, has given Freya, the goddess of youth and love, to the giants Fasolt and Fafner as payment for their labor in building for him the castle Valhalla. Without Freya, everything grows old, even the gods. To get her back, Wotan and Loki steal the ring and the hoard from Alberich and trade them for the goddess. Alberich has put a curse on the ring; and accordingly, almost immediately the giant Fafner kills his brother Fasolt. As the opera ends, the gods go over the rainbow bridge to Valhalla.

2. Die Walküre (The Valkyrie, 1870). Wotan is the father of two children, Siegmund and Sieglinde, who grow up on earth in ignorance of each other but who, by the desire of Wotan, are to mate in the interest of the coveted ring. Sieglinde has married Hunding, but when Siegmund comes, she goes with him into the forest. Wotan's wife, the goddess of marriage, insists that Siegmund be punished, and Wotan finally yields and entrusts the Valkyrie Brunhilde with the task. In spite of her orders, Brunhilde tries to protect Sieglinde, but Hunding, finally aided by the angry Wotan, kills him. She succeeds, however, in escorting with Sieglinde, who is about to give birth to the hero Siegfried. Wotan punishing Brunhilde by making her a mortal woman asleep on a mountain peak surrounded by magic fire through which only a hero may pass.

3. Siegfried (1876). Siegfried, since the death of his mother Sieglinde, has been brought up to the trade of the smithy by Mime, the dwarf, whom he hates. He remakes his father's sword and slays a dragon who is really the giant Fafner. A drop of the dragon's blood on his tongue makes him understand the language of the birds. Acting on the information they give him, he kills the treacherous Mime, secures the magic ring, and finds Brunhilde and marries her.

4. Götterdämmerung (The Twilight of the Gods, 1876). Siegfried leaves the magic ring with Brunhilde and goes to seek adventure. At the court of Gunther and his sister Gutrune, their half-brother Hagen, son of the dwarf Alberich, gives Siegfried a magic potion that causes him to forget Brunhilde and become a suitor for the hand of Gutrune. He even agrees to secure Brunhilde for Gunther and does so. Unable to understand his fickleness, Brunhilde denounces him and enters into schemes for revenge with the wily Hagen. At a hunting feast, just as Siegfried is remembering his past and calling for Brunhilde, he is killed by a thrust in the back from Hagen. The hero's body is burned on a funeral pyre; Brunhilde sacrifices herself in the flames; the Rhine overflows its banks; Gunther and Hagen perish in the struggle for the ring, which now returns to the Rhine Maidens, and Valhalla, with all the gods, is destroyed by fire.

Rinuccini, Ottavio (1562-1621). Florentine poet. Rinuccini's plays were used as librettos by the composers of the first operas. He was a member of the famous Camera dei Bardi, a Florentine association of poets and musicians bent on reviving Greek tragedy in its original form, mistakenly believed by them to consist of a completely sung text. Along with Peri, Caccini, and V. Galilei, he produced texts suited to the new style of recitative (recitar cantando), which superseded the polyphonic style of the earlier Renaissance. In 1594, his Dafne, called a favola per musica (a fable to be set to music) was performed with the music of Peri in the new monodic or recitative style. Though only the text survives, the Dafne is considered the first opera by historians. (The word opera itself, however, and its synonym in Italian, melodramma, came into use after 1650.) In 1600, Rinuccini wrote the text for the Euridice, with music by Peri, for the marriage of Henry IV of France and Maria de' Medici. In 1607, he helped to launch the career of Monteverdi by supplying the text for his successful opera Arianna, performed at Mantua's ducal court. By 1637, operas were being performed publicly in the theaters of Venice.

Ripheus. A Trojan, highly praised for his justice and nobility of character in Vergil's Aeneid. He is one of the two pagans admitted to heaven by Dante in his Paradiso. See Trajan.

Ripley, George (1802-1880). American editor, reformer, and literary critic. After graduating from Harvard University, Ripley taught mathematics there while attending the Divinity School. He became a Unitarian minister in Boston, and studied German theology as he edited the Christian Register. In 1838 Ripley began to edit Specimens of Foreign Standard Literature (14 v., 1838-1852), translations of the philosophers whose work forms the basis of the American transcendentalist movement. On April 1, 1841, Ripley and 20 other members of the Transcendental Club moved to West Roxbury, Mass., where he became president of the community at Brook Farm. After the disastrous fire of 1846, Ripley moved to Flatbush, L.I.; a contributor to the New York Tribune, he soon was recognized as an important influence in American letters. A founder of Harper's New Monthly Magazine, he also edited the New American Cyclopaedia (16 v., 1858-1863, later revised).
Rip Van Winkle (1819). A tale by Washington Irving, collected in his Sketch Book of Geoffrey Crayon, Gent. Certainly the most popular piece Irving ever wrote, the story is based on a folk tale. Hempecked Rip and his dog Wolf wander into the Catskill mountains before the Revolutionary War. There they meet a dwarf, whom Rip helps to carry a keg. They join a group of dwarfs playing nine-pins. When Rip drinks from the keg, he falls asleep and wakes 20 years later, an old man. Returning to his town, he discovers his tergemant wife dead, his daughter married, and the portrait of King George replaced by one of George Washington. Irving uses the folk tale to present the contrast between the new and old societies.

The story was adapted many times for the stage and opera house. The most famous adaptation was done by Dion Boucicaut for the actor Joseph Jefferson, who played Rip for almost 40 years (1865–1904).

Rise and Fall of the Town Mahagonny (Aufstieg und Fall der Stadt Mahagonny; 1929). A play by Bertolt Brecht with music by Kurt Weill in a style similar to that of their The Threepenny Opera. Set in the U.S., it is strongly Marxist in thought, and is intended as an object lesson about bourgeois decadence. The town of Mahagonny, founded and populated entirely by pleasure seekers, is in Brecht’s eyes a logical development of capitalist society; it eventually collapses because of inherent economic and human contradictions. It is an example of what Brecht called Epic Theater.

Rise of David Levinsky, The (1917). A novel by Abraham Cahan. Levinsky is a Russian Jew who emigrates to America and becomes, finally, the chief figure in the New York cloak-and-suit trade. Sometimes ruthless and unscrupulous, he becomes a rich man, but he does not attain happiness, and ends with neither family nor a real home. The novel is recognized as the first important novel dealing with immigrant life.

Rise of Silas Lapham, The (1885). A novel by William Dean Howells. Silas, a self-reliant businessman who has become wealthy, moves to Boston. Building a pretentious home on Beacon Hill, he disgraces himself by drinking too much at a dinner party given by the social elite. Originally careless of the morality of his money-getting methods, Silas begins to recognize ethical standards. Although he is financially ruined by the end of the book, his “rise” reflects this change in attitude. Persis, his helplessly provincial wife, has been unable to guide her daughters’ social careers; Penelope Lapham finally marries Tom Corey, member of a Brahmin family, and the two escape to Mexico. The novel is generally considered Howells’s best.

Risorgimento (ital., “revival; resurrection”). The political movement, starting about 1831, whose objective was the liberation and unification of Italy. Its three great leaders were Mazzini, Garibaldi, and Cavour. Risorgimento was the name of a newspaper founded (1847) by Count Cavour.

Ristori, Adelaide (1821–1906). Italian actress. One of the leading tragediennes of the European stage, she played principally in Paris, where the relative merits of her interpretations and those of Rachel at the Comédie Française were a subject of bitter controversy. In addition to her appearances in Italian and classical French drama, she was widely acclaimed for her portrayal of Lady Macbeth and of Maria Stuart in an Italian version of Schiller’s tragedy.

Ritchie, Anne Isabella. Born Thackeray (1837–1919). Novelist, eldest daughter of William Makepeace Thackeray. Although a novelist in her own right, her biographies of famous Victorians are her best work. These include Lord Tennyson and His Friends (1893) and Chapters from Some Memoirs (1894).

Ritson, Joseph (1752–1803). English antiquary and critic. He quarreled savagely with Thomas Percy over the editing of the Reliques of Ancient English Poetry, and with George Steevens over Steevens’s edition of Shakespeare. He also attacked Thomas Warton’s History of English Poetry. Ritson’s collections of popular songs (Select Collection of English Songs, 1783–1793) are distinguished by faithful reproduction of the text and the inclusion of the ballad music—as in most modern collections. He is best known for his comprehensive collection of ballads and poems on Robin Hood (1795); the Ancient English Metrical Romances (1802), attacking the authenticity of romances in Percy’s Reliques; and for the Bibliographia Poetica (1802), a catalogue of English poetry from the 12th to the 16th centuries. Ritson became insane shortly before his death.

Rittenhouse, Jessie B[elle] (1869–1948). American poet and anthologist. She is known for her anthologies of American verse, especially The Younger American Poets (1904). A founder of the Poetry Society of America, she published several books, including The Door of Dreams (1918), The Lifted Cup (1921), and The Moving Tide: New and Selected Lyrics (1929).

Rivals, The (1775). A comedy by Richard Brinsley Sheridan. Though less well known in name, this play is considered by some to be better than The School for Scandal. The plot is complicated: Sir Anthony Absolute wishes his son Captain Absolute to marry Lydia Languish. He does not know that Captain Absolute is already wooing her in the guise of the impudent Ensign Beverley, a guise taken on to please Lydia’s romantic dream of an elopement rather than marriage with a well-to-do baronet’s son. Lydia’s aunt Mrs. Malaprop, disapproving of the penniless Beverley, threatens to take away half of Lydia’s fortune if she marries him. She wishes Lydia to marry Captain Absolute. The plot is further complicated by the fact that Captain Absolute’s friend Bob Acres is also in love with Lydia and challenges Beverley to a duel (not knowing that Beverley is really Absolute). Things get straightened out in the end, however, and Lydia, after scolding Captain Absolute for ruining her hopes of a romantic elopement, happily agrees to marry him.

Rivas, duque de. Angel Saavedra y Ramirez de Baguedano (1791–1865). Spanish poet and dramatist. As a youth Rivas was seriously wounded while fighting against the French during the Napoleonic invasion of Spain. Exiled in 1823 by Ferdinand VII because of his liberal tendencies, he lived in London, Paris, and Malta, where he met John Hookham Frere, who exerted a decisive influence on his literary career by introducing him to English romanticism. After his return to Spain in 1834, he inherited the title and held a number of important political positions.

Though Rivas' early writings were in the classical manner, he later became the champion of Spanish romanticism. The change was signaled by the lyric El faro de Malta (1828) and by El moro expósito (1834), a long narrative poem in the style of Sir Walter Scott, dealing with the legend of the seven infants of Lara. His prose-and-verse drama, Don Alvaro o la fuerza del sino, first presented in 1835, had an impact on the Spanish theater comparable to that of Hugo's Hernani in France five years earlier. He also wrote Romances históricos (1841), a series of ballads on important events in Spanish history, such as the downfall of Alvaro de Luna and the victory of Pavia.

Rivera, Diego [Maria] (1886-1957). Mexican painter. His influence led to the formation of a purely national school of painting. He is best known for vast historical murals undertaken with the support of succeeding administrations. His fresco in Rockefeller Center in New York was removed because it was felt to be too radical in its political allusions. It was repainted in Mexico City. Currently in the hotel El Prado, it is covered by a heavy curtain to protect it from being defaced by Catholic or anticommunist demonstrators, and is only shown on special occasions.

Rivera, José Eustasio. See VORÁGINE, LA.

Rivera y Orbeneja, Miguel Primo de (1870-1930). Spanish political leader. By a military coup d'état he proclaimed a directorate of army and naval officers in Spain (Sept. 12, 1923) and made himself dictator. He later restored the original government and made himself premier. He resigned shortly before his death.

Riviére, Jacques (1886-1925). French critic and editor. One of the founders of the influential literary magazine the Nouvelle Revue Française, Riviére directed it from 1919 to 1925. His conversion to Catholicism is reflected in much of his literary criticism, such as A la trace de Dieu (1925), and in his correspondence with Paul Claudel (pub. 1926) and with Alain Fournier (4 vol., 1926-1927).

Rizal, José (1861-1896). Philippine novelist and national hero. He was sent into exile by the Spanish government because of his novel Noli Me Tangere (The Lost Eden, 1886), in which he criticized both the Spanish regime and the clergy. In 1896, on his return to the Philippines, he was charged with fomenting revolution and executed. Before his death he wrote a remarkable poem, Mi último adiós.

Rizzio, David (1533?-1566). An Italian musician in the service of Mary Queen of Scots. He became her private foreign secretary, arranged her marriage with Darnley, and finally attained such influence that he was attacked and killed in Queen Mary's apartment at Holyrood Palace in Edinburgh by Darnley, Morton, and Lindsay. Swinburne treats this event in Mary Stuart: A Tragedy (1881).

Road Not Taken, The (1915). A poem by Robert Frost. One of Frost's best-known poems, it describes how the narrator coming to a fork in the road is undecided on which way to go. Both roads seem very much alike. He takes the one less traveled—and "that has made all the difference."

Roads to Freedom, The (Les Chemins de la liberté). A trilogy of novels by Jean Paul SARTRE, The Age of Reason (L'Age de raison; 1945), set in 1938, presents Mathieu, a professor of philosophy trying to maintain his ethical freedom. The Reprieve (Le Suris; 1945) is a panorama of the eight days preceding the Munich Pact in September, 1938. Troubled Sleep (La Mort dans l'amour; 1949; also translated as Iron in the Soul, shows varied reactions to the fall of France in 1940.

Road to Rome, The (1927). A play by Robert E. Sherwood. Influenced by George Bernard Shaw's Caesar and Cleopatra (1899), it is a plea against war presented in a comedy. The first of Sherwood's plays, it describes how Hannibal is prevented from capturing Rome by the allurements of Amyntas, the wife of a pompous senator, Fabius Maximus.

Roa Hope Island. An island off the coast of North Carolina, site of an ill-fated English colony (1584-1591), sponsored by Sir Walter Raleigh. Although previous attempts at settlement had failed, a group of new colonists arrived in 1587. The ships that sailed back to England for supplies did not return until 1591 and found no trace of the settlers, except for the word "Croatian," the name of a friendly tribe of Indians, carved on the bark of a tree. The fate of the colony has never been discovered. Paul Green's historical pageant, The Lost Colony (1937), is presented annually on the island. See Virginia Dare.

Roan Stallion, Tamar, and Other Poems (1925). A collection of poems by Robinson Jeffers. The title poem deals with the almost religious love of a woman named California for a magnificent red stallion, in which she sees godlike power and beauty. She permits the horse to trample her brutal husband to death, but then shoots the beast "out of some obscure human fidelity."

Roaring Girl, The (c. 1610). A comedy by Thomas Middleton and Thomas Dekker. The marriage of Mary Fitzallard and Sebastian Wengrave is opposed by the latter's arrogant and avaricious father, Sir Alexander. In order to force his father's compliance, Sebastian pretends to pay court to "the roaring girl." Moll Cutpurse, a woman who combines a knowledge of London's lowlife with a sort of manly virtue, Moll agrees to help Sebastian and act as go-between with Mary. Sir Alexander sends his spy servant, Trapdoor, to gain Moll's confidence and bring about her downfall. However, Moll eludes the trap and succeeds, by pretending momentarily to be Sebastian's bride, in bringing about the wedding of the happy pair while gulling Sir Alexander into the bargain.

Robbe-Grillet, Alain (1922- ). French novelist, critic, and film engineer. Robbe-Grillet first described the nouveau roman or new novel in 1956, becoming the leading exponent of the New Waves in literature. His own novels experiment with the presentation of space and time. The changing appearance of what the protagonist sees, noted with geometrical precision, conveys the human significance. In The Voyeur (1955) we watch a rape and murder by a traveling salesman, and in Jealousy (1957) we observe the powerful obsession of a banana plantation owner about his wife and his neighbor. Other works include Les Gommes (The Erasers, 1953), *In the Robert Elsmere (1888). A novel by Mrs. Humphry Ward dealing with 19th-century religious problems. The hero is a clergyman whose intellectual convictions force him to leave the church. His wife Catherine loves him but cannot share his changing faith. Following the lead of French and German religious critics, the book advocates that Christianity should abjure its supernatural origins and concentrate on social questions.

Robert of Brunne. See Robert MANNING.

Robert of Gloucester (late 13th century). English chronicler. A long metrical Chronicle of English History from earliest times (c. 1300) bears his name, but someone else probably wrote the earlier sections (to 1135). Most of the work is compiled from other chroniclers, but the last section (1256–1270) includes fresh contemporary reminiscences. The work is primarily of linguistic importance, showing the beginning of the transition from Old to Middle English.

Roberts, Sir Charles G[eorge] D[ouglas] (1860–1943). Canadian novelist and poet. He was among the first to write about the Canadian scene, and has been called the father of Canadian letters. Among his collections of poetry are The Iceberg and Other Poems (1934) and Selected Poems (1936). His books include The Heart of the Ancient Wood (1900), In the Morning of Time (1923), They Who Walk in the Wild (1924), and Eyes of the Wilderness (1933).

Roberts, Elizabeth Madox (1886–1941). American novelist. A regional writer, she is noted for her treatment of the pioneers and "poor whites" of Kentucky and the Virginias. Although her talent and insight were highly poetic and she wrote several books of verse, including Under the Tree (1922) and Song in the Meadow (1940), she is known primarily for her distinguished works of prose. My Heart and My Flesh (1927) is the story of a Southern girl and her attempt to find happiness through three different love affairs. The Great Meadow (1930) is a novel dealing with the settlement of Kentucky.

Roberts, Kenneth [Lewis] (1885–1957). American historical novelist. He is best known for his excellent novels of the colonial and Revolutionary periods, especially Arundel, Rabble in Arms, and Northwest Passage. Roberts based his novels on facts unearthed after careful research; the journals of men accompanying Benedict Arnold, which Roberts used for Arundel, were edited by him in March to Quebec (1939). Oliver Wiswell (1940) is a study of an American Tory at the time of the Revolution.

Robertson, E. Arnot. Pen name of Eileen Arbutnot Robertson (1903–61). English novelist. Among her popular and witty novels are Four Frightened People (1931) and The Signpost (1944).

Robertson, Ethel F. Lindsay Richardson. See Henry Handel Richardson.

Robertson, Morgan [Andrew] (1861–1915). American short-story writer. He never received recognition during his lifetime and was debt-ridden most of the time. Today Robertson is considered one of America’s finest writers of sea stories. One of his best tales is The Derelict Neptune from Spin Yarn (1898), a collection of his short stories.

Robert the Devil

Robert the Devil (Fr. Robert le Diable). Hero of medieval legend. Robert learns that the reason he has been using his strength exclusively for outrageous crimes is that his mother, hitherto childless, had prayed to the Devil for a son. He goes to a hermit to seek purification and undertakes the severe penances imposed, living as the mute court fool at the court of Rome and saving the city three times from the Saracens, but finally ending his days at the hermitage.

The legend became attached to the name of Robert, sixth duke of Normandy and father of William the Conqueror. The historical Robert was known for his cruelty, as well as his daring, and died (1035) on his return from a pilgrimage he made to Jerusalem as penance for his sins.

Versions of the composite story vary widely. It is the subject of a French metrical romance of 1496, a 15th-century English metrical romance, Sir Gouther, and a prose romance by Thomas Lodge (1591). In Meyerbeer's opera Robert le Diable (1831), libretto by Scribe and Delavigne, the setting is Italy. Bertram, the Devil in disguise, follows his son Robert around in hopes of making a contract for his soul. But Robert's foster-sister Alice helps him break the evil spell, and he marries Princess Isabella of Sicily.

Robert François Damiens (1715-1757), who attempted to assassinate Louis XV, was also called Robert le Diable.

Robeson, Paul (1898-1976). American Negro singer and actor. He has appeared in The Emperor Jones (1923), Porgy and Bess, All God's Chillun Got Wings, Show Boat, and Othello. An open Communist sympathizer, he lived abroad for many years, and returned to the U.S. in 1964.

Robespierre, Maximilien François Marie Isidore de (1758-1794). French Revolutionist. Undisputed master of the Jacobin Club, he was called by the Parisians "the Incorruptible" for his uncompromising honesty and revolutionary fervor. In the year 1793-94, he dominated the Committee of Public Safety which instituted the Reign of Terror. While head of this committee, he and his two lieutenants, Louis de Saint-Just and Georges Couthon, gave every appearance of being masters of France. Robespierre was overthrown by the Convention on July 27, 1794. He and his fellow terrorists were sent to the guillotine without a trial, as they had sent so many others. During the 19th century the Robespierre legend enjoyed a revival among the lower classes as a champion of social revolution; others consider him to be an ambitious demagogue and dictator. See French Revolution.

Robin Adair. A song written by Lady Caroline Keppel, daughter of the second earl of Albemarle. She married Robert Adair, a young Irish surgeon, in 1758. The air was the old Irish tune of "Eileen Aroon," which her lover had sung to her.

Robin Hood. A legendary English outlaw and popular hero, best known through a cycle of ballads. It is said that he was born c. 1160 at Locksley, Nottinghamshire; he is also said to have been the outlawed earl of Huntington, Robert Fitzooth, in disguise. He lived in the forest, either out of choice or because he was outlawed for debt. His chief haunts was Sherwood Forest in Nottinghamshire. Ancient ballads abound with anecdotes of his personal courage, his skill in archery, his generosity, and his great popularity. It is said that he robbed the rich to give to the poor, and that he protected women and children with chivalrous magnanimity. According to tradition, he was treacherously bled to death by the priestess of Kirkley; as an old man he had gone to her to be bled, and she let him die.

Robin Hood's companions in Sherwood Forest and Barnsdale, Yorkshire, were Little John, Friar Tuck, Will Scarlet, Allan-a-Dale, Will Stutely, and Maid Marian. According to one tradition, Robin Hood and Little John were two heroes defeated at the battle of Evesham. Robin Hood became a stock figure in the May Day plays and festivities.

Robin Hood has long figured in English literature. He is first mentioned in a 1377 edition of Piers Plowman. The most important ballad series of which he is the hero is A Lytell Geste of Robin Hode (1510), a near epic of 456 four-line stanzas.

Robin Redbreast. A common name for two different birds, one European, the other North American. The tradition is that when Jesus was on his way to Calvary, a robin picked a thorn out of his crown, and the blood that issued from the wound falling on the bird dyed its breast with red.

Another fable, referred to in John Webster’s White Devil, is that the robin covers dead bodies with leaves.

Robins, Elizabeth (1865–1952). American actress and writer. She appeared in England in several of Ibsen’s plays. Under her pen name she wrote Below the Salt (1896) and other fiction. Under her real name she turned to feminist writing. She dramatized her novel The Convert (1906) as Votes for Women (1906). Her My Little Sister (1913), dealing with the white-slave trade, was a sensational success.

Robinson, Edwin Arlington (1869–1935). American poet. He is known for his long narrative poems and objective psychological portraits of New England characters, usually written in blank verse, and for his creation of Tilsbury Town, whose prototype was Gardiner, Me., where he spent his boyhood. Robinson privately printed 300 copies of The Torrent and the River (1896), his first book of poems, and, encouraged by the warmth of its critical reception, determined to make a career of writing. Published the following year with some changes, as The Children of the Night, the volume contained several of what were to become Robinson’s best-known poems, among them Luke Havergal, Richard Corey, and Two Men. The poet moved to New York, and worked at various unconvoluted occupations, hounded by poverty and depression. After the publication of Captain Craig, which included The Book of Annadale, Theodore Roosevelt, impressed by his work, secured a position in the New York City custom house for him. Miniver Cheevy first appeared as one of the poems in The Town Down the River (1910), and thereafter Robinson earned his living by writing, spending his summers at the MacDowell Colony in Peterboro, N.H. With the publication of This Man Against the Sky his reputation was firmly established. Although there are long narratives and dramatic monologues among them, the majority of the poems in these collections are short lyrics and character sketches.

Robinson’s Collected Poems (1921), which was published the same year as his Aven’s Harvest, won the first Pulitzer Prize to be awarded for poetry. He won the Pulitzer Prize again in 1925 for The Man Who Died Twice and in 1928 for Tristram. This long poem, which followed Merlin (1917) and Lancelot (1920), was the final volume of Robinson’s Arthurian trilogy, and had a very considerable popular success.

His later books include Cavendish’s House, The Glory of the Nightingales (1930), Matthías at the Door (1931), Nidocerous (1932), Talifer (1933), and Amaranth (1934). His Collected Poems (1937) were published posthumously.

Despite the irony and pessimism of his work, Robinson is usually considered 19th century in tone. His poetry forms an important bridge from Whitman and Dickinson to the truly modern poets of the 20th century.

Robinson Crusoe (1719–1720). The hero and shortened title of The Life and Strange Surprising Adventures of Robinson Crusoe, of York, Mariner, a novel by Daniel Defoe. Robinson Crusoe runs away to sea, is wrecked, and leads a solitary existence on an uninhabited island near the Orinoco river for 24 years. He meets the difficulties of a primitive existence with wonderful ingenuity and finds consolation in reading the Bible. At length he meets a human being, a young native whom he saves from death at the hands of cannibals. He calls him “Man Friday,” because he met him on a Friday, and makes him his companion and servant. Crusoe and Friday share in a variety of adventures which include a fierce battle with cannibals, culminating in their recapturing a mutinous ship and returning to England. Robinson Crusoe is a manual of the qualities that have won the world from barbarism—courage, patience, ingenuity, and industry. Defoe founded this story on the adventures of Alexander Selkirk.

In a commentary, Serious Reflections of Robinson Crusoe (1720), Defoe claims that the novel is an allegory of his own life.

Roboertelli, Francesco (1516–1567). Italian literary critic. He is famed for his pioneer edition (1548) of the Poetics of Aristotle. It included a Latin translation and commentary that were influential both in the history of Renaissance and later literary criticism.

Rob Roy. Nickname of Robert MacGregor (1671–1734). Scottish outlaw, comparable to England’s Robin Hood. He was given the name Roy because of his red hair.

He is the title character of Rob Roy (1817), a novel by Sir Walter Scott, in which he rescues the hero, Francis Osbaldistone, from various difficulties. His exploits also enable Osbaldistone to marry Diana Vernon, the heroine.

roc. An enormous white bird in Arabian folklore. Said to be of such size and strength that it could carry elephants to its mountain nest where it devoured them, it appears in the Arabian Nights, most notably in the story of Sinbad the Sailor, where it transports Sinbad from the Valley of Diamonds.

He was made marshal of France in 1791.

Rochefoucauld, duc de la. See Duc François de La Rochefoucauld.

Rochester, Edward Fairfax. See Jane Eyre.

Rochester, 2nd earl of. John Wilmot (1647–1680). English courtier and poet. A favorite of Charles II, he was known in his day as “the Wicked Earl” for his profligate life, atheism, and obscene verse. Rochester, who died worn-out and repentant at the age of 32, was nevertheless a man with some amiable characteristics and a highly talented poet, author of a number of graceful lyrics and a few biting satires. His best-known poem is A Satire Against Mankind (1675), a brilliant attack on homo sapiens and his pretensions to rationality.

Rocinante or Rosinante. In Cervantes' Don Quixote, the steed of Don Quixote, "lean, lank, meagre, drooping, sharp-backed, and raw-boned." The name implies "that the horse had risen from a mean condition to the highest honor a steed could achieve, for it was once a cart-horse, and rose to become the charger of a knight-errant."

Rockefeller, John D[avison], Sr. (1839-1937). American industrialist and philanthropist. Rockefeller's Standard Oil Company, incorporated in 1870, soon controlled virtually all U.S. facilities for oil refining and transportation. In 1911 the Supreme Court ordered the dissolution of the Standard Oil Company of N.J., a holding company for the Rockefeller interests. At this time Rockefeller retired with a fortune estimated at one billion dollars and devoted the remainder of his life to worthy causes. His son John D. Rockefeller, Jr. (1874-1960) continued his father's business and philanthropic interests.

The term is now applied to any flamboyant and excessively ornamental style.

Roderick or Rodrigo. A Spanish hero around whom many legends have collected. The thirty-fourth and last of the Visigothic kings, he came to the throne in 710 and was routed and probably slain, by the Moors under Tairik in 711.

One legend tells that he is befriended by a shepherd who is then rewarded with the royal chain and ring. Roderick passes the night in the cell of a hermit, who tells him that he must do penance by living for some days in a tomb full of snakes, toads, and lizards. After three days, the hermit goes to see him, and he is unhurt, "because the Lord kept his anger against him." The hermit goes home, spends the night praying, and goes again to the tomb. Rodrigo says, "They eat me now, they eat me now, I feel the adder's bite." His sins thus atoned for, he dies. According to other versions, he does not die but will come again in time of need. In one legend, he reappears at the Battle of Covadonga with the old rallying cry "Roderick the Goth! Roderick and victory!" and saves the day, but is seen no more.

Scott, in his Vision of Don Roderick (1811), portrays Roderick descending into an ancient vault near Toledo where he is shown a panoramic vision of Spanish history to the beginning of the 19th century. Walter Savage Landor made the Roderick legend the subject of his poetic drama, Count Julian (1812). Another famous Spanish hero named Roderigo is the Cid.

Roderick Hudson (1876). A novel by Henry James. In this, the first of James's novels published in book form, the titular hero is a talented young American sculptor. Going to study in Rome under the aegis of a wealthy benefactor, he becomes gradually disillusioned about his art and utterly demoralized by his experience. Christina Light, with whom he falls disastrously in love, reappears as a character in The Princess Casamassima.

Roderick Random, The Adventures of (1748). A picaresque novel by Tobias Smollett modeled on Lesage's Gil Blas. The titular hero, a young Scottish scapegrace in quest of fortune, narrates a succession of adventures. At one time he revels in prosperity, at another he is in utter destitution. Fleeing prosecution for having killed an officer in a duel, Roderick, accompanied by his comrade Hugh Strap, runs off to sea and becomes a surgeon's mate. He subsequently meets and falls in love with Narcissa; her suitors, Sir Timothy Thicket and Lord Quivervit, impede the progress of the romance. Thwarted in his plans, he flees to France and, supported by Strap's money, plans to marry Miss Melinda Goosetrap. Failing in these plans he goes to sea with his uncle Tom Bowling and lands in South America where he meets the wealthy Don Rodrigo, who turns out to be his long-lost father. The triumphant exile returns, marries Narcissa, repurchases the family estate, and shows scorn for those relatives who had earlier scorned him.

Roderick, the Last of the Goths (1814). A narrative poem by Robert Southey. Roderick, the last king of the Visigoths, dishonors Florinda, daughter of Count Julian. In revenge, Count Julian, calling the Moors into Spain to help him, drives Roderick from his throne. Roderick assumes the robes of a monk and devotes his life to God in expiation. During a revolt against the Moors, Roderick, under the name of Father Macabee, persuades his cousin Pelayo to head the Christian forces. When Roderick has heard Florida's confession (which partly absolves him) and makes peace with his mother and Count Julian, he reveals his identity, leaps into battle, and leads the Christian army to victory. He then disappears and Pelayo becomes the founder of the Spanish royal line. Generations later, a tomb bearing the name Roderick is discovered.

Roderigo. In Shakespeare's Othello, a rejected suitor of Desdemona. Foolishly believing that Iago will help him win Desdemona, he becomes a dupe in Iago's plot against Othello.

Rogers, Richard (1902- ). American composer of musical comedies. With his lyricists, Lorenz Hart (1895-1943) and Oscar Hammerstein, he developed the musical into a more unified dramatic form than it had been previously. Among his most famous shows are Pal Joey (1940; with Hart), Oklahoma!, and South Pacific (1949).

Rodin, [Francois] Auguste [René] (1840-1917). French sculptor. One of the important influences in the development of 20th-century art, Rodin used his genius as a means of self-expression, to register emotion and to reveal character. His work, tortured and lyrical in turn, is strengthened by his rejection of any desire for surface finish; bronze retains the rough texture of clay; satin-smooth marble contrasts with roughly cut stone. Among his many famous works are The Thinker, The Kiss, St. John the Baptist Preaching, the monuments to Claude Lorrai and the one to Balzac, the portrait bust of Victor Hugo. There is a Rodin Museum in Paris and one in Philadelphia.

Rodman, Selden (1909– ). American poet and critic. His best-known works include Lawrence: The Last Crusade (1937), a narrative poem concerning T. E. Lawrence; The Airmen (1941), a poem about the achievements of fliers throughout history; and The Revolutionists (1942), a play dealing with Toussaint L’Ouverture and Henri Christophe. As this last work indicates, Rodman has been greatly interested in Haiti. He has done much for Haitian art and written two books on the country: Renaissance in Haiti (1948) and Haiti: The Black Republic (1954). Among his other books are The Amazing Year: A Diary in Verse (1947), Portrait of the Artist as an American (1951), The Eye of Man: Form and Content in Western Painting (1955), and Conversations with Artists (1957). He has also edited a number of poetry anthologies.

Rodó, José Enrique (1871–1917). Uruguayan essayist. Rodó spent most of his uneventful life in Montevideo, where his home became a mecca for Latin-American intellectuals, especially after the publication of Ariel, his most influential essay. Los motivos de Proteo (1909) is a series of related essays, undoubtedly influenced by Bergson, in which the dominant note is the unlimited possibility for the development of the human spirit. The essays on Montalvo and Bolívar in El mirador de Próspero (1913) are also well known. Regarded as the foremost prose writer of modernism, Rodó wrote in a style remarkable for its marvellous serenity and purity.

Rodmane (1644). A tragedy by Pierre Corneille. The scheming queen Cleopatra, believing that her husband Nicanor, king of Syria, is dead, has married his brother Antiochus and banished his children. Nicanor, who has been a prisoner of the Parthians, avenges himself by announcing that he will return to Syria and marry Rodogune, princess of Parthia. Cleopatra arranges the ambush and murder of Nicanor and takes Rodogune prisoner. She recalls her two sons and announces that she will crown king whichever will kill Rodogune. The sons, Antiochus and Seleucus, both fall in love with Rodogune, who at first promises to marry whichever will kill Cleopatra but who eventually withdraws the condition and declares her love for Antiochus. Cleopatra pretends to favor their marriage, but murders Seleucus and poisons the wedding cup. In order to allay Antiochus’ suspicions she is forced to drink from the cup herself, and she dies. This tragedy was Corneille’s favorite of all his works.

Rodomonte. A Saracen hero in Carolingian legends, who appears as king of Sarza or Algiers in Matteo Maria Boiardo’s Orlando innamorato and Lodovico Ariosto’s Orlando furioso. Called the “Mars of Africa," he is the Saracen Achilles, commander of the armies sent against Charlemagne and the Christians by Agramante. His love is Doralice (Dorais), princess of Granada, who runs off with Mandricardo, king of Tartary. At the wedding feast of Ruggiero and the warrior maiden Bradamante, Rodomonte appears in battle dress to denounce Ruggiero, a convert to Christianity, for betraying Agramante and the Saracen cause. In the combat that follows, Ruggiero slays him.

Rodriguez Alvarez, Alejandro. See Alejandro CASONA.

Roebling, John Augustus (1806–1869). German-born American civil engineer. He designed and manufactured the first wire rope in America. He also constructed several bridges, the most striking of which was the railroad suspension bridge at Niagara Falls (1851–1855). He was injured while making plans for a bridge over the East River between Manhattan and Brooklyn (the Brooklyn Bridge); his son, Washington Augustus Roebling, completed the job. John Roebling wrote many articles for periodicals and published Long and Short Span Railway Bridges (1869).

Roebling, Washington Augustus (1837–1926). American civil engineer. The son of John Augustus Roebling, he worked in his father’s wire rope factory after receiving a degree in civil engineering; four days after the attack on Fort Sumter, he enlisted in the Union army, for which he built many important bridges. After the war he went to Europe to study caisson foundations of bridges, in order to assist his father on the Brooklyn Bridge project. When his father died as field work began, Washington Roebling succeeded him in the difficult work. In the spring of 1872, he was seriously injured at the bridge site; he directed the rest of the work, until its completion in 1883, from a house in Brooklyn. His health, permanently impaired by the bridge project, forced him to abandon professional engineering. He devoted the remainder of his life to collecting rare minerals; his collection is now housed in the Smithsonian Institution in Washington, D.C.

Roentgen, Wilhelm Konrad (1845–1923). German physicist who discovered X-rays (1895). He received the Nobel Prize for physics in 1901.

Roethke, Theodore (1908–1963). American poet. Roethke won a Pulitzer Prize for his Collected Poems (1954) and a Bolling Prize for Words for the Wind (1958). One of the talented poets of his generation, he wrote in strict forms, employing witty and rational modes of thought, and he also used free forms, tending toward the surrealist. Noted for their evocation of childhood and old age, Roethke’s poems also abound in horticultural imagery. Other collections of his poetry are Open House (1941), The Lost Son and Other Poems (1948), Praise to the End (1951), and The Waking, Poems 1953–1955 (1953). I Am! Says the Lamb (1961) consists of light verse.

Rogero. See Rugiero.

Rogers, Henry Hudsonston (1840–1909). American financier. Chief executive of the Standard Oil Company, Rogers was also a great admirer of Mark Twain. He advised the author on his tangled business affairs, and helped to bring about an agreement between Mark Twain and Harper & Brothers, by which this firm took complete charge of the works; the arrangement was greatly to the author’s benefit. The correspondence between Mark Twain and Rogers, soon to be published, reveals hitherto unknown facts
Robert Rogers

(1731–1795). American frontier captain and dramatist. His company of rangers became famous in 1756. As a loyalist, he was imprisoned at the start of the Revolution, but escaped and organized the Queen's Rangers. He fled to England (1789), where he received a pension from the government. Rogers wrote a drama about Pontiac's Conspiracy, Ponteatch (1766), the first tragedy written on a native American subject. He is the central figure of Kenneth Roberts' novel Northwest Passage.

Rogers, Samuel (1763–1855). English poet and patron of men of letters. A friend of Wordsworth, Scott, and Byron, Rogers was noted for his biting, sarcastic wit in conversation. Much of Rogers' table talk is preserved in Alexander Dyce's Recollections (1856) and G. H. Powell's Reminiscences (1859). His carefully lifeless 18th-century-style poetry has not stood the test of time, though it was highly regarded in its day. His best-known poetic work is The Pleasures of Memory (1792).

Rogers, William Penn Adair (1879–1935). American actor and humorist. He was widely popular in the U.S. for his vaudeville act of talking while swinging a lasso. He acted in many motion pictures, notably in David Harum, Judge Priest, and Lightnin'. He wrote a series of books with such titles as The Cowboy Philosopher on Prohibition (1919) and The Illicit Digest (1924). From 1926 on he ran an extremely popular syndicated column on the news of the day, selections from which were published by Donald Day in Sanity? Where You Find It (1955). An early enthusiast for aviation, he was killed in an airplane accident while flying in Alaska with the noted aviator Wiley Post.

Rojas, Fernando de. See Celestina, La.

Rojas Zorrilla, Francisco de (1607–1648). Spanish dramatist. A native of Toledo and a member of the order of Santiago, Rojas was strongly influenced by Calderón. His finest play, Del rey abajo ninguno or García del Castañar, deals with a peasant who mistakenly believes that the king has violated his honor; despite some gongorist traits, the drama is vigorous and direct. Rojas also wrote the amusing Entre bobos anda el juego and Cada cual lo que le toca, notable for its unconventional approach to feminine honor. His plots were borrowed by French dramatists such as Corneille, Lesage, and Scarron.

Rokesmith, John. See Our Mutual Friend.

Roland or Orlando. The most famous of Charlemagne's paladins in medieval romances. His story grew up around the name of Frisialand of Brittany, historical leader of Charlemagne's rear guard in the defeat at Roncesvalles. Tradition makes Roland the nephew of Charlemagne, his mother being the king's sister. He is the most perfect type of the devotedly loyal and courageous knight who sacrifices himself in service to his king. He is apt to be too trusting and unsuspicious in his dealings with others, too impetuous and determined in his decisions. These tendencies, however, are not treated as flaws, but as the necessary attributes of his pride and his admirably frank, straightforward nature. His close friend Olivier is thus his complement, being cooler and wiser in his advice.

Roland's story seems to have entered the tradition of French ballads by the 9th century and is said to have been sung by Taillefer in 1066. The Chanson de Roland (Song of Roland) is a French CHANSON DE GESTE probably written in the middle of the 11th century in Brittany. It has 4002 decasyllabic lines using assonance rather than rhyme, divided into lays or stanzas of unequal length. As the Chanson tells the story, Charlemagne has, in seven years of fighting, conquered all of Spain except Saragossa. The Saracen leader Marsile asks for a meeting to discuss a settlement in exchange for Charlemagne's departure from Spain. Roland warns of a trap, but the king accepts Ganelon's advice to send a messenger to Marsile at Saragossa. Roland then successfully urges that Ganelon be the messenger. The angry Ganelon goes, but decides to accept Marsile's bribes and betray Roland. He has Roland appointed commander of the rear guard and informs Marsile of the planned route through the pass of Roncesvalles. Accordingly, Roland's 20,000 men are ambushed by 400,000 Saracens. Olivier begs Roland to sound his ivory horn and recall the main body of the army, but Roland refuses. The valorous deeds of the 12 PALADINS during this unequal contest occupy much of the poem. When only 60 men are still alive, Roland finally sounds his horn, at the third blast cracking it and bursting the veins of his own neck; but it is too late to save anyone. Roland and Olivier exchange farewells and are blessed by the Archbishop Turpin; all are dead on the arrival of Charlemagne and his army, who then avenge the dead by defeating the Saracens. Aude, the sister of Olivier and the betrothed of Roland, dies upon learning of the disaster. Ganelon is found guilty and punished by quartering. There are many episodes involving Roland that do not appear in the Chanson, but in other chansons de geste; fights with giants, various accounts of how he acquired his sword Durander, and his horn Olibant, and the like. Two important 12th-century Latin versions of the Roland story are the Chanson de Charlemagne, erroneously attributed to the Archbishop Turpin, and the anonymous poem De Priditione Guenonis ("Ganelon's betrayal"). Roland became known in Italian minstrelsy as...
Orlando, and by the 15th and 16th centuries his loves and his adventures against the Saracens, along with those of the other paladins, had been thoroughly reshaped in Pulci's Morgante Maggiore, Boiardo's Orlando Innamorato, and Ariosto's Orlando Furioso.

Roland, Jeanne Manon Philpon. Known as Madame Roland (1754–1793). Famous character in the French Revolution. Her house was the intellectual center of the Girondists. She was guillotined in 1793; according to tradition, her last words on the scaffold were, "Oh liberty! What crimes are committed in thy name!"

Rolfe, Frederick [William Serafino Austin Lewis Mary]. Pen name, Baron Corvo (1860–1913). English novelist and historian. He was a versatile, eccentric, learned and witty man and writer. Related to the group of decadents of the 1890’s, Rolfe claimed that he had received the title Baron Corvo as a gift. Converted to Catholicism, he tried unsuccessfully to become a priest. His novel Hadrian the Seventh (1904) is a kind of wish-fulfilment compensation for his failure, and a revenge on his enemies. The Desire and Pursuit of the Whole (published posthumously in 1934) is another novel full of personal attacks. Stories Toto Told Me (1898) are retellings of legends of Catholic saints. Chronicles of the House of Borgia, In His Own Image (1901) is an unusual historical work. See A. J. A. Symons.

Rolland, Romain (1866–1944). French novelist, dramatist, essayist, and musicologist. Increasingly disturbed by the materialism of contemporary civilization, in 1889 Rolland began to write his long novel series Jean Christophe, a satirical criticism of the world he saw about him. A letter from Tolstoi and his friendship with Malwida von Meysembourg, who had known both Wagner and Nietzsche, greatly influenced his spiritual development. He evolved his own philosophy, a faith in humanity based on a pantheistic religion. An active participant in the Dreyfus case, Rolland collaborated with another Dreyfus sympathizer, Charles Péguy, on the semi-monthly review Cahiers de la quinzaine. He advocated a new form of drama built on the traditions of French history, and wrote twenty plays himself on the theme of revolutionary heroism. The Wolves (Les Loups; 1898), Danton (1900), The Fourteenth of July (Le Quatorze juillet; 1902) and Robespierre (1938) are based on the French revolution. A professor of music at the Sorbonne from 1900 to 1912, Rolland published several works on music: Histoire de l'opéra en Europe avant Lully et Scarlatti (1895), Musiciens d'autrefois and Musiciens d'aujourd'hui (1908). During World War I he wrote, from his place of retirement in Switzerland, Above the Battle (Au-dessus de la Mêlée; 1915), an influential essay of pacifist protest. The Soul Enchanted (L'Amé enchantée; 7 vols., 1922–1933) is a second novel series with a woman as its central character. In 1916 Rolland received the Nobel prize for literature.

Rolle of Hampole, Richard (c. 1290–1349). English hermit and mystic. He wrote about the soul’s approach to the mystical state through Purgation of worldliness, Illumination through meditation and prayer, and finally joyful Contemplation of the presence of God: Incendium Amoris (The Fire of Love) and Emendatio Vitae (The Mending of Life) in Latin; paraphrases of the Psalms, with commentaries, and The Form of Living in English. He became spiritual adviser to several other recluses and had great influence in the 14th century with his emphasis on individual spiritual experience rather than the forms of religion. However, he was best known for the Prick of Conscience, which he probably did not write.

Rolling Stone, The. The name that O. Henry gave to the magazine that he purchased and published from 1894 to 1895 in Austin, Tex. In 1913 his estate published a collection of stories, poems, and sketches called Rolling Stone, which included some pieces from the magazine.

Rollo Books. A once popular series of books for children by Jacob Abbott (1803–1879). The Lucy, Jonas, and Franconia books were by the same author. They told of simple adventures in a New England town and countryside and were packed with information and a fair amount of morals.

Rollo the Ganger or Walker (c. 860–c. 931). A leader of the Vikings. After conquering the area around Rouen in France, he received the territory by a treaty with Charles the Simple (c. 912), thus founding the Duchy of Normandy.

Rolvaag, Ole Edvard (1876–1931). Norwegian-born American novelist. He is known for his dramatic and realistic accounts of the life of Norwegian pioneers in the Dakotas, marked particularly by psychological studies of the characters. Rolvaag emigrated to America in 1896, attended, and later taught at, St. Olaf's College in Minnesota. Letters from America (1912) is an autobiographical novel cast in the form of letters written to relatives in Norway. Like all his novels, it was written in Norwegian and later translated into English. His best-known work is the trilogy that consists of Giants in the Earth, Peder Victorious (1929), and Their Father's God (1931). The Boat of Longing (1933), inspired by the death of his youngest child, contrasts the scenery of Norway with the sordidness of the American city.

Rouault, Jules. Pen name of Louis Farigoule (1885– ). French novelist, dramatist, essayist, and poet. Rouault was a leading exponent of Unanimism, in early poetry such as La Vie unanime (1908) and in novels such as The Death of a Nobody (1911) and The Boys in the Back Room (Les Copains; 1913). Raising the group to the status of divinity (Manuel de déification; 1910), he celebrated the soul of the city in the prose poems Puissances de Paris (1911) and the verse plays L'Armée dans la ville (1911) and Cromedeyre-le-Viel (1920). In the 1920's he wrote a number of popular comedies, such as Doctor Knock (1923). The 27 novels of the cycle Men of Good Will (Les Hommes de bonne volonté; 1932–1947) present frescoes of modern French life between 1908 and 1933 in cities, armies, etc.

roman à clef. Literally, a novel with a key, or secret meaning. Such a work of fiction contains one or more characters and situations based upon actual persons and their lives. Often such novels skirt dangerously close to infringement of the libel laws. Contemporary novels that might be mentioned are Point Counter Point, by Aldous Huxley, and The Mandarins, by Simone de Beauvoir. See also La Calprenède; Scudéry.
romance. In medieval literature, a verse narrative (originally written in Old French or Provençal, which were "Romance" languages) recounting the marvelous adventures of a hero of chivalry. Such medieval romances fall into three main cycles: the Arthurian, based upon the life of King Arthur and his Knights of the Round Table; those retelling the life and deeds of Charlemagne and his most celebrated paladin, Roland; and those devoted to the exploits of Alexander the Great. Romances were written in English and German as well as in French; the vast majority of them were connected with one of these cycles, but German romances in particular drew upon Scandinavian and other sources as well.

In modern literature, i.e., from the latter part of the 18th century through the 19th, the term denotes a work of prose fiction in which the scenes and incidents are more or less removed from common life and are surrounded by a halo of mystery, an atmosphere of strangeness and adventure. The Gothic novels, such as Horace Walpole's Castle of Otranto (1764), are typical English romances.

In linguistics, the term is applied to languages developed from Latin, including Spanish, Portuguese, French, Italian, Romanian, and Provençal. English is made up of both Romance and Germanic elements, with a small Celtic element as well.

Romance (1913). A play by Edward Sheldon. One of the first plays to employ the flashback as a stage technique, it is the story of a young man who comes to tell his grandfather, a clergyman, of his intention to marry an actress. The grandfather unsuccessfully attempts to dissuade him by relating the great romance of his youth when he fell in love with an Italian opera singer.

Romance of the Rose (Roman de la Rose; 13th century). A medieval French poem in two parts. The first 4000 lines were written by Guillaume de Lorris about 1230 and form an allegory of the Art of Love modeled on Ovid's. The Lover is conducted by Idleness to a garden of roses where he meets such characters as Pleasure, Riches, and Sweet-Looks. He is attracted to one particular rosebush and tries to pluck it, but the god of love (Cupid) stops him with an arrow and explains to him the sufferings required by the code of courtly love. Resolved to return to his Rose, the Lover is encouraged by Welcome but obstructed by Danger, Shame, and Slander. Reason urges him to abandon the attempt, but Pity and Venus finally help him attain a kiss. Thereupon Slander rouses Jealousy, who builds a wall around the Rose and imprisons Welcome, leaving the Lover to grieve.

The continuation of over 18,000 lines was written by Jean de Meung about 1275. Hypocrisy overcomes Slander; Nature allows the fire of Venus to drive away Danger, Shame, and Fear, and the Lover wins his Rose. The events of the story, however, are subordinated in this section to the long digressions in which the author flauts the extent of his learning with a number of quotations. Here the main point is a series of satires from the bourgeois point of view: against the holders of political and economic power, against the friars, against popular superstitions, against women, and particularly against the artificial glorification of women in the aristocratic tradition of courtly love that had originally inspired Guillaume de Lorris' poem. Instead, Jean de Meung glorifies Nature, asserting that only the natural is good, whether in matters of love or of social institutions.

The Romance of the Rose attributed to Chaucer is a translation, with additions, of the Guillaume de Lorris section and about one sixth of the Jean de Meung section. However, this is probably a 15th-century version of which only the first 1700 lines are actually Chaucer's.

Roman Empire, rulers of. The Empire was inaugurated 27 B.C., when Octavius received from the Senate the title "Augustus." He had been actual ruler since 31 B.C. when the Second Triumvirate was dissolved after the battle of Actium. The Republican constitution remained in force, but only formally; Augustus gradually assumed the titles of all the major offices. His reign is sometimes called the principate, from princeps (first citizen), the title he favored.

Romano, Giulio. Real name, Giulio Pippi (1492–1546). Italian painter and architect. Although he is remembered primarily as the pupil and imitator of Raphael, whom he assisted in many works, he produced on his own such paintings as the Moscow Lady at Her Toilet and such buildings as the Palazzo del Te at Mantua. While serving as artist-in-chief to Federigo Gonzaga, duke of Mantua, he also erected his own house in that city, a sturdily specimen of mannerist architecture. In his own day, he enjoyed fame of another kind because of a series of 16 lascivious engravings for which Arezzo supplied appropriate sonnets. For this work both artists were censured, and their joint effort suppressed.

Romanov or Romanoff. The last Russian royal house. The Romanovs were descended from Andrey Romanov (14th century). The first Romanov czar was Mikhail who was elected by a conference of nobles (boyars) in 1613. The direct male line ended with Peter II in 1730 and the direct female line in 1762 with Elizabeth. Peter III who succeeded Elizabeth was her nephew, his wife (Catherine the Great) was a German princess. The dynasty ended in July 1918 when Nicholas II, his wife and children were executed by the revolutionaries.

Romans, The Epistle of Paul the Apostle to the. A book of the New Testament. It is a long letter written by Paul in A.D. 56 to the Christians in Rome. It is sometimes called the "Gospel of Saint Paul," being his most profound exposition of the nature of Christianity. In this letter is the core of Pauline thought: Christianity is a religion for the whole world, having its roots in the older prophetic religion of the Jews.

Romantic Comedians, The (1926). A novel by Ellen Glasgow. Like the author's They Stooped to Folly, this novel is an ironic comedy of manners. The elderly Judge Honeywell, who belongs to the generation before World War I, marries 18-year-old Annabel Upchurch. The juxtaposition in age, manners, and values produces a rich comedy, told by Miss Glasgow with wit and compassion. Eventually Annabel runs away with Dabney Birdsong, leaving the judge looking longingly at the young nurse sent to take care of him.

romanticism. A term applied to the movement in European literature and the other arts that began toward the end of the 18th century. In emphasizing the imagination and emotions over reason and intellect, the movement was a reaction against neoclassicism.

The rise of romanticism was so gradual and it exhibited so many phases, some of them paradoxical, that a definition is nearly impossible. Broadly, romanticism might be said to involve the following characteristics: individualism; nature-worship; primitivism; an interest in medieval, Oriental, and vanished or alien cultures in general; philosophic idealism; a paradoxical tendency toward both free thought and religious mysticism; revolt against political authority and social convention; exaltation of physical passion; the cultivation of emotion and sensation for their own sakes; and a persistent attraction to the supernatural, the morbid, the melancholy, and the cruel.

father of romanticism, although its first manifestation as an organized movement appeared in Germany in the work of Schiller, Goethe, Novalis, Kleist, and Tieck, all early romantic leaders there, and especially in the idealist philosophies of Kant, Fichte, Schelling, and Hegel. Scattered English forerunners of romanticism in the later 18th century were Gray, Collins, Cowper, Burns, Chatterton, Blake, and the Gothic novel. The movement was given impetus with the publication of Percy’s Reliques and Macpherson’s Ossian, and was powerfully stimulated by the French Revolution. English romanticism flowered (1789-1832) in the work of Wordsworth, Coleridge, Shelley, Byron, Keats, Southey, Campbell, Moore, Leigh Hunt, Hood, Beddoes, Scott, Lamb, Hazlitt, De Quincey, and Landor.

1. Francis Mme de Staël and Chateaubriand were forerunners of romanticism after Rousseau, but there was no definite movement there until about 1820, lasting until about 1843. The chief influences in French romanticism were German and English and the literary outstanding representatives were Lamartine, Nodier, Béranger, Hugo, Musset, Vigny, Gautier, George Sand, Dumas père, Stendhal, Sainte-Beuve, and Mérimée. In the U.S., romanticism developed at a later date than in Europe, and was less well defined, exhibiting modifications from the peculiar nature of American culture of the time with a strong emphasis on humanitarianism and reform. Foreign influences were chiefly German idealism, Rousseauistic nature worship, the Gothic novel, and the historical romance and pseudo-popular ballad of Scott. Among American romantic writers were Charles Brockden Brown, Cooper, Irving, Simms, Bryant, Poe, Emerson, Thoreau, Very, Hawthorne, Melville, Longfellow, Whitman, Lowell, and Whitman. Transcendentalism (c. 1830-1861) is regarded as the clearest example of romanticism in the U.S.

Among the arts other than literature, romanticism is exemplified by Beethoven, Berlioz, Schubert, Mendelssohn, and Schumann in music, and by Delacroix, Ingres, Corot, and Millet in painting.

The romantic movement was arrested in its development in England after 1832, with only a brief revival under the pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood, and in the U.S. it was rapidly absorbed by native tendencies and other influences. In Germany, however, it persisted, continuing especially in the philosophies of Schopenhauer and Nietzsche, in the music dramas of Wagner, in the fiction of Mann, and in the poetry of Stefan George and Rilke. In France dominant romantic characteristics were developed by Baudelaire and through him passed to the Decadents, the Symbolists and, ultimately, the surrealists. See GERMAN ROMANTICISM.

Romany. A gypsy; or the gypsy language, the speech of the Roma or Zinelli. The word is from Gypsy rom, a man, or husband. A Roma ny rye, one who enters into the gypsy spirit, learns their language, and lives with them as one of themselves. Rye is gypsy for gentleman.

romanzo (romance). Italian term for the genre of the romantic epic. In Italy this took the form of a long poem in ottava rima dealing with the chivalric adventures and romantic loves of the knights of Charlemagne and of King Arthur. Sung on the streets by minstrels as well as written in the study by learned poets, the romanzi reached their artistic peak in the work of Boiardo and Ariosto, who wrote on the Orlando theme. Tasso’s Gerusalemme liberata is an attempt at a stricter emulation of the classical epics of Homer and Vergil, but in its variety of characters and incidents, its interweaving of plots, and its reliance on the marvelous and the magical, make it the last of the Italian Renaissance romanzo. Mock romanzi that poked fun at the absurdities of the genre, especially the Morgante Maggiore of Pulci, also appeared during the period. In the same vein, the Gargantua and Pantagruel of Rabelais and the Don Guixote of Cervantes utilize the ingredients of the popular romantic epics in a satiric manner. In England, the chief influence of the romanze can be seen in Spenser’s Faerie Queene.

Romantque of the Rose. See ROMANCE OF THE ROSE.

Rome. Known as the Eternal City. A city in central Italy, the capital of the Republic of Italy. In ancient times Rome was the capital and center of the Roman Empire. It then became, through Peter the first bishop of Rome, the home of the pope and the capital of early Christendom. Today the pope lives in the VATICAN City, which is wholly within the city’s precincts, and Rome remains the center of the Roman Catholic religion.

Traditionally the city was founded by ROMULUS in 753 B.C. By 265 B.C. Rome controlled the entire Italian peninsula, having subjugated all the neighboring tribes. Victory in the three Punic Wars with Carthage (264-241, 218-202, 149-146 B.C.) gave Rome domination of the Mediterranean and made her the most powerful state in the ancient world.

As a republic (753-31 B.C.), Rome had flourished. Under the dictatorship of Julius CAESAR and later under the emperors AUGUSTUS, TRAJAN, and HADRIAN, Rome became the capital of an empire that included virtually all the known world.

From the early days of the empire, various emperors had contemplated moving the capital from republican-minded Rome to an eastern city. In AD. 330, CONSTANTINE THE GREAT moved the seat of empire to Byzantium on the Bosphorus, renaming it Constantinople. The Visigoths sacked Rome in 410. The city was repeatedly pillaged by barbarian tribes until JUSTINIAN I restored imperial power (536).

During this period the popes (as bishops of Rome) began to assume temporal power over the city. In 756 the Frankish king Pepin donated Rome to Pope Adrian I.

Medieval Rome was a dingy, mud-filled city with animals grazing in the Imperial Forum. The population shrank as low as 2,000 people. Even the papacy moved to France (1309-1377).

A new period of splendor began in the 15th century under the Renaissance popes. New churches and public buildings were erected, often using material from the ruinous buildings of Imperial Rome that littered the city. Rome was sacked again in 1527 by the soldiers of Charles V, but this only temporarily halted the rebuilding. The modern city is still dominated by the lavish baroque and rococo churches and palaces built in the 16th, 17th, and 18th centuries.

The popes lost sovereignty of the city in 1870, when Rome became the capital of the united nation of Italy. A symbolic temporal power was restored to the popes in 1929, with the creation of the Vatican City as an independent state.

Rome's outstanding feature as a city is the fact that its history as a center of political and religious importance is unparalleled in duration. This is visually evident in its abundance of historic architecture. Roman buildings from the classical age can be seen standing between a Renaissance church and a modern apartment house.

Rome, sack of. In 1527 the imperial armies of Charles V, inspired by the zeal of Protestant mercenaries from the northern countries, destroyed and pillaged the holy city. Pope Clement VII took refuge in the Castel Sant'Angelo and later fled the city.

Rome: when in Rome, do as Rome does. Conform to the manners and customs of those among whom you live. St. Monica and her son St. Augustine said to St. Ambrose: "At Rome they fast on Saturday, but not so at Milan; which practice ought to be observed?" To which St. Ambrose replied, "When I am at Milan, I do as they do at Milan; but when I go to Rome, I do as Rome does!"

Rome-Berlin Axis. In World War II, the alliance between Germany and Italy, created in 1936. Both countries later signed agreements with Japan.

Romeo and Juliet (c. 1596). A tragedy by William Shakespeare. Romeo, the young heir of the Montagues, attends the great ball of the Capulets in disguise and falls in love with Juliet, the daughter of the house. (See Capulet and Montague.) Because of the deadly feud between the Montagues and Capulets, the lovers are married secretly in the cell of Friar Laurence. During a street brawl Romeo's friend Mercutio is killed by Juliet's cousin Tybalt. Enraged by his friend's death, Romeo kills Tybalt and is banished from Verona. In desperation Juliet, who is about to be married to Paris against her will, takes a sleeping potion given her by the friar to bring on a semblance of death. Romeo, hearing of her death before the friar's explanation reaches him, returns and drinks poison at Juliet's tomb. When she wakes up a few moments later to find him dead, she stabs herself. Realizing that their hatred has caused the tragedy, the two houses make a tardy, sorrowful peace.

Sentimental, romantic, and given to poetic expression of his love, Romeo is typical of the youthful Elizabethan swain. His best-known speech occurs in the famous balcony scene with Juliet:

But, soft! what light through yonder window breaks? It is the east, and Juliet is the sun! Arise, fair sun, and kill the envious moon, Who is already sick and pale with grief, That thou her maid art far more fair than she.

The first written version of the story of the ill-fated lovers appears in the Novellino (1476) of Muscchio Sierriutano. The story was retold in Arthur Brooke's poetic Tragic History of Romeus and Juliet (1562) and in William Paynter's Palace of Pleasure (1567). Shakespeare most closely follows Brooke's version.

Gounod wrote an opera, Roméo et Juliette (1867), based on the Shakespearean plot, and Jean Anouilh has written a bitter and very realistic version of the story in his Roméo and Jeanette.

Romero, Pedro. A young bullfighter in Ernest Hemingway's novel The Sun Also Rises. Admired by the other characters for his style and courage, he has a short-lived affair with Lady Brett Ashley.

Rommel, Erwin (1881-1944). Commander of German forces in North Africa during World War II. He was involved in an attempt to assassinate Hitler in 1944.

Romola (1863). A historical novel by George Eliot. After her marriage to the hedonistic Tito Melema, Romola, a young Florentine woman, comes under the influence of Savonarola; she finds peace through faith and dedication.

Romulus. Legendary and eponymous founder of Rome (753 B.C.) and its 1st king (753-716 B.C.). Descendants of Aeneas, Romulus and his twin, Remus, were sons of Mars and Rhea Silvia; Numitor, Rhea's father and king, was ousted by his brother Amulius who made Rhea a vestal virgin. Accordingly, when she gave birth, she was put to death and her two babies were thrown into the Tiber. They were washed ashore, suckled by a she-wolf, and found by a herdsman and his wife who brought them up. They were eventually recognized and overthrew Amulius, restoring Numitor as king. They then set about to found a city; they quarreled over the site for the city, and Romulus killed his brother in anger.
Romulus's settlement prospered, but there were no women, so he invited the Sabines for a festival. During the celebrations, the young Romans seized the Sabine women and drove off the men. The ensuing war was settled by making Sabines and Romans equal in the new settlement. Romulus ruled wisely for 37 years. When he died, Jupiter permitted Mars to come down and take Romulus off to the heavens in his chariot. Romulus was thereafter worshiped as a god among the Romans under the name Quirinus.

The rear guard of Charlemagne's army, returning from a campaign in Spain, was ambushed and badly defeated there in 778 by Basque mountaineers. In medieval romances such as the Chanson de Roland, however, the ambush is attributed to the treachery of one of Charlemagne's knights, the Basques become an army of 400,000 Muslims, and the defeat of the rear guard is followed by the return of Charlemagne's main army and the retaliatory defeat of the Muslim Saracens, to the glory of Christendom.

Ronde, La (Reigen; 1500). A play by Arthur Schnitzler. It consists of 10 scenes in which 10 different couples prepare for the sexual act. The scenes all interlock with one another—thus, for example, after a scene between a young girl and a married man comes a scene between the man and his wife, and then a scene between the wife and her lover—and the whole play forms a circle beginning and ending with a prostitute. This circular form symbolizes the unending frenetic quality of human erotic behavior; but the play contains frequent touches of sophisticated comedy, and its mood is not one of despair.

Rondeau. A lyric poem of 15 lines, in three stanzas of uneven length. The rondeau is characterized by a refrain, at the end of the second and third stanzas, made up of a fragment taken from the first line of the first stanza; the fragment may consist of a phrase, a clause, or as little as a single word. The rondeau form arose in France and its rules were enunciated in the 15th century. The rhyme scheme is: a-b-b-a, a-b-a-R, a-b-b-b-a, the R being the refrain. The following is an example:

In after days when grasses high
O'ertop the stone where I shall lie,
Though ill or well the world adjust
My slender claim to honoured dust,
I shall not question or reply.

I shall not see the morning sky;
I shall not hear the night wind sigh;
I shall be mute, as all men must
In after days!

But yet, now living, fain were I
That some one then should testify,
Saying—He held his pen in trust
To art, not serving shame or lust.
Will none?—Then let my memory die
In after days!

Austin Dobson, In After Days

See rondeau, roundel, Chaucerian roundel.

Rondel. A verse form containing fourteen lines and two rhymes. The rondel arose in France in the 14th century, was written in English as early as the 15th century, and revived in the 19th. A two-line refrain is repeated in the rondel three times in its entirety. The rhyme scheme is A-B-b-a-a-b-A-b-b-a-A-B, or sometimes A-B-b-a-a-b-A-b-a-b-a-b-A-B. (A-B represents the refrain). There is also a rondel form of thirteen lines which omits either one of the last two refrain lines. The following example has thirteen lines:

Love comes back to his vacant dwelling,—
The old, old love that we knew of yore!
We see him stand by the open door,
With his great eyes sad and his bosom swelling.

He makes as though in our arms repelling,
He faint would lie as he lay before.—
Love comes back to his vacant dwelling,
The old, old love that we knew of yore!

Ah, who shall help us from over-spelling
That sweet, forgotten, forbidden lore!
E'en as we doubt in our heart once more,
With a rush of tears to our eyelids welling.
Love comes back to his vacant dwelling.

Austin Dobson, The Wanderer

Ronsard, Pierre de (1524?–1585). French poet and leader of the Pléiade. He was destined by his father for a diplomatic career, but after spending four years as a page in the service of Francis I, he was struck by deafness and turned to humanistic studies and poetry. Inspired by the teaching of Jean Dorat at the Collège de Coqueret in Paris, Ronsard and his fellow-students Joachim Du Bellay and Jean Antoine de Baïf conceived a new program for French poetry, which Du Bellay elaborated in the Défense et Illustration de la Langue Française.

The succession of Ronsard's works testifies to his steady development and great versatility. Although his Odes (1550) were closely modeled after the work of Horace and Pindar, the Amours de Cassandre (1552), a collection of Petrarchan sonnets published with musical accompaniment, was characterized by the light, graceful style for which he is best known. The Folâtries (1553), Mélanges (1555), Odes (1555), and Amours de Marie (1555) are simple, sensual love poems which celebrate rustic pleasures and evoke the gentle atmosphere of Ronsard's native countryside. In the Hymnes (1555) he expressed his awed before the mysteries of the universe. With the outbreak of the religious wars, Ronsard the patriot produced the Discours des Misères de ce Temps (1562) and other political works that at first were conciliatory but became increasingly hostile to the Huguenots. He made an unsuccessful attempt at epic poetry with La Franciade (1572). His last and perhaps best collection of love poetry, Sonnets pour Hélène (1578), was written in the prevailing platonic style and betrayed the profound melancholy which dominated Ronsard as he saw death approaching.

Although widely acknowledged throughout Europe as the "Prince of poets," Ronsard, mindful of posterity's verdict, never cease polishing and perfecting his work. After his death, his reputation suffered an eclipse until he was re-discovered by the 19th-century Romantics.

Room at the Top (1957). A best-selling novel by John Braine. It is the story of a young man's struggle to rise in his job and marry his boss's daughter—at the cost of his mistress's life.
Room of One's Own, A (1929). A feminist essay by Virginia Woolf on the status of women and the difficulties of a woman artist. See Orlando.

Room with a View, A (1908). A novel by E. M. Forster. It is set mostly in Italy, a country which represents for the author the forces of true passion. The heroine, upper-middle-class Lucy Honeychurch, is visiting Italy with a friend. When she regrets that her hotel room has no view, lower-middle-class Mr. Emerson offers the friends his own room and that of his son. Among Lucy's experiences are a street murder at her feet, from which George Emerson rescues her, and getting lost at a picnic, at which George kisses her. On her return to England she becomes engaged to a shallow, conventional young man of her own class. But when she meets George again, she overcomes her own prejudice and marries him.

Roosevelt, [Anna] Eleanor (1884–1962). American humanitarian and wife of President Franklin D. Roosevelt. She married Roosevelt, who was a distant cousin, in 1905, and, after his election to the presidency, became the most active first lady in American history; she engaged in social welfare work, took part in Democratic politics, served as assistant director of the Office of Civilian Defense (1941–1942), and conducted a newspaper column, My Day. After her husband's death, she was chairman of the Commission on Human Rights of the UN Economic and Social Council and represented the U.S. in the UN General Assembly from 1949 to 1952. In her last years, she was a leader in New York City reform politics. Her books include This Is My Story (1937), My Days (1938), This I Remember (1948), and On My Own (1958).

Roosevelt, Franklin Delano (1882–1945). 32nd president of the U.S. (1933–1945). Roosevelt was a fifth cousin of Theodore Roosevelt, who was also his uncle. Educated at Groton and at Harvard University, he attended Columbia University Law School and married Eleanor Roosevelt in 1905. After his admission to the bar, he entered politics in 1910 as the leader of a group of insurgents against Tammany Hall in New York and won election to the state legislature. He supported Woodrow Wilson in 1912 and in 1913 was made an assistant secretary of the navy under Josephus Daniels. In 1920 he was nominated as the vice-presidential candidate on the Democratic ticket with James M. Cox and battled eloquently for the League of Nations. In August, 1921, he was stricken with poliomyelitis; he went to Warm Springs, Ga., to take the cure but, although his condition was somewhat improved, he remained a cripple for the rest of his life. He later established a foundation at Warm Springs to aid other victims of the disease.

After serving two terms as governor of New York, he ran for the presidency in 1932, defeating Herbert Hoover. Declaring in his first inaugural address that "the only thing we have to fear is fear itself," he dedicated his first administration to a New Deal that would alleviate the economic distress caused by the depression of 1929. In 1938, he defeated Alfred Landon of Kansas to win reelection by a landslide, losing the electoral votes of only Maine and Vermont. Domestic matters occupied much of Roosevelt's second administration, during which he lost his fight to enlarge the Supreme Court, but the worsening situation in Europe brought a new concern with foreign affairs as the president sought to sway public opinion in favor of international cooperation against aggressor nations, a policy that was bitterly attacked by isolationists.

Roosevelt defied a long-standing tradition in 1940 when he decided to run for a third term, defeating Wendell Willkie. Soon after his inauguration, he secured enactment of the Lend-Lease Act to aid Great Britain and met with Winston Churchill to frame the Atlantic Charter, a statement of Anglo-American aims for the future. When the U.S. entered World War II after the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor on Dec. 7, 1941, which Roosevelt described as "a day which will live in infamy," he directed American mobilization and acted to ensure hemispheric solidarity; in 1944 he won an unprecedented fourth term by defeating Thomas E. Dewey. At the Casablanca conference (1943), Roosevelt and Churchill announced that the war would continue until the enemy surrendered unconditionally; at the Yalta meeting (1945) with Premier Stalin, several concessions were made to the Soviet Union in exchange for her entry into the war against Japan. Two months later Roosevelt was dead of a cerebral hemorrhage.

One of the most colorful and controversial presidents in American history, Roosevelt greatly expanded the scope of the federal government, particularly in the field of social and economic legislation. His enemies, however, accused him of dictatorial tendencies and denounced his encroachments on private enterprise. His extraordinary gift for communication was best shown in his press conferences, of which transcripts were always made, and in his famous radio "fireside chats."

Roosevelt's writings include Looking Forward (1933) and On Our Way (1934). Samuel I. Rosenman edited his Papers and Addresses from 1928 to 1945. Playwright Robert E. Sherwood, who was one of Roosevelt's speech writers, wrote about the president in Roosevelt and Hopkins (1948). FDR's early struggles against polio are described in Dore Schary's drama Sunrise at Campobello (1959).

Roosevelt, Theodore (1858–1919). 26th president of the U.S. (1901–1909). After his graduation from Harvard, Roosevelt turned to writing history, in which he was intensely interested all his life. His first book was The Naval War of 1812 (1882). Then he entered politics and served from 1882 to 1884 as a Republican member of the New York legislature. When his first wife, Alice Lee, and his mother died within a few hours of each other, the grief-stricken Roosevelt went to the Dakota Territory where he ranched and won the approval of the local residents. In 1886 he married Edith Carow.

Returning to politics, Roosevelt served as a member of the U.S. Civil Service Commission and as police commissioner of New York City, displaying in these posts the vigor and determination that were his hallmarks. At the same time he was writing his four-volume Winning of the West (1899–1899), an account of U.S. expansion after the Revolution.

He was assistant secretary of the navy in 1898 when the Spanish-American War broke out and he resigned to form the Rough Riders, a volunteer cavalry group that was to become famous for its charge up San Juan Hill in Cuba. After Roosevelt had been elected governor of New York in 1898, Republican Party bosses who feared his independence and liberal views secured his nomination as William McKinley's running mate in 1900, only to see him become president upon McKinley's death in 1901. As chief executive, Roosevelt gained a reputation as a "trust-buster," particularly for his dissolution of the Northern Securities Co. (1902); he encouraged conservation of national resources and secured the passage of the Pure Food and Drug Act (1906) and the Hepburn Act (1906) to ensure stricter regulation of the railroads.

An advocate of a venturesome foreign policy, he effected the construction of the Panama Canal, won the Nobel Peace Prize for his successful intervention in the Russo-Japanese War (1905), and dispatched the U.S. Fleet on a round-the-world tour (1907–1909). His motto was "Speak softly and carry a big stick."

After the inauguration of his "lieutenant," William Howard Taft in 1909, Roosevelt traveled in Africa and Europe and returned to find a growing split between Republican conservatives and progressives. Breaking with Taft and unable to win the Republican nomination in 1912, he organized the "Bull Moose" Party, ran against both Taft and Woodrow Wilson, and took enough votes away from Taft to ensure Wilson's election.

In 1914 he led an expedition to South America and explored Brazil's River of Doubt, which was renamed Rio Teocoro in his honor. Later, he favored U.S. entry into World War I on the side of the Allies and was deeply disappointed when President Wilson prevented him from raising a volunteer division. His son Quentin was killed in action; in World War II his sons Kermit and Theodore died in active service.

Roosevelt's other writings include The Strenuous Life: Essays and Addresses (1900), The New Nationalism (1910), and Theodore Roosevelt, An Autobiography (1913). See Upton Sinclair, Rootabaga Stories (1922). A book of children's stories by Carl Sandburg. Written in a style nearer poetry than prose, it is rich in the language and cadence of folk song. It was followed by Rootabaga Pigeons (1923).

Rosas, Juan Manuel de (1793–1877). Argentine dictator. Named governor of Buenos Aires province in 1829, Rosas controlled the entire country until 1852 when he was defeated at the battle of Caseros. This was a period of great intellectual ferment in Argentina, and many writers, usually from exile in Chile or Uruguay, produced literary works attacking the despotism and terror of the Rosas regime. Among these were Sarmiento's Facundo, Mármol's Amalia, and Echevarría's El Matadero.

Roscius. A first-rate actor; so called from Quintus Roscius (d. about 62 B.C.), the Roman actor, unrivaled in his grace of action, melody of voice, conception of character, and delivery.

Rose. A flower of many symbolic connotations. Medieval legend asserts that the first roses appeared miraculously at Bethlehem as the result of the prayers of a "fayre Mayden" who had been falsely accused and was sentenced to death by burning. The burning brands changed to roses and she was saved.

The rose has been a emblem of England since the time of the Wars of the Roses, a contest that lasted 30 years, in which 80 princes of the blood, a large portion of the English nobility, and some 100,000 common soldiers were slain. It was a struggle for the crown between the houses of York (the white rose) and Lancaster (the red). When the parties were united in the person of Henry VII, the united rose was taken as his device.

Rose and the Ring, The (1854). A burlesque fairy tale by William Makepeace Thackeray. The fun arises from the fact that the magic rose, which belongs to Prince Bulbo of Crim Tartary, and the magic ring worn by Prince Giglio of Patagonia make their possessors seem both lovely and lovable. So long as she is allowed to wear either the rose or the ring, the Princess Angelica, Giglio's cousin, who has been wrongfully put in his place by her father, appears the most charming of individuals, but the moment she is deprived of them, she becomes the most ill-tempered and ugly. Rosalba, the deposed princess of Crim Tartary, shares with Giglio the favor of the all-powerful Fairy Blackstick, and although at their christenings she gave them each a little misfortune, she stands by them in their difficulties and brings their affairs to a happy ending.

Rosenkavalier, Der (The Cavalier of the Rose, 1911). An opera composed by Richard Strauss to a libretto by Hugo von Hofmannsthal. It is a bit-sweet love story infused with much broad comedy, Viennese gaiety, and a certain nostalgia for the days of Vienna’s flowering that were already slipping into the past at the time of composition. The principal characters are Baron Ochs, in love with the merchant’s daughter Sophie Faninal; Princess von Werdenberg (known as the Marschallin); and her young admirer Octavian, who is also in love with Sophie. The young and jovial country baron loses Sophie to his young rival, and the Marschallin reconciles herself to being too old for love.

Rose Tattoo, The (1951). A play by Tennessee Williams. Set in a Sicilian community on the Gulf Coast, the play deals with Serafina Delle Rose, a passionate and warm-hearted dressmaker, whose truckdriver husband has just been killed. Serafina, unwilling to believe rumors of her husband’s infidelity, keeps his ashes in a marble urn in the house and remains a frustrated widow, until three years later she meets a younger truckdriver who, like her dead husband, has a rose tattoo on his chest. The play has a clownish humor usually lacking in Williams.

Rose Theatre. An Elizabthan playhouse. It was built in 1587 by Philip Henslowe and John Cholmley on the Bankside in Southwark. The Rose was occupied by the Lord Admiral’s Men, featuring the famous tragedian Edward Alleyn, and in 1591–1592 by the Lord Strange’s Men who later became Shakespeare’s company, the Lord Chamberlain’s Men.

Rosetta Stone. A stone found in 1799 by M. Boussard, a French officer of engineers, in an excavation made at Fort St. Julien, near Rosetta, in the Nile delta. It has an inscription in three different languages: the hieroglyphic, the demotic, and the Greek. It was erected in 195 B.C., to honor Ptolemy Epiphanes, because he remitted the dues of the sacerdotal body. The great value of this stone is that it furnished the French Egyptologist Jean François Champollion the key whereby he deciphered the Egyptian hieroglyphics.

Rossellini, Roberto (1906–). Italian motion-picture director and producer. He began his film career by working on a number of documentaries for the Mussolini regime. In 1944, while the Germans were preparing to evacuate Rome, Rossellini began to work on his famous film, Open City. In it he sought to re-create as closely as possible the heroic action of the resistance movement among the people of Rome; it became a crucial film in the development of the Italian neorealist movement in cinema. Rossellini’s next film, Paisan was also highly acclaimed. Among his subsequent films are Germany Year Zero (1947), The Miracle (1948), No Greater Love (1952), and The General of the Rovere (1960).

Rossetti, Christina Georgina (1830–1894). English poet of Italian parentage, sister of Dante Gabriel and William Michael Rossetti. She is known for her ballads and her mystical religious lyrics, marked by symbolism, vividness of detail, and intensity of feeling. Among her works are Goblin Market, and Other Poems (1862); The Prince’s Progress; Sing-Song (1872), a collection of verse for children; Annus Domini (1874); A Pageant (1891); Time Flies (1885), prose and verse; and The Face of the Deep (1905), an interpretation of the Apocalypse. The Convent Threshold (1862) is one of her best-known single works. Her first poems were published in The Germ, the Pre-Raphaelite publication, and she often modeled for painters in the Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood. After a serious illness in 1874 she was left an invalid and withdrew from the world, rarely receiving visitors or leaving her home.

Rossetti, Dante Gabriel. Full name, Gabriel Charles Dante Rossetti (1828–1882). English poet and painter of Italian parentage, brother of Christina and William Michael Rossetti. He was the driving force of the Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood. As a painter he had little formal training, revealed little technical ability, and is noted chiefly as a colorist. His best-known painting, Ecce Ancilla Domini (1850), is an emotive representation of the Annunciation.

His lyric poems are distinguished by richness and vividness of detail, mysticism and fantasy, and the frequent use of modified ballad form. His books of poetry include The Early Italian Poets (1861), translations of the lyrics of Dante, his contemporaries, and predecessors; Poems (1870), a collection that was at first buried in the cofﬁns of Elizabeth Siddal, Rossetti’s wife; and Ballads and Sonnets (1881). His best-known single works are The Blessed Damozel, Sister Helen, Troy Town, and The House of Life. He also made a number of translations from the Italian, German, and French, the most outstanding of which is The Ballad of Dead Ladies of François Villon.

Rossetti, William Michael (1829–1919). Art critic and author, brother of Dante Gabriel and Christina Rossetti. He was one of the original members of the PRE-RAPHAELITE BROTHERHOOD, serving as editor of The Germ. Rossini, Giacchino Antonio (1782–1868). The dominant Italian operatic composer of the early 19th century. His more than 40 serious and comic operas were all written between 1810 and 1829, after which he wrote little but the Stabat Mater (1842) and the Petite Messe solennelle (1864). He settled in Paris in 1824, and there ended his days, famous as a wit and as a host. His most important operas are The Barber of Seville, Otello, La Cenerentola (Cinderella, 1817), Sémiramis (1823), and William Tell (1829).

Rosso Fiorentino. Also known as Il Rosso. Real name, Giovanni Battista de' Rossi (1494–1540). Italian painter. A leading figure in the movement away from High Renaissance classicism towards manerism, he is best known as a painter for his Moses and the Daughters of Jethro and Deposition from the Cross. He was also one of the leading decorators imported from Italy by Francis I to paint Fontainebleau. The resulting "School of Fontainebleau" is regarded as a source of the later rococo style in France.

Rostand, Edmond (1849–1918). French poet and playwright. Cyrano de Bergerac (1897) is the most famous example of the poetic, romantic drama created by Rostand. A colorful and exciting portrait of the reign of Louis XIII, with an aspiring poet-lover for its hero, the play enjoyed tremendous popularity. The actress Sarah Bernhardt made famous the title roles of La Princesse Lointaine (1895), La Samaritaine (1897), and L'Aiglon (1900), the story of Napoleon's son. Chantecler (1910), an experimental play, has since won critical acclaim, but it was poorly received and put an end both to Rostand's meteoric rise to fame and to his dramatic career.

Rosten, Leo [Calvin]. Pen name, Leonard Q. Ross (1909– ). Polish-born American humorist, political scientist, and teacher. He is best known for *The Education of H*y*m*a*n K*a*p*l*a*n* (1937), a series of amusing sketches based on his experiences as a teacher of English to adult immigrants. Rostova, Natasha. The heroine of Count Leo Tolstoy's novel War and Peace. One of Tolstoy's greatest characterizations, Natasha matures in the course of the book from a charming but ingenuous girl into a woman of poise and devotion. Her tragic love affair with Prince Andrei Bolkonski takes much of the joy out of her life, but her eventual marriage to Pierre Bezukhov is a happy one.

Roswitha (also Hrotsvitha or Hrotsvitha) (c. 935–c. 1002). German poet, dramatist, historian. A nun in a Benedictine convent in Saxony, she was among the first to adapt classical drama to a Christian purpose: she wrote six prose comedies revealing an effective sense of theater, modeled on the Latin comedies of Terence but devoted to the lives of saints, especially virgins. She also wrote eight narrative poems on religious subjects and a poetic chronicle in epic style celebrating the career of Otto I.

Rota, Bernardino (1509–1575). Italian poet. He is known for his Petrarchan sonnets, Italian eclogues, and Latin epigrams and elegies, all widely admired and influential in his day. These were published in the Rime (verses) of 1572.

Rothschild. A family of internationally known German-Jewish financiers, whose banking house was established at Frankfurt-am-Main near the end of the 18th century.

Rotrou, Jean de (1609–1650). French playwright. One of Richelieu's cinQ auteurs, Rotrou wrote his first play, L'Hypochondriaque ou le mort amoureux (The Hypochondriac, or the Amorous Dead Man, 1628), when he was 19, but produced his best work in his later life, including the comedies Las Sosias and La Soeur (The Sister, 1648), the tragedies Saint Genast (1646) and Venceslas (1641), and the tragicomedy Don Bernard de Cabrère (1648). Often derived from Spanish and classical sources, Rotrou's plays marked an enormous stylistic advance over those of his predecessors and were the only dramatic works of their time considered to rival those of Corneille.

Roughead, William (1871–1958). French painter and printmaker. Apprenticed to a stained-glass maker, he retained in his work a vigorous black line that encircles bright spots of color. He has concentrated on the anguish of man's fate in figures of judges and clowns, and has poignantly pictured religious subjects.

Name given to the First Volunteer Cavalry serving in Cuba during the Spanish-American War, under Theodore Roosevelt and Leonard Wood. The Rough Riders distinguished themselves in their charge up San Juan Hill.

Rougon-Macquart, Les (1871-1893). A series of 20 novels by Émile Zola. Zola himself characterized the work as the natural and social history of a family under the Second Empire. This enormous work, exhaustive in its treatment of events, describes the world of the Rougon-Macquart family in minute detail. He depicts these human beings with brutal realism, sparing no detail of their sordid lives. The novels provided Zola with a laboratory in which he could experiment with his new naturalistic theories of fiction. A reformer at heart, Zola uses his naturalistic technique to dramatize the desperate need for social change. The thick volumes vary in their merit, but such works as L'Assommoir, La Débâcle, Nana, La Terre, and Germinal are still widely read. See NATURALISM.

Roundheads. English Puritans of the reign of Charles I, and later, especially Cromwell's soldiers. They were so called because they wore their hair cut short, while that of the Royalists or Cavaliers was worn long, covering their shoulders.

Round Table. The table, in Arthurian legend, fabled to have been made by Merlin at Carduel for Arthur's father Uther Pendragon. Uther gives it to King Leodegrance of Camilliard who in turn gives it to Arthur when Arthur marries Guinevere. To prevent any jealousy on the score of precedence, it was circular and seated 150 knights, with a place left in it for the Grail. The first reference to it is found in Wace's Roman de Brut (1155), but the fullest legendary details are from Malory's Morte d'Arthur (c. 1469).

Knights of the Round Table. According to Malory, there were 150 knights who had sieges (chairs) at the table. (See Sieges Parliès.) Among the best known of the knights of the Round Table are Launcelot, Tristram, Lameracke, the three bravest; Tor, the first made; Galahad, the chastest; Gwain, the courteous; Gareth, the big-handed; Palamedes, the Saracen or unbaptized; Kay, the rude and boastful; Mark, the dastard; and Mordred, the traitor.

A specialist in U.S. folklore and humor, she wrote the first article on Paul Bunyan to appear in an American magazine (New Republic, 1918), but her best-known work is American Humor: A Study of the National Character (1931), which Lewis Mumford called "the most original piece of research that has appeared in American cultural history." She also wrote Trumpets of Jubilee (1927), Daisy Crockett (1934), Audubon (1936), Charles Sheeler, Artist in the American Tradition (1938), and The Roots of American Culture and Other Essays (1942).

Rousseau, Henri (1844-1910). French primitive painter, known as Le Douanier (Fr., the customs-officer). A municipal toll employee, he retired in 1885 in order to paint and exhibited regularly thereafter. During these years he suffered from the ridicule and scorn of critics, although he gained the support of young writers and artists, particularly that of Guillaume Apollinaire. His is a simple world: he stiffly portrays his friends, sketches Paris and its surroundings, shares his enjoyment for the color of patriotic and military scenes, and also presents dreams of the jungle. These subjects are translated with a freshness and naïveté that reveal a rare sense for color and a unique sense of design.

Rousseau, Jean Jacques (1712-1778). Swiss-born French philosopher, author, political theorist, and composer. The son of a watchmaker, he set out on a life of wandering at the age of 16; he went to Turin where he was converted to Catholicism and served as footman to a wealthy family. He left Turin in 1751 and spent most of the next 10 years at Chambéry, Savoy, with Mme de Waren's, his benefactress. In 1741 he set out for Paris; became a secretary in the French embassy in Venice, but resigned, and returned to Paris where he became acquainted with the writers of the Encyclopédie, for which he wrote the article on musical notation. During this period he began his liaison with the half-literate servant-girl Thérèse Le Vasseur, by whom Rousseau said he had five children, all of whom he put in an orphan asylum. She later became his common-law wife, and accompanied him throughout his life. During his stay in Paris he wrote his ballet Les Muses galantes (The Gallant Muses), and light opera Le Devin du village (The Village Soothsayer, 1752). Rousseau became famous overnight by the publication of his first essay Discours sur les sciences et les arts (Discourses on the Sciences and Arts, 1750), in which he reacts against the 18th-century view that progress in the sciences and arts increases man's happiness; he argued that, on the contrary, they corrupt mankind. His second philosophical essay, Discours sur l'origine et les fondements de l'inégalité parmi les hommes (Discourse on the Origin and Bases of Inequality among Men, 1754) celebrates the "natural man" and indict[s] private property and the political state as causes of inequality and oppression. Rousseau returned to Geneva (1754), became a Protestant again, and returned to Paris. He lived at... the Hermitage, a cottage built for him at Montmorency by Mme d'Epinay. He fell in love with Comtesse d'Houdetot, Mme d'Epinay's sister-in-law, who was herself in love with another man. Rousseau's persecution complex began to show itself, for he quarreled with his friends and left the Hermitage to live nearby in the château of the duc de Luxembourg. Here he finished his immensely popular novel La Nouvelle Héloïse while still partially under the influence of his unrequited love affair. Here too Rousseau wrote his most famous and influential work The Social Contract and his Emile. This latter work, because of its religious view, incurred the censure of the Sorbonne and the Parlement, and Rousseau was banished from France. He escaped to Switzerland, settling finally, at the invitation of David Hume, in England, where he started his Confessions, written from 1766 to 1770. Suspecting Hume, as he had suspected most of his friends, of a conspiracy against him, Rousseau quarreled with him and left England in 1767. Until 1770 he wandered with Thérèse and her mother from province to province, prey to intermittent delirium, finally returning to Paris where he lived in a state of poverty and near solitude. Here, protected from prying eyes by Thérèse, he wrote Récitaires d'un promeneur solitaire (Daydreams of a Solitary Stroller, 1776–1778), published in 1782, and a draft for a constitution for Poland, at the request of a Polish count. His only friend and contemporary disciple was Bernardin de Saint-Pierre. He died at Ermenonville, near Paris; in 1794 his remains were transferred to the Panthéon in Paris.

Rousseau's closeness to nature, his sensitivity, individualism, rebellion against the established social and political order, his imagination and his glorification of the emotions make him the father of French Romanticism. William Godwin and the leaders of the French Revolution of 1789 were among those influenced by his political ideas; Lamartine and de Musset were influenced by his style, as was Chateaubriand.

Roussin, André (1911– ). French dramatist. His farcical comedies, such as Bobosse (1957), Hélène (1953), La Petite Huite (1950), Les œufs de l'Autruche (1950), and Lorsque l'enfant parlait (1952), generally revolve about the familiar romantic triangle. A skilled dramatic craftsman, Roussin enlivens his plays with light, witty dialogue.

Rover Boys. The heroes of a popular series of books for boys about life in preparatory school and college. The series included more than 30 titles, the first of which appeared in 1899. The books were written by Edward Stratemeyer under the pen name Arthur M. Winfield. Stratemeyer also created Tom Swift.

Rovetta, Gerolamo (1851–1910). Italian novelist and dramatist. He is noted for his satirical treatment of the cultural and social values of the Italian bourgeoisie in the period following the Risorgimento. An uncompromising and pessimistic social critic, he was inspired by Balzac to write a "human comedy" pointing out the sordid economic and political interests that underlie the most praiseworthy ideals. His skill as a narrator is exceptional; his descriptions are precisely realistic; his language synthesizes dialect (usually Milanese) and colloquial modes of expression; his tone is often satirical and cynical.

Rovetta's forte is his psychological analysis of character types. For example, Pompée Barbardó, the protagonist of Le Larmirbe du Prosimo (1887), is a pitiless moneylender and shrewd investor whose rapid rise to social and financial prominence is sparked by a remark he heard as a poor young man, that the real gentleman is one who knows how to steal. Among Rovetta's numerous plays might be cited La Trilogia di Donnara (1889), I Disonnati (1892), La Realità (1895), Romanticismo (1893), and Re Bartone (1905).

Rowe, Nicholas (1674–1718). English poet and dramatist. He is best known for such tragedies as Jane Shore (1714), The Fair Penitent (1703), Tamerlane (1701), and Lady Jane Grey (1715). He also edited Shakespeare's plays, and was poet laureate (1715–1718).

Rowena. See Ivanhoe.

Rowlandson, Mary (1635?–1678). American pioneer and author of the first Indian-captivity narrative. The wife of a minister, she was taken captive with her six-year-old daughter in 1675 during King Philip's War, after an Indian attack on Lancaster, Mass. Her account of the event is The Sovereignty and Goodness of God . . . Being a Narrative of the Captivity and Restauration of Mrs. Mary Rowlandson (1682). One of the most popular American prose works of the 17th century, reprinted many times since, it gives a hair-raising picture of frontier perils.

Rowlandson, Thomas (1756–1827). English caricaturist. He is especially well known for his series of plates entitled Tours of Dr. Syntax (1812, 1820, 1821). He also illustrated books by Smollett, Goldsmith, Sterne, and others.

Rowley, Thomas. See Thomas Chatterton.

Rowley, William (c. 1585–c. 1637). English dramatist, best known for his collaboration with Thomas Middleton on The Changeling. His own plays include All's Lost by Lust (1622) and A Match at Midnight (1633). He also collaborated with John Ford, Philip Massinger, John Fletcher, John Webster, and possibly, on a play now lost, with Shakespeare.

Rowson, Susannah Haswell (1762–1824). English-born American writer and actress. She came to Boston with her father, a British naval lieutenant, in 1767 but was forced to leave during the Revolution. Charlotte Temple, the only one of her novels which has been remembered, appeared in 1791 in England and three years later in the U.S. In 1793 she returned to America as an actress and, after leaving the stage, she ran a school for girls until her death.

Roxane. The wicked sultana in Jean Racine's tragedy Bajazet. The heroine of Rostand's Cyrano de Bergerac is also named Roxane.

Roy, Gabrielle (1899– ). Canadian novelist. Her first novel, The Tin Flute (Bonheur d'occasion; 1945), won France's Prix Femina in 1947. The story of a large French-Canadian family living in an impoverished quarter of Montreal, it was praised for its vivid characterization, unfilching honesty, and dry-eyed compassion. Her later novels include Where Nest the Water Hen (La petite poule d'eau; 1950), The Cashier (Alexandre Chenievert; 1954), and The Hidden Mountain (1962). Street of Riches (Rue Des-sketches.

Roy, Jules (1907- ). Algerian-born French novelist, dramatist, poet, and essayist. All his works are set in the wars he has observed as pilot and officer and analyze the nature of heroism. His novels are Ciel et terre (1943), The Happy Valley (La Val¬ tée heureuse; 1946), The Navigator (1954), and Un¬ faithful Wife (La Femme infidele; 1955). Beau Song (1952), and Le Fleuve rouge (1957) are plays, while Chants et prières pour des pilotes (1943) is a collec¬ tion of poetry.

Royal Society of London for Improving Natu¬
rnal Knowledge, The. An English scientific academy, -founded in 1660 for the purpose of studying the whole field of knowledge and still in existence.
Abraham Cowley and the chemist Robert Boyle had presented plans for such an organization, and among its members were included some of the leading lit¬ erary, diplomatic, and scientific figures of the day.
Samuel Pepys, who was admitted to the society in 1665 and later became its president, has a number of references to its meetings and its experiments in his famous diary. Isaac Newton was president from 1703 to 1727, and John Winthrop and Cotton and Increase Mather were leaders of a group of New England members of the Royal Society. Thomas Sprat, bishop of Rochester, was historian of the organization, which sought, among other aims, to improve the English prose style of the time, making it simpler, clearer, and more suited to the needs of scientific exposition than the usual literary style then current.
In this connection, an international language of sym¬ boles was proposed by Bishop Wilkins, considered to have been the Society's most important member.

The Royal Society was satirized in numerous con¬ temporary works, including Shadwell's Virtuosi (1676), Swift's Gulliver's Travels (1726), and Samuel Butler's Elephant in the Moon and Satire on the Royal Society.

Royce, Josiah (1855-1916). American philo¬ osopher, teacher, and essayist. After a series of teaching posts, Royce went to Harvard to replace William James, who was on leave; he remained there as a professor for the rest of his life. The Religious As¬ pect of Philosophy (1885) established Royce's famous theory of the Absolute. He held that if one admits the presence of evil in the world, it then necessarily follows that there is also an absolute principle of Truth, an all-knowing Mind or Universal Thought.
James and Royce disagreed vigorously, and entered into a fruitful debate; James wrote that Royce's mind had nourished his, "as no other social influence ever has." Royce, the leader of the post-Kantian idealistic school in the U.S., also wrote The Spirit of Modern Philosophy (1892), The Concept of God (1897), The Problem of Christianity (1913), Lectures on Modern Idealism (1919), and other volumes. His Fugitive Essays (1920) deal with Shelley, George Eliot, and Browning. The Feast of Oakfield Creek (1887) was the philosopher's one attempt at fiction.

Rozanov, Vassili Vasilyevich (1856-1919). Rus¬ rian writer, critic, and philosopher. He is best known for his views on the central place that sexuality holds in man's nature, forming the creative impulse on both the biological and the spiritual planes. His views were expressed in the collections of aphorisms titled Solitaria (Uyedinennoye; 1912) and Fallen Leaves (Padshiyie liisty; 1913, 1915) in which he tries to convey not only his thought but his tone of voice through the prose. An avid admirer of Dostoev¬ ski, Rozanov published a penetrating study of the novelist, The Legend of the Grand Inquisitor (Le¬ genda velikogo inkiizitora; 1894) in which he was the first to note the importance of Dostoevski's short work, Notes from Underground. Rozanov married
Polina Suslova, the former mistress of Dostoevski.

Ruark, Robert [Chester] (1915- ). American newspaper columnist and novelist. In his newspaper columns, Ruark reveals a gift for expressing aversion amusingly, often in a facetiously ungram¬ matical style. In Grenadine Etching (1947), he lam¬ pooned historical novels. He has also written two melodramatic and sensational novels, both of which are laid in Africa: Something of Value (1955) and Ukhuru (1962). Poor No More (1959) is an embl¬ tered rags-to-riches saga set in the U.S. and Europe.

Rubáiyát of Omar Khayyám. A collection of quatrains by OMAR KHAYYÁM. Perhaps even better known in English than in the original Persian, 101 of the quatrains were translated by Edward Fitz¬ gerald and published in 1859. The oldest-known manuscript of the original work is in the Bodleian Library, Oxford, and is dated at Shiraz, A.H. 865
(A.D. 1460). Fitzgerald's translation, reputed to be extremely free but actually much closer to the orig¬ inal than has been supposed, is a masterpiece of Eng¬ lish poetry in its own right. Omar's beautiful and world-weary concentration, in FitzGerald's rendering, upon sensual pleasure as the sole aim of living, helped establish the mood of the whole fin de siècle of poetry in England.

Rubens, Peter Paul (1577–1640). Flemish painter. The greatest representative of baroque art in northern Europe, he was born and educated in Amsterdam. From 1600 to 1608, he was in the service of the duke of Mantua who sent him to Rome where he became strongly influenced by Italian painting. Thereafter, he returned to Antwerp where he entered the service of Albrecht and Isabella, who ruled the Netherlands as regents for Philip III of Spain. He was later entrusted with diplomatic missions that took him to Spain and England, and he undertook important commissions for the Spanish court. Exuberant religious paintings, classical fables, and allegories were produced at a stupendous rate in his workshop. These large-scale paintings are noted for their vitality, masterly execution, richness of color, and the vigorous, often rhythmic movement of their composition.

Rubicon. A small river separating ancient Italy from Cisalpine Gaul, the province allocated to Julius Caesar in the First Triumvirate. Fearing Caesar's growing power in Gaul, Pompey and the senate ordered Caesar to return to Rome without his army. When, in defiance of this order, Caesar crossed the Rubicon with his army (49 B.C.), he passed beyond the limits of his province, thereby becoming an invader of Italy and precipitating civil war. Hence, "to cross the Rubicon" is to take an irrevocable step.

Rucellai, Giovanni (1475–1529). Florentine courtier and dramatist. He is noted for his tragedies Rosamunda and Oreste. He also wrote Le api (The Bees), a celebrated version of the fourth book of Vergil's Georgics.

Ruck, Berta (1878– ), English popular novelist, married to Oliver Onions. Among her works are His Official Fiancée (1914) and Fantastique Holiday (1953).

Rückert, Friedrich (1788–1866). German poet, known especially for his pioneering efforts in popularizing Oriental poetic forms and philosophical ideas in Germany. His works include Geharnische Sonette (Harnessed Sonnets, 1814), a collection treating political themes of the day; a collection of Kindertotenlieder (Songs on Children's Deaths, 1872), set to music by Mahler; and Die Weisheit des Brahmanen (The Wisdom of the Brahman, 1836), collected translations from Oriental literature.

Ruddymane. See Père Queene, THE.

Rudin (1856). A novel by Ivan Turgenev. It traces the ineffectual career of the hero, Dmitri Nikolayevich Rudin. Typifying the philosophically inclined idealists Turgenev had encountered in his student days in Berlin, Rudin impresses almost everyone with his brilliant and high-minded talk. The hero does well when talking or dreaming, but decisive action is not in his line. The demands of a love offered him by Natalya Doloseyeva frighten him away. Rudin eventually does try to act and loses his life for it. During the 1848 revolt in Paris, he is shot while standing on top of a barricade, futilely waving a sword and trying to rally the retreating insurgents. Rudin has been characterized as one of superfluous men in Russian literature, a man unable to find a suitable cause to serve or proper outlet for his energies. Another view is that his nature would make him unable to act in any conditions.

Rudra (Sans., rud, to weep; dra, to run). The father of the tempest gods in the Hindu mythology of the Vedas. The legend says that as a boy he ran about weeping because he had no name, whereupon Brahma said, "Let your name be Rud-dra."

Rugby. A public school in England, founded in 1567. Its headmaster from 1828 to 1842 was Thomas Arnold, the father of Matthew Arnold. The book Tom Brown's Schooldays by Thomas Hughes concerns the school in the nineteenth century. A poem by Matthew Arnold is called Rugby Chapel. The game of Rugby football originated at this school.

Ruggiero or Roger. A leading figure in Carolingian legends and in Matteo Maria Boiardo's Orlando Innamorato and Lodovico Ariosto's Orlando Furioso. He is the brother of Marfisa (Marphisa) and the ward of the magician Atlante (Atlantes). After the slaying of his mother, he was nursed by a lioness. From Atlante he receives an enchanted sword of such dazzling splendor that it numbs all who look upon it, but he casts it into a well because he regards it as unchivalrous. At first he fights with the pagan forces of Agramante, the African king, against Charlemagne and the Christian knights. Later, having met and fallen in love with the warrior maiden Bradamante (Bradamant), he becomes converted to Christianity and marries her. Ariosto's poem ends with their marriage feast and his election to the crown of Castilia. From their union comes the house of Este, the princely patrons of both poets at the court of Ferrara. See Rodomonte.

In Torquato Tasso's Gerusalemme Liberata (Jerusalem Delivered), Ruggiero is a Norman, son of Roberto Guiscardo. A member of the crusading army led by Goffredo (Godfrey) against the Saracens, he is killed by Tisiphernes in the final canto.

Ruggles of Red Gap. A humorous novel (1915) by Harry Leon Wilson, dealing with a British butcher in a western pioneer town.

Ruysdael or Ruysdael, Jacob van (c. 1625–1682). Dutch landscape painter and etcher. His forest, shore, and mountain scenes reveal a sympathy and intimacy with nature. Calm and somewhat melancholy, they show his ability to interpret as well as represent nature.

Ruiz, Juan. Also known as the archpriest or arcipreste de Hita (c. 1283–1350). Spanish poet. Little is known about the life of the archpriest, considered the greatest poet of medieval Spain, except what he himself relates in his realistic and humorous autobiography in verse, El libro de buen amor, which may have been composed while he was in prison. His purpose, the poet wrote, undoubtedly with tongue in cheek, was to warn readers of the pitfalls of loco amor, or foolish love. The contents of the work are varied; included are hymns to the Virgin and animal apologues as well as picaresque accounts of the author's love affairs and a description of a battle between Lord Flesh and Lady Lent in which the latter is vanquished. Among the outstanding characters is the old hag Trotaconventos, ancestress of La Celestina.

Ruiz de Alarcón y Mendoza, Juan. See Juan Ruiz de Alarcón y Mendoza.
Rukeyser, Muriel (1913– ). American poet. Her early work, especially U.S. I (1938), dealing with the exploitation of working people along the U.S. highway of that name, is marked by proletarian sympathies. Theory of Flight (1935), published a year previously, shows her fondness for incorporating the world of 20th-century science and technology. Her later work is more concerned with the personal and the symbolic. Among her later collections are A Turning Wind (1939), Beast in View (1944), The Green Wave (1946), Orpheus (1949), Chain Lightning (1953), Sun Stone (1961), and I Go On Out (1961). She has also written the biography Willard Gibbs: American Genius (1942) and paid tribute to Wendell Willkie in One Life (1957).

Rule Britannia. See Thomas Augustine Arne.

Rumford, Count. See Benjamin Thompson.

Rumpelstiltskin or Rumpelstilzchen. A deformed dwarf in German folk tale. A king tells a miller’s daughter he will marry her if she can really spin straw into gold. Helpless, she accepts the dwarf’s offer to do it in exchange for her first child. Once queen, she grieves so bitterly when the child is born that the dwarf agrees to relent if in three days she can guess his name, which no one knows. On the third day he is so sure he will win the child that he is overheard muttering his name triumphantly to himself. When he hears his name from the queen, he destroys himself in his rage at losing.

Rump Parliament. In English history, a derisive nickname given to the fragment of the Long Parliament that remained after Pride’s Purge. Consisting of from 60 to 70 members, most of them Independent, the Rump voted for the execution of Charles I.

Rundstedt, Karl Rudolf Gerd von (1875–1953). German general. He commanded the army of occupation in France (1942–1944), and became commander-in-chief of the Western Front (1944–1945).

Runeberg, Johan Ludvig (1804–1877). Finnish poet. Though he wrote in the Swedish language, Runeberg was a leader of the Finnish nationalist literary movement of the 19th century. In addition to lyric poems and philological works, he wrote The Elk Hunters (1832), an epic of Finnish rural life; King Fisher (1844), a Norse epic; and Tales of Ensign-Stål (1848, 1860), a collection of prose and verse glorifying the Finnish soldiers of the 1808–1809 Russo-Finnish war. The Tales were instrumental in accelerating Finland’s awareness of herself as a nation separate from Sweden and Russia, and they contain the poem Viirt Land (Our Land), which has become Finland’s national anthem.

runes. Letters in various alphabets used by Teutonic peoples, especially in Scandinavia and the British Isles from the 2nd century to the 12th. The runic alphabets were adaptations of a Greek alphabet, simplified for facility in carving inscriptions on wood, stone, and metal. Each rune is the initial letter of its name (as the m letter is called man), and the name is also a common word (man, horse, thorn, see); thus the runes were used as characters in ordinary spelling, but also as idea-symbols in composing magical incantations or charms.

Rumyniade. An island (Charter Island) in the Thames in Surrey, where King John, on June 15, 1215, was forced to sign the Magna Carta. Cf. Kipling’s poem, The Reeds of Rumyniade. Some say the document was signed in the meadow on the south side of the Thames.

Runyon, [Alfred] Damon (1884–1946). American journalist and short-story writer. He is famous for his stories about such colorful Broadway characters as the Lemon Drop Kid and Harry the Horse. His style, so individual that it is called Runyonese, relies on Broadway slang, outrageous metaphors, and constant use of the present tense. Among his books are Guys and Dolls (1932) and Blue Plate Special (1934). He also wrote a play, A Slight Case of Murder (1939), with Howard Lindsay.

R.U.R. A play by Karel Capek, produced in 1923. It deals with an imagined future state in which robots, enslaved to do work for men, revolt against their masters. The initials in the title stand for “Rossum’s Universal Robots,” the name of the commercial firm which manufactures the mechanical creatures.

Rural Rides. See William Cobbett.

Ruritania. An imaginary Central-European kingdom. It is the locale of The Prisoner of Zenda and Rupert of Hentzau (1898) by Anthony Hope Hawkins.

Rush, Benjamin (1745–1813). American physician, member of the Continental Congress, and signer of the Declaration of Independence. Rush was a great admirer of Thomas Jefferson and like him had an informed and worthwhile opinion on almost every subject. As a medical man he was overly dogmatic in his insistence on bleeding as a form of therapy. However, his theory that the yellow fever epidemic of 1793 was caused partly by poor sanitation was advanced for the times and led him to be ostracized by the medical profession. His Medical Inquiries and Observations Upon Diseases of the Mind (1812) contains pioneer discoveries in psychoanalytic method and in the treatment of mental disorders.

Rush or Bausch, Friar. See Friar Rush.

Ruskin, John (1819–1900). English writer and critic. The son of a wealthy merchant, Ruskin benefited from extensive travel and private drawing lessons during his youth. In the first volume of Modern Painters he included a spirited defense of the then much-misunderstood landscape painter John Turner, attracting attention with his clear style and his novel approach to art criticism. The four later volumes of this series, along with The Seven Lamps of Architecture (1849) and The Stones of Venice (3 vols., 1851–1853), a study of the development of Byzantine and Gothic architecture in Venice and of the city’s moral, vital, and artistic decline, established Ruskin as a leading critic and stylist. Several of his lectures on art were published in Lectures on Art (1870), Arastra Pentelici (1871), The Eagle’s Nest (1871), Ariadne Florentina (1873–1876), Val d’Arno (1874) and Lectures on Landscape (1898). He developed and expressed his philosophy of art in these and other works, including St. Mark’s Rest: The History of Venice (1877–1884), Morning in Florence (1875–1877) and The Bible of Amiens (1880–1885). Believing that the “greatest picture” was the one that conveyed “to the mind of the spectator the greatest number of the greatest ideas” and classifying the greatest ideas in the categories of Power, Imitation, Truth, Beauty and Relation, Ruskin advocated a basically religious aesthetic, in which moral perception of beauty was superior to the merely sensuous and beauty itself revealed the attributes of God. His conviction that faith, morality, education, and good social conditions were prerequisites to the creation of good art led him to take up the cause of social and economic reform in such works as The Political Economy of the Arts (1857), Unto this Last, Essays on Political Economy (1862–1863), the widely read Sesame and Lilies (1865), and Fors Clavigera: Letters to the Workmen and Laborers of Great Britain (1889–1889). Ruskin's views deeply influenced the British socialist movement, just as his art history and criticism brought about the revival of interest in Gothic architecture. A scholar of enormously varied interests, he wrote works on botany, Preripina (1875–1886); ornithology, Love's Minnie (1873–1878); and geology, Desolation (1875–1883); and an unfinished autobiography, Praeterita (1885–1889). The term PATHETIC FALLACY was coined by Ruskin.

Ruskin, Bertrand. 3d Earl Russe (1872– ). English philosopher, mathematician, and social reformer. His books on mathematics, philosophy, and logic include Principia Mathematica, with A. N. Whitehead as co-author (1910–1913), which became a classic; An Introduction to Mathematical Philosophy (1919); The Analysis of Mind (1921); and An Inquiry into Meaning and Truth (1940). He wrote a number of essays on philosophic and scientific problems in a semipopularizing vein; among these are The ABC of Relativity (1925), Religion and Science (1935), and A History of Western Philosophy (1945). He has written numerous books expressing his unorthodox views on war, politics, sociology, and religion, and on such domestic matters as education, sexual relations, and divorce. Among these are Mysticism and Logic (1918), The Practice and Theory of Bolshevism (1920), Marriage and Morals (1929), Education and the Social Order (1932), Freedom and Organisation (1934), Let the People Think (1941), The Faith of a Rationalist (1947), Unpopular Essays (1950), and New Hopes for a Changing World (1951). Satan in the Suburbs (1953) is a collection of fantastic short stories. Russell's writing is remarkable for its clarity and ease. In 1944 he was awarded the British Order of Merit, and in 1950 the Nobel Prize for Literature. In more recent works—Common Sense and Nuclear Warfare (1958), Has Man a Future? (1961), and Unarmed Victory (1963)—he concerns himself with the threat of nuclear war.

Intent on putting his beliefs into practice as well as publicizing them, Russell has been involved in frequent difficulties with English and American authorities; nearing the end of his life, internationally acclaimed as an important 20th-century thinker, he has become more notorious than ever. During World War I in England he was fined and imprisoned for his pacifist views. An experimental nursery school he ran with his wife from 1927 to 1932 was severely criticized. An appointment to teach at the City College of New York was withdrawn on the grounds that his teachings were immoral. When over 90 years old he founded the Committee of 100 in England, an influential militant group which campaigned, through civil disobedience, for nuclear disarmament and international morality. Russell was married four times.

Russell, Lillian. Stage name of Helen Louise L. (1861–1922). American soprano. She first appeared in Tony Pastor's Variety Theatre (1880) and sang for more than 35 years in burlesque and comic opera. Her beauty and figure (of the Gibson Girl type) made her a great popular favorite.

Russell, William Clark (1844–1911). English novelist. After eight years in the British merchant service he became a journalist in London and wrote many stories of nautical adventure including John Holdsworth, Chief Mate (1875) and The Wreck of the Crewmener (1877). He also wrote Lives of Dampier (1889), Nelson (1890), and Collingwood (1891).

Russell, Sir William Howard (1820–1907). English journalist, one of the first and best known war correspondents, reporter for the London Times in the Crimean, American Civil, and Franco-German Wars. In the first he coined the phrase “the thin red line,” applied to British Infantry at Balaklava. His The War from the Landing at Gallipoli (1855–1856), about the Crimean War, and My Diary North and South (1862), about the Civil War, are of particular interest.

Russian Primary Chronicle, The (Nachalnaya Letopis). Also known as The Tale of Bygone Years (Povest' vremennykh let). Historical annals of medieval Russia covering events from 852 to the early 12th century. The chronicle contains descriptions of historical occurrences, legends, and tales from folk tradition. Kiev was the center of the Russian nation when these annals were compiled, and their authorship was for years attributed to Nestor, a monk in a Kiev monastery. Nestor's authorship is now doubted by most scholars. Chronicles also survive from other Russian cities, such as Tver, Pskov, and Novgorod.

Russian Revolution. The events that began with the abdication of Czar Nicholas II in the spring of 1917 and ended with the seizure of power by the Bolsheviks in Nov., 1917. An earlier, unsuccessful attempt at revolution had taken place in 1905, when a series of strikes had obliged the czarist regime to promise full civil rights to the people and the establishment of Russia's first legislative body, the Duma. After the storm had blown over, however, the government managed to avoid fulfilling most of its promises.

Early in 1917 military defeats by the Germans and internal chaos led to a series of strikes and mutinies among workers and soldiers, particularly in the capital of St. Petersburg. After the Czar abdicated in March, 1917, power was divided between a provisional government under Prince Lvov, set up by a committee of the Duma and the Soviet (council) of workers' deputies in St. Petersburg. Soviets also existed in Moscow and other cities. Lvov's government was replaced in July by a coalition government under Kerenski which was repeatedly attacked by the Bolsheviks. Lenin had returned to Russia from exile in April and immediately began agitation for the overthrow of the provisional government and the seizure of power by the Bolsheviks. In September the Bolsheviks won majorities in both the St. Petersburg and Moscow Soviets. Some Bolshevik leaders wanted.
to content themselves with this electoral gain, but Lenin's urging for a coup d'etat prevailed. Shortly before the convening of a constituent assembly in November, the Bolsheviks seized power. The new regime, under Lenin, signed a peace treaty with Germany in March, 1918, and turned to defend itself against its enemies, known as the Whites, who had massed armed forces in the Volga region, the south, and in western Siberia. The civil war raged until late 1920, when the last remnants of the White army under General Wrangel were forced from the Crimea.

The outstanding literary work based directly on the revolution was Aleksandr Blok's long poem The Twelve. Many works have been devoted to the civil war, the most notable being those of Mikhail Sholokhov, Isaak Babel, Aleksandr Fadeyev, Boris Pilnyak, and Vsevolod Ivanov.

Ruth. The Moabite heroine of the Old Testament book that bears her name. After the death of her husband, she loyally refused to desert Naomi, his Hebrew mother: "Entreat me not to leave thee, or to return from following after thee; whither thou goest, I will go; and where thou lodgest, I will lodge; thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God" (Ruth 1:16). After accompanying her to Bethlehem, Ruth became a gleaner in the fields of the wealthy Boaz, whom she married.

Ryder, Albert Pinkham (1847–1917). American painter. He lived as a recluse in New York City, working for years on end on glowing compositions in which he developed unerring patterns and rhythms. His subjects were drawn from the depths of his imagination and from the tales of William Shakespeare, Richard Wagner, and the Bible. His moonlit seas and night scenes range from calm to violence, but all reveal a sense of mystery and power. Ryder made his own pigments, often with bizarre ingredients, that have tended to darken and crack with time.

Rye House Plot (1683). In English history, an alleged conspiracy to assassinate Charles II and the duke of York (later James II) at Rye House in Hertfordshire. He attacked Beaumont and Fletcher in The Tragedies of the Last Age (1678), and criticized Shakespeare in A Short View of Tragedy (1692) for failing to observe the classical unities in Othello (1604), which he labelled a "bloody farce." He also wrote a tragedy, Edgar, or the English Monarch (1678), to show how it should be done.

Ryti, Rysto Heikki (1889–1956). President of Finland (1940–1946). Ryti was convicted on war-guilt charges and sentenced to 10 years of hard labor, but in 1949 he was pardoned on the grounds of poor health.

Saarinen, Eero (1910-1961). Finnish-born American architect. Though influenced by Mies van der Rohe, his creations—e.g., the Technical Center for General Motors, Warren, Mich. (1951-1956), Kresge Auditorium at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, and the TWA Terminal at New York's Kennedy International Airport (1962)—are very much his own. His works are characteristically light and graceful and each is different from the others.

Sabbatical year. Originally, 1 year in 7 when the ancient Jews allowed all their land to lie fallow for 12 months. The practice was based on a law found in the books of Exodus, Leviticus, and Deuteronomy. The phrase is now used for a missionary's furlough or a year of vacation from a profession.

Sablé, Marquise Magdeleine de (c. 1599-1678). French patroness of letters. Her literary salon was second in importance only to the Hôtel de Rambouillet and influenced La Rochefoucauld in the writing of his maxims. The marquise's Maximes et pensées diverses (Maxims and Various Thoughts), largely her own work, was published in 1678.

Sabra. The legendary daughter of Ptolemy, king of Egypt. She was rescued by St. George from a dragon and ultimately married her deliverer. She was pure in mind, saintly in character, a perfect citizen, daughter, and wife. Her three sons, born at one birth, were named Guy, Alexander, and David. She died from the pricks of a thorny bushwood.

Sabrina. Latin name of the river Severn, named from the daughter of Estrildis and Locrin in Geoffrey of Monmouth's History of the Kings of Britain. Sabrina and her mother are drowned in the river Severn by Gwendolen. In John Milton's Comus, Sabrina is a nymph of the Severn.

Sacajawea (1787?-1812). American Indian woman, probably of the Snake or Shoshone tribe. She served as guide and interpreter for the Lewis and Clark Expedition (1805), during which she bore a son to a Canadian trapper whom she had married by Indian rites.

Sacchetti, Franco (c. 1330-1400). Italian poet and prose writer. Born in Dalmatia of Florentine parents, he spent most of his life in Florence as a public official. His writings include sonnets, canzoni, settime and ballate, as well as the then less familiar madrigals, caccie, and frottola. Many of these varied lyrics were intended for musical setting, since he composed himself and was associated with musicians writing in the ars nova style. His most famous poem is the pastoral ballata beginning "O vaghe montanine pasturelle" ("O lovely mountain shepherdesses"). In prose, his masterpiece is the Libro delle trecentonovelle (Book of Three Hundred Tales), a collection of novelle, of which some 200 pieces are extant. Unlike the Decameron, there is no structure or framing story to knit the tales together.

saco benedetto (Ital.), saco bendito or san benito (Sp., "the blessed sack or cloak"). The yellow linen robe with two crosses on it, and painted over with flames and devils, in which persons condemned by the Spanish Inquisition were arrayed when they went to the stake. (See Auto-da-fé.) In the case of those who expressed repentance for their errors, the flames were directed downward. Penitents who had been taken before the Inquisition had to wear this badge for a stated period. Those worn by Jews, sorcerers, and renegades bore a St. Andrew's cross in red on back and front.

Sacco-Vanzetti case (May-July, 1921). A celebrated murder trial in which two Italian anarchists, Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti, were convicted of and condemned to death for the murder of a paymaster and a guard and the theft of over $15,000 at a shoe factory in South Braintree, Mass., on April 15, 1920. Both men denied any knowledge of the crime, and it was widely believed that they had been convicted largely because of their radical political views. The case aroused intense public interest, both in the U.S. and abroad, and defense committees succeeded in obtaining many stays of execution. In July, 1927, Governor Fuller of Massachusetts appointed a committee headed by President Lowell of Harvard to review the case; it upheld the original verdict, and Sacco and Vanzetti were executed the following month.

The case inspired numerous literary works, including Edna St. Vincent Millay's poem Justice Denied in Massachusetts (1927), Upton Sinclair's novel Boston (1928), and two plays by Maxwell Anderson, Gods of the Lightning (1928) and Winslow (1935). During their imprisonment the two accused men wrote hundreds of letters which possess considerable literary power. Vanzetti's final appeal has become a classic. A collection of the Letters of Sacco and Vanzetti appeared in 1928.

Sacher-Masoch, Leopold von (1836–1895). Austrian novelist whose name is the source of the word masochism. This abnormality is portrayed in many of his works, such as Das Vermächtnis Kains (The Legacy of Cain, 1870–1877) and Falscher Hemel (False Ermine, 1873).

Sachs, Hans (1494–1576). German poet and dramatist, by trade a shoemaker, most skilled and famous of the MEISTERSINGERS. In addition to his more than 4,000 master-songs, he wrote many poems on moral and religious subjects, the most famous being Die Wittenbergisch Nachtigall (The Nightingale of Wittenberg, 1523), an allegory in praise of Martin Luther, and an Epitaphium (1546) on Luther's death. His enormous dramatic production includes tragedies on classical, biblical, and medieval subjects, dialogues in defense of Protestantism, and many Shrove-tide-plays, a genre which he carried to its highest perfection. He appears as a leading character in Richard Wagner's opera Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg.

Sackville, Charles. 6th earl of Dorset, 1st earl of Middlesex (1638–1706). English poet and courtier. He was the friend and patron of poets, including Matthew Prior, Wycherly, Dryden, and others. His best-known poem, To ow Ladies, now at Land (1665), was written at sea during the Dutch War, the night before an engagement.

Sackville, Thomas. 1st earl of Dorset and Baron Buckhurst (1536–1608). English poet and statesman. Sackville is known for his authorship (with Thomas Norton) of The Tragedy of Gorbouge (1561), an important work in the history of English drama; and especially for his Induction to the 1563 edition of The Mirror for Magistrates. The latter piece is the most famous part of the Mirror, and one of the most outstanding poems written in England between the death of Chaucer and the publication of Spenser's Shepheardes Calender (1579). The Induction is patterned after the classical Descent into Hades; in it the poet meets the personification of Sorrow, who leads him to Hell and shows him the ghosts of men ruined by their ambition. The Induction then introduces Sackville's Complaint of Henry, duke of Buckingham.

In later life, Sackville devoted himself to a public career, serving variously as a Member of Parliament, ambassador, member of the Privy Council, Lord Treasurer, and Chancellor of Oxford University.

Sackville-West, Edward Charles (1901–). English novelist. A cousin of Victoria Sackville-West, he writes light, witty novels, such as Piano Quintet (1925), and The Sun in Capricorn (1934). Inclinations, a book of critical essays, was published in 1949.

Sackville-West, Vita (1892–1962). English novelist, poet, and critic; associated with the BLOOMSBURY GROUP. Her best-remembered novels are The Edwardians (1930), a sensitive portrayal of an era, and All Passion Spent (1931), an account of an unusual marriage relationship. The Land (1926) is a long poem about the year's cycle of an English farmer. She is particularly noted for her feeling for the English countryside and English history. A descendant of Thomas SACKVILLE, she was a member of an ancient family whose ancestral home was Knole Castle, originally a gift from Queen Elizabeth I to Thomas Sackville. Orlando, by Virginia Woolf, a close friend, was said to be a portrait of V. Sackville-West, her family's history, and Knole Castle, while she herself wrote Knole and the Sackvilles (1922), a family history. Her other books include The Eagle and the Dove (1943), a biographical study of St. Teresa of Avila and St. Thérèse of Lisieux; The Garden (1946), a book of poems; and The Easter Party (1953). She married Harold NICOLSON.

saco bendito. See Sacco Benedetto.

sacrament. Originally "a military oath" (Lat. sacramentum) taken by the Roman soldiers not to desert their standard, turn their back on the enemy, or abandon their general. The early Christians used the word to signify "a sacred mystery," hence its application to baptism, the Eucharist, and so on.

The sacraments interpreted by the Roman Catholic Church as having been commanded by Christ in the Gospels are Baptism and the Eucharist (Lord's Supper); the other five Sacraments of Christian tradition are Confirmation, Holy Orders, Matrimony, and Extreme Unction.

sacra rappresentazione (It., sacred representation). The Italian equivalent of the English and French mystery play, especially popular during the early Renaissance. Developed from the dramatic religious song called the lauda, these sacred dramas were elaborately performed by the young men and boys of religious organizations, with appropriate scenery and props. The subject was exclusively biblical and the favorite form the ottava rima. Most of the authors are anonymous, but one, Belcari, is remembered as an outstanding composer of these plays. The form was used by Lorenzo de' Medici, in whose city of Florence they were especially cultivated by the learned as well as the folk. Poliziano's Orfeo, one of the earliest examples of the Renaissance revival of classical subjects in drama, actually owed its structure to the sacred play, rather than to Greek or Roman practice. Soon after, however, the strict classicism of the later Renaissance ended the influence and popularity of the sacred representation.

Sacred Fount, The (1901). A novel by Henry JAMES. The title refers to the theory of the narrator that in an unequal marriage or liaison the older or weaker partner is refreshed and invigorated at the "sacred fount" of the younger or stronger personality, which in turn becomes depleted. At an English house party, the narrator attempts, by the use of his theory, to discover the relationships among his fellow guests.

Sacred Nine, The. The Muss. sacred thread. In Hindu custom, the upavita, worn by upper-caste members. It is a cotton thread of three strands, which a guru gives to a boy during the initiation ceremony, usually between 8 and 12 years.

Sacripante (Sacripant). In Matteo Maria Boiardo's Orlando Innamorato and Lodovico Ariosto's Orlando Furioso, the emperor of Circassia and one of the leading Saracen knights in the war between Charlemagne and the pagans. He is in love with Angelica, who allows him to be her champion for a time, but he does not win her.

Sade, Comte Donatien Alphonse François de. Known as marquis de Sade (1740–1814). French author. His works, because of their controversial subject matter, have been denied official publication by the French courts as recently as 1957. After completing his Jesuit education, Sade acquired various military ranks and took part in the Seven Years' War. Soon after his marriage at 23, much of the rest of his life was punctuated by violent scandals over his sexual conduct, netting him several prison sentences totaling some 30 years. After seven years of liberty from 1789 to 1801, he was again arrested for writing licentious books; he remained in prison to the end of his life. His works, many of which were written in prison, include Justine ou les Malheurs de la vertu (1791), La Philosophie dans le boudoir (1795), Aline et Valcœur (1795), Juliette (1797), and Les 120 Journées de Sodome (1931–35)—in all, a dozen 2- to 10-volume novels, about 60 short stories, 20 plays, and many smaller works. Approximately one fourth of his manuscripts were burned by the police during the Consulate and the Empire. For years his works were considered to be the monstrous ravagings of a delirious criminal mind, but recent criticism and psychiatric analysis of them have shown him to be a precursor of Nietzsche's superman, and a psychologist and analyst far ahead of his time, whose style, eloquence, language, and profundity of thought warrant his being given a permanent high place in French literature. See sadism.

Sa'di. Pen name of Musharrif-uddin (born Mushih-uddin; c. 1184–1291). Persian poet. As a young man he studied in Baghdad, returning to Persia about the time the ruler, Sa'd, was deposed by the Mongol invaders. It was in his honor that the court took his pen name, Sa'di. Depressed by conditions in Persia, Sa'di became a wanderer, traveling in other countries for 30 years. While in exile his life varied from that of a renowned sheikh to that of a prisoner condemned to forced labor. In 1256 he returned to his birth place in Shiraz, Persia, where he lived, according to tradition, to the advanced age of 107.

Sa'di is perhaps the most popular Persian poet of all time. His Būstān (Fruit Garden), Golestān (Rose Garden), and Dīwān, or collection of lyrics, are classics of Persian poetry. Sa'di's polished style and the wit and poignancy of his sentiments have delighted readers everywhere.

Sadism. A type of sexual perversion in which gratification is found by torturing the object of love. It is so called from comte (known as marquis) de Sade, the French writer whose works first brought such practices to public attention. The term has come to be popularly applied to any delight in causing suffering to others, sex not necessarily being involved. Sadism is usually associated with masochism.

Sadolet, Jacopo (1477–1552). Italian prelate and scholar. Bishop of Carpentras and later made a cardinal, he was noted for his Latin composition, including a treatise on education. In the Renaissance quarrel over languages, he championed the invincibility of Latin as the supreme tongue.

Sagittary. The name given in the medieval romances to the centaur, a mystical monster, half horse and half man. Its eyes sparkled like fire and struck dead like lightning, and it was fabled to have been introduced into the Trojan armies. The Sagittary referred to in Othello was probably an inn, but may have been the Venetian Arsenal.

Saikaku. See Ihara Saikaku.

Saint, the. In novels by Leslie Charteris, the name by which the gentleman-burglar Simon Templar is known. He appears in Enter the Saint (1930), The Saint Goes West (1942), and several other works.

Saint-Amant, Marc Antoine de Gérard (1594–1661). French poet. An original member of the Académie française but subsequently condemned by Boileau, Saint-Amant was an uninhibited freethinker and wrote verse that was by turns outlandish, fanciful, and realistic. In addition to sonnets and lyrics, he produced burlesques and tavern songs, as well as an epic, Moïse (Moses, 1653).

St. Cloud. A suburb of Paris. It is notable for its palace, where many important events in French history took place. Built by Louis XIV (1658) on the site of an older castle, it was bought by Louis XVI for Marie Antoinette, and was later a favorite residence of Napoleon I and Napoleon III. Badly damaged during the Franco-Prussian War, it was afterward demolished.

Sainte-Beuve, Charles Augustin (1804–1869). French literary critic and man of letters. Sainte-Beuve's career as a critic can be divided into three periods. When he first began to practice journalism, writing for the Globe in Paris, he spoke out warmly and enthusiastically in favor of the romantic school. His passionate love affair with the wife of Victor Hugo, celebrated in the love lyrics of Le Livre d'Amour (1843), engendered a certain coldness between the poet and the young critic. His interest in Romanticism considerably diminished, Sainte-Beuve was writing for the Revue de Paris and the Revue des Deux Mondes by 1831. During this second period, he developed his biographical and psychological approach, studying a literary work through the life and personality of its author. The third period saw Sainte-Beuve writing for the Constitutionnel and using a naturalistic method of criticism, placing emphasis upon historical background and social environment. Among his published works are Portraits Contemporains (1860–1871), Portraits Littéraires (1862–1864), Chateaubriand et son Groupe Littéraire (1861), and his collected weekly critical articles, Causes du Lundi (1851–1862) and Nouveaux Lundis (1865–70). His criticism favors moderation, artistic unity, truth in the portrayal of life, and good taste. A strange individual, Sainte-Beuve was erratic in both his personal friendships and intellectual affiliations. He became caught up, at various times, in the swirling intellectual currents of his day: Saint-Simonism, liberal Roman Catholicism, Swiss Calvinism, scientific skepticism, and positivism.

Saint-Evremond, seigneur de. Charles de Marquetel de Saint-Denis (1613–1703). French wit and man of letters. Saint-Evremond attacked Mazarin's treaty with Spain in his Lettre sur le Traité des Pyrénées (Letter on the Pyrenees Treaty, 1656) and was forced in 1661 to flee to England. Well received by Charles II, he became a permanent member of the English court. In his critical essays, his poems, and his play Comédie des Académistes (The Academists' Play, 1643) Saint-Evremond displays a keen wit coupled with natural elegance.

Saint-Exupéry, Antoine de (1900–1944). French novelist, essayist, and aviator. In 1926 he began flying for a commercial airline across West Africa, later flew in South America, and was one of the pioneers in exploring flight over the desert, the Andes, and at night. Barely fictionalized, his experiences in the air became the material for the novels Southern Mail (Courrier-Sud; 1928), and Night Flight. Regrettably the pilots must abandon the terrestrial order of things, purposefully rethought by women and their love, in order to discover the hidden treasures of experience represented by the stars. They give meaning to their lives by joining others who seriously accept the discipline of duty and the risk of death in a quest for a value greater than themselves.

Already the prose poet of the new world of the skies, Saint-Exupéry then rediscovered men's earth in Wind, Sand, and Stars. Flight to Arras (Pilote de guerre; 1942), autobiographical account of a dangerous wartime mission, becomes an introspective analysis of the pilot's mind and the humanistic philosophy he has shaped for himself. Human relationships are the basis of his morality and the source of his joy in life; ties of love, however, should not mean looking at one another, but rather "looking together in the same direction."

Letter to a Hostage (1942) and the posthumous publication of his unfinished notebook of reflections as The Wisdom of the Sands (Citadelle; 1948) give further exposition of his moral philosophy. The Little Prince (Le Petit Prince; 1943) is a fairy tale whose mode of whimsy and fantasy cloaks a wise understanding of the significant values in human life.

Saint-Caudens, Augustus (1849–1907). American sculptor. He is noted for his public monuments, symbolic figures, and portrait plaques in low relief. His Reminiscences were published in 1913.

Saint Joan (1923). A play by George Bernard Shaw. Produced three years after the canonization of St. Joan of Arc, Shaw's play shows her as an early nationalist and the prototype of the Protestant thinker who put her conscience before the judgment of the Church. She died because her new ideas were dangerous to both the Church and feudal society. In an epilogue Joan is surprised to learn of her sainthood; when she offers to return to earth she is again rejected, the usual fate of saints and geniuses according to Shaw.

St. John, Henry. Viscount Bolingbroke (1678–1751). English statesman, orator, and man of letters, who, during the reign of Queen Anne, was the leader of the Tory party in association with Robert Harley. He later propagated his opposition to the government of Sir Robert Walpole in The Craftsman (1726), a periodical. His major works include the Dissertation Upon Parties (1835); the Idea of a Patriot King (1749), an essay; and the Letters on the Study of History, published posthumously in 1752. As a patron, Bolingbroke formed literary friendships with Swift, John Gay, John Arbuthnot, and Pope. An adherent of Deism, he furnished Pope with many of the philosophical ideas used in the groundwork of the Essay on Man.

Saint John Lateran. A basilica, the cathedral church of the Pope as bishop of Rome. Adjoining is the Lateran Palace, scene of a number of Church councils known as Lateran councils. The name goes back to the Roman family Lateranus who owned a palace on the same site until the last owner was put to death by the Emperor Nero.

Its huge, smoke-blackened dome is a London landmark. Inside are tombs of Wellington, Nelson, and other notables including that of the architect.

St. Peter's Basilica. The largest church in Christendom. It can accommodate fifty thousand people, and in it most of the important papal functions are held. Donato Bramante laid out the plan in the form of a Greek cross. This was modified but Michelangelo used Bramante's ideas in bringing the plan to completion. The famous dome is Michelangelo's work. Bernini designed the colonnades of the piazza and the ornate baldacchino over the high altar.

His works include the opera Samson et Dalila (1877), and the humorous suite Le Carnaval des Animaux (composed in 1886 as a musical joke; he did not permit its performance in public while he lived), and five well-known piano concertos.

Saint-Simon, comte de. Claude Henri de Rouvroy (1760–1825). French philosopher and social reformer. His social doctrines were developed by his disciples into a system called Saint-Simonianism. Within this system, all property is owned by the state, while the worker shares in it according to the amount and quality of his work. The basic principle of the state is that of association for the good of all. Surprisingly modern in their ideas, the Saint-Simoniens not only advocated social equality, increased attention to education, and the abolition of hereditary rights, but also demanded disarmament.

Saint-Simon, duc de. Louis de Rouvroy (1675–1755). French courtier and writer. An aristocrat embittered by the frustration of his own political ambitions, Saint-Simon was sharply critical of bourgeois royal officialdom. His Mémoires, which present a vivid and candid picture of the life and personalities of the fashionable court of Louis XIV, are colored by the tart disposition of their author, who admits that he cannot be impartial. Claimed by his creditors at his death and sequestered by the state the manuscript was not published until 1829, and an accurate edition did not appear until 1879. (See marquis de Dangeau.)

The cult's worship of the fertile, productive energy of Nature (sakti) often degenerated into mere orgies. Kali, the consort of Shiva, was the chief object of veneration. See Tantras.

Sala, George Augustus Henry (1828–1895). English journalist. A prolific contributor to the Victorian popular press, he was a by-word, in his own day, for overblown and careless writing. He edited several magazines in the 1860's and produced sketches of London life, travel pieces, and war correspondence for Dickens' Household Words, The Illustrated London News, and the Daily Telegraph. Things I Have Seen and People I Have Known (1844) and Life and Adventure (1895) are memoirs.

Hundreds of persons were accused, many were brought to trial at a special court set up by Governor William Phips; nineteen were hanged; and one, Giles Corey, pressed to death. The hysteria began to subside when several prominent persons, including Phips's wife, came under suspicion. The episode has frequently been described in literature: e.g., John Neal's Rochel Dyer (1828), a novel; Longfellow's Giles Corey of the Salem Farms, a dramatic poem in The New England Tragedies (1868); and Arthur Miller's The Crucible (1953), a play. Salerio. See Salanio.

Salii. In ancient Rome, a college of 12 priests of Mars traditionally instituted by Numa Pompilius. The tale is that a shield fell from heaven, and the nymph Egeria predicted that wherever it was preserved the people would be the dominant people of the earth. To prevent its being surreptitiously taken away, Numa had 11 others made exactly like it, and appointed 12 priests as guardians. Every year these young patricians promenaded the city, singing and dancing, and they finished the day with a sumptuous banquet, with the result that saliires coena became proverbial for a most sumptuous feast. The name Salii is derived from the word salire, "to leap or dance."

Salinas [Serrano], Pedro (1892–1951). Spanish scholar, critic, and poet. A well-known academician, he taught both at home and abroad, notably in the U.S. at Wellesley College and Johns Hopkins University. His critical studies, which include Jorge Manrique o tradición y originalidad (1947) and La poesía de Rubén Darío (1948), have been well received. His own poetry, however, is the source of his reputation; his works include the volumes Fábula y lírico (1931), Razón de amor (1936), and Todo más claro y otros poemas (1949). Each of these is an individual investigation of the expression of love.

Salinger, [Jerome] [David] (1919– ). American novelist and short-story writer. Salinger won wide acclaim with his first novel The Catcher in the Rye, which captivated a whole generation of young people. His collection of stories, Nine Stories (1953), a majority of which originally appeared in The New Yorker, deals mainly with sensitive and troubled adolescents and children who are strongly contrasted with the empty world of their parents. In this collection, Salinger introduces the Glass family, notably in A Perfect Day for Bananafish, in which Seymour Glass, the oldest son, commits suicide. Members of the Glass family are also the subject of Franny and Zooey (1961) and Raise High the Roofbeam, Carpenters and Seymour: An Introduction (1963), long stories originally published in The New Yorker.

Salinger's style is clean and concise, and he is particularly noted for his faithful reproduction of colloquial speech. Perhaps no other writer of so few works has been the subject of so many scholarly analyses.

Sallust. Full Latin name, Gaius Sallustius Crispus (86–34 B.C.). Roman historian. His Bellum Catilinae, on the conspiracy of Catiline, and his Bellum Jugurthinum, on the war with Jugurtha, are extant. Sallust was the first artistic writer of Roman history. Like his Greek model Thucydides, he strove to give a vivid dramatic structure to a historical situation, and included brilliant speeches which, though they are fictitious, reveal the character of his historic personages with amazing force and subtlety. His style differs sharply from the rhetorical orchestration of Cicero; it is more like the style of the elder Cato—straightforward, condensed, and paradoxical.

Sally in our Alley (1729). A famous popular ballad in seventeen stanzas by Henry Carey, composed before 1719 and first published in Poems on Several Occasions (1729):

Of all the girls that are so smart
There's none like pretty Sally;
She is the darling of my heart,
And she lives in our alley.

Salmagundi; or, The Whim-Whams and Opinions of Launcelot Langstaff, Esq. and Others (1807–1808). A humorous periodical published by Washington Irving, his brother William, and James Kirk Paulding. It was collected in book form in 1808 and is an American link between The Spectator and Pickwick Papers. Under fantastic pseudonyms, the writers discussed politics, theater, fashions, and manners in order to "instruct the young, reform the old, correct the town, and castigate the age." The papers were an immediate success; their bias was Federalist and conservative. Their wit makes them readable today. Paulding went on to do a second series, but it lacks the spontaneity and vitality of the first.

The word salmagundi first appeared in the 17th century; it refers to a spicy stewlike concoction, whose ingredients are as various as the contents of the book.

Salmon, André (1881– ). French art critic, poet, novelist. Salmon did much to introduce such painters as Modigliani and Chagall to the public. His poems are often a kind of intuitive, almost surrealist reporting, such as Priúkas (1921), an epic of the Russian revolution, and L'Age de l'humanité (1922). The Black Venus (La Négresse du Sacré-Cœur;
Salome: Aubrey Beardsley illustration for Wilde’s poem.

The Imperial Purple (1892) dealt with the scandals of the Roman emperors. It was followed by other books of its kind.

Saltykov, Mikhail Evgrafovich. Pen name, N. Shechedrin (1826–1889). Russian novelist and satirist. Saltykov attended the Lyceum at Tsarskoe Selo, where interest in literature was high. After his graduation in 1844, he joined the Petrashevsky circle, a group of young intellectuals interested in the theories of the French utopian socialists. The novelist Feodor Dostoevsky, also just beginning his career, was a member of the group.

The radical tone of one of Saltykov’s early short novels, Zapustannye delo (A Complicated Affair, 1848), attracted the attention of the Czarist censor and Saltykov was exiled to Vyatka in eastern Russia. His exile saved him from the severer treatment dealt to the Petrashevsky circle in 1849, when the members were imprisoned, subjected to a mock execution, and sent to Siberia. Saltykov languished in Vyatka until 1856 when the amnesty following the death of Nicholas I released him. One result of his exile was Gubernskiy ocherk (Provincial Sketches, 1856), a collection of satirical pieces on provincial life, published under the pseudonym of N. Shchedrin.

From 1857–1862, Saltykov was again in the provinces, serving as vice-governor in Ryazan and Tver. Returning to St. Petersburg, he became the editor of the journal Sovremennik (The Contemporary) when its previous editor, Nikolai Chernyshevsky, was exiled. In 1868, Saltykov took over the journal Otechestvennye zapisi (Fatherland Notes) in collaboration with the poet Nikolai Nekrasov. He continued to work on this journal until 1884. During this period he produced his best-known works. These include Istoziya odnogo goroda (The History of a Town, 1869–1870), a satirical history of an imaginary town; the novel The Golovlyov Family, considered Saltykov’s masterpiece; and Skazki (Fables, 1880–1885), in which Saltykov used the fable form for incisive comments on man and society.

Salus. In Roman mythology, the goddess of health and good fortune. She became identified with the Greek Hygeia, the daughter of Aesculapius.

Salutati, Coluccio (1313–1406). Florentine scholar. A disciple of Petrarch, and one of the early Humanists, he was instrumental in bringing to Florence in 1397 the Byzantine scholar Chrysoloras, thus giving impetus to the revival of Greek studies at the university.

Salvation Army. A religious and charitable organization that grew out of the Christian Mission in London, established by the Methodist evangelist William Booth in 1865. From the beginning it devoted itself largely to work among the urban poor, criminals, alcoholics, and other neglected classes. The name Salvation Army, together with its semimilitary organization, was adopted in 1878 and goes back to a chance use of the phrase by Booth in reference to the work of his adherents. George Bernard Shaw has depicted the group in his Major Barbara (1905).

Salvation Nell (1908). A drama by Edward Sheldon. The heroine, Nell Sanders, is a scullery maid in a barroom. When she loses her job she goes to the Salvation Army where she meets Lieutenant Maggie O’Sullivan, who aids in Nell’s reformation.
Salvini, Tommaso (1829–1916). Italian actor. A famous tragedian, he was noted for his interpretations of Shakespearian roles. He toured England and the U.S. with great success, winning special acclaim in the role of Othello.

Samuel or Samson. In rabbinical legend, the prince of demons who, in the guise of a serpent, was said to have tempted Eve. He was also known as the angel of death. See Adam and Eve.

Samain. November 1, the New Year’s feast of the ancient Celtic year. Samain Eve, October 31, corresponds to the more modern Halloween, and in Early Irish tales this was the time that the fairy mounds of Ireland opened, allowing supernatural beings to come out into the world. By the same token, Samain Eve was the time when the mysterious mounds became accessible to Irish heroes in search of glory and hidden treasure. With the coming of Christianity, Samain became All Saints’ Day.

Sam Hill. A mythical individual of American origin, frequently referred to in such phrases as fight like Sam Hill, swear like Sam Hill. According to F. J. Wilsch, author of A Dictionary of Slang, the expression what in Sam Hill occurred at least as early as 1839 (in the Elmira, New York, Republican), and seems to have been well established in usage at that time. This date excludes a theory that Sam Hill on the Hill was the murderous chimney-sweep of an English song popular in 1846–1849. Mr. Wilsch is inclined to derive the fighting, swearing Sam Hill from the daemon Samo, and to see in references to him a satisfactory Puritan substitute for profanity. A simpler, not necessarily less probable explanation, treats the name as a playful euphemism for “hell.”

Samuel. See Farrie Queene, The.

Samuel. S. See Samba.

Samurai. See Semaramis.

Sampo. A precious object in the Kalevala, usually described as a magic mill that grinds out meal, salt, and gold.

Sampson, Dominie. An extremely well-drawn character in Scott’s Guy Mannering. Tutor to the hero, Harry Bertram, he is described as “a poor, modest, humble scholar, who had won his way through the classics, but fallen to the leeward in the voyage of life.” He is overfond of the exclamation “Prodigious!”

Samsa, Gregor. The hero of Kafka’s The Metamorphosis. A traveling salesman, he awakens one morning to find himself changed into an insect. His name is a code form of the author’s own, for by the substitution of k for s and f for m, Samsa becomes Kafka. See K.; Joseph K.

Samsāra. A Sanskrit word meaning the cycle of transmigration, birth, death, and rebirth.

Samson. In the Old Testament, the son of Manoah, famous for his prodigious strength and the many remarkable feats by which he routed his enemies, the Philistines. He became infatuated with Delilah, a Philistine woman, who discovered that the secret of his strength lay in his uncut hair; she betrayed him by cutting it off in his sleep so he was easily captured by the Philistines who blinded him and forced him to grind meal in the prison-house at Gaza. When, at the feast of the Philistine god Dagon, he was brought to the temple to be mocked by the people, he prayed to Jehovah for a return of his strength. He was enabled to pull down the two great pillars which supported the entire edifice, killing himself and all present (Judg. 13–16).

Milton made Samson the hero of his great poem Samson Agonistes (1671). The opera Samson et Dalila by Saint-Saëns (1877) also follows the Biblical story.

Samson’s crown. An achievement of great renown, which costs the life of the doer.

Samson Agonistes (1671). A tragedy in blank verse by John Milton. It deals with the captivity of the blinded Samson among the Philistines, his repudiation of the faithless Delilah, and his destruction of the Philistine temple. The agon, or struggle about which the play centers, is Samson’s effort to renew his faith in God’s support and his own mission. In structure the drama is closely modeled on Greek tragedy: there is a chorus; the action is confined to a single day; and the climactic event (the destruction of the temple) occurs off stage and is related by a witness.

Samuel. In the Bible, a judge and prophet, the religious and political reformer of early Israel, after whom are named two books of the Old Testament. At his birth, he was consecrated to temple service by his mother Hannah and, when still a child, heard Jehovah’s voice in the night. He preserved the work of Moses in reuniting the people and established schools devoted to the cultivation of sacred poetry and song. After a long life as priest and leader, Samuel was forced to yield to the people’s demand for a king and established Saul on the throne, though he prophesied loss of liberty. He also anointed David as future king.

Samurai. (Jap., “guard”). Title of the feudal warriors of Japan.

Sánchez, Florencio (1875–1910). Uruguayan dramatist. Considered the outstanding dramatist of the Rio de la Plata region, Sánchez turned to the theater after working as a journalist and participating in anarchist agitation. He wrote his first play, M’hijo el dotor (1903), in less than three weeks in order to earn enough money to marry his sweetheart, whose parents viewed his bleak prospects with disfavor. Dealing with the conflict between an old gaucho and his urbane, self-centered son, the play met with notable success. The struggle between the old order and new is also the theme of other plays by Sánchez, notably La Gringa (1904), which is concerned with racial animosity between native Argentines and Italian immigrants, and Barranca abajo (1905), a poignant elegy on the gaucho threatened by “progress.” Los muertos (1905) deals with the urban middle classes. Sánchez’ work has been likened to Ibsen’s, because of its realism and emphasis on contemporary problems.

Sanctuary (1931). A novel by William Faulkner. Horace Benbow, an ineffectual intellectual, becomes involved in the violent events centering around Temple Drake, a young coed. Temple is raped by Popeye, who murders a man trying to protect the girl. Carried off to a Memphis brothel by Popeye, Temple later protects him and testifies against Lee Goodwin, who is accused of the murder. Benbow defends Goodwin at the trial and unsuccessfully tries to give shelter to his common-law wife. Temple's testimony ends all hope for Goodwin, who is lynched by the townspeople. Temple's story is continued in Requiem for a Nun.

Sanctorum. See Holy of Holies.

Sanctus (Lat. "holy"). The oldest of the fixed chants in all historical Christian Eucharistic liturgies. The text, derived from the Book of Isaiah, begins "Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord God of Hosts." It is sung just before the Consecration.

Sand, George. Pen name of Amantine Lucile Aurore Dupin Baronne Dudevant (1804-1876). French writer. George Sand is as famous for her love affairs with such prominent artistic figures as Alfred de Musset and Frédéric Chopin, as she is for her writings. In 1831 she left her husband, Baron Dudevant, and established herself in Paris. Her work is usually divided into three distinct periods, the first of which, intensely romantic, corresponds to her affair with Musset (see Elle et Lui). The novels of this period plead the right of free love for both men and women, and include such works as Indiana, Lélia, and Valentine (1832). During the next decade George Sand became interested in various humanitarian reform movements and published such works as Consuelo and Le Meunier d'Angibault (1845). Her last group of novels, studies of nature and of rustic manners, includes La Mare au Diable (1846), La Petite Fadette (1848), and François le Champy (1850).

Sanadalphon. One of the three angels of rabbinical legend who receive the prayers of the faithful and weave them into crowns.

Sandburg, Carl (1878- ). American poet. Known for his free verse, written under the influence of Walt Whitman and celebrating industrial and agricultural America, American geography and landscape, figures in American history, and the American common people, he frequently makes use of contemporary American slang and colloquialisms. Born in Galesburg, Ill., Sandburg left school at 13 and worked at a variety of odd jobs in his youth, traveled as a hobo to the West, served in the Spanish-American War, and worked his way through college. He was an advertising writer, a newspaper reporter, a correspondent in Sweden and Norway, and an editorial writer for the Chicago Daily News. Early in his career he evinced socialist sympathies, worked for the Social-Democratic Party in Wisconsin, and later was secretary to the first Socialist mayor of Milwaukee.

After an early pamphlet, In Reckless Ecstasy (1904), Sandburg began publishing his poems in Harriet Monroe's Poetry, becoming part of the Chicago Renaissance (See Chicago Group). With Chicago Poems (1916) and Cornhuskers, his reputation was established. These volumes were followed in the 20's by Smoke and Steel, Slabs of the Sunburnt West (1922), Selected Poems (1926), and Good Morning, America (1928). Also in the 20's, Sandburg's energies were directed into three other areas. The most important of these was the beginning of his monumental study, Abraham Lincoln. His second area of interest was the collection of American folklore, the ballads of The American Songbag. This was to be followed by The New American Songbag (1950). Finally, Sandburg began to publish books for children. The best known of these is Rootabaga Stories, followed by Rootabaga Pigeons (1923), The Rootabaga Country (1929), and Potato Face (1930).

In the 1930's, Sandburg continued his celebration of America, especially with Mary Lincoln, Wife and Widow (1932); The People, Yes; and the second part of his Lincoln biography, Abraham Lincoln: The War Years (1939). For the latter he received a Pulitzer Prize; he received a second Pulitzer Prize for his Complete Poems (1958). Among Sandburg's other prose works are The Chicago Race Riots (1919); Steichen the Photographer (1929), a biography of his brother-in-law; Remembrance Rock (1948), a novel; and Always the Young Strangers (1952), an autobiography of his youth.

Sandhurst. A parish in Berkshire, England. It is the seat of the Royal Military College, which corresponds to St.-Cyr in France and to West Point in the U.S.

Sandibar, Tales of. See Seven Wise Masters, The.

Sandoz, Mari [Susette] (1901- ). American biographer and historical writer. A native of Nebraska, Miss Sandoz is known especially for her biography of her pioneer father, Old Jules (1935), and for such nonfiction narratives as Crazy Horse (1942), Cheyenne Autumn (1953), The Cattlemen (1958), Love Song to the Plains (1961), and These Were the Sioux (1961). She also wrote several novels, including Slogum House (1937), Capital City (1939), and Miss Morissa (1955).

Sandys, George (1578-1644). English poet and translator, a traveler in the Orient, one-time resident of Virginia, and a courtier of Charles I. Sandys is best known for his translation (1626) of Ovid's Metamorphoses, but also wrote numerous Biblical paraphrases and translations.

Sangrado, Dr. An epitaph applicable to an ignorable or quack doctor, from the doctor in the novel Gil Blas de Santillane by Alain René Lesage. Gil Blas, the hero, becomes his servant and pupil. Sangrado's knowledge of medicine is limited to prescribing bleeding and hot water. He is also known as the doctor of Valladolid.

Sangreal. See Grail.

Sangster, Charles (1822-1893). Canadian poet. Sangster is remembered as one of the first poets to make appreciative use of Canadian subjects. His works include The St. Lawrence and the Saguenay and Other Poems (1856) and Hesperus and Other Poems (1860).

Sanhedrin or Sanhedrin. The chief judicial council of the Jews from the 3rd century B.C. to A.D. 70. After the destruction of Jerusalem in 70, the Sanhedrin lost its temporal powers; it lasted until the fifth century as a purely religious body. Formerly it had acted as the supreme court in the interpretation of the complex Jewish law, having the power of life and death over the accused. It is not certain whether Gamals, when he judged Jesus, was acting as a member of the Sanhedrin or as an influential leader of the Jewish community.

San Martín, José de (1778–1850). Argentine general and revolutionary leader. After taking part in Argentina's struggle for independence from Spain,
San Martín became governor of Cuyo province (1814–1817), where he organized an army to lead against Chile and Peru, the stronghold of Spanish power in South America. After an arduous trek across the Andes, San Martín and the Chilean patriot Bernardo O'Higgins defeated the Spaniards at Chacabuco and Maipú and declared the independence of Chile. Rejecting the political honors which the grateful Chileans offered him, San Martín turned to the liberation of Peru. Although he was able to declare Peru's independence in 1821, most of the territory included in the viceroyalty of Peru still remained in royalist hands, and San Martín, who was named dictator of Peru, resolved to seek the aid of Bolívar.
After a famous meeting between the two liberators at Guaquilling (1822), San Martín, perhaps in the belief that his continued presence in Peru would delay the final victory, resigned his post and left the country, leaving a clear field for Bolívar. He spent his last years in Europe and died in France. His achievements were belatedly recognized by his countrymen, who had ignored or vilified him during his lifetime, and in 1880 his remains were brought to Argentina for final burial in Buenos Aires.

Sannazzaro, Jacopo (1456–1530). Neapolitan poet. Known also by his academic name of Actius Syncerus, he devoted most of his life to the service of the house of Aragon. His writings include Latin elegies, epigrams and piscatorial (or maritime) eclogues, the latter being the first attempts at the genre since Theocritus. His religious poem De partu virginis (On the Virgin's Parturition) was one of several Renaissance attempts at writing Vergilian epic on Christian subject matter and eventually influenced Milton. In Italian he wrote sonnets and canzoni, but his masterpiece is the Arcadia (1501–1504), a pastoral romance immensely popular and influential throughout Europe. Written between 1480 and 1485, it is divided into 12 prose chapters, each accompanied by 12 poems, and tells of the adventures of Sincero, who visits Arcadia to observe the pastoral life of its inhabitants. He returns to Naples in search of his beloved Fillide only to find her dead. The Arcadia was imitated by many European writers; in England, Spenser and Sidney are only two of his adapters, the latter using its title and some details for his own prose romance.

Sansoy. See Faerie Queene, The.
Sansjoy. See Faerie Queene, The.
Sanskara. The 10 essential rites of Hindus of the first three castes. They take place at the conception of a child; at the quickening; at birth; at naming;
when carrying the child out to see the moon;
when giving him his first food to eat; at the ceremony of tonsure; during investiture with the sacred thread; at the close of his studies; at the ceremony of "marriage," when he is qualified to perform the sacred rites ordained.

Sansloy. See Faerie Queene, The.
Sanson, William (1912– ). English novelist and short-story writer. He is the author of sinister Kafkaesque works such as the novel The Body (1949), an account of a paranoid delusion narrated by its victim, and the short stories collected in Fireman Flower (1944) and Something Terrible, Something Lovely (1954). Stories about restlessness and defection in love are collected in The Face of Innocence (1951) and A Bed of Roses (1954). The Pas-ionate North (1950) and other collections of short stories vividly describe foreign backgrounds and are really travel books.

Sanson, Charles Henri (1740–1795). Official executor in Paris from 1788 to his death. He executed Louis XVI. His son and colleague, Henri, executed Marie Antoinette.

Sansonetto of Mecca. In Lodovico Ariosto's Orlando Furioso, a Saracen knight who had been baptized by Orlando and joined the Christian cause.
He is Charlemagne's commander at Jerusalem.

Sans Souci (Fr., "carefree"). The palace built by Frederick II near Potsdam (1747).

Santa Anna or Santa Ana, Antonio López de (1795–1876). Mexican general and political leader.
Now generally regarded as a self-seeking opportunist who betrayed every cause he espoused, Santa Anna dominated Mexican politics for over 25 years. After serving as president (1834–1835), he led the Mexican assault at the Alamo. Taken prisoner at the battle of San Jacinto shortly afterwards, he was released when he promised to recognize the independence of Texas. He was provisional president and commander of the Mexican forces during the war with the U.S., but was deposed after the American victory. Again made president in 1853, he was exiled in 1855.
1874 he was permitted to return to Mexico, where he died penniless and alone.

Santa Claus or Santa Claus. The patron saint of children and bearer of gifts at Christmas. His name is a corruption of the Dutch form of St. Nicholas. His feast-day is December 6, and the vigil is still held in some places, but for the most part his name is now associated with Christmas-time. The old custom used to be for someone, on December 5, to assume the costume of a bishop and distribute small gifts to good children.

Santa Fe Trail. The main overland route to the American Southwest and southern California in the years before the railroad. Originally traced by explorer William Becknell in 1821–1822, it began at Independence (originally at Franklin), Mo., proceeded along the prairie divide to the great bend of the Arkansas River, followed the river upward almost to the mountains, then turned south to Santa Fe. It is still the route of a transcontinental highway and of the Atchison, Topeka, and Santa Fe Railroad.

Josiah Gregg's Commerce of the Prairies (1844) is the classic account of the trail. Novels about the trail include Stanley Vestal's 'Dobie Walls' (1917) and Harvey Fergusson's trilogy, Followers of the Sun (1938).

Santa Fe Trail, The: A Humoresque (1914). A poem by Vachel Lindsay. It contrasts industrial civilization at the beginning of the 20th century with the Rachel-Jane bird, which sings of love and eternal youth. It is notable for its radical sound effects.

Santa Sophia. The great metropolitan cathedral of the Greek Orthodox Church at Constantinople. It was built in the sixth century by Justinian, but since the capture of the city by the Turks in 1453 has been used as a mosque. It was not dedicated to a saint named Sophia but to the Logos, the second Person of the Trinity, called Hagia Sophia or Sacred Wisdom.

Santayana, George (1863–1952). Spanish-born American philosopher, poet, novelist, and critic. He was known for his cosmopolitan viewpoint, his philosophic skepticism and materialism, his interest in the systems of Plato and Aristotle, and his fondness for the Greek and Roman classical ideals of beauty.

Santayana studied at Harvard University and later returned there to teach philosophy; among his students were Conrad Aiken, Robert Benchley, Felix Frankfurter, Walter Lippmann, and T. S. Eliot. In 1912 Santayana resigned from the university and went to live and travel in Europe, spending winters in Rome and summers in Paris. At the outset of World War II he moved to a Roman Catholic nursing home in Rome where he spent the rest of his life.

Santayana himself divided his work into two groups: the poetic, or personal, and the academic. The first group includes such works as Lucifer: A Theological Tragedy (1899), Dialogues in Limbo (1925), and The Last Puritan. Santayana's memoirs, Persons and Places, were published in three volumes: The Background of My Life (1944), The Middle Span (1945), and My Host the World (1953).

In the academic group are The Sense of Beauty (1896), an outline of an aesthetic theory; The Life of Reason, or, The Phases of Human Progress, a five-volume work including Introduction and Reason in Common Sense (1905), Reason in Society (1905), Reason in Religion (1905), Reason in Art (1905), and Reason in Science (1906), all based on a materialistic view of nature; Skepticism and Animal Faith (1923); and Realms of Being, including the four volumes The Realm of Essence (1927), The Realm of Matter (1930), The Realm of Truth (1937), and The Realm of Spirit (1940). In addition to many other works, Santayana dealt with the American scene in Character and Opinion in the United States (1921) and The Gentile Tradition at Bay (1931).

Santiago. See St. James the Greater.

Santillana, marqués de. Iñigo López de Mendoza (1398–1456). Spanish poet. The nephew of the chancellor Ayala, Santillana was a great feudal lord who fought against the Moors and conspired against Alvaro de Luna, the powerful favorite of John II. Italian influences are evident in his two allegorical poems, La comedia de Ponsa and Infierno de los enamorados, and in his 42 sonnets, a form which he introduced to Spain. He is best known, however, for his charming serranillas, or mountain songs, such as the one about his encounter with the milk-maid of Finajosa. He also wrote Proemio e Carta, a letter on the nature of poetry addressed to the constable of Portugal, which is regarded as the first example of literary criticism in Spain.

Santos-Dumont, Alberto (1873–1932). A Brazilian pioneer aeronaut in France. His airship won a prize (1901) for making the first flight from St. Cloud around the Eiffel Tower and back. He also experimented with an airplane of a box-kite type (1906) and a monoplane (1909).

Sapper. See H. C. MckINZIE.

Sapphic. A four-lined verse-form of classical lyric poetry. It is named after the Greek poetess Sappho, who employed it, the fourth line being an Adonic. There must be a caesura at the fifth foot of each of the first three lines, which run thus:

| | | | | |
```

The Adonic is

```
| | | | | |
```

All the night sleep came not upon my eyelids,
Shed not dew, nor shook nor unclose a feather,
Yet with lips shut close and with eyes of iron
Stood and beheld me.

Algernon Charles Swinburne

Sapphira. A female liar. See ANANIAS.

Sappho (b. 612 b.c.). One of the most famous lyric poets of all time, a native of Lesbos. Except for a period of some years in Sicily, she lived in Lesbos all her life. Married and with a daughter, she was the leader of some kind of group of young girls who were devotees of music and poetry, and perhaps of Aphrodite. To some of these girls are addressed many of Sappho's poems. Classical writers called Sappho the tenth muse. Although her poems survive only in fragments, their lyrical intensity and economy prove that her reputation was not exaggerated. The legend that she flung herself into the sea on being rejected by the beautiful youth Phaon has been the subject of many works, from a section of Ovid's Heroides to plays by John Lyly (1584) and Percy MacKay (1907), both of which are named Sappho and Phao.

Saracinesca (1887). A novel by F. Marion Crawford. It is the first of four novels dealing with the fortunes of a great Italian family in Rome from 1865 to the 1890's. The novel was followed by Sant' ilario (1889), Don Orsino (1892), and Corleone (1897).

Sarah or Sarai. In the Old Testament (Gen. 12-23), the wife of Abraham and mother of Isaac. After the birth of Isaac, which occurred in her old age in accordance with Jehovah's promise to make a great nation of Abraham, her name was changed from Sarai to Sarah. See Hag. 12-23.

Sara Monday. The heroine of a trilogy by Joyce Cary. See Hosea's Mouth. The.

Sarasvati. A sacred river in the Punjab in North India. It is personified by the ancient Hindus as the wife of Brahma and goddess of the fine arts. The river loses itself in the sands, but was fabled to become united with the Ganges and Jamuna.

Sardanapalus. The mythical last king of Assyria. His legend, as it grew up among the Greeks, combined the name of one historical ruler, Assur-danin-pal, with some of the exploits of another, Assur-bani-pal. An effete ruler, he nevertheless was said to have fought bravely against the rebellious Medes. When faced with inevitable defeat, he burned himself, his wife, and his treasures in the year 880 B.C.

Sardou, Victorien (1831-1908). French dramatist. The author of comedies and historical dramas that won him enormous popularity during his lifetime, Sardou excelled at clever plot construction. His light, shallow comedies of manners include Les Pattes de mouche (A Scrap of Paper, 1860), Nos Intimes (Peril, 1861), and La Famille Benolton (1865). Sarah Bernhardt played the leading role in several of his historical dramas, including Phédora (1882), in which she triumphantly returned to the stage of Paris, and La Tosca (1887), on which Puccini based his opera of the same title.

Sarett, Lew (1888-1954). American poet. Sarett was a guide and forest ranger before he became a university teacher, and his poetry is often concerned with the American Indian and the creatures of the wild. Among his collections are Many Many Moons (1920), The Box of God (1922), Slow Smoke (1925), and Collected Poems (1941).

Sargasso Sea. A part of the North Atlantic Ocean. It derives its name from the great amount of seaweed (gulfweed or Sargassum) floating in it.

Sargent, John Singer (1856-1925). American painter. Born in Italy, he studied in Florence and Paris, and lived mostly in London. A fashionable and elegant portrait painter, he recorded surface observations with brilliant brushwork, if little insight. He was a distinguished watercolorist and also did murals for the Public Library and the Museum of Fine Arts in Boston.

Sarment, Jean (1897- ). French dramatist. His plays, such as Le Pêcheur d'ombres (1921) and Les Plus Beaux Yeux du monde (1925), are peopled with poets and dreamers unable to face the reality of life.

Sarmiento, Domingo Faustino (1811-1888). Argentine statesman, educator, and writer. Completely self-educated, Sarmiento once wrote that he had tried to pattern himself on Benjamin Franklin. His political career began when he opposed the dictatorship of Juan Manuel de Rosas, whom he denounced in his greatest work, Facundo. He spent many years as an exile in Chile, where he wrote spelling books and primers, directed a secondary school, and founded the first normal school in South America. He returned to Argentina after Rosas had been overthrown and held several important political posts. In 1864 he was named Argentine minister to the U.S., a country he unabashedly admired. While he was returning to Argentina in 1865, he was informed that he had been elected president of the republic. During his six years in office, he reformed the country's educational system, encouraged large-scale immigration, and furthered advances in transportation and communications. He was, however, unable to diminish the personalism in Argentine politics, and when his term ended the country was divided by civil war.

A prolific writer whose complete works fill 52 volumes, Sarmiento was a romantic in style and literary outlook. In 1842 he engaged in a newspaper debate with Andrés Bello, the great grammarian and poet, in which he argued that linguists should describe, rather than prescribe, usage and that literature should emphasize content, rather than form. Other important works by Sarmiento are Viajes (1849), an account of a trip to Europe, Africa, and the U.S., and Recuerdos de provincia (1850), an engaging memoir of his childhood.

Saroyan, William (1908- ). American short-story writer, novelist, and playwright. He is known for his impressionistic stories and sketches, which exalt personal emotion and freedom and assert kindness and brotherly love as a human ideal. His short story The Daring Young Man on the Flying Trapeze (1934), a mingling of fantasy and realism, did much to establish his reputation. There followed such fiction as Inhale and Exhale (1936), Three Times Three (1936), Peace, It's Wonderful (1939), and the autobiographical My Name Is Aram (1940). The Human Comedy (1942) was a largely autobiographical novel about a little boy who delivers telegrams.

Saroyan's play My Heart's in the Highlands (1939) was a Broadway success and was followed by The Time of Your Life, the winner of a Pulitzer Prize which the author refused, believing that commerce should not patronize art. This play was followed by Love's Old Sweet Song (1940) and The Beautiful People (1941). Two by Saroyan (which included The Cave Dwellers, 1958) was produced in 1961. Saroyan's later writing includes The Adventures of Weasly Jackson (1946), The Bicycle Rider of Beverly Hills (1952), Papa, You're Crazy (1957), and Boys and Girls Together (1963).

Sarraute, Nathalie

It purports to review a work on the philosophy of clothes by Diogenes Teufelsdröckh, an eccentric old professor of Things in General at Weissnichtwo (Ger., know not where). Passages supposedly translated from the German and the editor's running comments weave a narrative of Teufelsdröckh's life, often considered of autobiographical interest. A restless, impressionable youth, he passes through one disillusioning experience after another. He attends the university, studies law, falls in love with the Rose Goddess, Blumine, who discards him for a more eligible suitor. After years of despair and wandering, he realizes that "here, in this poor, miserable, hampered, despicable Actual, wherein thou even now standest, here or nowhere is thy ideal. . . ."

Sartre, Jean Paul (1905– ). French philosopher, dramatist, novelist, and teacher. Born and educated in Paris, he began his career by teaching (1929), first in lycées (secondary schools) in the provinces and later in Paris. He also traveled widely before 1935, and, while in Germany (1933–1934), studied under the philosophers Edmund Husserl and Martin Heidegger, who greatly influenced his thinking. Before World War II he wrote several original psychological studies: Imagination (1936), Emotions, Outline of a Theory (Esquisse d'une théorie des émotions; 1939), and The Psychology of Imagination (L'Imaginaire; 1940). He became known, however, for a series of articles on contemporary literature which did much to popularize in France the works of American novelists such as Faulkner, Hemingway, Dos Passos, and Steinbeck. In 1938, Sartre published the novel Nausea and the next year the short stories in The Wall, both books dramatizing the discovery of the meaninglessness of human life, which is the precondition for the philosophy of existentialism as Sartre later developed it.

He joined the French army in 1939 and was taken prisoner in Alsace in 1940. After nine months he escaped to Paris and resumed teaching. He took an active part in the underground Resistance movement, writing for clandestine publications such as Combat. The production of the play The Flies in 1943, despite the Nazi censorship of the Occupation, emphasized that the apparently pessimistic of Nausea did not lead to nihilism for Sartre but to the active assumption of moral responsibility—the position Sartre described as being engagé, or actively engaged in the business of shaping one's life. The same year he published Being and Nothingness, the major exposition of his analysis of man's condition and potentialities.

The following year, No Exit was produced, and, after the liberation of France, Sartre left his teaching position and organized (1946) the politico-literary review Les Temps modernes. He became internationally famous as the leader of a group of intellectuals, described in many of the works of his intimate friend Simone de Beauvoir. The Café de Flore where they gathered attracted tourists as well as disciples, and, for the rest of the decade, existentialism became a popular fashion as well as a serious and major influence on contemporary writers.

Albert Camus was one of the friends in Sartre's circle. Although his philosophical thinking started from similar assumptions, he was not an existentialist, and he disagreed publicly with Sartre on a number of issues, particularly that of ends and means. Sartre dramatized this issue in the controversial play Dirty Hands, which reflects his troubled sympathy with Communism. He defended this sympathy on occasion, on the grounds that one must be engagé, that even though there can be no perfect causes, one is obligated to support the least undesirable cause in order to act, in this case for the reform of existing social institutions. After the Soviet intervention in Hungary in 1956, however, Sartre publicly announced his final disillusionment.

Other important plays by Sartre include The Respectful Prostitute, The Devil and the Good Lord (Le Diable et le bon Dieu; 1951), Kean (1953), Nekrassov (1956), and The Condemned of Altona (Les séquestrés d'Altona; 1959), also translated as Loser Wins. The Chips Are Down (Les jeux sont faits; 1947), later revised as a novel, and In the Mesh (L'Engrenage; 1948) are film scenarios.

Sartre's other works include the novel trilogy The Roads to Freedom; the essays Existentialism and Humanism (L'Existentialisme et un humanisme), first presented as lectures in 1945; Baudelaire (1947); Literary and Philosophical Essays (Situations I; 1947); Saint Genet (1952), an exploration of the philosophical and psychological aspects of Jean Genet's life; and Search for a Method, the prefatory essay to Critique de la raison dialectique (1960).

Sassoon, Siegfried (1886– ). English poet, best known for his lyrics exposing the horrors of war. His volume Counter-Attack and other Poems (1918) contains angry, violent, and satirical poems about World War I trench warfare. He is also known for his fictional autobiography, called The Memoirs of George Sherston (3 vols., 1928–1936). The first volume, Memoirs of a Fox-Hunting Man, is a particularly vivid evocation of the life of the old English country gentry. Siegfried's Journey (1945) is a three-volume continuation of the autobiography.

During World War I Sassoon was wounded twice, received two medals for bravery, and attained the rank of captain, but he became a pacifist. He spent some time in the same hospital as Wilfred Owen and encouraged him in his writing.

Satan (Heb., "adversary"). In Judaic-Christian belief, the chief spirit of evil in the universe. He entered into Jewish religious thought during the Exile under the influence of the dualistic Persian theology of Zoroastrianism, and continued in Christian doctrine. It was Satan who, in opposition to God, tested Job and tempted Jesus in the wilderness. In early Christian writings he appeared as Christ's chief adversary. Many strange doctrines concerning Satan's continuing war with God were later considered heretical, but belief in the devil was an important factor in daily life throughout the Middle Ages and common up until modern times, though it no longer plays a widespread role in Christian theology.

The gods of one religion have often become the devils of an opposing religion. Following this principle, the Christian Devil acquired many characteristics of various "heathen" deities. In the early days of the Church, popular superstition added a whole company of demons to Satan's entourage. Later, many traits of Norse and Germanic gods and spirits enhanced his powers, notably the capacity to assume many forms, human and animal.

In Paradise Lost, Milton follows the Talmudic tradition of Satan's expulsion from heaven for pride, and makes him monarch of hell. His chief lords are Beelzebub, Moloch, Chemos, Thammuz, Dagon, Rimmon, and Belial—all once powerful gods of the ancient Near East. His standard-bearer is Azazel. Milton's Satan is a daring, ambitious chieftain who believes that "tis better to reign in hell than serve in heaven." In Dante's Divine Comedy, Lucifer, rather than Satan, is the ruler of hell. See Phineas Fletcher; Satanism.

Satanic school. A name of a group of writers in the early part of the 19th century. They were said to show a scorn for all moral rules and the generally received dogmas of the Christian religion. The most eminent English writers of this school were Bulwer Lytton, Byron, Moore, and Shelley. Of French writers, the leaders were Paul de Kock (1794–1871), George Sand, and Victor Hugo. The term was first used by Soutey in the preface of his Vision of Judgment (1821).

Satanism. The worship of Satan. A survival of pre-Christian fertility cults, it gained impetus in about the twelfth century from the secret rebellion against the Church. The central ritual of the cult was the Black Mass, an insulting and sometimes grisly parody of the Christian mass. It was performed by an unrobed priest, with the nude body of a reclining woman as the altar. The Host was sometimes stolen from a church; at other times it was the ashes and blood of murdered children. These practices, often connected with witchcraft, were supposed to have magical efficacy. They gave rise to the legend of the Witches' Sabbath, or Walpurgis Night.

Satanstoe (1845). A novel by James Fenimore Cooper. The first volume in the Littlepage Manuscripts, Satanstoe gives the historical background of the Anti-Revolution dispute. Set in pre-Revolutionary New York, the book shows the trouble and expense incurred by patriotic landowners, in encouraging the settlement of outlying lands. The hero, Corny Littlepage, is the heir of an old Dutch family living at Satanstoe, a strip of land in Westchester County. Corny travels upstate to explore his father's lands, falls in love, and fights the French and Indians at Lake George.

Satie, Erik [Alfred-Leslie] (1865–1925). French composer whose early rebellion against the ideals of romanticism earned him the adulation of Léon and others. He collaborated with Pablo Picasso and Jean Cocteau on the ballet Parade (1917).

Satin Slipper, The (Le Soulier de Satin, 4 vols.; 1928–1929). A poetic drama by Paul Claudel, revised for the stage in 1943. The never-consummated passion of Don Rodrigue and Donna Prouheze (at first married to old Don Pêlage) blazes across a baroque pageant of 16th-century Spain's domination of the seas, of Morocco, and of South America, until after the defeat of the Spanish Armada by the English. The love they cannot exchange is transmuted during their entire lives into the energy that explores a continent or holds an embattled fortress, and thus fulfills God's purpose. Because they accept the difficult challenge of bearing their separation loyally and nobly, their passion becomes the annealing flame that prepares them for spiritual joy; the symbol of this is the gay Dona Sept-Epées (Seven-Swords), who is actually Prouheze’s daughter by her second husband, Don Camille, but spiritually the child of Rodrigue.

satori. Enlightenment in Zen Buddhism. It is attained in Rinzai Zen as a product of successful intensive meditation and kōan practice; in Sōtō Zen by meditative sitting. An adept may have many satoris in the course of his Zen training.

Satsuma. One of the early powerful clans in Japan. Satsuma ware is a brand of china.

Saturday Night and Sunday Morning (1958). A novel by Alan Sillitoe. Arthur Seaton, the hero, is a young factory worker whose weekdays are devoted to a dull, evil-smelling job. His Saturday nights are devoted to drink, promiscuity and general rebellion, while on Sunday mornings he fishes peacefully in the country. Eventually he chooses the almost secure perpetual “Sunday morning” of marriage to a nice, ordinary girl.

Saturday Review. A weekly literary review founded in 1924 by Henry Seidel Canby, Christopher Morley, Amy Loveman, and William Rose Benét. Originally called The Saturday Review of Literature, it changed its name in 1925, because by then it covered social commentary, recordings, the drama, radio, television, and travel, as well as books. Among its other editors have been Bernard De Voto (1936–1938), George Stevens (1938–1940), and Norman Cousins (since 1940).

Saturn. An Italian god of agriculture, later identified with the Greek Cronus. He was the husband of Ops, goddess of plenty identified with the Greek Rhea. As a legendary king of Rome, Saturn was remembered for introducing agriculture, and his reign, considered a golden age, was commemorated by the Saturnalia, a festival which lasted from the 17th to the 19th of December. During this period, presents were exchanged, and all people, even slaves, were freed from customary restraints. The temple of Saturn was located at the foot of the Capitoline hill.

Saturnalia. A time of unrestrained disorder and misrule. In ancient Rome, it was the festival of Saturn, and was celebrated from the 17th to the 19th of December. During its continuance no public business could be transacted; the law courts and schools were closed; no war could be started, and no malefactor punished. Under the empire, the festival was extended to seven days.

Satyrane, Sir. See Faerie Queene, THE.

satyr play. A semiserious form of classical Greek drama. Presented at the end of a trilogy of tragedies by the same author, a satyr play apparently brought comic relief to the great festivals of drama. It treated serious mythological events in a grotesquely comic manner, but had the form of tragedy. The only surviving satyr plays are Cyclops by Euripides and a long fragment of Sophocles’ Icithyiai. The first tells the famous story of Polyphemus and Odysseus, the second the miraculous growth of the infant Hermes. As in all satyr plays, the chorus is made up of horse-tailed satyrs. Because of its comic scenes with the drunken Heracles, Euripides’ Alcestis resembles a satyr play.

satyrs. In Greek legend, a race of goat-men who dwelt in the woodlands. The most famous satyr was Silenus. They were often shown as followers of Dionysus and spent much of their time in amorous pursuit of the nymphs.

Saul. (1) In the Old Testament (I Sam. 9–15), 1st king of Israel, anointed by Samuel when the people demanded a king. In his moods of despair, he was calmed by the harp playing of David, but grew jealous of David’s friendship with his son Jonathan and persecuted David. He and his son were slain on Mount Gilboa, while in battle against the Philistines. (2) Paul, the apostle, was known in Hebrew as Saul of Tarsus.

Saunders, Richard. Benjamin Franklin’s pen name, under which he wrote the maxims in Poor Richard’s Almanack.

Savage, Richard (1697–1743). English playwright and poet, who claimed to be the illegitimate son of the countess of Macclesfield and Richard Savage, fourth Earl Rivers. His friend Dr. Samuel Johnson wrote his biography in The Lives of the Poets, although the account there of his birth and ill treatment is now generally disbelieved. Some of his plays were acted in Drury Lane. In one of them, Sir Thomas Overbury (1723), he himself played the title role. Savage edited Miscellaneous Poems and Translations (1726), a well-known collection, and wrote The Wanderer (1729), a poem. He had an adventurous life, and died in debtor’s prison.

Savoir, Alfred [born Poznanski] (1883–1934). Polish-born French dramatist. Savoir wrote a number of extravagantly farcical comedies, such as The Tamer; or, English as It Is Eaten (Le Dompteur; 1925) and He (Lui; 1929). Banco (1922) and Bacara (1927) are iconoclastic satires.

Savonarola, Fra Girolamo (1452–1498). The celebrated monk of Ferrara who came to Florence and preached reform. From the Dominican monastery of San Marco and the pulpit of the cathedral, his sermons and exhortations engulfed the city in a tidal wave of piety. After the ouster of the Medici family, he held political as well as spiritual power over the city; heeding his call to reform and purify, the people burned vanities, eschewed paganism, and practiced repentance. Finally, charges of disobedience, then heresy, brought his excommunication from the Church and his burning at the stake. His surviving sermons give some indication of why he was able to win adherents among the people and among such artists as Botticelli, Pico della Mirandola, Benvinci, Ficino, and the young Michelangelo. Savonarola is a leading character in George Eliot’s Romola, and appears in Harriet Beecher Stowe’s Agnes of Sorrento (1862).

Savoy, the. A precinct and parish of London between the Strand and the Thames. The famous Savoy Palace, the London residence of John of Gaunt, where Chaucer was married, once stood there. It was burned by the rebels under Wat Tyler, and rebuilt as a hospital. When Waterloo Bridge was built, the remains of the palace were all swept away. The Savoy Hotel and Theatre (1881) stand near the Strand, and the latter gave its name to the operas of Gilbert and Sullivan which were called the Savoy Operas. Members of the company that produced them were called Savoyards.
Savoyard, Vicar. A priest in Rousseau’s educational romance EMILE, charged with Emile’s religious instruction. His own liberal Christianism and sentiments deistic teachings are intended to make Emile follow his natural instincts and disregard all matters of religion, and to be wary of formal dogma.

Saxe, Comte Hermann Maurice de. Known as marshal de Saxe (1696–1750). Famous marshal of France who served under Marlborough and Prince Eugene, natural son of Augustus II of Saxony. He was victor at Fontenoy (1745) and was created marshal general (1747). His remarkable work on the art of war, Mes Rêveries, was published in 1757.

Saxo Grammaticus (c. 1150–c. 1220). Danish historian and poet. His Gesta Danorum or Historia Danica (c. 1185–1208) chronicles the history of Danish kings and heroes to 1185, interspersed with translations of earlier poetry. The account of Amleth (2d century B.C.) is the ultimate source for Shakespeare’s Hamlet.

Sayers, Dorothy (1893–1957). English detective-story writer and author of books of Christian apologetics. Her sophisticated detective stories, with their urbane sleuth Lord Peter Wimsey, are popular among intellectuals: Whose Body? (1923), Strong Poison (1930), The Nine Tailors (1934), and many others. In later life she wrote plays, often religious, such as The Man Born to Be King (1942); books of amateur theology such as Creed or Chaos (1947); and translations of Dante (1949–1955).

Scævola, Gaius Mucius. A legendary Roman youth who volunteered to assassinate Lars Porsena when the latter besieged Rome (509 B.C.). Captured and asked for details of the plot, Scævola refused to confess, and, in order to show that any attempt to force him to talk by torture would be vain, he thrust his right hand into the fire, holding it there until it was completely consumed. Lars Porsena thereupon released him and negotiated peace with Rome. He thereby earned the cognomen Scævola (left-handed).

Scala, La. Opera house in Milan (1778), one of the largest and most important in the world.

scalds or skalds. Court poets and chroniclers of the ancient Scandinavians.

Sealiger, Giulio Cesare. Known as Julius Caesar Scaliger (1484–1558). Italian literary critic. He was born and spent his youth as soldier and student in northern Italy. In 1525, he moved to France as a physician and stayed there to become a leading advocate of the moralist approach to literature. His Poetics (1561), ostensibly a manual for writing Latin poetry, served to spread his critical ideas throughout Europe.

Scamander (Skamandros) or Xanthos. A river near the ancient city of Troy. It figures largely in the accounts of the Trojan War.

scansion. In prosody, the term denoting the determination of the meter of a piece of poetry through the analysis, either written and detailed or done mentally in a general way, of the lines. The verb is “to scan,” and any piece of writing or of speech can be scanned to determine its meter or its rhythm. Detailed scansion is accomplished by marking each syllable according to whether it is accented or not and analyzing the pattern of accents and noneaccents.

scapegoat. A sacrificial animal symbolically bearing the sins of a group. Part of the ancient ritual among the Hebrews for the Day of Atonement laid down by Mosaic law (Lev. 16) was as follows: Two goats were brought to the altar of the tabernacle and the high priests cast lots, one for the Lord, the other for Azazel. The Lord’s goat was sacrificed; the other was the scapegoat. After the high priest, by confession, had transferred his sins and the sins of the people to it, it was taken into the desert and allowed to escape.

The word has come to mean anyone who bears the blame for a group or another person.

Scapigliatura, La (Ital., “the disheveled ones”). An avant-garde literary circle that flourished in Milan c. 1860–1875. The name was coined by one of its founding members, Clietto Arrighi, pen name of Carlo Righetti (1830–1906), as an Italian equivalent of the “Bohème,” the noted French circle of iconoclastic writers.

The Scapigliatura counted among its adherents Righetti; Arrigo Boero; Giuseppe Rovani (1812–74), its chief exponent; Emilio Praga; and Clietto Ugo Tarchetti (1841–1869), “the Italian Edgar Allan Poe.” These writers had a common objective in their declared war against the classical and Arcadian (see Arcadian Academy) as well as against the moralistic traditions in Italian literature. They proposed Baudelaire and the budding school of French symbolists as models for Italian writers. Poe (known through Baudelaire’s translations) was another model, as were Ernst Hoffmann and other German romantic writers of the bizarre and macabre.

The result of the Scapigliatura’s antibourgeois, antiradicalist stand was a fusion of interest in pathological characters, such as Tarchetti’s Fosca, and a preference for realistic descriptions expressed in a direct, unadorned, and nonclassical language. Verga, De Marchi, and Capuana were influenced by the Scapigliatura during their literary apprenticeships in Milan. The circle disbanded, having realized its raison d’être, when Capuana published his novel of psychological realism, Giacinta (1879), and Verga published his exemplar of realistic narrative, The Malavoglias (1881).

Scapin. The central character in Molière’s comedy Les Fourberies de Scapin (The Rogueries of Scapin, 1671). A clever and intrepid valet whose roguary provides the interest of the drama, he is the direct literary descendant of Scapino, the lively rascal who had long been one of the stock characters of the Italian stage. In Molière’s comedy he is the valet of Léandre, son of Seignior Gréonte. Léandre falls in love with Zerbinette, supposedly a gypsy, but really the daughter of Seignior Argante, stolen by gypsies in early childhood. Her brother Octave falls in love with Hyacinthe, whom he supposes to be Hyacinthe Pendoleph of Tarentum, but who turns out to be Hyacinthe Gréonte, the sister of Léandre. The gypsies demand a large sum for the ransom of Zerbinette, and Octave requires sufficient money for his marriage with Hyacinthe. Scapin obtains both these sums from the respective fathers under false pretenses. At the end of the comedy he is brought into the wedding banquet on a litter, his head bound as though he were on the point of death. He begs forgiveness, which he readily obtains, and thereupon leaps up from the litter to join the banqueteers.

Thomas Otway made an English version of this Scaramuccia (Fr., Scaramouche; Eng., Scaramouch). A stock character of the Italian commedia dell'arte. He is sometimes considered one of the zanni, or servants, though he may have more closely resembled the braggart soldier. The role was closely associated with Tiborio Fiorillo or Fiorilli (1608-1694), an Italian actor who often played in Paris.

Scarecrow, The (1908). A play by Percy Mackaye. It is based on Hawthorne's Feathertop, the tale of a scarecrow brought to life. In the play the scarecrow becomes Lord Ravensbane, successfully woos Rachel Merton, and eventually chooses to die in order to save her from further grief. The play was made into the silent film Puritan Passions and was successfully revived on Broadway in 1953.

Scarlatti, Alessandro (1660-1725). Italian composer, the outstanding figure of the Late Baroque period in Italy. His many operas are an important milestone on the way to modern opera, and he also wrote over 600 cantatas for solo voices, as well as church music. His son Domenico Scarlatti (1685-1757), long resident in Spain, was a virtuoso harpsichordist and composer, famous for his sonatas for the harpsichord.

Scarlet, Will. One of the companions of Robin Hood in the English Robin Hood ballad cycle. His name also occurs as Scadellock, Scarlock, and Scathlock. In one ballad he is the nephew of Robin Hood.

Scarlet Letter, The (1850). A novel by Nathaniel Hawthorne. Hester Prynne is condemned to wear the scarlet embroidered letter A on her breast as punishment for her adultery. She resists all attempts of the 17th-century Boston clergy to make her reveal the name of her child's father. Her husband, an old physician who had remained in Europe, arrives in America to see her on the pillory. Assuming the name of Roger Chillingworth, he seeks revenge. Soon correctly suspecting the respected young minister, Arthur Dimmesdale, he constantly torments him without revealing the full extent of his knowledge. Pearl, the elfin child, is a constant trial to her mother; perverse, wild, an "outcast of the infantile world," she is the brilliant product of sin. Chillingworth succeeds in frustrating the escape of Hester, Arthur, and Pearl. In the final scene, the minister mounts the pillory with Hester and their child, revealing his guilt and the scarlet letter that remorse had etched on his breast. By this act he finally escapes Chillingworth's Satanic power, and dies in Hester's arms. The child, transfigured by the sorrowful scene, sheds tears for the first time. Kissing her father, she gives proof of her humanity.

The book treats Hawthorne's favorite themes. First, all men are guilty of secret sin. Secondly, greater than Dimmesdale's is Chillingworth's sin, for he has invaded the sanctity of another's soul.

Scarlet Pimpernel, The (1905). A novel by Baroness Orczy. It is an adventure story of the French Revolution. The apparently foppish young Englishman, Sir Percy Blakeney, is found to be the daring Scarlet Pimpernel, rescuer of distressed aristocrats.

Scarlatti, Fiorillo. See Domenico Scarlatti.

Scarron, Paul (1610-1660). French novelist. His Roman Comique (Comic Novel, 1651), an account of a troupe of wandering comedians, is believed by scholars to be based upon the troupe of Molière. Scarron's realism and satire constituted a revolt against the artificial and excessively mannered writing of his time. Crippled by rheumatism at the age of 30, Scarron married Françoise d'Aubigné, who later became Mme de Maintenon.

Scève, Maurice (1510-1564?). French poet. The first of a group of French poets whose center was at Lyons, he wrote love poetry that reveals a profound spiritual uneasiness. His most famous collection of poems, the Délire (1544), betrays the Petrarchan influence—the conception of love progressing from the scenes to pure idea. In fact, Scève was involved in the discovery of what was thought to be the tomb of Petrarch's Laura in Avignon (1543). His verse is marked by a subtle musicality which 19th-century symbolism was quick to appreciate. The symbolist poets brought Scève back into literary prominence after two centuries of neglect.

Schacht, Hjalmar (1877-1932). German financier. He was president of the Reichsbank for the Weimar Republic (1923-1930) and for the Nazis (1933-1939). Called the "financial wizard of the Third Reich," he was acquitted at the Nuremberg Trials.

Schahriah. In the Arabian Nights, the Sultan for whom the tales are told. When both his own wife and that of his brother prove unfaithful, Schahriah, imagining that no woman is virtuous, resolves to marry a new wife every night and have her strangled at daybreak. But Scheherazade, the Vizier's daughter, marries him in spite of his vow and contrives, an hour before daybreak, to begin a story to her sister, Dinazade, in the Sultan's hearing, always breaking off before the story is finished. The Sultan grows interested in these tales and, after 1001 nights, revokes his decree, bestows his affection on Schism, the Great

Scheherazade, and calls her the liberator of her sex.

Schauffler, Robert Haven (1879– ). American poet and musical biographer. He is best known for the poem Scum o' the Earth (1912), a denunciation of race and religious prejudice. Other collections of his verse are The White Comrade and Other Poems (1920) and The Magic Flame and Other Poems (1923). He is also the author of Music as a Social Force in America (1927), Beethoven—The Man Who Freed Music (1929), and The Unknown Brahms (1935).

Scheffel, Joseph Viktor von (1826–1886). German popular novelist and poet, many of whose works are sentimentalizations of medieval themes. Examples are Ekkehard (1855), a novel, and Frau Aventiure (Dame Adventure, 1863), a collection of songs.

Scheffler, Johann. See Angelus Silesius.

Schéhâdî, Georges (1910– ). French dramatist and poet of Lebanese background. Scchéhâdî is known for the poetic, neo-surrealistic world of fairy tale and dream that characterizes his drama. The characters in such plays as Monsieur Bobâle (1951), La Soirée des proverbes (1954), Histoire de Vasco (1956), and Les Violettes (1960) seek desperately for innocence.

Scheherazade. The narrator of the tales of the Arabian Nights who tells her stories to her sister Denârayde in the presence of her husband, the Sultan Schahriâr, to keep him from strangling her at daybreak. The name is also the title of a famous orchestral suite by Rimsky-Korsakov, and a Fokine ballet, which is danced to its music.

Scheidemann, Philipp (1865–1939). German political leader. He declared Germany a republic after the abdication of Kaiser Wilhelm II (1918), and became its first prime minister (1918–1919).

Schelander, Jean de. See TIR et Sidon.

Schelling, Caroline, born Michaelis (1763–1809). Influential figure in German literary life during the period of romanticism. After the death of her first husband (1788), her erotic attachment to a French officer involved her in serious political trouble, from which she was rescued by August Wilhelm Schlegel, whom she then married in 1796. It is thought that she helped him with some of his essays on Shakespeare, and perhaps with his translations. Friedrich Schlegel was also deeply attached to her, and though he yielded to his brother, she clearly inspired many of his ideas on feminine emancipation. In 1803 she divorced A. W. Schlegel and was married, for the last time, to the young philosopher Schelling. Her letters later appeared in a collection entitled Briefe aus der Frühromantik (Letters of Early Romanticism, 1871) and offer many personal and literary insights into the romantic movement.

Schelling, Friedrich Wilhelm Joseph von (1775–1854). German philosopher and aesthetician of romanticism. His commitment to a pantheistic view of the universe is seen in his Von der Weltseele (Of the World-Soul, 1798) and System des transcendentalen Idealismus (System of Transcendental Idealism, 1800). He saw the universe as an organic, living whole pervaded by a single spirit, and contended that "nature is visible spirit and spirit is invisible nature." He believed that the creative act of the artist is analogous to the act of world creation, since it comprehends both the material and spiritual aspects of the world. Hegel and Hölderlin were both schoolmates and close friends of his, and all three shared the wish to see man and nature as parts of a single whole. See German Romanticism.

Schickele, René (1883–1940). Alsatian novelist, poet, and playwright of French-German background, writing in German. He was noted especially for his adoration of a cultural unity between France and Germany. His best-known works are Hans im Schrankenloch (Hans in the Mosquito-Hole, 1915), a play, and Das Erbe am Rhein (The Rhenish Heritage, 1925–1931), a novel in three volumes.

Schiff, Sidney. See Stephen HUDSON.

Schiller, [Johann Christoph] Friedrich von (1759–1805). German dramatist, poet, historian. From 1794 until his death, he was closely associated with Goethe, and the two authors, almost alone, led the movement known as Weimar Classicism. The two men's tendencies, however were considerably different. Whereas Goethe's main strength was broad, epic development, always striving to comprehend the balanced wholeness of life, Schiller's talent lay in the treatment of fast-moving, dramatic action. He had more skill in creating and maintaining theatrical interest than Goethe did, and though his characters are often not as deep, they are usually more sharply defined than Goethe's.

Schiller's early love plays are in the style of the Sturm und Drang, but tend to deal with more specific social problems than Goethe's early plays. The ROBBERS and KABALE UND LIEBE are examples. But after Don CARLOS, the play in which this period culminated, Schiller began to have serious misgivings about the value of his writing and felt the need for a reappraisal of his aesthetic and philosophical principles. For the next decade he wrote no plays at all, and his most important writings were several treatises on aesthetics, all influenced by Kant, including: Über Anmut und Würde (On Grace and Dignity, 1793); Briefe über die ästhetische Erziehung des Menschen (Letters on the Aesthetic Education of Man, 1795), in which art is defined as the expression of a human play-drive, and its value seen in the cultivation of this drive; and ON NAIVE AND SENTIMENTAL POETRY. These aesthetic writings provided the theoretical groundwork for his later dramatic style, which first appeared in WALLENSTEIN. He had now given up much of his earlier unquestioning and tendentious idealism in favor of a more realistic, Goethean technique, which is also observable in Mary STUART. But Schiller never entirely forsought his basic tendency toward idealism, and in fact took a strong turn back in that direction in his last plays, including The Maid of ORLEANS and WILHELM TELL. These plays, however, are more polished and classical in form than his early Sturm und Drang works, and put more emphasis on general, moral ideas.

As a lyric poet, Schiller is more famous for his long didactic poems, including Die Götter Griechenlands (The Gods of Greece, 1788) and Die Künstler (The Artists, 1789). By profession Schiller was a historian and in 1791 was made a professor of history at the University of Jena. His most famous scholarly work is Die Geschichte des Dreissigjährigen Krieges (History of the Thirty Years' War, 1791).

Schism, the Great (1378–1417). The period when the Roman papacy was challenged by antipopes who reigned at Avignon. The Council of Con-Stance (1414–1418), was responsible for its termination.

Schlaf, Johannes (1862–1941). German playwright and story-writer. He is known especially for the works on which he collaborated with Arno Holz: Papa Hamlet (1889), a collection of stories, and the play Die Familie Selicke (The Family Selicke, 1890), both of which are important in Naturalism. Schlaf showed his own talent, however, in the play Meister Oelze (Master Oelze, 1892), which is a better work than either of the collaborations.

Schlegel, August Wilhelm von (1767–1845); his brother Friedrich (1772–1829). German romantic poets and critics. August Wilhelm's poetry is of little significance, but he was an extremely able critic and scholar. His lectures at Berlin University, Über schöne Literatur und Kunst (On Literature and Art, delierated 1801–1802), and those at Vienna, Über dramatische Kunst und Literatur (On Dramatic Art and Literature, delivered 1807–1808), were instrumental in formulating and publicizing the ideas of his fellow romantics. He also accompanied Madame de Staël on her travels in Germany and many of her ideas are borrowed from him. Among his other works are translations of Calderón under the title Spanisches Theater (1803), and translations of seventeen plays of Shakespeare (1797). His German Shakespeare was later continued by Tieck (1825) and is still read today.

Friedrich Schlegel was a more original and creative spirit than his brother, but often lacked the latter's gift of stylistic clarity. He wrote hundreds of brilliant philosophical and critical aphorisms, which include many important statements about the romantic movement. It was he who defined romantic poetry as a "progressive universal poetry," and it was he who first clearly defined the concept of romantic irony. In his novel Lucinde (1799), he advocated free love, but not on a purely sexual basis; he believed in full equality of the sexes and felt that a man and a woman should not live together except on terms of complete spiritual and sexual union. He was a competent classical scholar and wrote a Geschichte der alten und neueren Literatur (History of Ancient and Modern Literature, 1815). Among his close friends were Novalis, Tieck, and Schleiermacher; like his brother, he was a lifelong admirer of Goethe, but fell out with Schiller whom he attacked critically on occasion.

The two brothers together edited the romantic periodical Athenäum (1798–1800). Central among the ideas they held in common was a distinction between classical (ancient) poetry as a "poetry of accomplishment," and romantic (modern) poetry as a "poetry of yearning." Goethe makes a similar distinction in Faust (see Helen). The Schlegels are also credited with a large part in the establishment of modern literary critical techniques, in that they opposed the 18th-century ideal of the critic as a judge of art and insisted that the critic must first of all understand and appreciate the literary work on its own terms. Both brothers, finally, were pioneers in the fields of Romance philology and Sanskrit studies. See Caroline Schelling; Dorothea Veit; Weimar classicism; German romanticism.

Schlegel, Johann Elias (1718–1749). German dramatist. Uncle of August Wilhelm and Friedrich von Schlegel, he was an early admirer of Shakespeare among the Germans and, though a student of Gottsched, his plays already show a tendency, which be-towed very strong in Lessing, away from neo-classisicism. Among his plays are Heh�ba (1736) and Orest (Orestes, 1739).

Schlegel, Margaret. The cultured, idealistic heroine of E. M. Forster's novel Howards End. Her sister Helen is also an important character.

Schleicher, Kurt von (1882–1934). German chancellor (1932–1933), succeeded by Hitler. He was shot with his wife in a Nazi purge.

Schleiermacher, Friedrich Ernst Daniel (1768– 1834). German philosopher and Protestant theologian, important in the movement of romanticism. In his Reden über die Religion (Speeches on Religion, 1799) and Monologe (Monologues, 1800), he developed the idea that every individual has a purely personal attitude toward religion. With his friend Friedrich von Schlegel, he was a staunch advocate of equality between the sexes.

Schlemihl, Peter. See Peter Schlemihls Wun-dersame Geschichte.

Schlesinger, Arthur M[eier] (1888– ). An American historian. Schlesinger taught at Ohio State and Iowa universities before joining the faculty of Harvard University in 1924. His many important historical works include The Colonial Merchants and the American Revolution (1918), New Viewpoints in American History (1922), The Rise of the City (1933), Paths to the Present (1949), and Prelude to Independence: The Newspaper War on Britain, 1764– 1776 (1958). In Retrospect: The History of a Historian (1963) is autobiographical.

Schlesinger, Arthur M[eier], Jr. (1917– ). American historian. The son and namesake of another well-known historian, Schlesinger joined the faculty of Harvard University in 1946. His best-known book is probably The Age of Jackson (1945), for which he was awarded a Pulitzer Prize; in it Schlesinger maintained that the controlling beliefs and aims of Jacksonianism came from the South and East, not the West. He has also completed three parts of a four-volume work on The Age of Roosevelt: The Crisis of the Old Order (1957), The Coming of the New Deal (1959), and The Politics of Upheaval (1960). Schlesinger's other books include Orestes A. Brownson: A Pilgrim's Progress (1939) and The Politics of Hope (1960), essays written from the liberal point of view. In 1961 Schlesinger was appointed special assistant to President Kennedy. In 1964, several months after Kennedy's assassination, he resigned from his White House post to devote full time to an account of the Kennedy administration.

Schliemann, Heinrich (1822–1890). A German amateur archeologist famous for his excavations of sites mentioned in Homer. He discovered the ruins of a series of cities near the present Turkish village of Hisarlik, though he guessed wrong as to which of them was the Homeric Troy. He also did extensive excavation at Mycenae. Though unscientific and even careless in his approach, Schliemann made monumental discoveries, largely as a result of his belief, then considered absurd, that the Homeric legends were to a considerable degree historical fact.
School for Scandal, The

Schulz, Des. See Castle, The.

Schlumberger, Jean (1877-  ). French novelist and critic. Schlumberger is best known for the novel Saint-Saturnin (1931) and his essays in Jalons (1941) and Nouveaux Jalons (1943).

Schmidt, Kaspar. See Max Stirner.

Schmitz, Ettore. See Italo Svevo.

Schnitzler, Arthur (1862-1931). Austrian playwright and novelist. He is known for his stylistic experiments in both prose and drama and for his brilliance of psychological observation and depiction. Both of these qualities are found in his two best-known works, Leutnant Gustl, a short novel, and La Ronde, a play. His early play Anatol is filled with characteristically Viennese wit and a vigorously amoral attitude toward erotic situations, which form the atmospheric background in many of his subsequent works. But though he continued to favor erotic themes, he became increasingly aware, in plays such as Light o' Love and Der grüne Kakadu (The Green Cockatoo, 1899), of problems inherent in his early carefree attitude. Only once, in the play Professor Bernhardi (1918), did he treat a completely asexual theme. Before turning to writing, Schnitzler had studied medicine and done research in psychiatry, which accounts in part for his ability to probe characters in depth.

Schoenberg, Arnold (1874-1951). Austrian-born composer and teacher. He is the inventor of the 12-tone or serial method of composition to provide a basis for unity and coherence in atonal music (see Atonality). His method and his music as well as his personal philosophy, which he expounded in many essays and several books such as Style and Idea (1950), have had a great impact on composers and musicians of many nations. Several of his students are major composers in their own right, among them Alban Berg, Anton von Webern, and Marc Blitzstein. When Thomas Mann described the 12-tone method in Dr. Faustus, Schoenberg demanded and received credit for his idea. The composer is also identified with the expressionism that affected various arts at the beginning of this century. His works include: Verklärte Nacht (1899; a tone poem based on Zwei Menschen by Richard Dehmel), Pierrot Lunaire (1912; 21 poems by Albert Giraud, in a German translation by O. E. Hartleben, for voice—in Sprechstimme and instruements), Suite for Piano (1924, the first work based entirely on 12-tone techniques); Ode to Napoleon (1942, for speaker, strings, and piano; based on Lord Byron's poem).

Scholar-Gipsy, The (1852). A poem by Matthew Arnold. According to an old story current in Oxford, a student of that university, who years before wandered off to learn the gypsy traditions, still roams about. Arnold makes this lonely wanderer, whose life he regards as envious in many ways, the hero of his poem.

Scholasticism (from Lat. schola, "school"). The philosophical system of the Schoolmen of the Middle Ages. In schools first established under the Carolingians and usually attached to monasteries or cathedrals, the Schoolmen, as distinct from the practicing clergy, were involved in trying to synthesize a Christian system of logic and philosophy based on Aristotle and other ancient scholars. Their work was made even more difficult by the fact that very often the classical texts they had at their disposal were poor Latin translations from Arabic sources that were in turn dubious translations from the original Greek. Hampered by the Church's insistence that their results be reconcilable with Christian doctrine, the Schoolmen were often reduced to hair-splitting quibbles over methodology and terminology. Their most significant contribution to modern philosophy was their argument over the priority of essence or existence, which was the problem behind the opposition of nominalism and realism. The climax of the first period (9th to 12th century) was reached in the work of Peter Lombard and Pierre Abelard; the best of the second period was summarized by St. Thomas Aquinas and John Duns Scotus.

Schönherr, Karl (1867-1943). Austrian dramatist. He is best known for his peasant plays in the tradition of such writers as Raimund, Nestroy and Anzengruber. His two best works are Erde (Earth, 1908), about the unsuppressible vital energy of a mountain peasant, and Glaube und Heimat (The Faith and the Homeland, 1910), which also glorifies, in a historical setting, the strength and steadfastness of the common people. Schönherr was very attached to his native Tirol and later, under the pressure of political and military events, brought out two frankly patriotic pieces: Volk in Not (A People in Distress, 1915) and Der Judas von Tirol (1928).

Schoolcraft, Henry Rowe (1793-1864). American ethnologist, explorer, geologist, and writer. After serving as geologist to the Lewis Cass expedition (1820) to Lake Superior, Schoolcraft was appointed Indian agent there. In 1832, he discovered the source of the Mississippi. Married to the daughter of a Chippewa chief, he gathered much of his Indian lore from his wife. As superintendent of Indian affairs for Michigan (1836-1841), he wrote his explorations and researches in a number of highly influential books. The first white man to translate Indian poetry, he was among the first seriously to study Indian legend and religion. Among Schoolcraft's books are Travels in the Central Portions of the Mississippi Valley (1825), Aigic Researches, Comprising Inquiries Respecting the Mental Characteristics of the North American Indians (2 v., 1839), and Personal Memoirs of a Residence of Thirty Years with the Indian Tribes (1851). Schoolcraft's writings made a profound impression on Longfellow; repeating Schoolcraft's error, the poet confused the Iroquois Hiawatha with the Chippewa Manabozho, and set his famous verse narrative on the shores of Lake Superior, instead of in central New York.

School for Husbands, The. See Sganarelle (2).

School for Scandal, The (1777). A comedy, one of the most popular in the English language, by Richard Brinsley Sheridan. Lady Sneerwell and a group of friends meet often at her house for the purpose of creating and spreading malicious gossip. Lady Teazle, attractive young wife of the much older Sir Peter, is a member of the circle. By making overtutes to Lady Teazle, Joseph Surface, a hypocritical young man, tries to gain access to Maria, Sir Peter’s ward. Although Maria is in love with Joseph’s brother Charles, Sir Peter favors a match with Joseph. Joseph tells Lady Teazle that he is indifferent to Maria; after a quarrel with Sir Peter, Lady Teazle keeps an appointment at Joseph’s rooms. Suddenly Sir Peter is announced, and Joseph hides Lady Teazle behind a screen. Sir Peter tells Joseph that he thinks his wife is in love with Charles and also speaks of the handsome settlement he intends to make on her. Overhearing this, Lady Teazle is full of remorse. Moments later Charles is shown in, and Sir Peter hides in a closet; he is thus able to hear Charles tell Joseph that his interest is entirely in Maria. Sir Peter comes out of hiding, and, while Joseph is called away, the screen topples, exposing a much chastened Lady Teazle. Meanwhile Sir Oliver Surface, wealthy uncle of Joseph and Charles, has returned from India with a plan to test the mettle of his nephews’ characters. First, disguised as Mr. Premium, a usher, he calls on Charles. Charles and his friends auction off the family portraits to Premium, but Charles refuses to sell the portrait of his Uncle Oliver. He sends some of the money to Stanley, an old relative who has asked him for assistance. Uncle Oliver, pretending to be Stanley, then calls on Joseph to ask for assistance and is refused; Joseph tells him that he can’t help him because Uncle Oliver is so stingy. Joseph’s duplicity is brought to light; Sir Peter and Lady Teazle are reconciled, and Maria and Charles are united.

School for Wives. See Ecole des femmes, L’.

Schoolmaster, The. A celebrated treatise by Roger Ascham (1570), expressing the author’s ideas on the education of the English youth of his time. It opposes foreign schooling, especially in Italy, favors the incorporation of athletics into the curriculum, and attacks English verse meter, while defending the use of English prose.

Schoolmen. The theologians of the Middle Ages. They lectured in the cloisters or cathedral schools founded by Charlemagne and his successors. They followed Aristotle and the Fathers of the Church (see Scholasticism), but attempted to reduce every subject to a system.

Schoolmistress, The. A poem by William Shenstone, written in Spenserian stanzae. It presents a burlesque picture of a village school of the author’s time and of the elderly mistress who teaches and punishes her pupils.

School of Abuse, The. A Puritan treatise by Stephen Gosson (English, 1554-1634), written in 1579, attacking poets, actors, and playwrights on moral grounds. It was dedicated without authorization to Sir Philip Sidney, who answered it in his famous Apologie for Poetrie.

School of Silence. See Jean Jacques Bernard.

Schopenhauer, Arthur (1778-1860). German philosopher whose extreme pessimism is expressed in his work as Will and Idea (Die Welt als Wille und Vorstellung; 1819). He maintained that desires and drives of men, as well as the forces of nature, are manifestations of a single will, specifically the will to live, which is the essence of the world. Since operation of the will means constant striving without satisfaction, life consists of suffering. Only by controlling the will through the intellect, by suppressing the desire to reproduce, can suffering be diminished.

Schreiner, Olive. Pen name Ralph Iron (1855-1920). South African novelist. Her best-known work is her semiautobiographical novel The Story of an African Farm. Although almost entirely uneducated, she was a fervent rationalist, feminist, and extreme liberal. Most of her later books were concerned with such problems as The South African Question (1899) and Woman and Labor (1911). Her other works include Dreams (1891), Trooper Peter Halkett of Mashonaland (1897), and The Story of an African Farm.

Schubert, Franz [Peter] (1797-1828). Austrian composer. Schubert was perhaps the finest composer of art songs the world has known; his catalogued works number nearly a thousand, of which nearly 600 are songs with piano. His favored poets were Goethe and Schiller, but he also set Shakespeare and Sir Walter Scott. He wrote much piano and chamber music, six masses, other church music, operas, and eight symphonies, of which No. 7, the “Great Symphony” in C major, and No. 8, “The Unfinished Symphony” in B minor, are the most remarkable.

Schulberg, Budd (1914- ). American short-story writer and novelist. The son of a leading film producer, Schulberg first published a satirical study of a Hollywood mogul, What Makes Sammy Run? His next novel was The Harder They Fall (1947), the story of a prizefighter. The Disenchanted is a roman à clef based on F. Scott Fitzgerald’s career. Schulberg’s short stories were collected in Faces in the Crowd (1953), and he wrote the screenplay On the Waterfront (1954), published as a novel in 1955.

Schumann, Robert (1810-1856). German composer, pianist, and music critic, a representative and leader of the romantic school. Among his works are highly imaginative song cycles based on poems by Heine (Dichterliebe), Chamisso (Frauenliebe und Leben), and others, four symphonies, one piano concerto, and many sets of piano pieces with titles such as Papillons (Butterflies), Carnaval, Kinderscenen (Scenes from Childhood), and Nachtmusik (Nightpieces). He founded, in 1853, and edited the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik (New Chronicle of Music. His wife, Clara Schumann, born Wieck (1819-1896), was a fine pianist and a masterly interpreter of her husband’s works. Schumann’s last years were darkened by mental illness.

Schuschnigg, Kurt von (1897- ). Chancellor of Austria (1934-1938), successor to Engelbert Dollfuss. When Germany invaded Austria, he was replaced by Seyss-Inquart and put in a concentration camp.
Schütz, Heinrich (1585–1672). Outstanding German composer of the 17th century. A pupil in Italy of Giovanni Gabrieli and Claudio Monteverdi, he introduced many of the new practices of Baroque music to Germany. He wrote the first German opera, Dafne (1627, music lost), but he is best known for his masterly setting of German Bible texts for use in services of the Lutheran Church.

Schutzstaffel. See S.S.

Schwab, Gustav (1792–1850). German poet, known for his ballads. His friends included Uhland and Kerner, and like theirs, his poetry shows traits of both romanticism and the Biedermeier style. His Die schönsten Sagen des klassischen Altertums (The Most Beautiful Legends of Classical Antiquity, 1838) was an attempt to popularize classical myths.

Schwartz, Delmore (1913– ). American poet, short-story writer, and critic. Among Schwartz’s collections of verse are In Dreams Begin Responsibilities (1938), Genesis (1943), Vaudeville for a Princess (1950), and Summer Knowledge (1959). He has translated Rimbaud’s A Season in Hell (1939). The World Is a Wedding (1948) is a collection of his short stories, many of them dealing with the problems of Jewish life.

Schwarz-Bart, André (1928– ). French novelist. His semihistorical The Last of the Just (Les Derniers des Justes; 1959) traces the martyrdom of the Jews through 36 generations of the Levy family, culminating with the death of Ernie in the Auschwitz German prison camp. The Last of the Just was awarded the Prix Goncourt in 1959.

Schwarzerd, Philipp. See Philipp Melanchthon.

Science fiction. A genre of fantasy. It has its basis either in scientific fact or in a plausible kind of pseudo-science. The first significant science fiction writer was Jules Verne, although Edgar Allan Poe had experimented with scientific fantasy in The Unparalleled Adventure of Hans Pfall and The Narrative of Arthur Gordon Pym.

The genre did not become widely popular until the 1940’s and 1950’s, when books and magazines devoted to it proliferated in the United States. A number of writers have made their reputation largely in this field, some of them having been scientists in their own right. Well known among these names are Isaac Asimov, Ray Bradbury, Robert A. Heinlein, and Theodore Sturgeon.

Scio. Another name for Chios.

Sciron (Skeiron). A robber of Greek legend. He was slain by THESEUS. He infested the parts about Megara, and forced travelers over the rocks into the sea, where they were devoured by a giant turtle. It was from these cliffs (known as the Scironian rocks) that Ixion cast herself into the Corinthian bay.

Scobellum. A very fruitful land mentioned in the Seven Champions of Christendom. Its inhabitants “exceeded the cannibals for cruelty, the Persians for pride, the Egyptians for luxury, the Cretans for lying, the Germans for drunkenness, and all nations together for a generality of vices.” To punish them, the gods changed the drunkards into swine, the lecherous into goats, the proud into peacocks, scolds into magpies, idle women into milch-cows, jesters into monkeys, misers into moles. Eventually four of the Champions restored them to their normal forms by quenching the fire of the Golden Cave.

Scobie. (1) In Graham Greene’s novel The Heart of the Matter, the hero who is torn between love and religious duty.

(2) In Lawrence Durrell’s novel The Alexandria Quartet, a comic old homosexual sailor.

Scoggan’s Jests. A popular jest book in the 16th century. It was said by Andrew Boorde (who published it) to be the work of John Scoggan (sometimes called “Scoggin”), reputed to have been court fool to Edward IV. He is referred to anachronistically, by Justice Shallow in 2 Henry IV, iii, 2, and is not to be confused with Henry Scoggan (d. 1407), the poet-disciple of Chaucer to whom Ben Jonson alludes:

Scoggan? What was he?
Oh, a fine gentleman, and a master of arts
Of Henry the Fourth’s times, that made disguises
For the king’s sons, and writ in ballad royal Daintily well.
The Fortunate Isles (1624)

Scopes trial (July, 1925). A court trial in Dayton, Tenn., in which John Scopes, a high school biology teacher, was found guilty of violating a state law that forbade teaching the theory of evolution. Clarence Darrow defended Scopes, and William Jennings Bryan directed the prosecution. Although Scopes was convicted, Bryan’s was a Pyrrhic victory; taking the stand as an expert on the Bible, he was subjected to relentless cross-examination by Darrow, who ridiculed his simple fundamentalist creed; Bryan died five days after the trial. H. L. Mencken reported the “monkey” trial in some famous sardonic dispatches. The trial was the basis of the play Inherit the Wind (1955) by Jerome Lawrence and Robert E. Lee.

Scot or Scott, Michael (1175?–1234). Scottish-birthed medieval scholar. After studying at the universities of Oxford, Paris, and Toledo, he became attached to the court of Frederick II of Sicily; there he served as physician and astrologer and, with others, translated the works of Aristotle and Averroës into Latin. Famed for his occult learning, even in his own lifetime he was said to possess miraculous powers; and after his death this reputation spread, and he became known as a wizard and magician. He is mentioned by Dante in the Inferno and by Sir Walter Scott in The Lay of the Last Minstrel.

Scotia. Scotland; sometimes called Scotia Minor. According to the Venerable Bede, Scotland was called Caledonia until a.d. 258, when it was invaded by a tribe from Ireland and its name changed to Scotia.

Scottish or Scottists. See under John Duns Scotus.

Scotland Yard. The headquarters of the London Metropolitan Police. From this office all public orders to the force proceed. The original Scotland Yard was a short street near Trafalgar Square, so called from a palace on the spot, given by King Edgar (about 970) to Kenneth II of Scotland when he came to London to pay homage and subsequently used by the Scottish kings when visiting England. New Scotland Yard, as it is officially called, is close by, on the Thames Embankment near Westminster Bridge.

Scots, Wha Hae (1794). A patriotic poem by Robert Burns, celebrating the victory of Robert Bruce over the English King Edward II at the Battle of Bannockburn in 1314, and hailing liberty and independence for the Scottish nation. It is believed that Burns was strongly influenced in the writing of this poem by the French Revolution.

Scott, Dred. See Dred Scott Decision.

Scott, Dunbar Campbell (1862-1947). Canadian poet. He is best known for his poems about man's conflict with nature and about the Indians, to whom he devoted most of his professional life in the Canadian Civil Service. His Complete Poems appeared in 1926.

Scott, Frances R[eginald] (1899- ). Canadian poet. During the 1920's Scott was a member of the "Montreal school," a group of poets influenced by T. S. Eliot, and was instrumental in the publication of New Provinces: Poems of Several Authors (1936), which included some of his own experimental work, along with that of five other modernist poets. Later he was one of the editors of Preview, an experimental literary magazine. Scott's poetry is often witty and amusing, as when he pokes fun at Canadian poetic movements in The Canadian Authors Meet; elsewhere, however, he reveals a profound concern with social problems.

Scott, Geoffrey (1886-1928). English scholar. His study of The Architecture of Humanism (1914) was influential in reviving interest in the Baroque.

Scott, Michael (1789-1835). Scottish novelist. He wrote Tom Cringle's Log, a lively, colorful account of life in the West Indies in the early 19th century, and the slightly less effective The Cruise of the Midge. Both novels were published anonymously in 1836, after appearing in installments (from 1829) in Blackwood's Magazine.

Scott, Robert Falcon (1868-1912). An English antarctic explorer. He perished with his party on the return trip from the South Pole in 1912. The searching party found his records and diaries.

Scott, Sir Walter (1771-1832). Scottish novelist and poet of the romantic period. Deriving most of his material from Scottish history and legend, and influenced by medieval French romance, popular ballads, and the Gothic novel, he wrote narrative poetry at first; but when overshadowed in this field by Byron, he turned to the novel. His great achievement here lay in his exploitation of history as material for the novel, and with Waverley he began the long series of works which proved him the master of the historical novel. In these romances he displays an arresting ability to recreate the atmosphere of an age in all its pageantry and detail. He was a skillful portrayer of character; his most brilliant figures are generally eccentric Scottish peasants, but his romantic lovers, usually aristocratic, tend to be somewhat uninteresting. His novels are written with an immense vigor, and achieved for him a vast public in England and on the Continent, where he strongly influenced Balzac and Tolstoy. Although by far the most popular novelist of his day, he has lost favor of late, partly because of the improbability of his plots, which he admitted to turn on "marvellous and uncommon incidents," and partly because his romanticism now seems rather cloying.

His more notable poetic works include The Eve of Saint John; Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border (1802-1803), a collection of ancient Scottish ballads; The Lay of the Last Minstrel; Marmion; and The Lady of the Lake. The best known of his novels are Waverley, Guy Mannering, The Antiquary, Old Mortality, The Black Dwarf, The Heart of Midlothian, Rob Roy, The Bride of Lammermoor, The Legend of Montrose, Ivanhoe, The Monastery, The Abbot, Kenilworth, The Pirate (1822), The Fortunes of Nigel, Peveril of the Peak, Quentin Durward, Redgauntlet, The BETROTHED (1825), The Talisman, Woodstock, The Fair Maid of Perth, Anne of Geierstein, Castle Dangerous, and Tales of a Grandfather (1828-30). Scott also wrote several dramatic works and a number of studies in biography and in the history, legends, and antiquities of Scotland. He contributed some articles to the Encyclopaedia Britannica and also had a part in the foundation of the Quarterly Review.

As his fortune increased he built the baronial mansion of Abbotsford on the banks of the Tweed. In 1813 he refused the laureateship in favor of Southey. He was almost ruined when the publishing firm of Ballantyne, in which he was a partner, went into bankruptcy in 1826, and spent the rest of his life working to pay off the debts.

Scott was known to the readers of his day as The Wizard of the North. See Waverley Novels.

Scott, William Bell (1811-1890). Scottish poet and painter, friend of Rossetti and Swinburne. Many of his short lyrics and sonnets appear in the collection, Poems (1875). He was also the author of Autobiographical Notes (1892).

Scott, Winfield Townley (1910- ). American poet. Scott worked for a number of years as a newspaperman and has taught at Harvard College. In his poetry he often deals with New England charaters and ideas, as in Elegy for Robinson (1936) and Mr. Whittier and Other Poems (1948). His poetry tends to be formally loose and is occasionally colloquial or autobiographical. Other collections are Biography for Tramman (1937), Wind the Clock (1941), The Sword on the Table (1942), To Marry Strangers (1945), and Collected Poems: 1937-1962 (1962). The Dark Sister (1958) is an epic of the Viking explorations in North America.

Scottish Chaucerians. A term applied to a group of Scottish poets in the late 15th and early 16th centuries who wrote in the tradition of Geoffrey Chaucer. They are considered by critics to have written the best lyric poetry of their time. Gawai Douglas, William Dunbar, and Robert Henryson were the leaders of the Scottish Chaucerians.

Scottish Renaissance. A 20th-century revival of Scottish literature, chiefly poetry. It is characterized by its use of Scottish themes and usually written in the Scottish poetic dialect of Lallans. The movement originated in the KILLYARD tradition of the 19th century. Its leading figure is the poet Hugh MacDiarmid, and other poets associated with it are William Soutar, Robert Garioch, Douglas Young, and Sidney Goodside Smith. James Leslie Mitchell was a novelist of the Scottish Renaissance.
Scotus Erigena, Johannes (9th century). Christian theologian and philosopher, probably born in Ireland of Scottish parents. He came to the court of the Carolingian emperor Charles II before 847, directed the palace school, and greatly influenced later scholasticism. He wrote a treatise on predestination (c. 851) asserting the fundamental identity of philosophy and religion, and freedom of the will in both God and man; he was soon under attack for lack of orthodoxy. His translation, with commentary (c. 858), of the neo-Platonic treatise On the Heavenly Hierarchy, by Dionysius the Areopagite, was similarly controversial, although important in the development of medieval mysticism. His major work, the Divisions of Nature (De Divisione Naturae, c. 865–870), is also neo-Platonic, establishing God as the supreme intellect through whose will archetypal ideas are made manifest as created things; but it was attacked for pantheism because it made Nature the totality of all things and forces, whether creating or created, or both or neither.

Scotus, John Duns. See John Duns Scotus.

Scourge of God. Epithet for Attila (406–453), king of the Huns. He was so called by medieval writers because of the widespread havoc and destruction caused by his armies. The term was also applied to Generis, king of the Vandals (d. 477), and to Tamerlane.

Scribe, Augustin Eugène (1791–1861). French dramatist. Scribe, a prolific and popular playwright, wrote nearly 400 plays, many in collaboration with other writers. Gay, spirited comedies of manners, his dramas were constructed with skill but had little substance. Almost devoid of characterization, they depended on farcical plots. Among his most successful comic efforts were Le Mariage de raison (1826), Le Mariage d'argent (1828), Le Camaraderie ou la courte échelle (1837) and Une Châне (1841). He is known also for his many opera libretti.

Scrublerus, Martinus. A fictional character created by the Scriblerus Club as a satire on pedantry and false taste. Martin, the son of Cornelius Scriblerus, has read everything but without discernment or taste. Supposedly, he is the author of Alexander Pope's Peri Bathous, or the Art of Sinking in Poetry (1727), a mock treatise on rhetoric satirizing the aesthetic theories of Longinus; of the Origine de Sciences (1732), ironically deriving modern learning from the ancient pygmies; and of The Memoirs of the Extraordinary Life, Works, and Discoveries of Martinus Scriblerus, a burlesque which was first printed in Pope's second volume of prose works (1741), but which was largely written by John Arbuthnot in 1714, in the heyday of the Scriblerus Club.

Scriblerus Club. An association formed in 1714 by John Arbuthnot, Alexander Pope, Jonathan Swift, John Gay, Thomas Parnell, and Robert Harley, earl of Oxford. The group met in Arbuthnot's apartments in St. James's Palace. Arbuthnot and Pope were the principal instigators of this project to combat pedantry and the abuses of learning. Although meetings ceased within the year, the spirit of Scriblerus lived on, kept alive by Pope's correspondence. Pope's Dunciad and the third book of Swift's Gulliver's Travels are the most important works which sprang from this association. See Martinus Scriblerus.

Scudamore. See Fabre Queene, The.

Scudder, Horace Elisha (1838–1902). American editor and writer. Scudder described his happy and pious home in a book about his older brother, Life and Letters of David Coit Scudder, a Missionary in Southern India (1864). He graduated from Williams College and went to New York, where he taught private pupils and wrote two books for children, Seven Little People and Their Friends (1862) and Dream Children (1864). He joined Henry O. Houghton's publishing firm (later Houghton Mifflin), serving as literary editor. From 1890 to 1898, he was editor of The Atlantic Monthly. Scudder did more than any other individual to raise the standards of literature for children, through his own writings and through his editorial work. When the Riverside Magazine for Young People was started in 1867, he contributed stories and enlisted the aid of such distinguished writers as Hans Christian Andersen, Jacob Abbott, Frank R. Stockton, and Sarah Orne Jewett. As editor, he planned the "American Commonwealth Series" and the "Riverside Literature Series." He wrote the Bodley Books (1875–1887), popular juvenile books of travel; Childhood in Literature and Art (1894); and biographies of Noah Webster (1882), George Washington (1890), and James Russell Lowell (1901).

Scudéry, Madeleine de (1607–1701). French novelist. She was also known as Sapho, the name she gave herself in Artamène, ou le Grand Cyrus (10 vols.; 1649–1653). This novel and Clélie, Histoire Romaine intermix adventurous historical narrative with portraits of contemporary society, friends, and even the author herself in Persian, Greek, and Roman disguise, and abound in conversations expressing the author's opinion on a variety of practical subjects (see Anne Lenclos). Scudéry is considered to have brought the sentimental romance to the height of its popularity with her enormous novels, which include Ibrahim, ou l'Illustre Bassa, the first roman à clef (1641) and Almahide, ou l'Escave Reine (Almahide, or the Slave as Queen, 1660–1663). She and her brother, the dramatist Georges de Scudéry, were associated with the Hotel de Rambouillet, and her elaborate salons with their competitions in précieux gallantry were satirized in Molière's Les Precieuses Ridicules.
Scylla (Skylla). In Greek legend, a daughter of King Nissus of Megara. The daughter of Nissus promised to deliver Megara into the hands of her lover Minos and, to effect this, cut off a golden hair on her father's head while he was asleep. Minos despaired of this trick and Scylla threw herself from a rock into the sea. At death she was changed into a lark and Nissus into a hawk.

Scylla (Skylla) and Charybdis. In Greek mythology, two monsters. They endangered shipping through the narrow Straits of Messina between Italy and Sicily. Scylla, a female monster with twelve feet, six heads, each on a long neck and each armed with three rows of pointed teeth, barked like a dog as she sat on her rock on the Italian side of the straits. Homer called her a daughter of Crataeis, but later accounts make her a nymph who, because she was beloved by Glauceus, was changed by the jealous Circe into a monster. Across the straits, Charybdis supposedly lived under an immense fig tree; thrice every day he swallowed the waters of the sea and thrice threw them up again. In post-Homeric legends he is said to have stolen the oxen of Hercules, been killed by lightning, and changed into the whirlpool that bears his name.

The phrase "between Scylla and Charybdis" came to mean between two equal difficulties, between the devil and the deep sea. Horace says that an author trying to avoid Scylla drifts into Charybdis: i.e., in seeking to avoid one fault, he falls into another.

sea deities. In classical myth, besides the 50 Nereids, the Oceanides (daughters of Oceanus), the Sirens, etc., a number of deities presiding over or connected with the sea. The chief of these are:

Sea Gull, The (Chaika; 1896). A play by Anton Chekhov. A four-act work, it established Chekhov as a major dramatist and was one of the first successful productions of the Moscow Art Theatre. Two years earlier, the play had been presented in St. Petersburg with such poor results that Chekhov nearly abandoned writing for the stage. The plot deals with young Konstantin Gavrilovich Trepliov, his literary ambitions, and his love for Nina Mikhailovna Zarechnaya, a girl who aspires to become a great actress. Trepliov's hopes for literary greatness suffer a setback when a private performance of his play proves to be a failure, arousing mostly laughter from his audience. He fears that Nina has lost her love and respect for him, and is angered at her attentions to Trigorin, a well-known writer who has been a lover of Trepliov's mother, Irina Nikolayevna Arkadina. Trepliov in his despair kills a gull at the lake and places it at Nina's feet as a symbol of his ruined hopes. Nina leaves with Trigorin, after the stricken Trepliov has made an unsuccessful suicide attempt. Two years pass, during which Trepliov finally achieves his aim of becoming a capable writer. Nina returns, having been cast aside by Trigorin. In a semicoherent speech, she compares herself to the gull destroyed by a man's mere momentary whim. Nina leaves, and Trepliov, with his old griefs stirred once more, succeeds in his second suicide attempt.

Sealsfield, Charles. Pen name of Karl Postl (1793-1864). German author. Seasons, The (1726-1730). A descriptive poem in blank verse by James Thomson, in four parts—Winter (1726), Summer (1727), Spring (1728), Autumn (1730). The poem reflects the author's main convictions: his belief in progress, his fascination with the ideal of the Golden Age, his deistic views, and, above all, his sense of a universe ordered by divine harmony and reason. The poem contains the love episodes of Celadon and Amelia, Damon and Musidora, and Palemon and Lavinia.

Sea Wolf, The (1904). A novel by Jack London. The ruthless power of Wolf Larsen, captain of the schooner Ghost, is challenged by Humphrey Van Weyden, a literary critic, and Maude Brewster, a poet, both of whom he has rescued. Sebastian, Dom (1554–1578). King of Portugal. Sebastian, who became king in 1557 upon the death of his grandfather, John III, dreamed of spreading Christianity to Asia and Africa and of winning new dominions for the crown of Portugal. Becoming involved in a civil war between rival claimants to the throne of Pez and Morocco, he was slain at the battle of Alcázarquivir. Because his body could not be identified with certainty, it was widely believed that he had merely been taken prisoner and that he would one day return to the throne. He was the subject of numerous literary works, notably Calderón’s drama El príncipe constante, Dryden’s tragicomedy Don Sebastian (1691), and Zorrilla’s play Traidor, incon-feso y mártir (1849).

Second Mrs. Tanqueray, The (1893). A play by Arthur Wing Pinero, one of his most successful works. Paula, the titular heroine, is a woman “with a past” and in spite of Aubrey Tanqueray’s hopes and efforts, is not very cordially accepted by his friends or by his 19-year-old daughter, Elleen. Elleen goes to Paris with a friend and there becomes engaged to Captain Ardale, a former lover of Paula. Paula tells Aubrey, who then forbids Elleen to see Ardale again. Elleen suspects Paula of ruining her love, and tells her that she always knew what kind of a woman she was. In the end Paula kills herself.

Second Nun’s Tale, The. One of the Canterbury Tales of Geoffrey Chaucer. Although written in 1373 before he thought of the plan for the Tales, it was included. It is an adaptation in rhyme royal of the life of Saint Cecilia as told by medieval Latin sources. Cecilia, born of Roman nobility and raised a Christian, warns her bridegroom Valerian that an angel guards her at all times. Valerian goes to Saint Urban to be christened and finds on his return that he can see the angel, who gives Cecilia a crown of roses and him a crown of lilies, adjuring them to live a pure life. Cecilia also converts Valerian’s brother Tiburtius, and they all perform many miracles. The pagan Almachius tries to make them sacrifice to Jupiter, but they refuse and are killed. Cecilia is the last; the executioner strikes her three times in the neck while she is in her bath, but she continues to preach and convert for three days. Saint Urban buries her body when she dies.

Second Sex, The. See Simone de Beauvoir.

Second Shepherd’s Play, The (Seconda Pagina Pastorum). A medieval English miracle play, written at the end of the 14th century or the beginning of the 15th, and considered to have been from the hand of the Wakefield Master. It deals with the Nativity in a vein of rollicking, farcical, almost burlesque realism, in terms of country life in Yorkshire at the time of the play’s composition. It is the second in the Towneley cycle of plays to present the Adoration of the shepherds at Christ’s Nativity, but its success is due to the long, lively prefaceary episode about the exposure of Mak the sheep-stealer, who pretends that a stolen sheep concealed in a cradle is his wife’s new-born baby.

Selden, John (1584-1654). English jurist, scholar, and orientalist, known for his treatises, many of which were written in Latin and dealt with questions of law. Of humble birth, Selden was an outstanding lawyer and became especially known for his collection of Oriental manuscripts, which he willed to the Bodleian Library.

His scholarly publications include De Dies Syriis (1617), a study of Oriental religion, and History of Tithes (1618), which was suppressed because of the objections of the English clergy. Selkirk, Alexander (1676–1721). A Scottish sailor whose narrative of his actual experience as a castaway suggested Daniel Defoe's Robinson Crusoe. As the sailing-master of the privateer Cinque Ports Galley, Selkirk, at his own request, was left on the desolate island of Juan Fernández off the coast of Chile for four years and four months (1704–1709). Selvaggio. The father of the Knight of Arts and Industry, and the hero of James Thomson's Castle of Indolence.

selve (It., "woods or forests"). During the Renaissance it was used in literature to describe improvisations or scattered thoughts provoked by varied subjects. This meaning came from the Latin sylva, used by Statius to title a collection of occasional poems; for Cicero and the rhetoricians it meant: a collection of materials from authors of note, useful in studying expression. Poliziano entitled his lectures Sylvae and Lorenzo de' Medici entitled one of his longer poems Selve d'amore.

Semele. In Greek mythology, the daughter of Cadmus and Harmonia and mother of Dionysus by Zeus. Six months pregnant by her unknown lover, she was persuaded by the jealous Hera to insist that he reveal himself. Zeus appeared as a thunderbolt and she died, but the unborn Dionysus was saved by Hermes. Semele was later rescued from Hades by her son under the name of Thyon. This raising of Semele, symbolizing the return of vegetation in the Spring, was widely celebrated. Semele seems to have been a Greek adaptation of Zemelo, a Phrygian earth-goddess.

Semiramis or Sammaramat. An Assyrian queen. All that is known of the historical queen, Sammaramat, is that she was the mother of the Assyrian king Ninus and a woman of immense importance through more than one reign. Perhaps Babylonian herself, she introduced a Babylonian god, Nebo, into the Assyrian pantheon. She fought effectively against both Medes and Chaldeans.

The legendary queen, Semiramis, on the other hand, is a figure known to various Greek writers, who believed her to be the daughter of the Syrian goddess Atargatis. Various legends claimed that she was fed as a child by doves (which fact later identified her with Ishtar), married King Ninus, and after his death built Babylon and other great cities and monuments. At her death she became a dove. It was this fabulous creature, rather than the human queen, who was the heroine of Voltaire's tragedy Sémiramis, a drama by Calderón, and Rossini's opera Semiramide.

Semitic. Pertaining to the descendants of Shem (Gen. 10) who are the Hebrews, Arabs, Assyrians, Aramaeans, and others. The word is now popularly used as a synonym for Jewish.

Glossary of the Semitic languages. Ancient Assyrian and Chaldean, Aramaean, Syrian, Arabic, Hebrew, Samaritan, Ethiopic, and old Phoenician. The great characteristic of this family of languages is that the roots of words consist of three consonants.

Sen, Pradip (1928– ). Indian poet writing in English. Strongly influenced by Catholic imagery and ideals, his poetry is characterized by tight technical discipline and deep feelings, especially in And Then the Sun (1960). He is a founder-member of Writers Workshop (Calcutta).

Séancour, Étienne Pivert de (1770–1846). French man of letters. A forerunner of such romantics as Chateaubriand and a follower of Rousseau, Séancour lived a melancholy, lonely existence. He escaped for a time to Switzerland where the majesty of nature seemed to satisfy the longings of his romantic spirit. Séancour is most famous for his pessimistic novel in letter form, OBERMANN.

Senápo (Senanus). In Lodovico Ariosto's Orlando Furioso and Torquato Tasso's Gerusalemme Liberata, the king of Ethiopia. In Ariosto, he is tormented by Harpies until Astolfo arrives on the Hippogriff to chase them back to the gates of Hell. In the Tasso epic, he is the father of Clorinda, the warrior maid, whom he never knew because her mother had given the child away in fear of the suspicion its white complexion would arouse in him.

Sender, Ramón [José] (1902– ). Spanish novelist. Sender resides in New Mexico, exiled from his native Spain because of his liberal views. His novels, strong and detailed, include Imán (Earmarked for Hell, 1939) dealing with the war in Morocco; Siete domingos rojos (Seven Red Sundays, 1932); Contraataque (Counter Attack in Spain, 1937), which describes the Spanish Civil War; and Epitalamio del Prieto Trinidad (Dark Wedding, 1942), considered his best work.

Seneca. Full Latin name, Lucius Annaeus Seneca (4 B.C.—A.D. 65). Roman philosopher and playwright. While still a young man, this Spanish-born scholar was chosen to become the tutor of the future emperor Nero. Seneca spent the major portion of his life studying and writing, and instructing his disciple Nero on the art of government and the virtues of a Stoic philosopher-king. When the young prince ascended the imperial throne in A.D. 54, Seneca remained his most trusted advisor and three years later, in 57, was honored by the conferral of a consulship. However, for reasons that are not entirely clear to historians, Seneca lost favor with the emperor and prudently withdrew from imperial politics and court society in 62. In 65 he was implicated in Piso's conspiracy to assassinate Nero, and was commanded by his one-time pupil to kill himself. With Stoic composure, the philosopher had his veins opened and bled to death.

As a Roman philosopher, Seneca is second only to Cicero, and like Cicero was an adherent of the philosophy of Stoicism. He wrote, furthermore, the first and only Roman text on politics, the Questiones Naturales (Investigations in Natural Science), which was an important source of knowledge (and misinformation) in the Middle Ages. His influence on Renaissance drama was considerable. Eight tragedies are ascribed to him; they are Hercules, Troaces, Phoenissae, Medea, Phaedra, Agamemnon, Oedipus, and Thisbes. Marked by violence and bloodshed, and characters of little individuality or differreratation, they had an important influence on the tragic drama of Italy, France, and, especially, of Elizabethan England.

Senécal. A character in Gustave Flaubert's novel L'Éducation Sentimentale. Senécal, a political radical, is quick to change his allegiance when the Revolution of 1848 fails and Napoleon III assumes control of the government.

Sennacherib. In the Bible, an Assyrian king who captured and destroyed Babylon. His siege of Jerusalem in the days of Hezekiah is dramatically described: in the night, "the angel of the Lord went out, and smote in the camp of the Assyrians an hundred fourscore and five thousand" (II Kings 19:35). He was murdered by two of his sons while praying in a temple.

Byron has made the destruction of his army by disease the subject of a famous lyric, The Destruction of Sennacherib (1815).

Sennett, Mack. Original name, Michael Sinnott (1884–1966). American motion-picture producer and director. After acting for a time under the direction of D. W. Griffith, he became associated in 1912 with the Keystone Company. Here he began to produce his famous slapstick films, known as "Mack Sennett comedies." Among the actors who worked for him were Marie Dressler, Mabel Normand, Ben Turpin, Roscoe ("Fatty") Arbuckle, and Charlie Chaplin.

senryū. Japanese satiric verse. It follows the same syllabic system as haiku, but deals with subjects of a lighter vein.

Sense and Sensibility (1811). A novel by Jane Austen in which two sisters, Elinor and Marianne Dashwood, represent "sense" and "sensibility" respectively. Each is deserted by the young man from whom she has been led to expect an offer of marri-mony. Elinor bears her deep disappointment with dignity and restraint while Marianne violently expresses her grief. Elinor soon discovers why her lover, Edward Ferrars, has left her: he has been secretly engaged to Lucy Steele for four years, and, while he regrets the connection now, he feels honor bound to marry her. When his mother discovers his engagement to Lucy, a girl of inferior social standing, she disinherits him, settling her property on his younger brother, Robert. The sly Lucy, at this turn of events, shifts her interest to Robert. Thus released, Edward proposes to Elinor and is accepted. On the other hand, Marianne, with characteristic impetuousity, follows her lover John Willoughby to London where she only becomes more disillusioned with him. As she gradually recovers from her foolish love, she is able to see, for the first time, the more quiet attractions of her old admirer, Colonel Brandon, and she finally marries him.

Sensitive Plant, The (1820). A poem by Percy Bysshe Shelley. The sensitive plant is a variety of mimosa; its outer leaves curl up when touched. The poem relates the mystic love of the plant for the "lad-of the garden" and its death in the general ruin of the garden following the lady's demise.

Sentimental Journey, A (1768). An unfinished narrative by Laurence Sterne. Attacking sentimen-talism in the guise of a tour through France and Italy, it is itself didactic in its sentimental emphasis on natural benevolence and philanthropy. Here Sterne moralizes so playfully as to present an almost delicate caricature of moralizing. It was long read seriously, even in such famous episodes as Yorick weeping over an ass chewing a thistle. Its first illustrator was William Hogarth.

Sentimental Tommy (1896). A novel by J. M.
Barrie which, together with its sequel Tommy and Grizel (1900), relates the story of a young man overendowed with imagination who cannot resist playing the hero whenever his mood or the situation seem to call for it, often to the injury of his adoring Grizel. In spite of his spasmodic efforts, Tommy cannot succeed in being the faithful lover and husband she deserves. He meets an accidental death by hanging.

Separate Tables (1954). A play by Terence Rattigan. This work is actually two one-act plays set in the same English resort hotel. The minor characters remain the same in both acts; only the male and female leads change. The theme of both acts is the frustration and misunderstanding caused by the artificial social barriers erected between individuals.
The loneliness and isolation of the guests in the hotel is symbolized by their separate tables in the dining room.

Sephardim. The group of Jews early settling in Spain and Portugal. See ASHKENAZIM.

sepoy. The Anglicized form of the Hindu and Persian sipahi, a soldier, denoting a native Indian soldier trained and disciplined in the British manner, especially one in the British Indian Army.

Sepoy Mutiny. A revolt of the Sepoy troops in British India during the transference of the administration of India from the East India Company to the British crown.

September Massacres. An indiscriminate slaughter, during the French Revolution, of Loyalists confined in the Abbaye and other prisons, lasting from Sept. 2 to 5, 1792. As many as 8,000 persons died.

Septimius Felton, or a Romance of Immortality (1871). An unfinished novel by Nathaniel Hawthorne. Discovered after his death, the manuscript was prepared and published by the author's wife. Set in both England and America, the story involves a hero of mixed Indian and English blood.
He discovers the elixir of life, causes the death of his sweetheart, and finally disappears in England.
The plot is further complicated by a long episode about a bloody footprint.

Septimus Warren Smith. A character in Virginia Woolf's novel Mrs. Dalloway. Having retreated into a private world, he has gone mad; a conventional doctor’s efforts to intrude and to cure him drive him to suicide.

Septuagint. The Greek version of the Old Testament and Apocrypha. It is so called because it was traditionally said to have been made by 72 Palestinian Jews in 72 days, during the third century B.C. at the command of Ptolemy Philadelphus. In abbreviated form, it is usually expressed as LXX, “The Seventy.”

The first translators, working on the island of Pharos, translated only the Pentateuch. Greek translations of the other books were added by later writers. This version of the Bible was used in Mediterranean lands during the time of Christ and the early Church.

Serafinovich, Aleksandr. Pen name of Aleksandr Serafinovich Popov (1863–1949). Russian novelist. He wrote The Iron Flood (Zheleznyi potok; 1924), describing the civil war struggle between White and Red Cossacks in the Caucasus. The novel is a favorite of Soviet critics because of its Marxist emphases and interpretations.

Serafino de Ciminielli. Also known as Serafino Aquilano (1466–1500). Italian Renaissance poet. He is known as an inspired performer of supposedly improvised poems (improvvisatore). A singer and a lutanist, he was widely traveled in important Renaissance circles. His Rime (1502) is composed of sonnets and other verses, particularly strambotti. This work was widely circulated and reaching England, was adapted and translated by Wyatt and Surrey. Ciminielli’s verse favors exaggerated Petrarchism in the manner of Charito and Tebaldeo; his conceits invited the lyric reforms of Rembo.

Seraglio. The former palace of the Sultan of Turkey at Constantinople. Situated on the Golden Horn, it is enclosed by walls seven miles and a half in circuit. The chief entrance was the Sublime Gate. The chief of the large edifices was the Harem, or sacred spots, which contained numerous houses for the Sultan’s wives and his concubines. The word is often used as a synonym for harem, as in Mozart’s opera The Abduction from the Seraglio.

seraphim. Angels. Seraphim belong to the highest order of angels, according to medieval angelology, especially distinguished by the arduity of their zeal and love. In the Bible, each seraph had six wings: “with twain he covered his face, and with twain he covered his feet, and with twain he did fly” (Isa. 6:2). Elizabeth Barrett Browning wrote a poem entitled The Seraphim (1838).

Serapion Brothers, the. An organization of writers formed in Russia during the 1920s. The group, which had no definite program, came together chiefly to advocate the rights of nonconformist and freedom in literature. They especially were in reaction against the growing demands for literature to concern itself with political themes. Included in the group were Yevgeni Zamiatin, the oldest member and leading spirit, and younger writers such as Veniamin Kaverin, Konstantin Fedin, Mikhail Zoshchenko, Vsevolod Ivanov, and Nikolai Tikhonov. The name of the group was taken from a story called The Serapion Brothers by E. T. A. Hoffmann, in which one of the characters advocates unlimited freedom in literary work.

Serapis. An Egyptian deity, combining the attributes of Apis and Osiris. The temples of Serapis were called Serapeums. The most famous Serapeum at Memphis was the burial place of the sacred bull Apis.

Sercambi, Giovanni (1348–1424). Italian writer. Born in Lucca, he is the otherwise unknown author of an untitled collection of novelle, first published in 1889. Based on the Decameron of Boccaccio, its basic plot involves the wanderings over Italy of a group of refugees from a 1374 plague. The author, a member of the company, tells the tales himself. The resemblance to Chaucer’s Canterbury Tales is largely coincidental.

serendipity. A word coined by Horace Walpole to denote the faculty of making lucky and unexpected “finds” by accident. In a letter (January 28, 1754) he says that he formed it from the title of a fairy story, The Three Princes of Serendip, because the princes “were always making discoveries, by accidents and sagacity, of things they were not in quest of.”

Serkin, Rudolf (1903– ). Bohemian-born Austrian concert pianist, residing in the U.S. He is known for his interpretations of Mozart and Beethoven, and is director of a summer music school and festival at Marlboro, Vt.

Sermon on the Mount. In the New Testament, the sermon given by Christ to the multitudes and his disciples (Matt. 5–8) where he explains the essence of the true disciple and enunciates his teachings of love and righteousness. See Beatitudes.

Serpentino. In Matteo Maria Bozardo’s Orlando Innamorato and Lodovico Ariosto’s Orlando Furioso, a brave knight and one of the best of the pagan warriors. He is defeated by the warrior maiden Bradamante. He is surnamed “de la Stella” because he is from the Spanish city of Estella.

Sertões, Os (Rebellion in the Backlands, 1902). A book, considered the chief classic of Brazilian literature, by Euclides da Cunha (1866–1909). The work, which has been called “the Bible of Brazilian nationality,” defies classification. It is partly a geographical and sociological treatise that gives a brilliant description of the drought-ridden sertão, or hinterland, and its backward, poverty-stricken inhabitants. It is also a fast-paced narrative, full of pathos and suspense, that has sometimes been called a novel. The book recounts the heroic, though ill-fated, attempt of a religious zealot, “Antônio the Counselor,” and his followers to resist the authority of the central government in 1856–1857. In their settlement at Canudos, 300 miles northwest of Salvador, the rebels stubbornly held out against government troops until the last man was dead. Da Cunha was an engineer and journalist of Darwinian convictions who accompanied one of the military expeditions to Canudos as a newspaper correspondent. He turned the story of the rebels into a remarkable document, an indictment of Brazilian society for its neglect of the sertão...
as well as a stirring account of human misery and courage.

Sesha. In Hindu mythology, the serpent who supports the world on his head.

sestina. In prosody, a lyric poem of six stanzas of six lines each and an envoy or tornada of three lines. A specialized form of the Provençal canzo and the Italian canzone, the sestina was developed sometime toward the end of the 13th century by the famed Provençal troubadour Arnaut Daniel. Admired and written by Dante and Petrarch in Italy, it was hardly used in France and England before the 19th century. Instead of rhyme the sestina uses a pattern of repetition of the six words which terminate the six lines of the first stanza. (Not content with this, Swinburne invented a rhymed form of the sestina.) Such modern poets as Ezra Pound and W. H. Auden have the sestina with notable success. The arrangement of repetition is as follows:

Stanza I. 1–2–3–4–5–6
Stanza II. 6–1–5–2–4–3
Stanza III. 3–4–6–1–2–5
Stanza IV. 5–3–2–6–1–4
Stanza V. 4–5–1–3–6–2
Stanza VI. 2–4–6–5–3–1

The envoy contains inner repetition, as well as terminal repetition. Line one has word 2 in the middle, and 5 at the end. Line two has word 4 in the middle and 3 at the end, while line three has word 6 in the middle and 1 at the end.

Sestius or Sextius, Publius. Roman politician. He helped Cicero crush the conspiracy of Catiline and was instrumental in bringing about the recall of Cicero from exile (57 B.C.).

Set. The Egyptian god of darkness, prototype of the Greek Typhon, the god of evil. He was the brother-son and deadly enemy of Osiris whom he slaughtered and cut into 14 pieces. Representations of Set portray him with a human body and the head of some unidentified mythological beast with pointed muzzle and high square ears.

Settembrini, Ludovico. In Thomas Mann's novel The Magic Mountain, an Italian tubercular patient who befriends Hans Castorp. He is concerned lest the young man succumb to the decadent atmosphere of Haus Berghof and frequently urges him to leave. He represents the classical European tradition of enlightened humanitarian and political liberalism.

Seurat, Georges (1859–1891). French painter. Seurat collaborated with Paul Signac in the foundation of Neoimpressionism. His sensitive, controlled pointillism, with its emphasis on the repetition of simplified forms expressed in terms of light and shade, is best exemplified by Sunday Afternoon on La Grande Jatte (1886), in the Chicago Art Institute.

Seuss, Dr. See Theodor Seuss Geisel.

Sevastopol Sketches (1855). Three stories by Count Leo Tolstoy. They are based on his own experiences and observations at the siege of Sevastopol during the Crimean War. Tolstoi, who was an army officer at the time, was in the thick of the fighting at the most exposed point in the town's fortifications. The stories were a departure from the usual war descriptions. Tolstoi stripped away the tinsel and showed war, not as a heroic and glorious pastime, but as a dangerous, tedious, and bloody succession of horrors. In these stories, Tolstoi first used the stream-of-consciousness technique which he developed in his later work. In an article about the sketches, the Russian critic Nikolai Chernyshevski called the technique that of an “internal monologue,” the first time this term was used in relation to the literary device. The three stories are separately entitled Sevastopol in the Month of December (Sevastopol v dekabre mesyatze), Sevastopol in May (Sevastopol v maye), and Sevastopol in August 1855 (Sevastopol v avguste 1855 goda). At the end of the second story are the famous lines: “The hero of my story, whom I love with all the strength of my soul, whom I have tried to reproduce in all his beauty and who always was, is, and will be beautiful, is truth.”

seven. A mystic or sacred number. It is composed of four and three, which, among the Pythagoreans, were, and from time immemorial have been, accounted lucky numbers. Among the Babylonians, Egyptians, and other ancient peoples, there were seven sacred planets. The Hebrew verb to swear means literally to come under the influence of seven things; thus, seven ewe lambs figure in the oath between Abraham and Abimelech at Beersheba (Gen. 21:28), and Herodotus describes an Arabian oath in which seven stones are smeared with blood.

There are seven days in Creation, seven days in the week, seven graces, seven divisions in the Lord's Prayer, and seven ages in the life of man; climatic years are seven and nine with their multiples by odd numbers; and the seventh son of a seventh son was held notable.

Among the Hebrews, every seventh year was sabbatical, and seven times seven years was the jubilee. The three great Jewish feasts lasted seven days; and between the first and second were seven weeks. Levitical purifications lasted seven days; Balaam would have seven altars, and sacrificed on them seven bullocks and seven rams; Naaman was commanded to dip seven times in Jordan; Elijah sent his servant seven times to look out for rain; ten times seven Israelites went to Egypt, the exile lasted the same number of years, and there were ten times seven elders. Pharaoh in his dream saw seven kine and seven ears of corn; Jacob served seven years for each of his wives; seven priests with seven trumpets marched round Jericho once every day, but seven times on the seventh day. Samson's wedding feast lasted seven days; on the seventh he told his bride the riddle, he was bound with seven withes, and seven locks of his hair were cut off. Nebuchadnezzar was a beast for seven years.

In the Apocalypse, there are seven churches of Asia, seven candlesticks, seven stars, seven trumpets, seven spirits before the throne of God, seven horns, seven vials, seven plagues, a seven-headed monster, and the Lamb with seven eyes.

The old astrologers and alchemists recognized seven so-called planets. According to the Muslims, there are seven heavens.

Seven Against Thebes (Hepta epi Thebas, 467 B.C.). A tragedy by Aeschylus. It deals with the war between the sons of Oedipus for the throne of Thebes. It is the last play of a trilogy that included Laius and Oedipus, both now lost. The ending was changed by an unknown poet to conform to Sophocles' popular tragedy Antigone and the original ending is lost. Static in action, the play is martial in spirit; it may have been in part a tract urging Athens to fortify its acropolis. For the story, see the Seven Against Thebes.

Max MELL's Sieben gegen Theben (1932) is a German adaptation of the play.

Seven against Thebes, The. Seven mythical Argive champions. They waged war on Thebes. Cursed by Oedipus for consenting to his banishment, his sons, Eteocles and Polynices, agreed to occupy the Theban throne on alternate years, but Eteocles banished his brother. Polynices fled to Argos, where, with the help of Eamys, he won the support of King Adrastus, whose daughter he married. Their force was led by seven champions: Adrastus; his brother-in-law, the seer Amphiaraus, who foresaw that only Adrastus would survive the war; Adrastus' son-in-law Tydeus, a hero from Calydon; Parthenopaeus, Hippomedon, Capaneus, and Polynices (though some accounts add the Argives Meicisteus and Eteocles in place of the foreign leaders, Polynices and Tydeus).

Tydeus was sent ahead to demand Theban surrender; Eteocles refused and Tydeus was ambushed, but killed his fifty attackers and escaped. On the way to Thebes, the seven were dismayed by the death of the infant Opheltes, which they regarded as an ill omen. Each of the champions stationed himself at one of the seven gates of Thebes; Eteocles assigned a general to defend each, reserving for himself the one menaced by Polynices. In the ensuing battle, the Argives were almost totally destroyed. Zeus struck Capanes from a scaling-ladder for his impious boasting; Amphiaraus was swallowed by the earth; Athena would have saved the wounded Tydeus, but refused when she saw him eating the brains of an enemy; and the other Argive leaders died except for Adrastus, who was saved by his horse Arion. Polynices and Eteocles met in single combat and killed each other.

For more details of this bloody war, and its aftermath, see Menoeceus, Antigone, Eadne, and Epigoni. The story of the war was told by Aeschylus in his Seven Against Thebes, by Euripides in his Phoenician Women and The Suppliant Women, by Seneca in his Phoenissae, and by Statius in his epic poem Thebae.

Seven Arts, The (1916–1917). An American monthly periodical of literature and opinion founded by James Oppenheim. One of the best-known and longest-lived of the little magazines of the early 20th century, it ceased publication largely because its pacifist views made it a financial failure. Its aim was to provide a vehicle for the expression of ideas and forms to which the conservative journals of the day were closed. Van Wyck Brooks and Waldo Frank were among its editors.

Seven Champions of Christendom, The Famous History of the (1596). A medieval romance by Richard Johnson about the national patron saints of England, Scotland, Wales, Ireland, France, Spain, and Italy. Johnson relates that St. George of England was seven years imprisoned by the Almador, the Black King of Morocco; St. Denys of France lived seven years in the form of a hart; St. James of Spain was seven years dumb through love for a fair Jewess; St. Anthony of Italy, with the other champions, was enchanted into a deep sleep in the black castle, and was released by St. George's three sons, who quenched the seven lamps by water from the enchanted fountain; St. Andrew of Scotland delivered six ladies who had lived seven years in the form of white swans; St. Patrick of Ireland was immersed in a cell where he scratched his grave with his own nails; and St. David of Wales slept seven years in the enchanted garden of Ormandine, and was redeemed by St. George. See Scordellium.

Seven Hills, the City of (Lat. Urbs Septicollis). Ancient Rome. The city was built on seven hills, which Servius Tullius surrounded with a line of fortifications. The hills are the Palatine, the Capitoline, the Quirinalis, the Caelius, the Aventinus, the Viminalis, and the Esquiline.

seven last words of Christ. (1) "Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do."
seven names of God. Among the ancient Hebrews, the seven names for the Deity over which the scribes had to exercise particular care. They were El, Elohim, Adonai, YHWH (i.e., our Jehovah), Elyah-Eshel-Elyah, Shadai, and Zebaoth. In medieval times God was sometimes called simply The Seven.

Sages of Rome, The. See The Seven Wise Masters.

seven sciences. See Liberal arts.

seven seas. The Arctic and the Antarctic, North and South Pacific, North and South Atlantic, and the Indian oceans. Kipling called a volume of his poems The Seven Seas (1896).

Seven Sleepers. In Muslim and Christian legend, seven noble youths who fled in the Decian persecution of 250 to a cave in Mount Celen. After 309 years (or 230 years, according to some sources), they awoke, but soon died. Their bodies were taken to Marseilles in a large stone coffin, still shown in Victor's church. Their names are Constantine, Dionysius, John, Maximian, Malchus, Martian, and Servion. In the Muslim version the Sleepers had a dog named KATMIR who watched over them. This fable took its rise from a misunderstanding of the words in the Bible (I Cor. 15:18), "They fell asleep in Christ" (i.e., died). See TALISMAN.

Seventeen (1816). A novel by Booth Tarkington. Its hero is William Sylvanus Baxter, "Silly Billy," an adolescent in the throes of his first love affair. The object of his attention is Lola Pratt, whose chief occupation is lavishing baby talk on her pet dog Flopit and on her numerous admirers.

Seven Wise Masters, The. Also known as the Tales of Sandibur or Sindibad or Syntipas. A collection of Oriental tales (probably Indian, c. 100 B.C.) popularized in the Middle Ages through the French verse romance The Seven Sages of Rome (Roman des Sept Sages, early 14th century) and the prose variation Dolopathos (c. 1222-1225). A jealous stepmother tells her husband the king that his son is trying to seduce her, and the prince is condemned to death. For seven days the queen and the boy's seven wise teachers alternate in telling the king tales, the queen urging him that the prince is a dangerous rival, the sages demonstrating the untrustworthiness of women. Finally the prince, who has been silent for seven days, reveals the whole truth, and the queen is burned at the stake.

Seven Wonders of the Ancient World. A list of man-made wonders compiled by Hellenistic travelers. The first extant list was that made by Antipater of Sidon in the second century B.C.; a better known list by Philo of Byzantium was made somewhat later. The Seven Wonders included the pyramid of Egypt, the Hanging Gardens of Babylon, the statue of Zeus at Olympia, carved by Phidias, the temple of Artemis at Ephesus, the tomb of king Mausolus (hence the term MAUSOLEUM) at Halicarnassus, the Colossus at Rhodes, and any one of the following three: the Pharos, the walls of Babylon, or the palace of Cyrus.

Seven Years War (1756-1763). The war against Frederick the Great of Prussia waged by France, Austria, and Russia. England aided Frederick with subsidies and Hanoverian troops. The war ended with the treaty of Hubertusburg by which Frederick retained all his dominions. The war carried with it the struggle between France and England overseas, which was settled in the Peace of Paris of 1763, leaving England predominant in India and America. See French and Indian War.

Sevren, Joseph (1793-1879). English painter. He is chiefly remembered as a friend of John Keats, whom he accompanied to Italy in 1820 and attended on his deathbed.

Sevérin, John (1745-1815). American frontiersman, Indian fighter, and politician. During the Revolution he contributed to the American victory at King's Mountain on the border between the Carolinas (Oct. 7, 1780). He later served as the first governor of Tennessee. He is a character in Winston Churchill's novel The Crossing (1904).

Sévigné, marquise de. Born Marie de Rabutin-Chantal (1626-1696). French letter writer and lady of fashion. In letters to her daughter, Mme de Grignan and to a circle of intimate friends, Mme de Sévigné described the life of the court, city, and countryside, her domestic affairs, and her reading. These writings afford not only a picture of an age but a portrait of the woman herself—wise and witty, imaginative and affectionate.

Sewall, Samuel (1652-1730). English-born American statesman of early New England. He is known for his liberal views and for his Diary (1787-1822), written between 1647 and 1729, which gives a vivid picture of life and personalities in the Boston of his day and has been compared to the similar and more famous work of Samuel Pepys. Among his other writings are The Revolution in New England Justified (1691), which seeks to justify the deposition of the dictatorial English governor Andros; The Selling of Joseph (1700), one of the first antislavery tracts written in America; and A Memorial Relating to the Kennebec Indians (1721), a brief appeal for charitable treatment of the Indians.

Sewall, who held a number of political offices in the Massachusetts colony, was one of the judges at the Salem witchcraft trials, but later repented publicly in church while his confession was read to the congregation.

Sewance Review, The. A quarterly magazine founded in 1892 at the University of the South, Sewance, Tenn. It has always been especially interested in Southern affairs, but in later years (under Allen Tate and his successors) the magazine has been chiefly noted as an organ of the New Criticism and of avant-garde writing in general.

Seward, Anna (1747-1809). English poet, known as "the swan of Lichfield." She bequeathed her poems to Sir Walter Scott, who published them with a memoir in 1810.

Seward, William Henry (1801-1872). American statesman. After serving as governor of New York, Seward was elected to the U.S. Senate in 1848. An opponent of slavery, he attacked the COMPROMISE OF 1850 and the Kansas-Nebraska Act, claiming that the struggle over slavery entailed irrepressible conflict between North and South. After an unsuccessful attempt to win the Republican presidential nomi-ination in 1860, he became Lincoln's secretary of state and apparently thought that he could dominate the administration, but the president soon showed Seward his error. Considered one of the greatest American secretaries of state, he carried on a successful foreign policy during the Civil War and later secured the withdrawal of French troops from Mexico. On the night of Lincoln's assassination, Seward, who was recovering from injuries sustained in an accident, was wounded by an accomplice of John Wilkes Booth. Continuing as secretary of state under Johnson, he purchased Alaska from Russia for $720,000, a transaction once known as "Seward's Folly."

Sewell, Anna (1820–1878). English writer. She is best known for her highly popular Black Beauty, the Autobiography of a Horse, which was translated into most European languages. She also wrote stories in prose and verse for children.

Sextus Empiricus (fl. 190). A Greek physician and Skeptical philosopher. In Pyrrhonian Sketches he defends the position of the Skeptics, as he does in his other work Against the Dogmatists and Against the Schoolmasters (Adversus Mathematicos). Although he adds nothing original, he gives useful information on the positions he attacks.

Seymour, Jane. See Jane Seymour.

Seys-Inquart, Artur von (1892–1946). Austrian Nazi. He succeeded Schuschnigg as chancellor (1938) and proclaimed union with Germany.

Sforza. Italian family that ruled in the second half of the 15th century at Milan. From their obscure origins as soldiers of fortune they established themselves as a princely house and one of the leading powers of Italy. Among those noted for their cultivation of the arts and their patronage of learning were Francesco Sforza (1401–1466) and his son
Lodovico Sforza (1451–1508), both dukes of Milan.
Lodovico, surnamed il Moro (the Moor) because of his swarthy complexion, is especially known for his employment of Leonardo da Vinci.

Sganarelle. In the comedies of Molière, a favorite name for the cowardly, domineering or unpleasant
character:

(1) The titular character in Sganarelle, ou Le Cucu imaginaire (The Imaginary Cuckold, 1660). This farce hinges on the consequences of Sganarelle's finding and confiscating a miniature of a gentleman, which he thinks his wife has dropped. In reality, the miniature was dropped by Clélie, and the portray is not that of Sganarelle's imaginary rival but of Lélie, her sweetheart.

(2) In L'Ecole des maris (The School for Husbands, 1661), Sganarelle and his brother Ariste are the guardians of the two young orphans, Isabelle and Léonore. The conceited and domineering Sganarelle expects to marry Isabelle, but forces her to lead such daull, strict life that she dupes him and marries Valère instead.

(3) In Le Mariage Forcé (The Forced Marriage, 1664), Sganarelle is a rich man of 64 who promises marriage to Dorimène, a young girl in her teens.
He decides at the last moment to withdraw from the alliance, but Dorimène's brother beats him ruthlessly until he consents to go to the altar.

(4) In L'Amour médecin, Sganarelle is the selfish father of Lucinde.

(5) In Dom Juan, ou le Festin en Pierre, Sganarelle is Don Juan's rather foolish, cowardly valet.

(6) In Le Médecin malgré lui, the last of the Sganarelle plays of which Le Cucu imaginaire is logically the sequel, Sganarelle is a woodcutter.
Martine, his wife, wanting to get even for the blows he has dealt her, tells some inquirers who are looking for a doctor that he is a noted specialist but so eccentric that he will deny it until they beat him well.
Sganarelle, beaten, is taken to the house of the apparently dumb Lucinde. The shrewd Sganarelle sees through her ruse and brings her lover Léandre to her in the guise of an apothecary.

Shackleton, Sir Ernest Henry (1874–1922).
English antarctic explorer. He accompanied Robert F. Scott on his 1901 expedition, and later conducted several expeditions of his own. He described them in The Heart of the Antarctic (1909) and South (1919).

Joseph Conrad. Its hero is a young captain who grows mature in the experience of taking his sailing ship through a difficult calm.

Shadows on the Rock (1931). A novel by Willa Cather. In part a result of the author's interest in the Roman Catholic church, this work is an episodic narrative of life in Quebec during the last days of Frontenac. The story centers in the life of Cécile Aucclair, a child recently emigrated from France.

Shadrich, Meshach, and Abednego. In the Old Testament, 3 Hebrews who, because of their repeal to worship a golden image, were cast by the command of Nebuchadnezzar into a fiery furnace.
But although the furnace was made burning hot, the three men "came forth of the midst of the fire" unharmed, convincing Nebuchadnezzar of the power of their God (Dan. 3:22).

Shadwell, Thomas (c. 1642–1692). English dramatist and poet. He is best known as Dryden's original for the titular hero of MacFlecknoe and for Ong in Absalom and Achitophel (1682). These satirical portraits were inspired by Shadwell's The Medal of John Bayes (1682), a savage attack on Dryden as a member of the court party. Shadwell later became poet laureate when Dryden was deprived of the position upon the accession of William III.
His best plays, distinguished equally by their coarseness and acute observation of manners of the day, are Epsom Wells (1672) and The Squire of Alstia (1688).

Shaftesbury, 1st earl of. Anthony Ashley Cooper (1621–1683). English statesman. A Royalist during the Civil War, he was a member of the Caral after the Restoration and was named lord chancellor in 1672. A fomenter of the Popish Plot and a supporter of the duke of Monmouth, he was satirized by Dryden, who made him the Achitophel in his Absalom and Achitophel. See Medal, The.

Shahn, Ben (1898— ). Lithuanian-born American artist. At one time assistant to Diego Rivera, he has put his expressive talent to public use, doing commercial work and posters as well as drawings and paintings of social import.

Shah-nama (The Book of Kings). Persian epic poem by Firdousi. The poet labored for 35 years on this work, finishing it in 1010. It consisted of 60,000 couples, but not all have survived. A legendary treatment of Persian history, it immediately became the natural epic. It chronicles the entire history of Persia from the creation of man to the Sasanian empire (A.D. 226-641). By writing this epic Firdousi preserved material that was on the verge of oblivion; he used now lost written sources and the dying oral traditions for his material. While Shah-nama has many heroes, its main theme is an expression of Persian pride and glory.

Shakers. A celibate sect of Second Adventists, founded in the 18th century in England by a secession from the Quakers and transplanted to the U.S. by Ann Lee. Their official name is "The United Society of Believers in Christ's Second Appearing" or "The Millennial Church"; their popular name was originally derivitive and refers to the contortions they made during the religious dances of which their public form of worship chiefly consisted. Theologically, they hold that God is dual, comprising the eternal father and eternal mother, the parents of angels and of men.

Shakespeare, William (1564-1616). English poet and dramatist of the Elizabethan and early Jacobean period, the most widely known author in all English literature. Shakespeare was born at Stratford-on-Avon, the son of John Shakespeare, a man who attained some prominence in town affairs, and Mary Arden, a woman of good family. William was probably educated at the King Edward IV Grammar School in Stratford, where he learned Latin and a little Greek and read the Roman dramatists. At 18 he married Anne Hathaway, some seven or eight years his senior, who bore him a daughter Susanna, in 1583, and twins, Hamnet (who died in boyhood) and Judith, in 1585. There is no record of Shakespeare's activities between 1585 and 1592, when he is known to have been in London and is alluded to as an actor and playwright in a bitter passage in Robert Greene's A Groatsworth of Wit. There is some speculation that Shakespeare may have taught school during this period, but it seems more probable that in 1585, or shortly after, he went to London and began his apprenticeship as an actor.

The London theaters were closed from June, 1592, to April, 1594, because of the plague. How Shakespeare earned his living during this period is not precisely known, though he probably had some income from his patron, Henry Wriothesley, earl of Southampton, to whom he dedicated his first two published poems: Venus and Adonis (1593) and The Rape of Lucrece (1594). Venus and Adonis is a long narrative poem based on Ovid and dealing with Adonis' rejection of the goddess of love, his death, and the consequent disappearance of beauty from the world; it was immensely popular, and went through six editions in nine years. Contemporary sources, however, indicate that the more conservative elements objected to what they considered the poem's glorification of sensuality, and it may have been in response to this that Shakespeare wrote Lucrece, which praises chastity. The story of the rape of the Roman matron Lucretia by Tarquin, it is based on tales found in Ovid, Livy, and Chaucer's Legend of Good Women, and written in rhyme royal. Though a more polished and in some senses a better poem than Venus and Adonis, it suffers from excessive length and never found the popularity of the earlier poem.

In 1594, Shakespeare appears in contemporary records as a member of the Lord Chamberlain's company of actors. The most popular of the companies acting at Court, it lasted through the reign of Elizabeth and became the company of the King's Men under the patronage of James I. In 1599, a group of the leading actors of Chamberlain's Men—Shakespeare among them—formed a syndicate to build and operate a new playhouse; it was named the GLOBE, and became one of the most famous theaters of its time. Largely from his share of the income of the Globe (and of Blackfriars, in which he also had an interest) Shakespeare became a moderately wealthy man. As early as 1597 he purchased New Place, a large house in Stratford.

By 1597, Shakespeare had written at least a dozen plays: comedies, patriotic histories, and one tragedy in the bloody-revenge style popular in the Elizabethan theater. The dates of these plays, and their order of composition, cannot be definitely established. The earliest plays include, among the histories, Henry VI (Parts I, II, and III, 1590-1592), Richard II (1594), Richard III (1595), and King John (1596-1597); among the comedies, The Comedy of Errors (1590-1592), Two Gentlemen of Verona (c. 1592), Love's Labour's Lost (1593-1594), A Midsummer Night's Dream (1595-1596); and, among the tragedies, Titus Andronicus (1590-1592). The earliest plays, as might be expected, show the greatest influence of contemporary and classical models; the early comedies are conventional, artificial, filled with ingenious conceits, puns, and other elaborate word-play, but they foreshadow his later great comedies in their careful structure. The Henry VI plays, though faulty in themselves, developed into an early triumph in Richard II. Titus Andronicus, Senecan in style and strongly influenced by Thomas Kyd's The Spanish Tragedy, is so unlike Shakespeare's mature tragedies that some critics dispute his authorship of it.

Romeo and Juliet (1596), Shakespeare's second tragedy, is a transitional work; like the early comedies, it tends to be artificial, but in its lyricism and its development of character it indicates the direction of Shakespeare's growth. His plays in the last years of the 17th century are primarily comedies and histories: the so-called joyous comedies, namely, The Merchant of Venice (1596), The Merry Wives of Windsor (1597-1600), Much Ado About Nothing (1598-1599), As You Like It (1599-1600), Twelfth Night (1599-1600); and the histories of Henry IV (Parts I and II, 1597-1598) and Henry V (1598-1599). It is in these plays that Shakespeare's great gift for character portrayal becomes evident as he brings to life Shylock, Falstaff, Jaques, and a host of memorable figures.

The great period of Shakespeare's tragedies is ushered in at the turn of the century with Julius Caesar (1599-1600). In the intensely drawn character of Brutus from this play there is a foreshadowing of the heroes of the first two of the great tragedies:...
Hamlet (1600–1601) and Othello (1604). These profound explorations of the human spirit are developed with even larger range in King Lear (1605–1606), generally regarded as his greatest work, and with a sharper focus in Macbeth (1606) and Antony and Cleopatra (1607–1608). Timon of Athens (1607–1608) and Coriolanus (1608–1609) are his final tragedies, and their enigmatic quality is shared by the other plays of this period: Troilus and Cressida (1600–1602), a play variously described as a comedy or a tragedy and now generally regarded as a serious satire; All’s Well That Ends Well (1602) and Measure for Measure (1604–1605), two of “the dark comedies.”

The plays of Shakespeare’s last period are sometimes described as comedies, but might be better termed romances or tragicomedies; clearly experimental, they are light-hearted and yet serious, romantically fanciful and yet symbolic. They include Pericles (1608–1609), Cymbeline (1609–1610), The Winter’s Tale (1610–1611), and The Tempest (1611–1612).

Henry VIII, a history play, is the final work attributed to Shakespeare; it is generally considered to be an inferior piece, and many scholars believe much of it to have been written by John Fletcher. Eighteen of Shakespeare’s plays were published separately in quarto editions during his lifetime; a complete collection of his works did not appear until the publication of the First Folio in 1623.

Shakespeare’s achievements did not go unnoticed among his contemporaries. In 1598, Francis Meres cited “honey-tongued” Shakespeare for his plays and poems. With Shakespeare as their leading dramatist, the Chamberlain’s Men rose to become the leading dramatic company in London, and, in 1603 were installed as members of the royal household, bearing the title of the King’s Men.

Sometime after 1612, Shakespeare apparently retired from the stage and returned to Stratford. In January, 1616, he had his will drawn up; it included the famous bequest to his wife of his “second best bed.” On April 25 of that year, he was buried at Stratford Church, and the monument over his tomb lists the day of his death as April 23, 1616.

Although Shakespeare was ranked among the foremost dramatists of his time by his contemporaries, evidence indicates that both he and his world looked to poetry, not playwriting, for enduring fame. In the years following the publication of Venus and Adonis and Lucrece, Shakespeare continued to write poems; his sonnets (see Sonnets of Shakespeare) were composed between 1593 and 1601, though not published until 1609. In 1599 there appeared a volume of 20 poems called The Passionate Pilgrim; Shakespeare’s name was given on the title page, but only five of the poems (I, II, III, V, and XVII) are now believed to be his. A poem called The Phoenix and the Turtle, attributed to Shakespeare, was published in Robert Chester’s Loves Martyr (1601). A Lover’s Complaint, published at the end of the 1609 edition of the sonnets, is written in the same meter as Lucrece but seems to belong to a different period. Not all scholars agree that it is the work of Shakespeare.

During the 17th and early 18th centuries Shakespeare suffered at the hands of those—including Alexander Pope—who would “improve” him; his plays were frequently staged, but apparently he was not widely read. There was, however, a considerable upsurge of interest in his works, beginning in the middle of the 18th century and continuing with the enthusiastic criticism of Samuel Taylor Coleridge, Charles Lamb, and William Hazlitt. The 19th century also saw the growth of the theory that someone other than Shakespeare—usually Sir Francis Bacon—wrote his plays (see Baconian controversy).

Shakuntala. In Hindu mythology, the daughter of Visvamitra and Menaka. She is the heroine of Kalidasa’s Sanskrit drama Shakuntala. She was abandoned on the banks of the river Malini and brought up by the hermit Kanva. While hunting one day King Dushyanta meets Shakuntala, falls in love with her, and persuades her to marry him. He gives her a ring before returning to his throne. Shakuntala gives birth to a son and sets out with him to find Dushyanta. She loses the ring while bathing and the king, enchanted by Durvasas’s curse, does not recognize her. The ring is subsequently recovered by the king in the stomach of a fish he has caught. He then recognizes his wife and proclaims her his queen. Their son, Bharata, becomes the heir to the throne and later the founder of the race of the Bharatas.

The play, written in both poetry and prose, follows a highly traditionalized style. Like Attic Greek drama, the plot is taken from mythology and there is no effort to use suspense or to introduce elements into the story that are not already known to the sophisticated audience. Through his poetry and music the playwright seeks to evoke states of being and to elicit the emotions in his audience: love, mirth, energy (the heroic emotion), terror, disgust. Each scene is supposed to engender some emotional flavor, but not to run counter to the dominant emotion of the play, which in the case of Shakuntala is erotic.

shamanism. A primitive form of religion. Those who practice it believe that the world and all events are governed by evil spirits who can be propitiated or bought off only through the intervention of a witch doctor, or Shaman. The word is Slavonic; it comes from the Samoyeds and other Siberian peoples, but is now applied to American Indian and other primitive worship.

Shamash. The Babylonian sun-god. The son of Sin, the moon-god, and brother of Ishtar, he was a divine dispenser of justice. In this role it was he from whom Hammurabi claimed to have received sanction for his code of laws. His wife was Aya, the Dawn. He is almost identical with the Sumerian god Uru.

Shandy, Tristram. See Tristram Shandy.

Shandy, Walter. In Laurence Sterne’s novel Tristram Shandy, the father of the hero-historian. Walter’s great aim is to rear his child to be a great man, but all his schemes are confounded by fate: the child is baptized Tristram not Trismegistus; his nose is crushed by Dr. Stor's forceps; a window-sash falls leaving Tristram circumcised or worse.

Shang or Yin. The first historical Chinese dynasty
(c. 1523–1027 b.c.). Centering about the Yellow River with its capital at Anyang, it possessed a highly developed civilization. Exquisite Chinese bronzes and oracle bones, inscribed with an advanced form of writing, which date to this period, were unearthed in excavations in the late 1920's.

Shangri-La. In James Hilton's popular novel
Lost Horizon (1933), a mythical land of eternal youth and safety from war, supposedly situated somewhere in the interior of Tibet. Shangri-La has come to mean any ideal refuge.

chanties (from Fr. chanter to sing). Songs sung by sailors at work, to ensure united action; also called chanties. They are in sets, each of which has a different cadence, adapted to the work at hand.

Shan Van Voght. An Irish patriotic song (1798).
The title is a corruption of Ais-ssan bhsean bhocht
(the poor old woman, i.e., Ireland).

Shapiro, Karl [Jay] (1913– ). American poet, critic, and editor. Shapiro is best known for his poems of World War II, the best of which appeared in V-Letter and Other Poems (1944). Other collections include Person, Place, and Thing (1942),
The Place for Love (1943), Trial of a Poet and Other Poems (1947), Poems 1940–1953 (1953), and Poems of a Jew (1958). His critical works include Essay on Rime (1945), a philosophical discourse in verse, and Beyond Criticism (1955). In Defense of Ignorance (1960) is a collection of essays on modern poetry. He was editor of Poetry magazine from 1950 to 1956 and later was editor of Prairie Schooner.

Sharp, Becky or Rebecca. The central character in the novel Vanity Fair by William Make-peace Thackeray. She is a cool, unprincipled, selfish girl, whose only object is to rise in the world from er her obscure and poverty-stricken origins. "She was small and slight in person, pale, sandy-haired, and with green eyes, habitually cast down, but very large, odd, and attractive when they looked up."

Among her light, popular novels are The Nutmeg
Tree (1937), Cluny Brown (1944), Britannia Mews (1946), The Gypsy in the Parlor (1953), and The Turret (1963).

Shatov, Ivan Pavlovich. In Feodor Dostoevski's The Possessed, an earnest, awkward former student and friend of Stavrogin whose father had been a servant in the household of Stavrogin's mother.
He has become obsessed with the idea of the mission of Russia in saving the world with the unsullied Christianity preserved in Orthodoxy, a notion once casually dropped by Stavrogin. Shatov is a member of Verkhovenski's revolutionary group. When he tries to quit, Verkhovene1ski has him murdered.

Darya Pavlovna Shatova. Ivan's sister, a ward in the household of Varvara Petrovna, Stavrogin's mother. The open-hearted Darya is in love with Stavrogin and immediately agrees to go away with him to begin a new life elsewhere. Before the plan is carried out, Stavrogin hangs himself.

Marya Ignatyevna Shatova. Ivan's wife, who returns to him on the evening of his murder and gives birth to a child, presumably fathered by Stavrogin.

Shatriya. See Caste.

Shaun the Postman. In James Joyce's novel Finnegans Wake, the name by which Kevin, one of H. C. Earwicker's twin sons, is generally known. He represents the man of action. Shem is his opposite.
See Finnegans Wake.

Shaw, George Bernard (1856–1950), Irish dramatist, critic, and social reformer. Idealistic, prudish, afraid of intimacy, often shy, Shaw's public image was his own created caricature: "G.B.S." The beard, the mysticism, the eccentricities all belonged to G.B.S., whom Shaw used as the spokesman for his social, mental, and literary theories. Political and economic socialism, a new religion of creative evolution, anti-vivisection, vegetarianism, and spelling reform were a few of his causes. His plays and essays, never written solely to entertain, were the vehicles for Shaw's thories; G.B.S. was his press agent.

Shaw had written five unsuccessful socialist novels by 1884 when he met William Archer, who urged him to write modern, purposeful dramas as Ibsen had done. Through Archer, Shaw became music critic for a London newspaper. He was well known for his music reviews long before he became famous as a dramatist. He began to write for the stage in 1885.
With most of his early plays either banned by the censor of refused production, Shaw sought a reading audience with his first published collection, Plays Pleasant and Unpleasant (1898), the pleasant plays being Arms and the Man, Candida, The Man of Destiny, and You Never Can Tell; the unpleasant, The Philanderer, Mrs. Warren's Profession, and his first play, Widowers' Houses. It was for this volume that Shaw began the practice of writing the challenging, mocking, eloquent prefaces to his plays, the prefaces sometimes being longer than the plays themselves and covering a diversity of topics.

By 1900, some of Shaw's plays had been produced in the U.S. and in Germany, but not in England. His next collection of plays, Three Plays for Puritans (1900), contained The Devil's Disciple, Caesar and Cleopatra, and Captain Brassbound's Conversion.

Before the outbreak of the First World War, and largely through the efforts of H. Granville-Barker, Shaw had been accepted in England; his position as a playwright was secure, and his fame worldwide.

Because of his attacks on British policy during the war and his continual irritation to reactionary elements in England, Shaw was widely unpopular for a time, but his international fame allowed him to speak his mind and write what he pleased.

Shaw wrote his best plays prior to, during, and shortly after the First World War. They include Man and Superman, John Bull's Other Island (written at the request of William Butler Yeats for the Irish Literary Theater), Major Barbara, Misaliance, Fanny's First Play (1912), Androcles and the Lion, Pygmalion, Great Catherine (1918), Heartbreak House, Back to Methuselah, and Saint Joan. He received the Nobel prize for literature in 1925.

A member of the Fabian Society from its founding (1883), Shaw wrote many essays on socialism, politics, and economics and one longer work, The Intelligent Women's Guide to Socialism and Capitalism (1928).

He wrote less as he grew older, but never stopped completely; he was at work on a comedy when he died at the age of 94. His last full-length play, Buoyant Billions, was produced in Zurich in 1948 "before a respectful if uncomprehending audience."

Shang 922

Always outspoken, with a barbed humor and wit, never satisfied with the conventional, Shaw conducted himself so that the adjective "Shavian" is descriptive of an iconoclastic way of life, rather than a literary form.

His fame and popularity rest on his plays, but John Mason Brown has observed, "This astonishing Mr. Shaw has been greater than anything even he has written.

Shaw, Henry Wheeler. See Josh Billings.

Shaw, John. 3rd earl of Mulgrave, 1st duke of Buckingham and Norhamby (1648-1721). English political leader, poet, essayist, and dramatist, patron and friend of Dryden and Pope. He is remembered chiefly for his Essay on Satire (1690), which published anonymously and attributed to Dryden, resulted in the latter's being attacked by some thugs engaged by the earl of Rochester.

Sheik, The (1921). A novel by the English popular novelist Edith Maude Hull. A preposterous story that made a semiscandalous sensation, it became the basis for a famous movie with Rudolph Valentino.

Sheldon, Charles M[oonro] (1857-1946). American clergyman. He is the author of the novel In His Steps (1896), one of the greatest all-time best sellers. Sheldon published other works of exhortation, but none achieved the fame of this book. From 1902 to 1925, he was editor of the Christian Herald.

Sheldon, Edward Brevster (1886-1946). American playwright. His best-known plays were melodramas based on the social problems current in the early 20th century. His first success was Salvation Nell, written while he was still at Harvard. The Nigger created a furore because its hero is a white man with Negro blood, whose fiancée does not reject him. Later came The Boss, The High Road (1912), Romance, and other successful plays. He also collaborated with Sidney Howard on Bewitched (1924), with Charles MacArthur on Lulu Belle (1926), and with Margaret Ayer Barnes on Dishonored Lady (1930).

Shelabarger, Samuel (1888-1954). American historical novelist and biographer. After teaching at Princeton (1914-1923), Shelabarger retired to write historical romances, such as Captain from Castile (1945), about the conquest of Mexico by Cortez; Prince of Foxes (1947), about Renaissance Italy; and The King's Cavalier (1950), about Renaissance France. He also wrote mysteries and light romances under the pen names John Esteven and Peter Loring.

Shelley, Mary Wollstonecraft. Born Godwin (1797-1851). English novelist, daughter of William Godwin and Mary Wollstonecraft and second wife of Percy Bysshe Shelley. She wrote in the convention of the Gothic novel. Frankenstein or the Modern Prometheus is her best-known work. Other romances are Valperga (1823), The Last Man (1826), Lodore (1835).

Shelley, Percy Bysshe (1792-1822). English poet. Although he was the son of a conservative country squire, Shelley was influenced early in life by the doctrines of the Enlightenment, ardently championing liberty and rebelling against the strictures of English politics and religion. While at Oxford he wrote and circulated a pamphlet called The Necessity of Atheism, and was sent down for "contumacy in refusing to answer certain questions" about it. In 1811, when he was 19, he eloped with 16-year-old Harriet Westbrook, and the pair spent the following two years traveling in England and Ireland, distributing pamphlets and speaking against political injustice. By 1814, however, an estrangement was growing between them, and they were separated. At about the same time he met William Godwin, whose Political Justice had strongly influenced the early direction of his thinking, and soon fell in love with Godwin's daughter Mary (see Mary Shelley). In the summer of 1814 he and Mary eloped to the Continent; though they did not believe in marriage because of its exclusiveness and limitations, they were married after Harriet committed suicide in 1816. Their household, however, was scarcely conventional, and after 1818 they lived exclusively in Italy, where Shelley did his best work.

Shelley's early poetry includes Queen Mab, written in 1812–1813, a long work inveighing against orthodox Christianity and secular tyranny, and Alastor, or the Spirit of Solitude (1816), an allegory of a youth seeking in vain for a being equal to his most perfect imaginings. His Hymn to Intellectual Beauty, conceived during a voyage on Lake Geneva with Byron in 1816, reflects Shelley's Platonism. He revised the early Laon and Cythna, an allegorical poem on the French Revolution, and renamed it The Rise of Island; somewhat similar in ideological content to Queen Mab, it was the last long poem Shelley wrote before leaving for Italy in 1818. He was working on The Cenci (1819), a blank verse drama on the unfortunate Beatrice Cenci, when news came of the Peterloo Massacre at Manchester; inspired by outrage and pity, he wrote the Mask of Anarchy. He soon began working on Prometheus Unbound, a lyric and symbolic drama for which he adapted elements from the Greek myth of Prometheus.

In 1819 the Shelleys moved to Pisa, where Shelley composed many of his shorter lyrics, among them The Cloud, To a Skylark, One to the West Wind, and The Sensitive Plant; with the earlier Ozymandias (written 1817), these poems have become the most famous among Shelley's works, though their popularity has obscured his general recognition as a philosophical poet.

Among Shelley's last works are Epipsychidion, a passionate love poem addressed to Emilia Viviani; and Adonais, an elegy on the death of Keats modeled after the elegies of Bion and Moschus and frequently considered to be, of elegies in English, second only to Milton's Lycidas. In 1821, in response to Thomas Love Peacock's disparaging comments on the value of poetry in The Four Ages of Poetry, Shelley wrote his famous Defence of Poetry. Based somewhat on Sir Philip Sidney's essay, and drawing on ideas contained in the Symposium and Ion of Plato, the Defence is interesting primarily for the light it throws on Shelley's philosophical thought and his analysis of the value of the creative imagination.

In 1822 the Shelley household, which now included Jane and Edward Williams, moved to the Bay of Lerici, where Shelley wrote the poems addressed to Jane and sailed with Edward. He was at work on a long poem, The Triumph of Life, which was left incomplete when his boat was caught in a storm and he and Edward Williams were drowned. Their bodies were washed ashore at Viareggio where, in the presence of Lord Byron and Leigh Hunt, they were burned on the beach.

A thorough student of Greek, Shelley was a Platonist and a humanist, looking to the Athens of the time of Pericles as the ideal toward which present-day civilization should be directed. Though his enthusiasms had the spontaneity and impulsiveness of an adolescent, there can be little question of the sincerity of his beliefs or his dedication to his liberal ideals. Never an atheist, he rejected orthodox Christianity but always held to the idea of some 'pervading spirit co-eternal with the universe,' and rejected all conventions that he believed stifled love and human freedom. His poetry, typically abstract and allegorical, reflects his concern with the nature of transcendent reality.

Shen. In the Old Testament, the eldest of the three sons of Noah, whose supposed descendants are called Semites (Shemites) from his name.

Shem the Penman. In James Joyce's novel Finnegans Wake, the name by which Jerry, one of H. C. Earwicker's twin sons, is generally known. He represents the artist. Shaun is his opposite. See Finnegans Wake.

Shenstone, William (1714–1763). English poet, known for his pastoral verse, including songs, odes, ballads, and elegies. His major works include The Judgment of Hercules (1741), a poem; The Schoolmistress; and Essays on Men and Manners, prose penées in the manner of La Rochefoucauld.

Sheol. See Hades.

Shepard, Benjamin Henry Jesse Francis (1848–1927). English-born American musician and essayist. Shepard became famous as a pianist during his 20's; when he began to write essays he took the pen name of Francis Grierson, so that his two talents would be judged independently. He lived abroad for many years, but in 1913 returned to the U.S. to devote himself to writing and lecturing. His first book, written in French and published in France, was La Révolte Idélistie (1889); his other volumes include Modern Mysticism and other Essays (1899), The Celtic Temperament and Other Essays (1901), The Valley of Shadows: Recollections, 1858–63 (1909), and Abraham Lincoln, The Practical Mystic (1921).

Shepard, Ernest H. (1879– ). English illustrator and political cartoonist. Much of his work has appeared in Punch, but it is for his illustrations of A. A. Milne's Christopher Robin books and Kenneth Grahame's Wind and the Willows that he is most widely known.

Shepherd Calender, The (1579). Twelve eclogues by Edmund Spenser, one for each month of the year. The first and last eclogues are laments by the shepherd Colin Clout (a persona of Spenser) because the fair Rosalind does not return his love. The remaining ten are dialogues on love and other subjects among the shepherds.

Shepherd Kings. See Hyksos.

Shepherd Lord. Epitom for Henry de Clifford, 10th baron of Westmoreland (d. 1573). He was sent by his mother to be brought up by a shepherd, in order to save him from the fury of the Yorkists. At the accession of Henry VII he was restored to all his rights and seignories. His story is told by Wordsworth in The Song for the Feast of Brougham Castle.
Sheridan, Philip Henry (1831–1888). American Union general in the Civil War. His army was endangered at Cedar Creek while he was in conference with General Grant at Winchester; on that day, Oct. 19, 1864, he made a famous ride that turned imminent defeat into victory. His feat is celebrated in Sheridan's Ride (1865) by Thomas Buchanan Read. In 1883 Sheridan succeeded Sherman as commander of the U.S. army. His Personal Memoirs were published in 1888.

Sheridan, Richard Brinsley (1751–1816). Irish-born English dramatist, orator, and statesman. He wrote brilliantly polished, satirical comedies of manners that returned to the general vein of the Restoration period, although critics have pointed out that the moral tone of his works is not to be found in the drama of 17th-century England. He established himself as a versatile playwright within one year (1775) with the Covent Garden Theater productions of The Rivals, St. Patrick's Day, and The Duenna, a light opera. In 1776 he succeeded David Garrick as manager of the Drury Lane Theater. His other plays include The School for Scandal, The Critic (1779), and Pizarro (1799), a melodramatic tragedy.

Sherman, Frank Dempster (1860–1916). American writer of light verse. Among his collections are Madrigals and Catches (1887), Lyrics for a Lute (1890), and Lyrics of Joy (1904).

Sherman, William Tecumseh (1820–1891). American general. After succeeding Grant as commander of the Union forces in the West during the Civil War, Sherman captured Atlanta on Sept. 1, 1864 and began his famous March to the Sea, which cut the Confederacy in half. His men lived off the country, destroying enemy supplies, buildings, and railroads, and so devastated the region that Sherman’s name is still anathema in the South. After the war he performed important services in the West. When Republican leaders attempted to nominate him for the presidency in 1884, he replied, “I will not accept if nominated, and will not serve if elected.” The remark that “war is hell,” usually attributed to Sherman, probably stems from a speech (1880) in which he said, “There is many a boy here today who looks on war as all glory, but, boys, it is all hell.”

Sherriff, Robert Cedric (1896– ). English playwright and novelist. Among his plays are Journey’s End, Windfall (1933), and St. Helena (with Jeanne de Casalis; 1934). His best-known novels are The Fortnight in September (1931) and The Hopkins Manuscript (1939). He has written motion picture scenarios.

Sherwood, Robert Emmet (1896–1955). American playwright and editor. Wounded in World War I, Sherwood early resolved to do all he could to stop future wars. This attitude appears in Acropolis (1933), which attacked Hitler, and Issor’s Delight, a Pulitzer Prize-winning drama. Sherwood had earlier been drama critic of Vanity Fair (1919–1920), and associate editor and then editor of Life (1920–1928).

His first Broadway play was The Road to Rome, a comedy satirically attacking the concept of military glory. This was followed by The Love Nest (1927), The Queen’s Husband (1928), Waterloo Bridge (1930), This Is New York (1931), Reunion in Vienna, The Petrified Forest, Abe Lincoln in Illinois, and There Shall Be No Night.
Sherwood was extremely vocal in warning of the dangers of European totalitarianism. During World War II he was at various times special assistant to the secretaries of war and the navy, and director of the overseas operation of the Office of War Information. He helped write some of Franklin D. Roosevelt's speeches and later won his fourth Pulitzer Prize with Roosevelt and Hopkins: An Intimate History (1948). During this period, Sherwood did little writing for the stage, only The Rugged Path (1945) and a musical comedy, Miss Liberty (1949), with Irving Berlin. In the next years he wrote a number of movie scripts and plays for television.

She Stoops to Conquer, or, The Mistakes of a Night (1773). A comedy by Oliver Goldsmith. The story concerns young Marlow, a bashful young man who feels easy only with barmaids and serving girls. It is with reluctance that he sets forth to win the hand of Miss Hardcastle. Tricked into believing that the home of Mr. Hardcastle is a village inn, he treats her estranged father as if he were an impudent landlord. Miss Hardcastle takes advantage of the situation, posing first as the barmaid, then as a poor relative and thus conquers Marlow. The mistakes of the evening unravel with the arrival of Marlow's father who had arranged the match. Mr. Hardcastle forgives young Marlow and all ends happily. This comedy is noted for its rich characterizations and retains its deserved popularity.

Shestov, Lev. Pen name of Lev Isaakovich Schwarmzan (1866–1938). Russian philosopher and critic. He is best known for his studies of Tolstoi, Dostoevski, and Nietzsche, and his doctrine of the primacy of irrationalism in human thought, expressed in his books The Apotheosis of Groundlessness (Apotheosis bespoehovennost; 1903), also known as All Things Are Possible, and Athens and Jerusalem (1935).

shibboleth. The password of a secret society; the secret by which those of a party know each other; also, a worn-out or discredited doctrine. The Ephraimites could not pronounce sh, so when they were fleeing from Jephthah and the Gileadites (Judg. 12:1–16) they were caught at the ford on the Jordan because Jephthah caused all the fugitives to say the word shibboleth (which means "a stream in flood"), which all the Ephraimites pronounced as sibboleth.

Shigalyov. In Fedor Dostoevski's The Possessed, a member of Verkhovenski's revolutionary group. He is a burlesque portrait of a political theorist. Reporting on his plan for the new order after the revolution, the bewildered Shigalyov admits that in working out his ideas he began with unlimited freedom in the system and ended with unlimited despotism.

Shih-ching. See Book or orbs.

Shiites or Shiah. (Arabic, shiah, a sect). Those Muslims who regard Ali as the first rightfull Imam or Caliph (rejecting the three Sunni Caliphs), and do not consider the Sunna, or oral law, of any authority, but look upon it as apocryphal. There are numerous Shiite sects, all of them regarded as heretical by the orthodox Sunnites. Because of the Shiite doctrine of the Mahdi, a 12th Imam who is supposedly living in concealment through the centuries, but is expected to appear to rule Islam, the Shiites have had a political as well as a religious influence on the development of Islamism.

Shiloh, battle of (Apr. 6–7, 1862). A U.S. Civil War battle near Pittsburg Landing, Tenn. A Union army under Gen. Ulysses S. Grant was attacked and nearly defeated by the Confederates under Gen. A. S. Johnston. The arrival of reinforcements under Gen. Buell and Gen. Lew Wallace enabled the Union forces to drive the Confederates from the field, but they were too weakened for pursuit. Gen. Johnston was killed in the first day of fighting. The battle is sometimes called the battle of Pittsburg Landing.

Shimazaki Tōson (1872–1943). Japanese poet and novelist. His work shows strong Western influence. Hakai (Broken Commandment, 1906) concerns the eto, or outcast class, and was one of the earliest Japanese novels to deal with social problems.

Shin Buddhism. See AMIDISM.

Shigon or Esoteric Buddhism. A Japanese Buddhist sect. Introduced from China by Kukai, it gained wide popularity with Tendai Buddhism during the Heian period (784–1185). Shigon Buddhism centers its teaching on Vairocana, the Cosmic Buddha, and emphasized secret ritual, and learning, transmitted directly from master to disciple.

Shinto. The native religion of the Japanese. It emphasizes the worship of natural objects, ancient deities, and national heroes. From the Nara period (710–794) it coexisted with Buddhism and many of its gods were incorporated into the Buddhist pantheon. Although without a literature and fixed tenets, it has always held a firm place in Japanese religious life. The Meiji government accorded it state sponsorship (1888) and officially divorced it from Buddhist influences. The word shinto means literally "the way of the gods."

Shipman’s Tale, The. One of the Canterbury Tales of Geoffrey Chaucer, based on a popular fabliau. The monk John has claimed cousinship with a rich merchant in order to frequent his house and be near his wife. Just before the merchant departs on a business trip, the wife complains bitterly to John about her husband’s miserliness and begs the loan of 100 francs to pay a debt for fine clothes. John then asks the departing merchant for a loan, takes the money to the wife, and spends the night with her. When the merchant returns, John thanks him for the loan and says he has already returned it to his wife. She, when questioned, claims she understood the money was meant as a gift because of the two men’s friendship. The merchant decides the case is hopeless and accepts her offer to pay him back in their marriage bed.

Ship of Fools. Title of a number of allegorical satires lashing the weaknesses and vices of their times. The first popular one was Sebastian Brant’s Das Narrenschiff (1494), a poem in rhymed couplets assembling on a ship bound for Narragonia, the land of fools, representatives of every age, class, and quality among men. In exposing, among other things, abuses within the Church, it helped prepare the way for the Protestant Reformation. Written in an Alsatian dialect, it was almost immediately translated and adapted throughout Europe; in English the most famous versions were Alexander Barclay’s The Ship of Fools (1509) and the anonymous Cock Lovell’s Bote (c. 1510).

Ship of Fools (1962). A novel by Katherine Anne Porter. It is an allegorical account of a voyage of the German ship Vera from Veracruz, Mexico, to Bremerhaven in 1931. The title of the book, taken from Sebastian Brant's 15th-century novel Das Narrenschiff, represents a “simple almost universal image of the ship of this world on its voyage to eternity.”

Shipton, Mother. A fictitious English prophetess. She is first heard of in a tract of 1641, in which she is said to have lived in the reign of Henry VIII, and to have foretold the death of Cardinal Wolsey, Thomas Cromwell, Lord Percy, and others. In 1677, Richard Head the pamphleteering publisher, brought out a Life and Death of Mother Shipton, and in 1862 Charles Hindley brought out a new edition in which she was credited with having predicted steam engines, the telegraph, and other modern inventions, as well as the end of the world in 1881. Bret Harte named one of the characters in his story The Outcasts of Poker Flat (1869) Mother Shipton.

Shirer, William Lawrence (1904—). American journalist. He vividly depicted the rise of Nazism in his CBS radio reports from Germany and in his Berlin Diary (1940). His massive history of The Rise and Fall of the Third Reich (1960) was a notable best seller.

Shirley (1849). A novel by Charlotte Brontë. The story is set in Yorkshire at the end of the Napoleonic Wars. The depressed wool industry of the time, and the strife between workers and the hero, a mill owner named Robert Gerard Moore, figure in the plot. The heroine, Shirley Keeldar, was drawn from Charlotte’s sister, Emily.

Shirley, James (1596–1666). English dramatist, often called “the last of the Elizabethans” because he was the last important dramatist writing when the theaters were closed by Parliament in 1642. He is best known for his comedies of manners, such as The Lady of Pleasure, The Witty Fair One (1628), Hyde Park (1632) and The Gamester (1633), although he wrote at least two noteworthy tragedies: The Cardinale and The Tragedy (1631). Other plays include The Royal Master (1638), The Young Admiral (1633), The Doubtful Heir (1640), The Ball (1632), and such masques as The Triumph of Peace (1634) and Cupid and Death (1653).

Shiva or Siva (Sansk., the blessed one). The 3rd person of the Hindu trinity, or Trimurti, representing the destructive principle in life. Since in Hindu philosophy restoration is involved in destruction, Shiva is also the reproductive or renovating power. Shiva is a worker of miracles through meditation and penance, and hence is a favorite deity with the ascetics. He is a god of the fine arts, and of dancing. Shiva is also known as Hara, and Mehadeva, “the Great God.” His consort is Kali.

Shoemaker’s Holiday, The (1600). A comedy by Thomas Dekker. Two young lovers, Rowland Lacey and Rose Otley, are determined to overcome the efforts of their parents to keep them apart. Rowland, who is supposed to be with the army in Europe, returns to London disguised as a German cobbler, takes a job in the shop of the prosperous shoemaker Simon Eyre, and eventually reveals himself to Rose. After many complications, Rowland and Rose are married, and Simon, now Lord Mayor, declares a holiday.

Shogun. The title of the actual ruler of Japan from the 12th century to the restoration of the emperor in 1868. The shoguns were hereditary military commanders-in-chief (the word means army leader), and took the place of the emperors, whom they kept in a state of perpetual confinement, but with some show of prestige.

Sholom or Shalom Aleichem. See Sholem Aleichem.

Sholokhov, Mikhail Aleksandrovich (1905—). Russian novelist. His famous novel The Quiet Don is considered the major literary work written since the revolution. Born in the Don Cossack region of southern Russia, Sholokhov published his first volume of stories, Don Tales (Donskie rasskazy) in 1925. The next year he began work on his major novel, The Quiet Don, a study of the conflicting loyalties set loose among the Don Cossacks by the revolution. The four-volume work was immensely popular, selling millions of copies in Russia and abroad. In 1936, Sholokhov was elected to the Supreme Soviet, the country’s legislative body, and in 1939 he was awarded the Order of Lenin.

Between the publication of the third and fourth volumes of The Quiet Don, Sholokhov worked on a novel dealing with the collectivization of agriculture during the Five-Year Plan in Russia. This work, Virgin Soil Upturned was less artistically successful than Sholokhov’s masterpiece, but it gave a good picture of the misery and chaos caused by the collectivization.

Sholokhov’s place in Soviet literature, based mainly on his authorship of The Quiet Don, is a secure one. His novel is cited as a model to young writers, although recent trends have been away from his type of objective realism. In recent years, Sholokhov’s role has been confined to that of a representative of the conservative wing of literature, chiding the younger writers for their modernist views and methods.

Shore, Jane (1445?–1527). Mistress of Edward IV. She left her husband, a London goldsmith, in 1470 to become the mistress of the king, and through her wit and beauty exerted great influence. After the death of Edward she continued to have political influence, thereby incurring the hatred of Richard III who accused her of practicing witchcraft. She was put to public penance and became a prisoner in London, remaining in poverty and disgrace until her death.

Thomas Churchyard, in 1563, and Nicholas Rowe, in 1714, wrote tragedies based upon her life, both entitled Jane Shore. She is also the heroine of a IV. She left her husband, a London goldsmith, in Shakespeare’s Richard III, Thomas Heywood’s Edward IV, and many other works of literature.

Shylock. The avaricious Jewish money-lender in Shakespeare's MERCHANT OF VENICE. When his daughter Jessica elopes, taking some of his money with her, he is more concerned with the loss of his ducats than the loss of his daughter. His hatred for the merchant Antonio is so great that he persists in obtaining a pound of flesh as forfeit for his bond until he is out-witted by Portia in the Venetian court.

One of the most controversial of Shakespearean roles, Shylock was played as a low-comedy character until Charles Macklin electrified London audiences in 1741 by making the despised usurer a tragic, dignified figure. His performance drew from Alexander Pope the comment, "This was the Jew that Shakespeare drew."

Although Shylock cannot be described as a likable or attractive character, he utters the moving speech:

Hath not a Jew eyes? hath not a Jew hands, organs, dimensions, senses, affections, passions? ... If you prick us, do we not bleed? if you tickle us, do we not laugh? if you poison us, do we not die?

Sibelius, Jean (1865-1957). Finnish composer. A fervent nationalist, Sibelius wrote music—symphonies, songs, and choral works—that captures the spirit of Finnish mythology: remote, melancholy, and grand. The tone poem Finlandia (1899) is the most popular of his works.

sibyl. A prophetess of classical legend, who was supposed to prophesy under the inspiration of a particular deity. The name is now applied to any prophetess or woman fortuneteller. There were a number of sibyls, and they had their seats in widely separate parts of the world: Greece, Italy, Babylonia, Egypt, etc.

Plato mentions only one sibyl, the Erythraean, identified with Amalthea, the Cumaean sibyl, who was consulted by Aeneas before his descent into Hades and who sold the SYBILLINE Books to Tarquin. Martianus Capella speaks of two, the Erythraean and the Phrygian; Aelian of four, the Erythraean, Samian, Egyptian, and Sardinian. Varro tells us there were ten, the Cumaean, the Delphic, Egyptian, Erythraean, Hellespontine, Libyan, Persian, Phrygian, Samian, and Tiburline.

The medieval monks adopted the sibyls, as they did so much of pagan myth; they made them 12 in number and gave to each a separate prophecy and distinct emblem.

Sibylline Books. A collection of oracles of mystical origin, preserved in ancient Rome and consulted by the Senate in times of emergency or disaster. According to Livy, there were originally nine of these books; they were offered in sale by Amalthea, the swan of Cumae, to Tarquin; the offer was rejected, and she burned three of them. After 12 months she offered the remaining six at the same price. Again being refused, she burned three more, and after a similar interval asked the same price for the three left. The sum demanded was then given, and Amalthea never appeared again.

The three books were preserved in a stone chest underground in the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, and committed to the charge of custodians chosen in the same manner as the high priests. The number of custodians was at first 2, then 10, and ultimately 15. Augustus had some 2,000 of the verses destroyed as spurious, and placed the rest in two gilt cases, under the base of the statue of Apollo, in the temple on the Palatine Hill, but the whole perished when the city was burnt in the reign of Nero.

A Greek collection in eight books of poetical utterances relating to Jesus Christ, compiled in the second century, is entitled Oracula Sibyllina or the Sibylline Books.

Sic (Lat., “thus”). A word sometimes inserted [sic] to indicate that the preceding word or phrase is reproduced exactly as in the original text, calling attention to the fact that it is wrong in some way.

Sic et Non (Yes and No). A compilation of theological arguments by Pierre Anélard. It is notable as being an unprejudiced listing of all the arguments, pro and con, on the doctrinal questions of the Middle Ages with no attempt to draw conclusions.

Siddal, Elizabeth [Eleanor] (d. 1862). Wife of Dante Gabriel Rossetti who both before and after her marriage posed for his paintings and served as an inspiration for his poetry, notably The Blessed Damozel. A frail, lilylike beauty, she died just two years after her marriage. Rossetti, beside himself with grief, buried her with her in the coffin the sole copy of a manuscript of poems dealing with their love and marriage; in 1869 the manuscript was recovered and published. The House of Life was contained in the collection.

Siddons, Sarah, born Kemble (1755-1831). English tragic actress, sister of John Philip and Charles Kemble. She appeared first at Drury Lane in the role of Portia. She became the leading Shakespearean actress of her time; her greatest role was Lady Macbeth.

Sidney, Algernon (1622-1683). English politician. During the Civil War he fought at Marston Moor and became a Parliamentary leader. He lived on the Continent after the Restoration until 1677. Known to be a supporter of the duke of Monmouth, he was accused of complicity in the Rye House Plot and executed for treason.

Sidney, Sir Philip (1554-1586). English poet, scholar, soldier, and courtier, regarded by many as the perfect example of the Renaissance gentleman. Sidney came from a noble family, traveled extensively on the Continent, and was one of the most admired of Elizabeth's courtiers. With his uncle, the earl of Leicester, Sidney took part in a military expedition to the Low Countries, and was fatally wounded at Zutphen. According to the traditional story told by his friend and biographer Fulke Greville, the wounded Sidney gave his own water bottle to a dying foot soldier, saying "Thy necessity is greater than mine." His death was greatly mourned and celebrated in a number of elegiac poems, the best of which is Edmund Spenser's Astrophel.

Only two of Sidney's poems were published during his lifetime, but his works were read and circulated among his friends. His essay entitled An Apology for Poetrie (written c. 1580; published 1595) is perhaps the most eloquent and solid critical work of the Elizabethan period. Arcadia (written c. 1580, published 1590) is a pastoral romance in prose, interspersed with lyrics, which established that genre in England. Astrophel and Stella (written 1580-1584, published 1591) created a vogue for the sonnet sequence in England. Sidney's poetry, though making much use of conventional Petrarchan elements, is distinguished by its metrical skill, its poignant, grave, and virile tone.

Siege Perilous. Also called The Perilous Seat. In Arthurian legend, especially Malory's Morte d'Arthur (c. 1469), a vacant chair at the Round Table of King Arthur, reserved for the one predestined to achieve the quest of the Grail. It was the death of any other who sat in the chair. At the appointed time the name of Galahad is found on the Siege Perilous; he takes the chair and later goes on to win the quest of the Grail.

Siegfried Line. The western line of defense established by Germany in World War II, opposed to the Maginot Line in France.

Sienkiewicz, Henryk (1846–1916). Polish novelist. His With Fire and Sword, The Crusaders (4 vols., 1900), and Children of the Soil were well received in English translation, but he is best known for his historical novel of Nero's court, Quo Vadis, written in 1895. His portrait of the hero, Petronius Arbiter, is a memorable one. In 1905 he received the Nobel prize for literature.

Sieveking, Lance[lot de Giberne] (1896– ). English writer and playwright. He is best known for his productions of radio and television plays on the BBC. He is the author of many radio plays; his works include Dressing Gowns and Glue (1919), Stampede (1924), and Silence in Heaven (1936). Among his books are The Stuff of Radio (1934), Soul of a Heel (1952), and The Eye of the Beholder (1957).

Signac, Paul. See NEOIMPRESSIONISM.

Signorielli, Luca (1441–1523). Italian painter of the Umbrian school. A pupil of Piero della Francesca, he produced many easel and fresco paintings of religious and mythological subjects, but excelled principally in rendering the nude. His great painting entitled Pan, formerly at Berlin, was the single most tragic loss in art during World War II. Although he assisted Botticelli in decorating the walls of the Sistine Chapel and painted in other rooms of the Vatican, the latter were painted over to allow their decoration by Raphael. His best surviving work is now the series of frescoes, Heaven and Hell, in the Orvieto cathedral.

Sigurd. See SIEGFRIED.

Sikes, Bill. In Charles Dickens' Oliver Twist, a brutal, violent house-breaker and thief. The only rudiment of a redeeming feature he possesses is a kind of affection for his dog. His murder of his mistress, Nancy, is a horrible but celebrated incident in the novel.

Sikh (Hindi, "one who is learning, a disciple"). Originally, a member of a monotheistic religious body which broke off from Hinduism in the Punjab in the 16th century. The Sikhs soon formed a military community, and in 1664 formally assumed independence. From 1849 to 1947 the Sikhs, as part of India, were ruled by the British. Reinforced with a code of the highest ascetic and moral ideals, the religion of the Sikhs, as propounded by the gurus (spiritual leaders), enjoins on every Sikh the strict observance of the "five K's": kesha (long hair), kanga (the hair comb), kaccha (the undergarment), kara (the steel bangle), and kirpan (the dagger worn in self-defense). The orthodox Sikh neither smokes nor drinks. Sikhs are famous for their courage and fighting ability.

Silas Marner, or the Weaver of Raveloe (1861). A novel by George Eliot. The author says that the book "is intended to set in a strong light the remedial influences of pure, natural, human relations." Silas is a lonely, embittered hand-loom weaver who long ago was accused of a theft of which his best friend was guilty, and so robbed of the girl he loved. He has no friends in Raveloe, the village to which he has come, and cares only to add a little more gold to the pile in his humble cottage. In close succession two strange events occur: he is robbed of his gold, and finds by chance a little yellow-haired baby girl whom no one claims. Gradually he is brought back into a more wholesome, normal life through his love for little Eppie. In the meantime, much of the story is concerned with the affairs of the two sons of Squire Cass, Dunstan and Godfrey. Dunstan, who is a wild reckless fellow, always in debt, disappears. Godfrey marries the girl of his choice, Nancy Lammeter. At last, after 16 years Silas' lost gold is found, together with the skeleton of Dunstan Cass. Godfrey now confesses that Eppie is the offspring of his earlier, secret marriage to a common woman who died the night Eppie was found; he asks Eppie to come and live with him and Nancy, but Eppie chooses to stay with Silas and eventually marries a village boy whom she has always known.

Si le grain ne meurt. See If It Dies ... Silence. A country justice in Shakespeare's Hamlet IV: 2. When sober, he is dull and asinine; drunk, he is outrageously funny.

Silenus (Seilenos). In Greek mythology, an elderly follower of Dionysus. Originally there were many sileni, male spirits of the woods who became associated with the worship of Dionysus; later, Silenus was differentiated, and usually represented as a sly, cowardly, and often drunken old man. As such he appears in innumerable paintings of the Renaissance. He is a leading character in Euripides' satyr play Cyclops.

Silsesius, Angelus. See Anselm Silesius.

Silhouette, Etienne de (1709–1767). French controller general of finances (1759). His rigid economies were ridiculed by certain members of the nobility who applied his name sarcastically to any mode or fashion that was plain or cheap; eventually it was used only in the restricted sense to apply to portraits in which the painter's expensive art is replaced by a profiled outline in plain black; hence, silhouette.

Sill, Edward Rowland (1841–1887). American writer of essays and verse. A professor of English at the University of California, he contributed essays to the Atlantic Monthly and wrote poems under the name of Andrew Hecbrooke. His best-known poems are The Foot's Prayer and Opportunity. Among his collections are The Hermitage and Other Poems (1868), The Venus of Milo and Other Poems (1883), and Poems (1887).

Sillanpää, Frans Eemil (1888–1964). Finnish novelist and short-story writer. His novels, which are sensitively written and reveal keen psychological insight, include Hurskas Kurjuus (Meek Heritage, 1919).
and Nuorena nukkunut (Fallen Asleep While Young, 1931). In 1939, Sillanpää received the Nobel Prize for literature.

Sillitoe, Alan (1928– ). English novelist. A factory worker who left school at 14, Sillitoe writes best about the lives of contemporary workers and their families in industrial towns. His heroes are young anarchists whose lives are constant struggles against conventional morality, employers, and the Establishment. His books include Saturday Night and Sunday Morning; The Loneliness of the Long Distance Runner, a collection of short stories; The General (1960), an allegorical story about war and a general who captures the enemy's orchestra by mistake; Key to the Door (1962), about Brian Seaton, brother of the hero of his first novel; and The Raman's Daughter and Other Short Stories (1964). See ANGRY YOUNG MEN.

Silone, Ignazio. Original name: Secondo Tranquilli (1900– ). Italian novelist. Silone lived in his native Pescina, a small village in central Italy, until it was destroyed in 1915 by an earthquake that took the lives of his mother and several of his brothers. In 1922 he was editor of Il Lavoratore, a labor newspaper in Trieste, that was raided by the fascists. Although his brother was seized and was subsequently beaten to death in prison, Silone managed to elude capture, finding shelter among the Italian peasantry with whose life and cause his own work has so movingly and consistently identified itself. From 1930 to the fall of the fascist regime, he lived in Switzerland, where he wrote his two great novels: Fontamara (1934; revised, 1960) and Bread and Wine. They brought him international fame, though neither they nor his next novel, The Seed Beneath the Snow (Il Seme sotto la Neve; 1942), were published in Italy until after the war.

Once a fervent Marxist and member of the Communist Party, Silone described his disillusionment and break with the party (1930) in an essay in The God that Failed (1950), edited by Richard Crossman. At the same time he affirmed his faith in socialism as "an extension of the ethical impulse from the restricted individual and family sphere to the whole domain of human activity."

His other novels include A Handful of Blackberries (Una Manciata di More; 1952), The Secret of Luca (Il Segreto di Luca; 1956), and The Fox and the Camelias (La Volpe e le Camelie; 1961). He also wrote Fascism (Il Fascismo; 1934), a history of fascism; The School for Dictators (La Scuola dei Ditatori; 1938), a satirical treatise on the training of dictators; and Ed Eglì Si Nasce (And He Hid Himself), a play.

Silurist, the. See Henry Vaughan.

Silva, José Asunción (1865–1896). Columbian poet, considered a precursor of MODERNISM. A tragic figure of acute sensibility, Silva felt oppressed by the smug provincialism of his native Bogotá, against which he rebelled in bitter, though highly lyrical, verse. The death of a beloved sister is said to have inspired his best-known poem, Nocturno III, which displays the musicality and morbid melancholy, akin to Poe's, that distinguish his poetry. Another characteristic note is the nostalgic yearning for the past that is evident in the short poem Vejeceus. He died by his own hand.

Silvanire. See Jean Mairet.

Silver, Long John. See TREASURE ISLAND.

Silver Cord, The (1926). A play by Sidney Howard. It is one of the earliest psychological studies of a dominant mother to be presented on the stage. Mrs. Phelps has two sons, one of whom is unable to break away from her, while the other succeeds only through the help of his wife.

Silver-Fork school. A name given to a class of English novelists who gave undue importance to etiquette and the externals of social intercourse. The most distinguished are Lady Blessington (1799–1849), Theodore Hook (1716–1796), Bulwer-Lytton (1803–1873), Mrs. Trollope (1790–1863), and Disraeli (1804–1881).

Silvia. In Shakespeare's Two Gentlemen of Verona, the duke of Milan's virtuous and beautiful daughter, who is in love with Valentine. When Valentine's friend Proteus declares his love for her, she refuses him and chides him for his unfaithfulness to his friend. She runs away from her father's court to join Valentine when he is banished, and finally is allowed to marry him.

Silvius. A young shepherd, embodying Shakespeare's somewhat satirical view of pastoral love, in As You Like It. He is in love with the shepherdess Phoebe.

Simenon, Georges. Also Georges Sim (1903– ). Belgian-born French novelist. Simenon is most famous for his detective stories, especially the series about Inspector Maigret, which includes Les Fiancailles de M. Hire (1933), Le Coup de lune (1933), and La Maison du Canal (1933). Later he wrote more ambitious psychological analyses of modern man, among them La Neige était sale (1948), La Mort de Belle (1952), Lettre à mon juge (1947), and L'Ours en peluche (1960).

Simeon Stylites. See STYLITES.

Simile. In rhetoric, a figure of speech: a comparison between two things of a different kind or quality, usually introduced by "like" or "as." Simile is one of the two main figures of speech, the other being METAPHOR; in simile, the comparison made is explicit, whereas in metaphor it is implied. The object of both simile and metaphor is double: to achieve clarity and exactness of meaning; and to achieve vividness of presentation and style. An example of simile is:

Now the chimney was all of the house that stood, Like a pistol after the petals go.

Robert Frost

Simms, William Gilmore (1806–1870). American novelist and poet. Born in Charleston, S.C., Simms had a varied career, marked by numerous misfortunes. Although he considered himself primarily a poet and published 18 volumes of verse up to 1860, his reputation rests on his historical novels. The first of these, Guy Rivers (1834), which deals with a fiendish Georgia bandit, was an outstanding success. Also included in the series known as "the Border Romances" are The Yemassee and The Casique of Kiawah (1859), in which Indians figure prominently, and two novels based on the KENTUCKY TRAGEDY: Beauchamp (1842) and its sequel, Charleston (1846). The series called "the Revolutionary Romances" includes The Partisan and its sequels, Melchampe (1836) and Katharine Walton (1851); The Kinsmen (1841), later revised as The Scout; The Sword and the Distaff (1853), later issued as Woodcraft; and The Forayers (1855) and its sequel, Eutaw (1856).

In his romances Simms was a loyal follower of Sir Walter Scott and James Fenimore Cooper. His stories preserve a wealth of local tradition and vividly express many aspects of the American Revolution in South Carolina. An ardent defender of the Southern ideal of agrarian life, Simms was also steeped in Elizabethan literature, and one of his best characters, Captain Porcy, has been called "the American Falstaff."

A member of the Charleston School, Simms was surrounded by a coterie of young men in his later years, chief among them Paul Hamilton Hayne.

Simon. In the New Testament: (1) The original name of the disciple Peter (Matt. 10:2); (2) a Pharisee who entertained Jesus and criticized him for forgiving the sins of a woman of the streets who anointed his feet (Luke 7); (3) a sorcerer of Samaria, also called Simon Magus ("Simon the Magician"), rebuked by Peter because he attempted to buy the power of the Holy Spirit (Acts 8); this is the origin of the term simony, the buying of ecclesiastical power.

Simon, Claude (1913- ). French novelist born in Madagascar, considered a member of the New Wave of fiction. All his works are characterized by a fluid style of long, convoluted sentences. They give extremely detailed and precise descriptions of sensual impressions, yet often leave their essence or significance obscure. His most successful novels are The Wind (Le Vent; 1957) and The Grass (L’Herbe; 1958), both set in the rural south of France, and The Flanders Road (La Route des Flandres; 1960), in which three soldiers remember the fall of France in 1940.

Simonides (c. 506-467 B.C.). A Greek poet. Born at Ceos, he was the first Greek poet to make a living from his writing. He was highly admired by Classical writers. He is said either to have invented or perfected the epinicion, but is better known for his elegiac epigrams. Especially famous is his epitaph for those who died at Thermopylae. (See Persian Wars.)

Simon Lee (1798). A poem by William Wordsworth, subtitled The Old Huntsman with An Incident in which He Was Concerned. The incident is that the poet helps Simon dig up the root of a tree, which causes him to relate the simple story of the old huntsman's life.

Simonov, Konstantin (1915- ). Russian novelist, poet, dramatist, and short-story writer. Simonov attained popularity during the war with Dni i nochi (Days and Nights, 1945), a novel portraying the defense of Stalingrad, and a play, Rasskazy tyudy (Russian People, 1942). Another war novel, Zhiyey i myortedo (The Living and the Dead, 1962), deals with events in Russia in 1941 just after the Germans invaded the country. During the Stalinist era, Simonov managed to avoid dangerous or fatal entanglements with the government, in which other prominent Soviet authors so often became involved.

Simmonson, Lee (1888- ). American scenic designer. He early designed scenery for the Washington Square Players and later for the Theatre Guild, which he helped found. His sets for the Metropolitan Opera's production of The Ring of the Nibelungen (1948) were highly praised. Among his books are The Stage Is Set (1932) and The Art of Scenic Design (1950).

Simon the Canaanite or Simon Zelotes (the Zealot). One of the original 12 disciples. Almost nothing is known of this disciple except that at one time he had been a member of the Zealots, an ultranationalistic Jewish group.

Simple Cobler of Aggawam in America, The (1647). A tract by Nathaniel Ward, published under the pseudonym Theodore de la Guard. The book is a satirical denunciation of New England and England for being "tolerant," of England for the quarrel between Parliament and the Crown, and of the human race in general and women in particular for being silly. Ward's vitriolic, witty style has been compared to that of Elizabethan pamphlet writers such as Greene and Nash. Aggawam was an early name for Ipswich, Mass.

Simple Heart, A (Un Coeur Simple; 1877). A short story by Gustave Flaubert. Originally published in the volume Trois Contes, it portrays the life of Félicité, the servant of Mme Aubain—a small-town, bourgeois widow and mother of two children. Flaubert reveals himself as a true master of the genre in the careful strokes that picture the endless self-denial of Félicité's existence; only faith remains upon the canvas at the completion of the work.

simple life. An existence unhindered by the luxuries and artificialities of civilization. It implies a return to the life led close to nature as imagined by the pastoral poets. The phrase was taken as the title of a book by Charles Wagner (1901), a Lutheran preacher in Paris who was brought up in the pastoral surroundings of the Vosges, and was popularized by President Theodore Roosevelt. See PRIMITIVISM.

Simplicissimus. (1) The popular title of a novel (1668, expanded 1669) by Hans Grimmelshausen. Its full title is Der abenteuerliche Simplicissimus (The Adventurous Simplicissimus). A picturesque story set during the Thirty Years War, it treats the development of its hero's originally simple soul toward resignation and wisdom. It is well known as a panorama of contemporary events, of the horrors and injustices of war, but its treatment of psychological development has also caused some critics to give it a place in the growth of the Bildungsroman (novel of education or development).

(2) A satirical weekly, founded (1896) by Thomas T. Heine in Munich. Its last pre-Nazi editor was Franz Schoenberger whose Confessions of a European Intellectual (1946) was well received in America.

simurgh. In Eastern legend, a huge bird who has seen the destruction of the world three times and has all the knowledge of the ages. He is perhaps identical with the roc.

Sin. The Babylonian moon-god. An old man, he was the first of the astral deities and father by Ningal of Shamash (the sun-god), Ishtar, and Neskù (the fire god). He rode in his moon boat through the sky at night. He is much like Nanna, the moon deity of Sumerian Ur.

sins. Failure to attain to the standard of behavior attributed to God’s moral requirements. In Roman Catholic theology sins are distinguished as semial (those that do not forfeit the state of grace) and mortal (those that forfeit the state of grace and can be removed only by confession and absolution).

In Milton’s Paradise Lost Sin is the Keeper of the Gates of Hell, together with Death. Described as half woman, half poisonous serpent, she sprang full grown from the head of Satan.

The Man of Sin (referred to in 2 Thess. 2:3) is generally held to signify the Antichrist. However, it was applied by the old Puritans to the Roman Pope, by the fifth monarchy men to Cromwell, and by many 19th-century theologians to “that wicked one” (identical with the “last horn” of Dan. 7) who was immediately to precede the second advent of Christ.

Sinbad or Sinbad the Sailor. A well-known story in the Arabian Nights. Sinbad is a Baghdad merchant who acquires great wealth by going on seven voyages. He describes these to a poor discontented porter, Hindbad, to show him that wealth can only be obtained by enterprise and personal exertion.

First Voyage. Being becalmed in the Indian Ocean, he and some others of the crew visit what they suppose to be an island, but which is really a huge whale asleep. They light a fire on the whale and the heat wakes the creature, which instantly dives under water. Sinbad is picked up by some merchants, and in due time returns home.

Second Voyage. Sinbad is left on a desert island where he discovers a roc’s egg fifty paces in circumference. He fastens himself to the claw of the bird and is deposited in the Valley of Diamonds. The next day, some merchants come to the top of the crags and throw into the valley huge joints of raw meat to which the diamonds stick; when the eagles pick up the meat, the merchants scare them from their nests and carry off the diamonds. Sinbad then fastens himself to a piece of meat, is carried by an eagle to its nest, and, rescued by the merchants, returns home laden with diamonds.

Third Voyage. This is the encounter with the Cyclops. See POLYPHEMUS.

Fourth Voyage. Sinbad marries a lady of rank in a strange island on which he is cast; when his wife dies, he is buried alive with the dead body according to the custom of the land. He makes his way out of the catacomb and returns to Baghdad, greatly enriched by valuables rifled from the dead bodies.

Fifth Voyage. The ship in which he sails is dashed to pieces by huge stones let down from the talons of two angry roc’s. Sinbad swims to a desert island, where he throws stones at the monkeys who throw back coconuts in return. On this island, Sinbad encounters and kills the Old Man of the Sea.

Sixth Voyage. Sinbad visits the island of Serendip (Ceylon) and climbs to the top of the mountain where Adam was placed on his expulsion from Paradise.

Seventh Voyage. Sinbad is attacked by corsairs, sold to slavery, and employed in shooting at elephants from a tree. He discovers a tract of hill country completely covered with elephants’ tusks, communicates his discovery to his master, obtains his liberty, and returns home.

Sinclair, May (1865–1946). English novelist. The best of her popular books were experimental in technique and based on the new Freudian psychology. A feminist, May Sinclair wrote her first novels about the lives of women and followed the point of view of George Bernard Shaw and H. G. Wells. The Divine Fire (1904), a study of a temperamental Cockney genius supposedly drawn from the poet Ernest Dowson made her famous. Three Sisters (1914) is a novel loosely based on the situation of the Brontë sisters, confined in a Victorian rectory. Mary Olivier is her best-known novel.

Sinclair, Upton [Beall] (1878–1963). American writer of novels and nonfiction. Sinclair, a remarkably prolific author, is known for his steady espousal of socialism and his concern with social and political problems. The first of his 80-odd books was the novel Springtime and Harvest (1901), later called King Midas. It was followed by The Journal of Arthur Sirling (1903), which was first regarded as factual rather than fictional. His best-known book, The Jungle, created a sensation when published; it shocked President Theodore Roosevelt, who invited Sinclair to the White House, and was influential in the passage of the Pure Food and Drug Act (1906).

Sinclair used his earnings from The Jungle to found the cooperative Helicon Home Colony, near Englewood, N.J. The project, in which Sinclair Lewis participated briefly, was abandoned after a mysterious fire in 1907. In 1915, Sinclair moved to California. In 1934 he was the Democratic candidate for governor of the state, running on the famous EPIC (End Poverty in California) platform; after an acrimonious campaign, he was narrowly defeated.

Meanwhile, Sinclair continued to write steadily. Among his later novels are The Metropolis (1908), Love’s Pilgrimage (1911), King Coal (1917), One, Boston, and Affectionately Eve (1961). His nonfiction works include The Brass Check (1919), a highly critical treatise on journalism, based on his own experiences; American Outpost: A Book of Reminiscences (1935); and Upton Sinclair Presents William Fox (1933). His autobiography appeared in 1942.

With the rise of fascism and communism in Europe, Sinclair also became more interested in foreign affairs; he wrote a long series of popular novels, beginning with World’s End (1940), which deal with Lanny Budd, scion of a wealthy family, who takes it upon himself to right the world’s wrongs and becomes a prominent figure in international politics and intrigue.

Sindibad, Tales of. See Seven Wise Masters, The.

Khushwant Singh, a novelist writing in English. A lawyer by profession, he became a free-lance writer and has published three books of Sikh culture, two short story collections, and two novels, Mano Majra (1956), an account of the partition days, and I Shall Not Hear the Nightingale (1959).

Siris. In Greek mythology, a robber of the Isthmus of Corinth known as the Pine-Bender. He used to fasten his victims to two pine trees bent toward each other; they were rent asunder by the rebound. He was eventually captured by Theseus and put to death in this same way.

Sinister Street (1913-14). The best-known title in a series of novels by Compton Mackenzie. An early archetype of the novel of growing up, it describes the childhood and youth of Michael and Stella Fane, illegitimate children of wealthy parents. The book was published in two volumes in England, and appeared in the U.S. as Youth’s Encounter (1913) and Sinister Street (1914). Flashers Mead (1917), Sylvia Scarlett (1918), and Sylvia and Michael (1919) continue the story up to Michael’s marriage.

Sinjohn, John. The pen name under which John Galsworthy published his early work.

Sinn Fein (Ourselves alone). The name given to the extreme home rule party in Ireland in the 20th century. It grew out of early nationalist agitation but reached its greatest power with the Easter rebellion of 1916.

Sion. The Greek who induced the Trojans to receive the wooden horse (Vergil: Aeneid, ii, 102, etc.). Dante, in his Inferno, places Sion, with Potiphar’s wife, Nimrod, and the rebellious giants, in the tenth pit of Malebolge.

Sion. Another name for Mount Herman in the Anti-Lebanons. It is to be distinguished from Zion.

Sirt, Al (Arabic, “the path”). An imaginary bridge, in Muslim legend, said to span the distance between earth and paradise, yet be no wider than a spider’s thread. Sinners fall into the abyss below.

Sir Charles Grandison (1753). An epistolary novel by Samuel Richardson, which relates the love story of Sir Charles and Harriet Byron. The hero, a male counterpart of Clarissa Harlowe, is an ideal 18th-century gentleman who rescues Harriet from her abductor, Sir Hargrave Pollexfen. Sir Charles becomes enamored of Harriet, but is honor-bound to marry a beautiful Italian girl, Clementina della Porretta, whom he has met on his travels abroad. Clementina rejects his proposal on the grounds of religion, leaving him free to marry Harriet. See Charlotte Grandison.

Sirens (Greek, seirènes, entanglers). A mythical monster, half woman and half bird. They were said by Greek poets (see Odyssey) to entice seamen by the sweetness of their song to such a degree that listeners forgot everything and died of hunger. Odysseus escaped their blandishments by filling his companions’ ears with wax and lashing himself to the mast of his ship.

In Homeric mythology, there were but two sirens; later writers name three, Parthenope, Ligeia, and Leucosia, and the number was still further augmented by later writers. According to one tale, the Argonauts safely passed the sirens because Orpheus sang more ravishingly than they. Chagrined, they either flew away forever or committed suicide.

Sir Gawain and the Green Knight (c. 1370). A Middle English poem in alliterative verse written by an unknown called the Pearl Poet. The poem is one of four (all by the same writer) which appear in a single manuscript of the Cotton Collection.

Perhaps the greatest single Arthurian legend in English, this masterpiece of Middle English writing concerns the ordeal of the ideal knight, Sir Gawain. Two major motifs are utilized in the unfolding action: the so-called Beheading Game and the Temptation To Adultery.

Into the midst of New Year festivities at King Arthur’s court bursts a green giant on horseback. He dares any of Arthur’s knights to chop off his head on condition that in one year he be allowed to return the blow. Sir Gawain accepts the challenge, wields the axe successfully (the Green Knight calmly scoops up his head and leaves), and 12 months later sets out in search for the Green Chapel where he is to keep the bargain. After a long, bitter journey, he comes to a marvelous castle where he is entertained by Lord Bercilak, his beautiful wife, and an ugly old lady who quietly hovers in the background. Bercilak suggests to his guest an exchange-of-gifts game: every day he will bring to Sir Gawain what he gains hunting, and Sir Gawain will give him what he has won in the castle during the absence of the host. For two days, Sir Gawain is tempted to adultery by the beautiful wife of Bercilak; he resists, and each night, in accordance with their game, exchanges with Bercilak the kisses of the lady for animals from the hunt. On the third day, however, he accepts a supposedly magic sash of green silk from the lady, believing that it will save him from the Green Knight. That evening he fails to mention the sash during the exchange of gifts.

At the appointed time, he leaves the castle and goes for his tryst at the Green Chapel. Three times the Green Knight strikes at his neck. The first two strikes do not touch him because he twice resisted temptation, but the third blow nicks his neck slightly marking his failure with regard to the green sash.

The Green Knight turns out to be Bercilak, in the service of the ugly old lady who is really Morgan le Fay and who planned the entire affair.

Returning to King Arthur’s court at Camelot, Sir Gawain sweats always to wear the green sash around his waist as a reminder of moral lapse. His fellow knights, in tribute to Sir Gawain’s courage, also place green sashes around their waists, to wear thereafter.

Siris: A Chain of Philosophical Reflections and Inquiries concerning the Virtues of Tar-Water (1744). A treatise by George Berkeley, containing a recommendation and a list of the uses of tar water for medicinal purposes, as well as a somewhat mystical philosophy dealing with the utilization of tar water as a panacea.

Sir Launfal. A 12th-century Breton lai by Marie de France. In this narrative verse romance, Sir Launfal is one of the knights of King Arthur’s court. He falls in love with a beautiful fairy who brings him great wealth and happiness, but pledges him to secrecy regarding the source. But the oath is violated when the envious Queen Guinevere goads him into admitting his love for someone else. Infuriated, Guinevere accuses him, as Potiphar’s wife did Joseph, of having insulted her. Thereupon King Arthur swears that unless Sir Launfal can defend himself at trial, he will be either burned or hanged. Being told that he might save himself by producing his fairy mistress, Sir Launfal has to admit that by breaking his oath to her, he may never again expect her aid. Faced with a most miserable fate, he is, however, dramatically rescued by the beautiful fairy and carried off by her to Avalon.

There have been many adaptations of this romance, one of the best-known being a 14th-century English version bearing the same title. The material was also used centuries later in The Vision of Sir Launfal (1848) by James Russell Lowell.

Sir Patrick Spens. The title of a medieval Scottish sea ballad. It is a tragic tale of shipwreck based on the voyage of the titular Scottish hero. Though warned of a terrible storm, Sir Patrick Spens puts out to sea with his companions, and then:

...O lang, lang may the ladies stand,
Wi their gold kens in their hair
Waiting for thar ain deir lords,
For they’ll se thame na mair.

Sir Thomas More. A chronicle play. Probably it was written by Anthony Mundy. It deals with three significant episodes in the life of Thomas More. One of these, an account of More’s role in pacifying a rioting mob, was apparently rewritten by another playwright whom many reputable scholars believe to be Shakespeare. Since the play is extant in manuscript form, it is further argued that the relevant passages are in Shakespeare’s handwriting.

Sir Thopas. See Thopas.

Sisera. In the Old Testament, the Canaanite captain defeated by Barak and Deborah. Taking refuge in the tent of Jael, he was killed by her with a tent pin (Judg. 4-5).

Sisley, Alfred (1839–1899). French impressionist painter. Sisley rejected a career in business and, in 1862, went to study in the studio of Gleyre, where he met Monet and Renoir. His landscapes are usually set in the countryside near Paris, or near his birthplace of Moret, as in Le Canal and La Barque pendant l’Inondation. The play of light over natural forms in his work is subtle and delicate. Muted blues, greens, and browns, his characteristic colors, contribute to a quiet, sometimes gently wistful, mood.

Sister Carrie (1900). A novel by Theodore Dreiser. The author’s first novel, it was officially published in 1900 but was not made publicly available until 1912 because of its outspoken frankness and supposed immorality. It is considered by many to be Dreiser’s finest work. It tells the story of Carrie Meeber, an innocent country girl, who is exposed to the impersonal cruelty of Chicago in the 1890’s. From this life of bleak poverty and loneliness, she is rescued by a traveling salesman, Charles Drouet. Later, a wealthy married man, George Hurstwood, virtually absconds with funds in order to take her to New York. There Carrie goes on the stage, but as her star rises Hurstwood’s sinks until finally, unknown to Carrie, he commits suicide, a destitute Bowery bum, while Carrie herself fails to find happiness, despite her success.

Sister Helen (1870). A poem by Dante Gabriel Rossetti about a young woman who destroys a false lover by melting a waxen image of him.

Sisters, The. The first story in James Joyce’s Dubliners (1914). It is about a boy confronted with death for the first time. Through the conversation between his aunt and the two sisters of the dead man (a paralyzed old priest, his former teacher), the boy learns of the priest’s insanity and finds a new, dubious light shed on the Catholic religion.

Sisyphus (Sisyphos). In Greek mythology, a son of Aeolus and the founder of Ephrye. He is best known for his punishment for revealing Zeus’s rape of Aegina to her father, the river Asopus: in Hades he rolls a huge stone up a hill, only to have it roll down again each time. When Autolycus stole his cattle, he avenged himself by stealing Autolycus’ daughter Anticlea and thus became (according to some authorities) the true father of Odysseus, rather than Laertes, Anticlea’s husband.

Sita (Sans., “furrow”). In Hindu mythology, the wife of Rama. She was not born, but arose from a furrow when her father Janaka, king of Mithila, was ploughing. She is the heroine of the Hindu epic the Ramayana, which is largely concerned with her faithfulness under misfortune.

Sitting Bull (1834–1890). American Sioux Indian chief. He was the leader of the Indian forces during the Sioux War of 1876–1877 and was present at the battle of the Little Big Horn during which a U.S. contingent under George A. Custer was wiped out. Forced to flee to Canada, he returned to the U.S. in 1881 and was settled on a reservation. He was killed by Indian police while trying to escape arrest.

Sitwell, Dame Edith (1887– ). English poet and prose writer. She is known for the brilliant, experimental patterns of sound and imagery in her poems. From 1916 she edited Wheels, an annual anthology that printed gay, experimental, near-non-sense poems by herself, by her brothers, Osbert and Sacheverell, and by other writers. Clowns’ Houses (1918) was her first successful volume of poetry. Her public reading of her long, difficult poem Paradæ in 1922 caused a sensation. Gold Coast Custer (1929) is a satirical poem. During World War II she began to write emotional, passionate, and religious poetry; Still Falls the Rain, which combines thoughts of the crucifixion with impressions of a London air raid, is one of her best poems. Other collections of poetry include Gardeners and Astronomers (1953) and Music and Ceremonies (1963). Her historical and critical works include Alexander Pope (1930), Bath (1932), The English Eccentrics (1933), and A Poet’s Notebook (1943). I Live Under a Black Sun (1937) is a novel about Jonathan Swift. Born into a noble and ancient English family, Edith Sitwell, who was converted to Roman Catholicism in 1954, maintained a reputation for aristocratic eccentricity, habitually dressing in medieval costume. She was made dame of the British Empire in 1954.

Sitwell, Sir Osbert (1892– ). English poet and writer, brother of Edith and Sacheverell Sitwell. His most remarkable achievement is his five-volume autobiography, which is an interesting account of the Sitwell family background and a fine evocation of the aristocratic England of his own childhood and youth. The volumes are Left Hand! Right Hand! (1944), The Scarlet Tree (1945), Great Morning (1947), Laughter in the Next Room (1948), and Noble Excess (1958). Tales My Father Taught Me (1962) consists mainly of autobiographical anecdotes about the author's eccentric father. Sir Osbert's poetry, collected in Argonaut and Juggernaut (1919) and other volumes, is largely satirical, concerned with war and types of English character. He also has written fiction, plays, essays, and literary criticism.

Sitwell, Sacheverell (1897– ). English poet and writer on art and travel; brother of Edith and Osbert Sitwell. Among his volumes of poetry are The Hundred and One Harlequins (1922), Doctor Donne and Gargantua (1930), and Sacred and Profane Love (1940). He has written on art, especially of the baroque period, on music, and on travel from the art-lover's point of view. All Summer in a Day (1926) is "an autobiographical fantasia"; Golden Wall and Mirador (1961) is a travel book about Peru.

Six Characters in Search of an Author (Sei Personaggi in Cerca d'Autor; 1921). A play by Luigi Pirandello. The action takes place on an unprepared stage, where a company of actors is being assembled for a rehearsal. The life stories of all six characters are then presented.

Six Nations. A confederation of North American Indians formed by the union of the Five Nations with the Tuscaroras in 1715.

1601 (1939). A sketch written about 1786, by Mark Twain. The piece is subtitled "Conversation as It Was by the Social Fireside in the Time of the Tudors." An amusing essay on manners, it was printed only privately for many years, because of its free use of Anglo-Saxon vocabulary.

Sixteen-string Jack. The almost affectionate nickname of a famous highwayman whose real name was John Rann and who is referred to in Boswell's Life of Samuel Johnson. He was renowned for his affection of fine clothes and his nickname was an allusion to the many "strings" or ribbons he wore at his knees. He was hanged in 1774.

Sixtus IV, Pope. See Della Rovere.

skeleton at the feast. An Egyptian custom. Plutarch says that toward the close of Egyptian banquets a servant brought in a skeleton, and cried aloud to the guests, "Look on this! Eat, drink, and be merry; for tomorrow you die!" Herodotus says the skeleton was a wooden one, about 18 inches in length.

Skelton, John (c. 1460–1529). English poet. He is known for his satire, his humorous and realistic verse, and his short, "breathless" lines and irregular rhyme-scheme, called "Skeltonic meter." His surviving works include A Garland of Laurel (c. 1520), an allegorical poem dealing with the crowning of Skelton himself as a great poet; Philip Sparrow (c. 1550), a lyric mourning the death of a sparrow, the pet of a young girl; Colin Clout (c. 1519), a satire on the abuses of the Church; The Boigne of Court, a satire in allegory on life at the English court; Magnificence, a Morality Play; The Tunning of Elinour Rummung, a coarse and humorous work, giving a realistic picture of contemporary "low life"; Why Come Ye Not to Court? (c. 1523) and Speak, Parrot, satires on Cardinal Wolsey. Skelton received the title of Poet Laureate from both Oxford and Cambridge Universities and held an unofficial position as Laureate under Henry VIII. He was ordained a priest, but spent most of his time at court, where he made many enemies by his outspokenness. As a result of the hostility between him and Cardinal Wolsey, he was forced to seek refuge with the abbot of Westminster, with whom he stayed virtually as a prisoner until his death.

Skelton is considered a poet of the transition between England of the Middle Ages and the Elizabethan period, writing in the tradition of Chaucer, Gower, and Lydgate, and the medieval Latin poets. Interest in his work was revived in the 20th century by Robert Graves and Skeltonic meter is parodied in the early verse of W. H. Auden.
Skepticism. A movement in Greek philosophy. It was based on careful examination and deliberately suspended judgment. There were two main types of Skepticism, Pyrrhonism and Academic Skepticism. The last, beginning in the Platonic Academy c. 250 B.C., was founded by Arcesilaus. He believed that philosophic assent should always be withheld, because reasons could be adduced for any side of the question. The Skeptics confined knowledge to the impressions. They continued to influence Greek philosophy until the third century of the Christian era.

Sketch Book of Geoffrey Crayon, Gent., The (1819, 1820). A collection of tales and sketches by Washington Irving. The book marked the beginning of the short story in America. At the time of publication, Irving's sketches of English landscape and customs were most popular, but the best loved and most permanently valuable tales in the collection are The Legend of Sleepy Hollow and Rip Van Winkle.

Skimpole, Harold. In Charles Dickens' Bleak House, an amateur artist, always sponging on his friends. It was said that the character was drawn from Leigh Hunt, who was much offended by him.

Skinner, Cornelia Otis (1901- ). American actress and author. The daughter of Otis SKINNER, she made her first Broadway appearance with her father in Blood and Sand (1921), and thereafter wrote and acted in various plays and sketches. In 1937 she turned Margaret Ayer Barnes's novel Edna His Wife into a full-length play in which she played all the parts. She has also written a number of humorous books, perhaps the best known being the highly successful Our Hearts Were Young and Gay (1942), on which she collaborated with Emily Kimbrough.

Skinner, Otis (1858-1942). American actor. The father of Cornelia Otis SKINNER, he had a long and distinguished career on the stage. One of his most famous roles was that of the beggar in Knickerbocker, a play that ran from 1911 to 1914. He also wrote several books about the theater, including The Last Tragedian: Booth Tells His Own Story (1939).

Skin of Our Teeth, The (1942). A play by Thornton WILDER. Unconventional in structure, it gives a panoramic picture of George Antrobus (man), his family, and their maid Sabina (the eternal temptress), who manage to survive the world upheavals from prehistoric times until the present. Wilder was awarded his third Pulitzer Prize for this play.

Skipper Ireson's Ride (1857). A ballad by John Greenleaf WHITMAN. This poem denounces Skipper Ireson, a Marblehead sea captain, for abandoning his crew. His ride is his tar-and-feathering by the village widows on his return. The poem's greatest interest lies in Whitman's attempt to imitate the sound of the Marblehead dialect.

Skuld. In Norse mythology, one of the three Norns or Fates. She represents the future, her name being related to the word shall. Veiled, she was thought to face the future, scroll in hand.

Slavophiles. A 19th-century school of thought in Russia which stressed the uniqueness of Russian life and culture. The Slavophiles claimed that the Russian way of life, based on the faith of the Orthodox Church, was superior to that of the West, whose rationalism and weak religious faith doomed it to decay. The leading Slavophile thinkers included Aleksei Stepanovich Khomyakov (1804-1860), Ivan Vasilyevich Kireyevsky (1806-1859), Yuri Fedorovich Samarin (1819-1876), and Konstantin and Ivan Aksakov, sons of the author Sergei Timofeyevich Aksakov. Although he was not an adherent of the group, some elements of Slavophile thought can be discerned in the writings of Feodor Dostoevski.

The Slavophiles were opposed by the so-called Westerners, who believed that Russia should adopt the social, political, and cultural ways of the West. Outstanding members of this group were Vissarion Belinski, Aleksandr Herzen, and the novelist Ivan Turgeniev.

Slawkenbergius, Hafen. An imaginary author, distinguished for the great length of his nose, in Laurence Sterne's novel Tristram Shandy. Slawkenbergius is referred to as a great authority on all lore connected with noses, and a curious tale, filled with sexual symbolism, is introduced from his hypothetical works about a man with an enormously long nose. Gogol based a short story called The Nose on Slawkenbergius' tale.

Sleeper, the. Widely used descriptive term. Epi-mendles, the Greek poet, is said to have fallen asleep in a cave when a boy, and not to have waked for only years, when he found himself possessed of all wisdom. Medieval legends of those who have gone to sleep and been or are to be awakened after many years are very numerous. Such legends cluster around the names of King Arthur, Charlemagne, and Barbarossa. See the stories concerning Endymion, the Seven Sleepers, Tannhäuser, Oger the Dane, Rip Van Winkle, Peter Klaus, and the Muslim Mahdi.

Sleeping Beauty, The. See Belle au bois dormant.

Slessor, Kenneth (1901- ). Australian poet and journalist. During the Second World War he was correspondent for Australia with the Second A.I.F. In 1944 he became the literary editor for the Sydney Sun. Edith Sitwell's anthology, Wheels (1916-1921), revealed to him the horizons of the new poetry, and started him writing verse that was to put him among the ranks of the foremost Australian poets. His work, highly individualistic, rich in imagery and unconventional rhythms, reveals a keen zest for life. His publications include Thief of the Moon (1924); Earth Visitors (1926), the visitors being pagan gods who come down to earth to court women; Cuckoo Contrey (1932); and Five Bells (1939), an elegy on the death of a dear friend.

Slice of life. A phrase used to describe the work of naturalistic writers such as Zola who attempt to present a chunk of life complete, not modified by any selection or arrangement of material. The phrase is used for short stories that have no plot, climax, or structured form, but instead give an impression of the characters' daily life.
Slick, Sam. A Yankee of the Yankees, hero of Thomas Haliburton's The Clockmaker or the Sayings and Doings of Samuel Slick of Slickville (1837), first published as a series of letters in the Nova Scotian. Sam is a shrewd, ingenious New England clock peddler who does not scruple to take advantage of the slower-witted Nova Scotians among whom he peddles his wares. Sam Slick reappeared in a number of volumes and was finally sent abroad in The Attacked, or Sam Slick in England (1843–1844).

Slopes, Mrs. A lecherous old maid and ancestress of Mrs. Malaprop in Henry Fielding's Joseph Andrews.

Sloane, Sir Hans (1660–1753). English physician and naturalist. He succeeded Sir Isaac Newton as president of the Royal Society (1727–1741) and was president of the Royal College of Physicians (1719–1735). He also founded the Botanic Garden in 1721. He received by bequest the valuable library of the naturalist William Courtine and, in turn, bequeathed it to England; it formed the basis of the collection in the British Museum. Catalogue of Jamaica Plants (1696), published in Latin, is Sloane's only noted work.

Slop, Dr. A choleric, bigoted Catholic physician, in Laurence Sterne's novel Tristram Shandy. In attempting to demonstrate the use and virtues of a newly invented pair of obstetrical forceps, he crushes Tristram's nose (an event ominous for Tristram's father, who believes that all great men have large noses).

Sloper, Catherine. See Washington Square.

Slough of Despond. See Pilgrim's Progress. Protestants have applied the words to the Church of Rome, and some Roman Catholics, to the Protestant churches generally.

Sly, Christopher. The principal character in the Induction to Shakespeare's Taming of the Shrew. He is a keeper of bears and a tinker, the son of a peddler, and a drunken sot; he may have been an actual person from the village of Wincot, near Stratford-on-Avon. Sly is found dead drunk by a lord, who commands his servants to put Sly to bed, and on his waking to attend him like a lord and deceive him into thinking himself a great man. The play is performed for his entertainment.

A similar trick was played by the Caliph Haroun-al-Raschid on Abou Hassan in "The Sleeper Awakened" tale in The Arabian Nights; another is attributed to Philippe the Good, duke of Burgundy, in Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy.

Small Souls. The first of a series of novels by the Dutch author Louis Couperus (1863–1923). They deal with the Van Lowe family, a large and diverse group, many of them united by little except the custom of pleasing old Granny Lowe by spending Sunday evenings together at her home. The other novels of the series are The Later Life, The Twilight of the Souls, and Dr. Adrian. Constance Van Lowe causes a great scandal by her love affair, which ruins the career of the brilliant young diplomat Van Welcke, and the first books deal with the married life of this unhappy couple, who are held together only by their intense love for their small son Adrian. The Twilight of the Souls is the story of Gerritt Van Lowe, an apparently healthy, normal member of the family, with a pleasant, domestic wife and large brood of children, who, however, gradually goes to pieces under the influence of a morbid, neurotic fear. Among the other characters who appear throughout the novels are Ernest Van Lowe, a sensitive dilettante, who is as obviously morbid as his brother Gerritt was secretly so; Paul, thetopish idler (whom some critics consider a spokesman for the author's ideas) and the devoted old-maid sister and aunt, who gives herself unstintingly, yet nourishes a bitter resentment at being so made use of. Dr. Adrian tells of the career of Adrian Van Welcke, who becomes a physician with a strange power for healing.

Smart, Christopher (1722–1771). English poet and journalist, who frequently worked for the bookseller John Newberry. In 1756, a religious mania overtook him and he was confined to an asylum. During this period he wrote the incoherent poem Jubilare Agno (recently published as Rejoice in the Lamb), in which Smart declares, "For I am the Lord's News-Writer, the scribe-evangelist"; and his best-known work, Song to David (1763), a rhapsodic poem in praise of God. His religious concepts are close to those of William Blake.

Smike. See Nicholas Nickleby.

Smith, Adam (1723–1790). Scottish moral philosopher and political economist. He was educated at Glasgow and Oxford, and gave a series of lectures on English literature at Glasgow which were so popular that they had to be repeated the two following years. He was elected to the chair of logic at Glasgow in 1751 which he exchanged for the chair of moral philosophy the following year. With the publication of Theory of Moral Sentiments (1759), in which he expressed his ethical views, he won recognition as a contemporary writer of the first rank. His major work, The Wealth of Nations was the first systematic formulation of classical English economics.

Smith, Alexander (1830–1867). Scottish poet, a member of the Spasmonic School. His best verse appears in City Poems (1857). He was also the author of Dreamthorp (1853), a book of essays, and numerous articles and critical pieces.

Smith, Alfred E[manuel] (1873–1944). American political leader. Born on New York's East Side, Smith joined Tammany Hall at an early age and held several city and state offices before being elected gov-error in 1919. He was an advocate of legislation to improve labor conditions and favored women suffrage and the repeal of prohibition. After an unsuccessful bid for the Democratic presidential nomination in 1924, he ran for president in 1928 against Herbert Hoover and was defeated after an unusually vitriolic campaign; with his Roman Catholic faith, his opposition to prohibition, and his Tammany connections, he seemed to many, especially in the South and West, a symbol of the corrupt urban East. Later, Smith's views became more conservative, and he broke with his one-time ally, Franklin D. Roosevelt. In his last years, he was head of the corporation that managed New York's Empire State Building. Smith, who was dubbed "the Happy Warrior" by Roosevelt at the 1924 Democratic convention, was noted for the brown derby he habitually wore and for his colorful New York accent.

Smith, Betty [Wehner] (1904– ). American novelist. Best known for her widely read first novel, A Tree Grows in Brooklyn, she is also the author of more than 70 one-act plays and three other novels: Tomorrow Will Be Better (1948), Maggie-Now (1958), and Joy in the Morning (1963).

Smith, Dodie (1896– ). English playwright. Among her works are Autumn Crocus (1950), Touch Wood (1953), and Dear Octopus (1938). Until 1936 she used the pen name C. L. Anthony. I Capture the Castle, a novel, appeared in 1948.

Smith, Ernest Bramah. Pen name, Ernest Bramah (1869–1942). English author of detective stories. He also wrote the suave, witty, and ironic Kai Lung books about Chinese life and traditions: The Wallet of Kai Lung (1900), and Kai Lung's Golden Hours (1922).

Smith, George (1824–1901). English publisher. From 1846 he headed the publishing house of Smith, Elder & Co., which had been founded by his father George Smith (1789–1846). He published the early works of John Ruskin, Jane Eyre by Charlotte Brontë, Henry Esmond by Thackeray, the works of Robert Browning and Matthew Arnold, and the Dictionary of National Biography. Smith also founded the Cornhill Magazine of which Thackeray was an editor.

Smith, Goldwin (1823–1910). English historian. He was active in politics as an anti-imperialist and opponent of the Boer War; he was a regius professor at Oxford from 1858 to 1866.

Smith, James (1775–1839) and his brother Horatio Smith (1779–1849). English humorists. The Smiths are best known as joint authors of Rejected Addresses (1812), a classic of parody aimed at, among others, Wordsworth, Southey, Coleridge, Scott, and Byron. James subsequently produced three slight comedies, and Horace a number of more highly regarded novels and collections of humorous verse.

Smith, John (1580–1631). English explorer and soldier of fortune. He came to Jamestown, Va., in 1607 and became president of the governing council of the colony. The legend of his rescue from death by Pocahontas is based on his own story, told in his General Historie of Virginia, New-England, and the Summer Isles (1624). He also made several expeditions to New England and helped to promote interest in the region. A True Relation of . . . Virginia (1608), another of Smith's works, is sometimes called the first American book.

Smith, Joseph (1805–1844). American religious leader and Mormon prophet. In 1829, Smith began to have supernatural visions, which appointed him prophet of a new religion; in 1837, according to his account, he got from the angel Moroni a book written in strange characters on golden plates. He translated the message as the Book of Mormon (1830), and on this book the Church of the Latter-Day Saints was founded the same year. Smith decided to move westward from Vermont with his followers; he went to Ohio (1831), Missouri (1838), and finally to Nauvoo, Ill. There on July 12, 1843, he proclaimed the doctrine of polygamy. Much opposition was aroused, especially in the columns of the Nauvoo Expositor. When Smith's followers destroyed the press of this paper, a warrant for his arrest was issued. He resisted, but was placed in jail at Carthage. An angry mob invaded the jail, and killed him. His son, Joseph Smith, Jr. (1832–1914) headed the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints in Missouri and his nephew, Joseph Fielding Smith (1838–1918), later became a leader of the Utah Mormon Church.

Smith, Lillian (1897– ). American novelist and social worker. Born in the South and for a time a music teacher in a mission school in China, Lillian Smith then became a social worker in the South and the publisher of a quarterly, South Today. She is best known for Strange Fruit (1944), her vividly written and widely read novel, dramatized in 1945 by the author and Esther Smith. The novel deals with the hopeless love of a white man and a Negro girl. Her nonfiction includes Killers of the Dream (1949; rev., 1961), The Journey (1954), Now Is the Time (1955), and One Hour (1959).

Smith, Seba (1792–1868). American teacher, editor, humorist, and poet. Born in Maine, where he attended school and contributed to various newspapers, Smith adopted the pseudonym of Major Jack Downing, contributing satirical letters to the Portland Courier (1830). Smith first attacked the local legislature and Maine customs, then went on to Washington and President Jackson. The Downing letters continued until the Civil War; several skits were produced about Jack Downing in New York theaters. As a semileterate Yankee oracle, he was the predecessor of Artemus Ward, Hosea Biglow, and Sam Slick.

Smith, Thorne (1892–1934). American humorist. He is known for his ribald and impish books, especially Topper (1926), the story of a sober gentleman transformed into an adventurous romantic by two ghosts. Topper Takes a Trip (1932) is its sequel.

Smith, Winchell (1871–1933). American playwright. He collaborated with Byron Ongley on Brewster's Millions (1902), based on the novel by George Barr McCutcheon, and with Frank Bacon on La svgin.

Smoke (Dym; 1867). A novel by Ivan Turgenev. It combines the story of a love triangle with strictures on Russia's need to turn to the West for her civilization. The hero, Litvinov, in love with Tanya, is distracted by an old lover, Irina, who manages to break up the romance. The interjections of social comment, which harm the structure of the novel, are mostly made by Turgenev's mouthpiece in the book, Potugin.

Smoke and Steel (1920). A collection of poems by Carl Sandburg. The title poem is an attempt to find some kind of beauty in modern industrialism, with particular reference to the steel mills.

Smollett, Tobias [George] (1721–1771). Scottish-born English novelist and surgeon. After a vain attempt to sell a tragedy in London, he served as surgeon's mate on board the Chichester, took part in an ill-fated attack on the Spanish at Cartagena (1741), and lived for a few years on the island of Jamaica. On his return to England, he began writing his picaroon novels, including The Adventures of Roderick Random and The Adventures of Peregrine Pickle, both satiric works patterned on Le Sage, The Adventures of Ferdinand Count Fathom, the memoirs of a Gothic villain; The Expedition of Humphrey Clinker, an epistolary novel; and The Adventures of Laurence Greaaves. He was fined and imprisoned for a libel that appeared in the Critical Review, which he edited from 1756 to 1763. He also published a History of England (1751–1758); Travels Through France and Italy (1766), a sardonic account of his travels; and The Adventures of an Atom (1769), a somewhat gross and virulent political allegory. During his last illness, he returned to Italy where he died.

Smollett is noted for his well-drawn eccentric characters, particularly those of a nautical type; these at times grotesque caricatures often draw interest away from the main plot to the incidental and to comic relief. Smollett expressed his conception of what a novel should be in his preface to Ferdinand Count Fathom:

> A novel is a large diffused picture, comprehending the characters of life, disposed in different groups, and exhibited in various attitudes, for the purpose of an uniform plan, and general occurrence, to which every individual figure is subservient. But this plan cannot be executed with propriety, probability, or success, without a principal personage to attract the attention, unite the incidents, unwind the clue of the labyrinth, and at last close the scene, by virtue of his own importance.

Smuts, Jan Christian (1870–1950). A famous Boer leader in the Boer War. During World War I, he organized the South African forces. Prime minister of the Union of South Africa (1919–1924; 1939–1948), he was most influential in World War II.

Snodgrass, Augustus. In Charles Dickens's Pickwick Papers, an M.P.C. (Member of the Pickwick Club). He is a poetical young man who travels about with Mr. Pickwick. He marries Miss Wardle.

Snodgrass, William D[eWitt] (1926– ). American poet. Snodgrass's first volume of poetry, The Heart's Needle (1955), was awarded the Pulitzer Prize. The title refers to an Irish proverb that one daughter is a needle to the heart; in Snodgrass's poetry, always deeply personal, the reference is to his daughter by his divorced first wife. Considered one of the better contemporary young poets, Snodgrass combines sensitivity of perception with deep feeling; his forms tend to be traditional and regular, and though his poetry is polished and lyrical it contains a sometimes harsh humor that turns on puns. Many of his poems have appeared in magazines.

Snopes. A family in several novels and stories by William Faulkner, notably The Hamlet, The Town, and The Mansion. Residents of Yoknapatawpha County, the Snopeses typify the vicious and inhuman aspects of modern commercial civilization. The first Snopes to be mentioned is Ab, who is involved with a gang of horse thieves and killers in The Unvanquished; he reappears in the story Barn Burning and in The Hamlet. Ab's son, Flem, is a central character in the trilogy of which The Hamlet is the first volume. Flem works his way up from clerkship in a store to the presidency of a bank, is largely responsible for his wife's suicide, and drives her lover from town. Mink Snopes, who spends 40 years in prison for murdering Jack Houston, is a central character in The Mansion and is Flem's murderer. Eula Varner Snopes, Flem's wife, carries on an 18-year-long love affair with Manfred de Spain and later kills herself to keep her daughter, Linda, from scandal. Linda is a Snopes in name only; she is the illegitimate child of Eula and Hoake McCarron. Byron Snopes, who appears in The Town and Sartoris, writes anonymous letters to Narcissa Benbow and robs the Sartoris bank. Clarence, the son of I. O. Snopes, appears in Sanctuary and The Mansion and is an unscrupulous state senator. Other members of the family are I. O., a schoolteacher noted for his lengthy use of proverbs; Ike, the idiot ward of Flem who has a pathetic and tender attachment to Jack Houston's cow; Eck, an honest man and not a true Snopes; Montgomery Ward, who runs a "French post-card peep-show" before being run out of town; and Wallstreet Panke, who, like his father, Eck, is honest and not truly a Snopes.

Snorri Sturluson (1178–1241). Icelandic historian. His Heimskringla is a record of the kings of Norway from earliest times to 1177, as well as a collection of their sagas and poems. He expanded one of its sections into the separate Olafo's Saga. He also wrote Prose Edda (see Edda).

Snout, Tom. See Bottom.

Snow, Sir Charles Percy (1895– ). English novelist, scientist, and administrator. His novels, especially those in his Strangers and Brothers series, deal with problems of power and morality in contemporary managerial and scientific society. His analysis of The Two Cultures claims that scientists are too much separated from the rest of educated English society, and too little appreciated and understood. In such novels as The Search (1935) and The New Men he gives a picture of scientists and their work and problems. C. P. Snow used his scientific training to move beyond a humble family background. His novel Time of Hope (1949) is partly autobiographical. During his years of scientific research in a Cambridge college he studied the workings of power in a small community, recording his findings in The Masters and The Affair. During and after the war he did administrative work for the government and industry; he was knighted in 1957. He married the novelist Pamela Hansford Johnson.

Snow's novels were much admired during the 1950's, chiefly because of their documentary presentation of English society and social history. His statement that, in the future, novels must be less experimental and more closely related to man and his environment was influential in keeping with the prevailing mood of the times.

A six-month trip to Red China in 1960 resulted in the controversial Other Side of the River (1962).

Snow, [Charles] Wilbert (1884– ). American poet. Snow is noted for his poems dealing with Maine. Among his collections are Maine Coast (1923), The Inner Harbor (1926), and Down East (1932). He was lieutenant governor of Connecticut in 1945-1946 and governor in 1946-1947. Sonnets to Steve, and Other Poems was published in 1957.

Snow-Bound, A Winter Idyll (1866). A long poem by John Greenleaf Whittier. An excursion into Whittier's boyhood, Snow-Bound evokes the memory of being snowed in on his father's Massachusetts farm. Sharply depicted details bring out the wondrous metamorphosis of the barnyard as the snow falls, and the cozy, homely indoor scene around the fire. Whittier nostalgically pays tribute to his family and their guests and adds a prayer for peace and brotherhood.

Snowe, Lucy. See Villette.

Snow Image, The, and Other Twice-Told Tales (1851). A collection of 17 tales and sketches by Nathaniel Hawthorne. Among the best are Ethan Brand and My Kinsman, Major Molineux.

Snow King. Epitaph for Gustavus Adolphus of Sweden (1594-1632). He was so called by the Austrians because, said they, he “was kept together by the cold, but would melt and disappear as he approached a warmer soil.”

Snows of Kilimanjaro, The (1938). A short story by Ernest Hemingway. With a wealthy woman who has been keeping him, Harry, a writer, goes on a safari in Africa. There he hopes to “work the fat off his mind,” so that he can set to work on all the things he has dreamed of writing. This dream is shattered when he develops gangrene in his leg. In the knowledge of death he reviews his life, and in a dream just before he dies he sees a legendary, gigantic, frozen leopard on the summit of Mt. Kilimanjaro.

Snyder, Gary. See beat movement.

Sobakevich. A bearlike character in Nikolai Gogol’s Dead Souls. Everything about Sobakevich is huge and solid: his person, his furniture, and, especially, his appetite. At a banquet for the artful schemer Chichikov, Sobakevich creates a sensation by devouring a grandiose sturgeon that was to have served as the main course.

Sobrino. In Lodovico Ariosto's Orlando Furioso, a Saracen knight noted for his valor and wisdom. Called "the Sage," he is the Saracen Nestor who advises the pagan king Agramante (Agramant) to entrust the outcome of the war with the Christians to a single combat, with the stipulation that the nation of the defeated warrior shall be tributary to that of the winner. When the Christian knight Rinaldo defeats the pagan champion Ruggero, Agramante breaks the agreement. Sobrino's displeasure causes him to accept soon after the Christian rite of baptism.

Social Contract, The (Le Contrat social) (1762). Chief work of Jean Jacques Rousseau, a treatise on the origins and organization of government and the rights of citizens. Rousseau's thesis states that, since no man has any natural authority over another, the social contract, freely entered into, creates natural reciprocal obligations between citizens. The individual, as the basic political unit, surrenders his rights to the State, and is legally equal to all other members. The third book is a discussion of three forms of government: democratic, which Rousseau distrusts; aristocratic, which, if elective, is acceptable; and monarchic, which is preferable, if headed by an ideal ruler. Like Montesquieu, Rousseau states that practical, moral, and theoretical considerations should determine the best form of government for any people. That all minorities must submit to the general will or be banished is the conclusion of the fourth book. Though an individualistic work, it reveals Rousseau as a firm collectivist. Some critics assert that the injustices of collectivism and "democratic despotism" during the French Revolution and later in the 19th and 20th centuries were, in part, derived from this work.

socialism. A term used since the 1830's to describe any theory or social or political movement predicated upon communal or government ownership and control of production and distribution of goods. Socialism does not necessarily imply the abolition of private property, though it is characterized by public ownership of property directly affecting public interests. The societies advocated in Plato’s Republic and Sir Thomas More’s Utopia are socialist in nature, and the early Christian community has been held to have been socialist in that all property was communally owned. Socialist theories have been advanced by Robert Owen in England and François Fourier (see Fourierism) in France, advocating the organization of society into cooperative communities. In 1847 Marx and Engels' Communist Manifesto laid down the principles of scientific socialism. The Fabian Society in England, whose members included George Bernard Shaw and Beatrice and Sidney Webb, attempted to popularize the socialist cause. Guild socialism, an English movement of the early 20th century, advocated government ownership of all industries, control and management being entrusted to a guild composed of all the manual and white-collar workers in each industry, who in turn were to

socialist realism. The officially supported artistic doctrine that has been more or less obligatory for Soviet writers and artists since 1932. The resolution of the Communist Party's Central Committee, which set up the Union of Soviet Writers, declared that "Socialist realism is the basic method of Soviet literature and literary criticism. It demands of the artist a truthful, historically concrete depiction of reality in its revolutionary development. Truthfulness and historical concreteness in the artistic depiction of reality must be combined with the task of reforming the ideas of the toilers and of educating them in the spirit of socialism." The writer Maksim Gorki was one of the early theoreticians of the doctrine, but Gorki's ideas about the relationship of literature to life contained elements of romanticism that later Soviet critics have tended to label "revolutionary romanticism," rather than realism. Shortly before his death, Gorki said: "I want literature to rise above reality and to look down on reality from above, because literature has a far greater purpose than merely to reflect reality. It is not enough to depict already existing things—we must also bear in mind the things we desire and the things which are possible of achievement." As the grip of Soviet control tightened on literature, the freedom of the artist to depict reality as he saw it or wished it to be was—officially, at least—subordinated to the demand for an art that showed the steady progress of Soviet society toward its socialist goal. The claim that society actually was progressing in that direction without setbacks was, of course, as much of a dream as Gorki's revolutionary romanticism, but this was not to be admitted by Soviet critics. Concomitant with the general depilation of a progressive society, there was also demanded the creation of positive heroes in Soviet literature. This was a sharp break with the literary scene of the 19th century, in which the protagonists were most often SUPERFLUINT MEN, alienated from society and unable to find a useful purpose for their lives. The Soviet hero, on the contrary, was to be an active, healthy man, without hesitations and scruples about his role in society. He was to be a good Communist, a leader who knew exactly what to do to advance the cause of the building of socialism, and who was willing to sacrifice personal considerations to this task. This rigid formula laid down for Soviet writers to follow resulted in the deadness of so much of Soviet literature for three decades. Gorki's novel Mother, held up as an early example of socialist realism, fell more within the scope of Gorki's revolutionary romanticism. Another novel often cited as a model of socialist realism, Sholokhov's The Quiet Don, also fails to meet the test. His hero, Gregor Melekhov, resembles the 19th-century superfluous man more than he does a positive hero.

Since the doctrine was first pronounced, Soviet writers have obviously had trouble adhering to the prescribed formula and producing readable literature. Occasionally one of the bolder Soviet authors openly questions the possibility of writing within such a narrow framework or questions the validity of such a doctrine at all. One of the recent critics of the theory, a pseudonymous writer who calls himself Abram Tertz, wrote in an essay on the subject: "What is socialist realism? What is the meaning of this strange and jarring phrase? Can there be a socialist, capitalist, Christian, or Mohammedan realism? Does this irrational concept have a natural existence? Perhaps it does not exist at all, perhaps it is only the nightmare of a terrified intellectual during the dark and magical night of Stalin's dictatorship? Perhaps a crude propaganda trick of Zhdanov or a sene fancy of Gorki? Is it fiction, myth, or propaganda?" Despite such sharp questioning by their own writers, Soviet authorities remain determined to retain the doctrine as a useful way to control literature in their country.

Society for Pure English (S. P. E.). An organization founded in 1913 by a committee of which Robert Bridges, Sir Walter Raleigh, and Logan Pearsall Smith were members, with the object of directing popular taste and education in the development of the English language.

Society of Friends. See Quakers.

Socrates (Sokrates, c. 470-399 B.C.). A Greek teacher of wisdom. Socrates himself left no writings, and is known to us through the Dialogues of Plato, Aristotle's treatises, and Xenophon's discourses. His interest was in ethics. He is represented as believing that virtue is knowledge; all wickedness, he said, is due to ignorance. In his teaching, Socrates sought the universal definition of virtue through particulars. Aristotle credits him with developing inductive method. With self-knowledge the foundation for inquiry, Socrates would save men from leading "unexamined" lives. The Socratic method of teaching consisted in asking questions, and drawing out the answers from the student. Socrates himself pretended to be ignorant of the subject. The purpose of the method, which Plato called midwifery, was to show the student that the answers are contained in his own mind. Socrates always understated the truth, giving rise to the expression "Socratic irony." In 399 B.C. the Athenians tried Socrates on a charge of impiety and corruption of youth. He was sentenced to death, and drank hemlock, as described by Plato in the Phaedo.

The only unfavorable view of Socrates occurs in Aristophanes' comedy The Clouds, where he is caricatured as a representative of the Sophistic profession. The play, however, is professedly fictional, and is not accepted as history.

Sodom and Gomorrah. In the Old Testament, 2 cities of the Vale of Siddim destroyed by heaven with fire and brimstone because of their wickedness. Abraham persuaded Jehovah to spare Sodom if 10 righteous men could be found there, but this condition could not be fulfilled. Lot and his family were the only inhabitants who escaped the doomed city, but Lot's wife became a pillar of salt because she looked back.

Sodome et Gomorrique. See Remembrance of Things Past.

Sofronia (Sophronia). A young Christian maiden, heroine of an episode in Torquato Tasso's Jerusalem Delivered. Aladino, king of Jerusalem, is advised by the enchanter Ismeno to remove the statue of the Virgin from a Christian church and place it in a mosque, to insure against the capture of the city. When the statue is stolen, Aladino orders the execution of the entire Christian community of Jerusalem. To avoid this fate, Sofronia offers herself as the culprit. Her lover Olingo then confesses the theft himself, in hopes of saving her. Aladino promptly sentences both to death, whereupon Clorinda, the Amazon warrior, appears to offer her services against the Christians in return for their lives. With Aladino's acceptance of the bargain, Sofronia and Olingo are free to wed.

Sohrab and Rustum. A narrative poem in blank verse by Matthew Arnold (1853), dealing with the legendary Persian hero Rustum and his son Sohrab. The two meet in single combat, in ignorance of their relationship, and Sohrab is slain.

Sōka Gakkai. See NICHIREI.

Soldati, Mario (1906– ). Italian novelist. Noted for his terse, journalistic style, he is a prolific and versatile writer. He has written, among other works, America Primo Amore (1935); Dinner with the Commendatore (A Cena col Commendatore; 1952); The Capri Letters (Le Lettere da Capri; 1954); The Confession (La Confessione; 1955); Il Vero Silvestri (1957), based on the Pirandellian theme of truth and its many semblances; and I Racconti (1958), a collection of short stories.

Soldiers Three, and Other Stories (1880). A volume of short stories of life in India by Rudyard Kipling. The soldiers three are the famous trio, Ortheris, Learoyd, and Mulvaney.

Soledades, Las. See Luis de Góngora y Argote.

Solemn League and Covenant. A league of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, the Westminster Assembly of English Divines, and the English Parliament in 1643, for the establishment of Presbyterianism and suppression of Roman Catholicism in both countries. Charles II swore to the Scots that he would abide by it, and therefore they crowned him in 1651 at Dunbar; but at the Restoration he not only rejected the Covenant, but had it burnt by the common hangman.

Solimano (Solyman or the Soldan of Nicea). King of the Turks and elected chiefman of all the Muslims in the wars against the Crusaders led by Goffredo in Torquato Tasso's Gersamlemme Liberata. He is killed by Rinaldo of Este in revenge for the earlier slayings of Sveno and Argilliano. His death brings to a victorious end the Christian assault on the Holy City.

Solinus. The kindly duke of Ephesus in Shakespeare's Comedy of Errors. Although he is moved to pity by Aegeon's story about the loss of his family, he is forced to arrest him because of the law which bars Syracusans from Ephesus. When Aegeon is discovered to be the father of Antiphilus, who is under the duke's patronage, he pardons him.

Sologub, Feodor. Pen name of Feodor Kuzmich Tetenikov (1863–1927). Russian novelist, poet, and short-story writer. Sologub was a schoolteacher until the success of his novel Meščani (The Petty Demon, 1907) allowed him to devote himself entirely to writing. The hero of the novel, the evil and vindictive schoolteacher Pederedon, is one of the most striking and grotesquely unpleasant characters in Russian fiction. The novel expresses Sologub's sense of the evil reality of the world, stilling an ideal of good which is only sporadically glimpsed. Similar ideas are found in his finely wrought poetry, in his stories, and in his other novels, Tyazhelye sny (Bad Dreams, 1896) and Tvoryimaya legenda (The Created Legend, 1908–1912). His poetry places him with the Russian symbolists. However morbid or perverse Sologub's ideas or stories, his literary ability is of high quality. His work has been generally ignored in the Soviet Union since his death.

Solomin. A character in Ivan Turgenev's novel, Vonot Son; who urges a gradual, evolutionary reform of the social system in Russia as opposed to the revolutionary methods of the young radicals.

Solomon. In the Old Testament, the wisest and most magnificent of the kings of Israel and the son of David and Bathsheba. When asked by Jehovah to be granted any wish, he wisely chose “an understanding heart” by which to judge the people (I Kings 3:9). He is perhaps most celebrated for his building of the famous temple which bore his name, and for his lavish entertainment of the queen of Sheba. (See I Kings 2–11.) The glory of his reign gave rise to many legends in the Talmud and the Koran. See CARPET; MAGIC; OPHEL; SONG OF SOLOMON.

Solomon, Judgment of. A famous example of Solomon's wisdom. Two harlots came before the king bearing a live and a dead baby, and each claimed the live baby as her own. Solomon ordered that the live child be cut in half and shared between the two. One woman begged the king to give the living child to the other woman rather than kill it. Solomon at once knew that she was the true mother, and the people knew that “the wisdom of God was in him, to render justice.” See CIRCLE OF CHALE, THE.

Solomon of the Vanity of the World (1718). A didactic verse soliloquy in three books by Matthew Paris in which he expresses the pessimistic notion that neither reason, pleasure, nor power overcome the vanity of human reason and effort, that “The Pleasures of Life do not compensate for the miseries.” See ARBA.

Solomon's Temple. The central place of Jewish worship. It was erected by Solomon and his Tyrian workmen (probably on Phoenician models) on Mount Moriah, Jerusalem, about 1006 B.C. It was destroyed at the siege of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar (588 B.C.), and some 70 years later the Temple of Zerubbabel was completed on its site. In 20 B.C. Herod the Great began the building of the last Temple—that of the New Testament—which was utterly destroyed during the siege of Jerusalem by Vespasian and Titus in A.D. 70. For many centuries the site has been covered by the splendid Muslim mosque, Haram esh Sherif.

Solon (c. 640–c. 558 B.C.). A Greek statesman and poet. He was elected archon (594–593 or 592–591 B.C.) on order to mediate between the oppressed poor and the rich few. He carried out extensive reforms to this end, but his true title to fame rests on his constitutional reforms. Although he retained a class system, he added the lowest class, the Thetes, and gave them a part in the Assembly and in the choice of magistrate. His radical measure was establishing courts of justice, Heliaea, administered by all the citizens. Even the magistrates, after they resigned their office, could be accused before the people. Solon's reforms won him the title of founder of Athenian democracy. A man of moderation, a poet, legislator, traveler, and merchant, he embodied the best characteristics of the Greeks. He survived to see his reforms partially thrust aside under the tyranny of Psesistatus.
Soloviov, Vladimir Sergeevich

Soloviov, Vladimir Sergeevich (1853–1900). Russian religious philosopher and poet. His mystic doctrine of Sophia (the eternal feminine, the divine wisdom) had a large influence on the symbolism of poets Aleksandr Blok and Andreï Bely. Much of Soloviov's poetry reflects his mystical thought, although some of it is riotously witty nonsense verse. His major prose work is Three Conversations (Tri razgovory; 1899).

Soma. An intoxicating drink. It was brewed by Hindu priests in ancient times, with accompanying mystic rites and incantations, from the juice of some Indian plant, and was drunk by the Brahmins as well as offered as libations to their gods. It was fabled to have been brought from heaven by a falcon, or by the daughters of the Sun, and it was itself personified as a god. Soma is one of the most important of the old Vedic deities, a sort of Hindu Bacchus. All the 114 hymns in the ninth book of the Rig Veda are invocations in his honor. In later mythology, Soma represented the moon, which was supposed to be gradually drunk up by the gods and then filled up again.

To drink the Soma. To become immortal, or as a god.

Somaize, sieur de. Antoine Beaudou (1630–?). French man of letters. Author of the Dictionnaire des Préceuses, in which he defined the elaborate circumlocutions employed by the female habitues of the Hôtel de Rambouillet (1660), Somaize took it upon himself to defend the Rambouillet circle against the barbs of Molière's Le Préceuses Ridicules.

Somerville, Ed[ith] O[neone] (1861–1949). Irish novelist who collaborated with Martin Ross, the pen name of her cousin Violet Martin, on many novels, including the humorous Some Experiences of an Irish R.M. (1899).

Somerville, William (1675–1742). English author known for his blank-verse poems The Chase (1735) and Hobbinol, or the Rural Games (1740), a burlesque epic dealing with his life in the countryside of Warwickshire.

Somus. In Roman mythology, the god of Sleep, the son of Night (Nox) and the brother of Death (Mors).

Sonette an Orpheus, Die. See SONNETS to ORPHEUS, THE.

Song of Bernadette, The (Das Lied von Bernadette; 1941). A novel by Franz Werfel, concerning the life of Saint Bernadette of Lourdes. Werfel, who was in France when the Germans invaded in 1940, is said to have taken refuge in the church of St. Bernadette and to have vowed to dedicate a book to the saint if he should escape. He did escape to the U.S. in 1940 and the novel appeared shortly afterward.

Song of Igor's Campaign, The. Also known as The Tale of Igor's Campaign and The Igor Tale (Slovo o polku igoreve; 1800). An anonymous late 12th-century heroic poem. Describing the ill-fated campaign of a Russian prince against the roaming Polovtzy tribes in 1185, it is regarded as one of the greatest literary masterpieces in Russian written before Pushkin's work. Rather than strictly an epic poem, the work is a mixture of epic, lyric, and sometimes oratorical styles. The only manuscript of the poem was discovered in the late 18th century. An edition of it was published in 1800, and the original manuscript was destroyed in the Moscow fire of 1812. Some scholars have expressed doubts about its genuineness, although a literary forger with such poetic talents could hardly have remained anonymous. The work is now generally accepted as authentic.

Song of Myself (1855). A poem by Walt Whitman. Nearly 2,000 lines long, it is probably his most important poem, containing his major themes. The poet celebrates himself; encompassing all, he gives everything significance. The poet-prophet sees the equality and the beauty of all things and all people; in his huge catalogues, he moves through space and time, the poet of wickedness as well as goodness. The grass, "a uniform hieroglyphic" transpiring from the graves of men and women, testifies to immortality and cyclical rebirth. Sounding his "barbaric yawp," Whitman departs, dissolving into the universe. If he is sought, he advises, "look for me under your bootsoles." His Song, containing the "origin of all poems," direct experience of life, is "good health" to its reader.

Song of Roland. See ROLAND.

Song of Solomon, The. One of the books of the Old Testament, "the song of songs." A love idyll, it was universally ascribed to Solomon until the 19th century; critics now consider it of later date. It is interpreted as an allegory of the union between Christ and his Church more frequently than as a type of Oriental love poem.

Song of the Lark, The (1915). A novel by Willa Cather. The author said this was both her favorite novel and the one that satisfied her least. It tells the story of Thea Kronborg, a Colorado girl, the daughter of a Swedish clergyman, who has talent for music. She goes to Chicago to study, has an unhappy love affair with Fred Ottenbury, a wealthy young man who cannot obtain a divorce to marry her, and eventually becomes a soprano at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York City, famous for her Wagnerian roles. Thea is to some extent drawn from the famous Wagnerian singer Olive Fremstad.

Song of the Open Road (1856). A poem by Walt Whitman. The road on which the poet travels, and on which he encounters and accepts all things, becomes symbolic of life. The universe itself is a road "for traveling souls."

Songs and Sonnets. See TOTTEL'S MISCELLANY.

Songs of Innocence (1789) and Songs of Experience (1794). Two series of poems, subtitled Showing the Two Contrary States of the Human Soul, by William Blake. The first group exults in the omnipresence of divine love and sympathy, even in face of sorrow; the second group, gloomy in tone, opposes the first and deals with the power of evil. Innocence and experience are two opposing states of the human soul; the poems of one group are set against the poems of the other. Thus we have "Infant Joy" against "Infant Sorrow," The Blossom against The Sick Rose, The Lamb against The Tiger, and The Divine Image against The Human Abstract. Often the same subject is treated in each group, as in The Chimney Sweeper and A Little Boy Lost. This dualistic thinking, so characteristic of Blake, is set forth in his most important prose work The Marriage of Heaven and Hell.

sonnet. In prosody, a fourteen-line poem of a set rhyme scheme and movement. In English the sonnet is written in heroic verse, i.e., iambic pentameter. The earliest sonnet form was the Italian or Petrarchan sonnet, so called after Petrarch, its earliest major practitioner. Apparently the form developed after long experimentation from a kind of “little song” (sonetto in Italian and sonet in Provençal, from Latin sonus, sound). The 13th-century Italian poet Guittone d’Arezzo established its rules. In structure it falls into the octave, or first eight lines, which state the proposition, and the sestet, or last six, which contain the resolution. A break between the octave and the sestet, and a minor thought-division between lines four and five and 11 and 12, are standard in the form. The rhyme scheme is a-b-b-a, a-b-b-a in the octave, and either c-d-e, c-d-e or c-d-e, d-c-d in the sestet. The Italian sonnet form was introduced in England early in the 16th century by Wyatt and Surrey, and sonnets and sonnet sequences, usually upon the subject of love, were soon a literary fashion.

However, English writers were not satisfied with the Italian form, and soon were experimenting with what became the English or Shakespearean sonnet, so-called because Shakespeare was the greatest writer to use the form. As in the Italian sonnet, the rhyme scheme largely determines its movement. Rhymed a-b-a-b, c-d-c-d, e-f-e-f, g-g, it usually retains the Italianate break in thought between octave and sestet, but the epigrammatic force of the final couplet is so strong that it changes the whole character of the form; a major break comes between the 12th and 13th lines, and this sometimes becomes the main thought division of the poem.

Writers of sonnet sequences in the 16th century include Thomas Watson, Sir Philip Sidney, Samuel Daniel, Michael Drayton, Edmund Spenser, Henry Constable, Barnabe Barnes, Thomas Lodge, Giles Fletcher, and William Shakespeare. Milton, Wordsworth, Keats, Elizabeth Barrett Browning, and Christina Rossetti have written notable sonnets and sonnet sequences, in both the Italian and the Shakespearean forms. In the 20th century the sonnet has lost none of its popularity, having been written by Edwin Arlington Robinson, Edna St. Vincent Millay, Elinor Wylie, E. E. Cummings, W. H. Auden, and many others.

The two kinds of sonnet, first the Italian and then the Shakespearean, are illustrated in the following examples:

Much have I travell’d in the realms of gold,
And many goodly states and kingdoms seen;
Round many western islands have I been
Which bard in fealty to Apollo hold.
Of one wide expance had I been told
That deep-brow’d Homer ruled as his demesne:
Yet did I never breathe its pure serene
Till I heard Chapman speak out loud and bold;
Then felt I like some watcher of the skies
When a new planet swims into his ken;
Or like stout Cortez, when with eagle eyes
He stared at the Pacific—and all his men
Look’d at each other with a wild surmise—
Silent, upon a peak in Darien.

John Keats, On First Looking into Chapman’s Homer

Shall I compare thee to a summer’s day?
Thou art more lovely and more temperate:
Rough winds do shake the darling buds of May,
And summer’s lease hath all too short a date:
Sometime too hot the eye of heaven shines,
And often is his gold complexion dimm’d:
And every fair from fair sometime declines,
By chance, or nature’s changing course, untrimm’d.

But thy eternal summer shall not fade
Nor lose possession of that fair thou ow’st;
Nor shall Death brag thou wanderest in his shade,
When in eternal lines to time thou growest:
So long as men can breathe, or eyes can see,
So long lives this, and this gives life to thee.

Shakespeare, Sonnet XVIII

sonnet sequence. A collection of sonnets in which there is discernible, if only vaguely, some kind of development, whether it be narrative or psychological. In Petrarch’s Rime (verses), the antecedent of most European and English sequences, the sonnets are mixed with madrigals and canzonets, but they are the chief vehicles of the story of the poet’s love for Laura in life and after her death. Outstanding English sequences include Sidney's Astrophel and Stella, Spenser's Amoretti, and Shakespeare's Sonnets. Sonnets from the Portugese (1850). A collection of sonnets by Elizabeth Barrett Browning, expressing the poet's love for her husband, Robert Browning, and presented to him as a gift. The basis for the title is probably the series of sonnets of the great 16th-century Portuguese poet Luiz de Camões (or Camoens). The 43d sonnet in Mrs. Browning's series begins with the well-known line, "How do I love thee? Let me count the ways."

Sonnets of Shakespeare, The (printed 1609). A series of 154 sonnets by William Shakespeare. Probably composed between 1593 and 1601, they are written in the form of three quatrains and a couplet that has come to be known as Shakespearean (see sonnet). Influenced by, and often reacting against, the popular sonnet cycles of the time, notably Sir Philip Sidney's Astrophel and Stella, Shakespeare's sonnets are among the finest examples of their kind. They fall into two groups, Sonnets 1-126 addressed to a beloved friend, a handsome and noble young man, and Sonnets 127-152 to a malign but fascinating "Dark Lady" whom the poet loves in spite of himself owing to her unworthiness. It is frequently suggested that the stolen mistress of Sonnets 40-42 is the Dark Lady; the poet's complaint in the second group indicates that she has been false to him with his friend. Several themes recur throughout the series, notably the inevitable decay brought by Time, and the immortalization of beauty and love in poetry. The final two poems (153-154), which do not seem to fit anywhere, are adaptations of a Greek epigram and were possibly early poetic exercises.

Critics disagree as to whether the Sonnets form a coherent and unified sequence, and whether they are simply fictional pieces written according to the Petrarchan conventions of the day or deep expressions of Shakespeare's intimate life. Perhaps the safest general conclusion is that the Sonnets fall into several related groups within the two main divisions, and that, because of their intensity of feeling, many if not most of them sprang out of the poet's personal experiences. The dedication of the 1609 printing to a "Mr. W. H." has led many scholars to identify the beloved youth of the first group as Henry Wriothesley, earl of Southampton, to whom Shakespeare had dedicated Venus and Adonis and The Rape of Lucrece. Another theory is that William Herbert, earl of Pembroke, is the object of the dedication (as he was of the First Folio edition of Shakespeare's plays in 1623), although he was only in his teens during the period in which the poems were probably written.

Sonnets to Orpheus, The (Die Sonette an Orpheus; 1923). A cycle of sonnets by Rainer Maria Rilke. The sonnets are free and varied in form and center about the myth of Orpheus. One of the main ideas in the cycle is that in order to realize his true essence, man must make his nature fluid, must be capable of constant inner metamorphoses in order to exist on a par with the varied and changing world about him. Death is only one metamorphosis among many. Similar ideas may be found in the later poetry of Stefan George.

Sonnets from the Portuguese (1926), by William Shakespeare. An autobiographical narrative by Hamlin Garland. Garland tells of the westward migration of the Garland and McClintock families and of his own boyhood in the Middle West. Although he writes feelingly of the grandeur of the prairie, he also describes the bleakness and hardship of farm life that forced men like his father into what was by then a fruitless quest from frontier to frontier. The book was succeeded by A Daughter of the Middle Border (1921), Trail-Makers of the Middle Border (1926), Memories of the Middle Border (1926), and Back-Trailers of the Middle Border (1928).

Sons and Lovers (1913). A novel, autobiographical in character, by D. H. Lawrence. It deals with the family background, childhood, adolescence, and young manhood of Paul Morel, sensitive and talented son of an English coal miner in Nottinghamshire. His mother Gertrude, the educated daughter of puritanical middle-class parents, has married the miner in the heat of physical attraction. The marriage soon disintegrates; Walter Morel takes to drink and beats his wife and children, and Mrs. Morel pours all her possessive love upon her sons, especially Paul. The novel is concerned with Paul's painful introduction to the commercial world, his discovery of books and art, his growing discontent with his background of poverty and gloom, his developing talent for painting. It records his first love affairs with Miriam and with Clara Dawes. Because of the strong bond of love between him and his mother (a classical Oedipus complex), he is never able to give his affection wholly to either of the women, although both love him passionately. After his mother has died from cancer Paul decides to set out on an independent life of his own and rejects both Miriam and Clara.

The novel, which was attacked on its first publication because of its frankness in dealing with sexual matters, is in a more naturalistic vein than most of Lawrence's later work. Remarkable for its portrayal of English mining life, its vivid and moving characterizations, and its poetic descriptions of nature, it is considered one of Lawrence's best novels.

Sons of Ben. English poets such as Thomas Carew, Robert Herrick, Richard Lovelace, and John Suckling, who acknowledged Ben Jonson as their literary "father." Like him, they emulated the ease and polish of the Latin lyricists. The group is also called "the tribe of Ben" or (most commonly now) the Cavalier Poets. It was their custom to meet with Jonson regularly at the Apollo Room of the Devil Tavern in London, membership in the "tribe" implying a certain convivial as well as poetic relationship.

Sons of Freedom. See DUKHOBORS.

Sons of Mill. In the mythological cycle of Gaelic literature, the 5th and last race to invade and inhabit Ireland. In effect, the Sons of Mill were the first Celts to come into Ireland and are presumably the ancestors of the present-day Irish. In order to win the island, they had first to engage in battle and defeat the Tuatha Dé Danann.

Sonya. The heroine of Fedor Dostoevski's Crime and Punishment, a slyly, gentle young girl who has been forced into a life of prostitution to support her father, the drunken Marmeladov, her stepmother, and their children.
Sorel, Georges

Sophists. Greek philosophers of the 5th century B.C., masters of the arts of rhetoric and persuasion. They are considered the first professional teachers of Greece and the first to give practical help in politics. Since rhetorical training was the key to political power, these teachers emphasized the arts of persuasion. Originally, sophist was the Greek term for any skilled craftsman or artist; however, it was later applied to anyone who devoted himself to wisdom. Early Sophists such as Gorgias and Protagoras of Abdera were conservative: they affirmed things as they were and stood for the rule of law and order. The later Sophists, Hippias, Antisthenes, Callicles, and Thrasymachus, were more radical; they opposed “nature” or man’s individual instincts and desires to law or convention, and were the first to set forth the doctrine, later criticized by Plato, Thucydides, and Aristotle, that might makes right. Because the Sophists were in the service of the rich, a class inimical to democracy and held in contempt by Plato and Aristotle, the word Sophist was given a pejorative sense by these two men: they thought the object of the teachers was not genuine knowledge, and sophist in the general sense has come to mean anyone who makes the worse reason appear the better. The Sophists and their methods were caricatured in The Clouds by Aristophanes, who erroneously placed Socrates among them.

Sophocles (Sophokles) (496-406 B.C.). Greek tragic dramatist. He was born at Kolonus, near Athens, and in his own day was probably the most generally admired of the three great Athenian dramatists. He was known not only for his poetic and dramatic gifts, but for his musical skill and his fine appearance; he was the choragos when the victory over Xerxes at Salamis was celebrated in Athens in 480 B.C. In addition to his work as a playwright, he also held military and political positions, and was a priest of Asclepius. He was only 27 when, with his first tragedy, he defeated Aeschylus in the playwright’s contest. Evidence of his special position in the public esteem is the fact that Aristophanes, who ridiculed Euripides and, to some extent, Aeschylus in The Frogs, spoke only with the greatest respect of Sophocles.

Although Sophocles wrote well over 100 plays, only 7 tragedies and a part of a satyr play remain. Best known of the plays are the three about Oedipus and his children—Oedipus Tyrannos, Oedipus at Colonus, and Antigone—and the Electra.

He also wrote plays on Ajax, The Women of Trachis (see Heracle), Philoctetes, and the Ichnetain, his fragmentary satyr play about the birth of Hermes. It was Sophocles who added a third speaking actor to the two used by Aeschylus, increased the size of the chorus, and abandoned the use of the trilogy in favor of single plays—his three plays on Oedipus were written over a period of 40 years.

Whereas both Aeschylus and Euripides, in different ways, may be said to have had a progressive attitude toward religion and social custom, Sophocles was more conservative. His chief interest was in the search for truth and self-understanding on the part of the individual in relation to the existing moral order, as in the case of Oedipus’ relentless seeking after the murderer of Laius even though that knowledge brings with it his own destruction. His best dramas have never been excelled in their power and economy of expression.

A doubtful but highly popular tradition about Sophocles is that at the age of 90 he was haled into court by his son Iophon as too senile to manage his own affairs. To prove the absurdity of this contention, Sophocles merely read a choral ode he had just written for the Oedipus at Colonus. As a matter of fact, Iophon himself became a tragic dramatist, as did Sophocles’ grandson by his second son.

Sophonisba or Sophonib (d. 204 B.C.). Daughter of Hasdrubal of Carthage, sister of Hannibal. Like her brother, she was reared to detest Rome. Originally affianced to Prince Masinissa of Numidia, she was married, for political reasons, to Syphax, Masinissa’s rival. Masinissa defeated Syphax in battle and captured Sophonisba, but was compelled by Rome to give her up. Rather than fall into Roman hands, she willingly took the poison given to her by Masinissa. She is the subject of tragedies by Jean Mairé, Corneille, Voltaire, Trissino, Alfieri, and John Marston.

Sophronia. See Titus and Gisippus.

Sorbonne. The institution of theology, science, and literature in Paris founded by Robert de Sorbon, canon of Cambrai, in 1252. In 1808 the buildings, erected by Richelieu in the 17th century, were given to the University, and since 1821 it has been called the Académie universitaire de Paris.

Sordello (c. 1200-c. 1270). Italian troubadour who wrote in Provençal. He wrote a conventional didactic poem, L’Enseñamen d’oonor, and a bitter complaint against poor rulers, Servente (1237), written on the death of his patron Blacatz. His fame, however, comes from his appearance in Dante’s Purgatorio as a too zealous patriot, and in Robert Browning’s psychological poem Sordello (1840).

Sordello (1840). A poem by Robert Browning. Against the background of restless southern Europe of the 13th century, it projects the conflicting thoughts of a poet about the best way of making his influence felt, whether by personal action or the power of song. Tennyson said that he had done his best with Sordello, but there were only two lines he understood—the first and the last—and they were both untrue:

Who will, may hear Sordello’s story told.
Who would has heard Sordello’s story told.

Sorel, Agnès [also called Mlle de Beauté] (1422-1450). Politically influential mistress (1444-1450) of the French king Charles VII.

Sorel, Georges (1847-1922). French advocate of social progress. In 1892 Sorel abandoned his career as a highway engineer to devote himself exclusively to the examination of social problems. A proponent of revolutionary syndicalism, he published his most famous work, Réflexions sur la violence, in 1908. Although Sorel turned to different agents to effect his purpose, his aim remained consistent: social progress through a spiritual revitalization of all sectors of society. The revitalization would occur, he believed, through spontaneous outbreaks of violence that would engender widespread enthusiasm and release human energy. Sorel’s revolutionary doctrine did not depend upon an ideology; he emphasized not the source of the violence, whether proletarian or bourgeoisie, but its effect. At the turn of the century, he looked to the labor unions for revolutionary action, and later published Matériaux pour une théorie du prolétariat (1919). In an abrupt shift of sympathies, he collaborated with royalists and nationalists, and finally transferred his allegiance to Lenin and Mussolini. Among Sorel's works are Le Proces de Socrate (1889), an anti-intellectualist tract; Introductions à l'économie moderne (1903), a hopeful view of technology controlled and utilized to good purpose by man; and
Les illusions de progrès (1908).

Sorel, Julien. The protagonist of Stendhal's novel
The Red and the Black. Julien Sorel is a young man motivated by boundless ambition. Calculating and egotistical, he uses his love affairs to serve his drive for power. Le Rouge represents the red of the military while Le Noir is the black of the clergy, which for Julien, living in the aftermath of the Napoleonic dreams of glory, represents the one channel then open for advancement.

Sorel, Hetty. See Adam Bede.

Sorrell and Son (1925). A popular novel by Warwick Deeping. It is a sentimental account of an ex-officer's hard life as a hotel porter and the sacrifices he makes for his son. See If Winter Comes.

Sorrows of Young Werther, The (Die Leiden des jungen Werthers; 1774, final version 1787).
A short novel by Johann Wolfgang von Goethe, the first great popular success of his career. It is the story, in Goethe's words, of an artistically inclined young man "gifted with deep, pure sentiment and pentrating intelligence, who loses himself in fantastic dreams and undermines himself with speculative thought until finally, torn by hopeless passions, especially by infinite love, he shoots himself in the head."
Werther's infinite love for an uncomplicated girl named Lotte who, however, marries a man with a much steadier, more bourgeois temperament than Werther's, at least partly reflects Goethe's own experiences. In its epistolary form the book was influenced by Richardson, and in its imagery and language by Macpherson's Ossianic Poems. See Er-risenheit. The book caused a wave of suicides among young German romantics.

Sosies, Les (1636). One of the most successful comedies of Jean de Rotrou. A retelling of the Amphitryon legend and a source of Molière's comedy on the same theme, the play takes its name from Sosie, Amphitryon's servant, who like his master is confronted with his own double—actually Mercury in disguise.

Sothern, E[dward] H[ugh] (1859-1933). American actor. The son of the famous English actor E. A. Sothern, he was closely associated on the stage with Maria Malibran, whom he married in 1911. They appeared together in a number of celebrated Shakespearean productions. Sothern won fame in such plays as The Prisoner of Zenda, Henry Es-mond, and If I Were King. He also played Lord Dundreary in a revival of Tom Taylor's Our American Cousin.

Soubiran, André (1910– ). French novelist.
The Doctors (Hommes en Blanc, 1947) and The Healing Oath (1951) describe the sordid, then the redemptive qualities of hospital life and of sex for a young medical student. Bedlam (1955) describes an insane asylum.

Soulier de Satin, Le. See Satin Slipper, The.

Soul of Pedro Garcia, the. Riches, from a story in the preface to Lesage's novel Gil Blas de Santillane. Two students discover a tombstone with the inscription, "Here lies the soul of the licentiate Pedro Garcia." The more quick-witted student digs under the stone and finds 100 ducats. Lesage means that he hopes the reader of his novel will take heed of the moral lessons implied in it.

Soult, Nicolas Jean de Dinu, Duke of Dalmatia
(1769-1851). Marshal of France under Napoleon Bonaparte (1804). Soult fought in many Napoleonic campaigns and aided Napoleon upon his return from Elba. He was recalled to France after living in exile and again made a marshal in 1820. From 1830 to 1834 and from 1840 to 1844 he served as minister of war.

Sound and the Fury, The (1929). A novel by William Faulkner. Often considered Faulkner's best novel, the book is a radical experiment in form and technique. Three of the novel's four sections are the interior monologues of the three Compson brothers.
With their hypochondriac mother and their vanished sister, Caddy, they are the sole surviving members of a decaying aristocratic family in Mississippi. The first section, seen through the eyes of the idiot Benjy, is literally "a tule told by an idiot, full of sound and fury." The second follows the thoughts of Quentin, a Harvard student whose world, built on a dyin view of family honor and on his abnormally close ties to his sister Caddy, has been shattered by her seduction and hasty, loveless marriage.

The third section is a first-person narrative by greedy, petty-minded Jason, who keeps for himself the money Caddy has been sending for the support of her illegitimate daughter, Quentin. The final section is a third-person narrative focused on Dilsy, the Negro cook, whose patience and compassion are implicitly contrasted with the self-absorption and selfdestructiveness of the Compsons.

Soupault, Philippe (1897– ). French poet, novelist, and critic. At first closely associated with André Breton in the Dada and Surrealist movements, he left the group and began to write novels describing the social and moral degeneration of the 1920's, such as Last Nights of Paris (Les Dernières Nuits de Paris, 1928). Age of Assassins (Le Temps des assassins, 1945) is the story of his prison days.
His critical works include books on Charlie Chaplin
(Charlot, 1931), James Joyce (1944), Lautréamont
(1946), and Alfred de Musset (1956).

Sousa, John Philip (1854-1932). American bandmaster and composer of marches. Among the best known of these are Stars and Stripes Forever (1897) and El Capitan, from his comic opera of that name (1896). He was known as the "March King."

South Robert (1634-1716). English cham.pion and writer. His Sermons (1692) are notable for their unusual liveliness, wit, and humor.

Southampton, 3rd earl of. Henry Wriothesley (1573-1624). English politician and soldier, patron of Shakespeare and other Elizabethan poets. Shakeswpe's Venus and Adonis (1593) and Rape of Lucrece (1594) are dedicated to him. He was imprisioned for his part in Essex's rebellion (1601), but was released by James I. In 1605 he helped to equip an expedition to Virginia.

Souterne, Thomas (1660-1746). English dramatist. He was the author of such tragedies as The Loyal Brother (1682) and two plays based on novels by Mrs. Aphra Behn: The Fatal Marriage (1694) and Oronoko (1695).

Southern Literary Messenger (1834-1864). American magazine founded at Richmond, Va. In December of 1835, Edgar Allan Poe assumed the editorship; his book reviews, stories, and critical essays gave the magazine a wide reputation. Poe raised its circulation from 500 to 3500, but the owner, T. W. White, gave him little compensation or appreciation. Poe was succeeded by Matthew F. Maury, a naval officer and oceanographer, whose articles, under the pseudonym of Harry Bluff, contributed to naval reorganization. George W. Bagby edited the magazine from 1860 to 1864. Revived in 1939 by the Dietz Press, it frequently reprinted Poe's original contributions.

Southern Review, The (1935-1942). An American literary quarterly. Founded at Louisiana State University, it was the third magazine in the South to bear such a title. Under the editorship of C. W. Pipkin, Cleanth Brooks, and Robert Penn Warren, it became one of the most distinguished of the little magazines of the 1930's, printing articles on literary criticism—often aligned with the New Criticism—philosophy, and politics, as well as stories and poems by outstanding 20th-century authors. Kenneth Burke, Katherine Anne Porter, John Crowe Ransom, and Allen Tate were among its regular contributors.

Southey, Robert (1774-1843). English romantic poet, one of the so-called Lake Poets. Though a leader in his day, he is considered by 20th-century critics to have been of mediocre talent. He wrote a great deal of verse, including the epic poems The Raka, the Destroyer; The Curse of Kehama; and Roderick, the Last of the Goths. He also wrote ballads, such as The Battle of Blenheim; didactic poems, such as The Old Man's Comforts; and much prose criticism and biography. If Southey's epics now seem tedious and diffuse, his ballads unmusical and morbid, his prose is still esteemed. Such miscellanies as the Common-Place Book (1849-1851) and The Doctor (1834-1847) are erudite and valuable; while his short biographies of Nelson (1813), Cowper (1833), and Wesley (1830) are admired. In his youth, Southey joined with Coleridge in the scheme of Pantisocracy and married Edith Fricker, whose sister married Coleridge. His early liberalism was superseded by a conservatism that was attacked in satire by Byron. Southey was Poet Laureate (1813-1843). In the last years of his life his mind gave way, and a brief bout of brain fever proved fatal.

South Sea Scheme or Bubble. A stock-jobbing scheme devised by Sir John Blunt, a lawyer, in 1710, and floated by the earl of Oxford in the following year. The object of the company was to buy up the national debt in return for the sole privilege of holding an extensive trade monopoly in the South Seas and in South America. Spain refused to give trading facilities, so the money was used in other speculative ventures and, by careful "rigging" of the market, £100 shares were run up to over 10 times that sum. The company at times rivaled in influence even the Bank of England (incorporated in 1694); but the highly inflated value of its stock caused, in 1720, England's first great stock-market panic in which thousands were ruined. Dr. John Arbuthnot wittily remarked that "the Government and South Sea Company have only locked up the money of the people upon conviction of their lunacy, as is usual in the case of lunatics, and intend to restore them as much as is fit for such people, as they see them return more and more to their senses."

Southwell, Robert (c. 1561-1595). English poet and author of religious writings. Southwell was ordained a Jesuit priest in Rome in 1584; two years later he was sent, at his own request, as a missionary to England, where his presence (after forty days) was legally treason. In 1592, after six years of secret service to English Catholics, he was arrested. He was imprisoned and repeatedly tortured for three years, and hanged in 1595. His religious tracts, such as Mary Magdalen's Funeral Tears (pub. 1609), were written before his imprisonment and probably fairly widely circulated in manuscript. Most of his poetry, which is concerned with the spiritual life, was composed while he was in prison. Saint Peter's Complaint was published anonymously in 1599, and followed shortly by Macoenae, a supplementary volume. A Fourfold Meditation of the Four Last Things was published in 1606. The Burning Babe, which was highly praised by Ben Jonson, is Southwell's best-known poem.

South Wind (1917). A novel by Norman Douglas. It is set on the Capri-like island of Nepenthe, and is concerned with the group of exotic, odd, and learned characters who live there during a spring "season," blown on by the disturbing south wind. The filmy thread of plot quietly embraces drunken orgies, intentional miscarriages of justice, forgery of art treasures, a religious revival, a volcanic eruption, fraud, blackmail, and murder. But the novel is less a story than a symposium—a series of long hedonistic and skeptical discussions of ethics, religion, art, food, and many other matters. These discussions are interspersed with Douglas's lightly satirical essays on the island's history and mythology. The island's free pagan values challenge the beliefs of a respectable visiting English bishop. He so modifies his ideas that by the end of the book he is condemning a murder.

Southworth, Emma Dorothy Eliza. Born Nevitte (1819-1899). American novelist, known as Mrs. E. D. E. N. Southworth. Mrs. Southworth married in 1841 and two years later was deserted by her husband; left with two children to support, she turned to teaching and novel-writing. The more than 60 melodramatic tales she wrote sold millions of copies. Her greatest triumph was The Hidden Hand (1859). Her Works (42 v.) were published in 1872.

Soviet literary policy. Soviet literature was freest during the years just after the revolution. Bolshevik leaders such as Lenin and Trotsky seemed willing to allow unfettered development of literature, barring any openly anti-Communist works. Not until 1928, when the literary organization RAPP (q.v.) gained dominance, was pressure put on writers. During the years of the first Five-Year Plan (1928-32), RAPP exhorted writers to heed the "socialmand" by producing the kind of literature RAPP said was needed at the time: depictions of contemporary social and economic problems. In 1932, RAPP was dissolved and the Union of Soviet Writers established. Apparently a step in the direction of greater freedom, the move actually made writers easier to watch and control by gathering them into a common organization. Further restraint was created by the proclamation of the doctrine of socialist realism which all writers were obliged to follow. Recalcitrant writers, who either did not heed the new standards or whose earlier work offended the authorities, were eliminated during the purges beginning in 1936. Among the outstanding authors who disappeared, presumably into prison camps, were Isaak Babel, Boris Pilnyak, and Osip Mandelstam. Other writers, such as Yuri Oliosha, Anna Akhmatova, and Boris Pasternak, ceased to appear in print.

The war years saw a loosening of the iron grip on literature, although the Party showed it was still vigilant by castigating Mikhail Zoshchenko for his "personalistic" work, Before Sunrise (1943). Immediately after the war, the slight degree of freedom was quickly destroyed with the campaign against Western influences in Soviet culture led by Andrei Zhdanov. The "anticosmopolitan" campaign began in 1946 with the expulsion of Zoshchenko and Akhmatova from the Writer's Union. From this time until Stalin's death (1953), literature was smothered by the close Party control. With Stalin gone, a gradual relaxation was felt in cultural life. Hints of this relaxation were contained in Ilya Ehrenburg's novel, The Thaw (1954), which gave its name to the new atmosphere. The thaw was given impetus by Nikita Khrushchev's anti-Stalin speech at the 20th Communist Party Congress in 1956. That year a number of works criticizing various aspects of Soviet life appeared, among the most publicized being Vladimir Dudintsev's novel Not by Bread Alone. A new tightening of controls came, however, after the Hungarian Revolution of late 1956.

In 1958 a new disciplinary problem presented itself to the government with the publication abroad of Pasternak's novel, Dr. Zhivago. The work, which had been refused for Soviet publication, was outspoken in its criticism of the Marxist attempts to order life to a set plan. Pasternak was expelled from the Writer's Union and threatened with expulsion from the country. He was obliged to reject the Nobel Prize offered him in 1959.

In recent years the Soviet leadership has tended to allow writers to work in a relatively relaxed atmosphere, clamping down only when works are too openly critical of the present Soviet society. Works exposing the evils of the Stalin regime, which is considered safely in the past, are allowed and even praised. The most sensational of such works has been Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn's short novel, One Day in the Life of Ivan Denisovich.

Sowerby, James (1757-1822). English artist and naturalist who illustrated botanical and conchological works. His great works are English Botany (1790-1814) and English Fungi (1797-1815).

Sowerby, Katherine Githa. English playwright and writer. Among her works are Rutherford & Son (1912), Sheila (1917), and The Policeman's Whistle (1934). She collaborated with her sister Amy Milliken Sowerby on a number of children's books.

Spade, Sam. A private detective created by the novelist Dashiell Hammett. His first and most significant appearance was in The Maltese Falcon. Spade, a rough, tough, realistic man, was a far cry from the dilettantes who had been featured in most detective fiction up to his appearance.

Spanish-American War (1898). A war between the U.S. and Spain, stemming from a native revolt on the Spanish-held island of Cuba, in which Americans had long had a political and economic interest. The sensational reports of the "yellow press" about Spanish atrocities in Cuba aroused American resentment against Spain, as did the publication of a letter written by Dupuy de Lôme, Spanish minister to the U.S., in which he referred to President McKinley in derogatory terms. War hysteria reached its height when an explosion destroyed the U.S. battleship Maine in Havana harbor with the loss of 260 lives; although a naval court of inquiry could not discover who was to blame for the disaster, it was popularly attributed to Spanish agents. Although McKinley had previously followed a peaceful policy, he asked Congress to declare war on April 11, 1898. U.S. victories in the Philippines and Cuba led Spain to sue for peace in July. According to the terms of the treaty of Paris, Spain agreed to Cuban independence and ceded the Philippines to the U.S. for $20 million, as well as Puerto Rico and Guam. The conflict marked the emergence of the U.S. as a world power. See George Dewey; Theodore Roosevelt.

Spanish Gypsy, The (1892). A poem by George Eliot. It relates the tragic love story of Fedalma, a gypsy brought up as a noble Spanish girl, and Duke Silva, the commander of the Spanish fort. The couple are engaged, but, when Fedalma's father Zarca recognizes her and reveals her parentage, she believes it her duty to give up her lover and join her people, Silva, on the other hand, deserts his post and resolves to become a gypsy. During his absence the post falls, and Silva in desperation stabs Zarca. The lovers then part forever, Fedalma to lead the gypsies to Africa, Silva to seek pardon at Rome.

Spanish Main, the. Properly the northern coast of South America, going westward from the mouth of the Orinoco to the Isthmus of Panama, or a bit farther. It is the main-land bordering the Caribbean Sea, called by the Spanish conquerors Tierra Firme. The term is often applied, however, to the curving chain of islands forming the northern and eastern boundaries of the Caribbean Sea, beginning from Mosquito, near the isthmus, and including Jamaica, Hispaniola, the Leeward Islands, and the Windward Islands, to the coast of Venezuela in South America. It is carelessly used to refer to the Caribbean Sea. It often relates to the haunts of pirates who preyed on shipping to the Spanish colonies.

Spanish Tragedy, The (prod. between 1584 and 1589). A drama by Thomas Kyd. A bloody tragedy of revenge in the popular Senecan style, The Spanish Tragedy deals with political intrigue between the Spanish and the Portuguese that explodes in the murder of Horatio, the son of the marshal of Spain Hieronimo. Horatio, in the arbor with his beloved Bel-Imperia, is slain by her brother and the prince of Portugal, who wants to marry her. Horatio's body is left hanging in the arbor, where Hieronimo finds it and goes mad with grief. Finally Hieronimo conspires with Bel-Imperia to stage a play at a party at which the murderers are present. The villains are lured into taking parts in the play and are killed, and Hieronimo, to prevent himself from being tortured into naming his confederates, kills himself. In 1592 a prologue was added to the play, called The First Part of Hieronimo [sic], or The Warres of Portugal. This gives a somewhat different version of the story, and is thought by some critics to be the work of someone other than Kyd.

Spark, Muriel (1918– ). Scottish novelist, poet, and critic. Her witty novels are strongly colored by her Catholicism. Robinson (1958) is about a wrecked plane and a hermit; Memento Mori (1959) is about old people plagued by mysterious phone calls, "a reminder of death." The Ballad of Peckham Rye (1960) deals with a London factory turned upside down by satanic Dougal Douglas, while The Prime of Miss Jean Brodie (1962) is concerned with a schoolteacher and her girl pupils.

Sparks, Jared (1789–1866). American historian and editor. As owner and editor of the North American Review (1824–1830), Sparks made it the most influential magazine in the U.S. Meanwhile, he had begun to compile his 12-volume edition of The Writings of George Washington (1834–1837); he also edited The Works of Benjamin Franklin (1836–1840) and two series of The Library of American Biography (1834–1838, 1844–1847), to which he contributed several sketches. Although his editorial methods were often faulty, Sparks rescued many important documents from oblivion and stimulated interest in American history. In 1839 he joined the Harvard faculty as the first professor of history in any American university. From 1849 to 1853 he was president of Harvard.

Sparta or Lacedaemon (Lakedaimon). The ancient capital of Laconia, in the southeast corner of the Peloponnesus. The victorious opponent of Athens in the PELOPONNESIAN WAR, Sparta was also opposed to that city in spirit. Aristocratic, conservative, and militaristic, the Spartans took pride in their courage, endurance, frugality, and discipline. Boys were taken from their mothers at the age of seven and lived in barracks until they were 30. No deformed Spartan children were allowed to live, and the newborn were washed in icy mountain streams. The Spartans were frugal even in speech, a fact that gave us the term Lacaonian. Two famous figures of legend illustrate Spartan attitudes: the Spartan mother who, handing her son the shield he was to carry into battle, told him to come back either with it or on it; and the boy who, having hidden a stolen fox under his tunic, permitted it to gnaw his vitals rather than confess his theft. These characteristics were peculiar to the Dorian Sparta of Classical times. In the Mycenaean period, Sparta was known primarily as the capital of Menelaus' dominions, from which Helen was abducted by Paris.

Spartacist Party. A German revolutionary organization, led by Karl LIEBNECHT and Rosa LUXEMBURG, which became powerful during World War I. It attempted to imitate the Russian Bolsheviks by organizing a proletarian uprising in 1919, but without success. It was named after the Roman slave Spartacus, who led a revolt in 73 B.C.

Spartacus (d. 71 B.C.). Roman slave and gladiator. He led an insurrection of slaves (73–71 B.C.), during which he routed several armies; he was finally defeated and killed by CRASSUS. Howard Fast's historical novel Spartacus (1951) is based on his life.

Sparti (Gr., "own men"). Armed men. They grew from the dragon's teeth sown by Cadmus and by Jason (see ARGONAUTS). The dragon had guarded the sacred spring of Ares at Thebes. Both heroes defeated the Sparti by throwing a stone among them, which set them fighting each other to the death. Of the five surviving Sparti at Thebes who became Cadmus' followers, Echion married his daughter Agave and was the father of Pentheus, Chthonius was the father of Nycteus and Lycus, later kings of Thebes.

Spasmodic School. A name applied by William Edmonston AYTOUN to certain 19th-century poets, such as P. J. Bailey, Gerald Massey, Alexander Smith, and Sydney Dobell. Their work was characterized by forced conceits and unnatural style.

speakeasy. A tavern, restaurant, or cabaret that sold liquor illegally in the U.S. during the prohibition era. It was so called because in the 1920's the admittance was surrounded by an air of secrecy and adventure, although police surveillance of speakeasies was actually quite lax.
Specimen Days and Collect (1882). A collection of notes and essays by Walt Whitman. The book begins with an account of the poet's youth, but concentrates on his Civil War experiences. Much of the material is adapted from notebooks Whitman kept during the period. Some reminiscences of his old age are included. The "Collect" is a group of literary essays.

Spectator, The (March, 1711–December, 1712). A famous series of essays by Joseph Addison and Richard Steele. In these essays, purportedly edited by the members of the fictional Spectator Club, Mr. Spectator, a shy, observant gentleman who has settled in London, provides a picture of the social life of the times, while the individual concerns of the club's other members, Sir Roger de Coverley, Will Honeycomb, Andrew Freepoet, and Captain Sentry, add narrative depth and interest.

Spectra and the Spectrist school. A literary hoax perpetrated by Witter Bryner and Arthur Davison Pickle. Irked by the pretentiousness of the imagist and vorticist poets, they decided to found their own school of poetry and, using the names Emanuel Morgan and Anne Knish, published Spectra: A Book of Poetic Experiments (1916). The so-called school was taken seriously for nearly two years.

Speculum Meditantis, also known as Speculum Hominis or Miroir de l'homme (c. 1378?). Norman-French poem by John Gowes, of 30,000 lines in 12-line stanzas. A didactic work, it describes the contest for men's souls between the seven vices, with all their offspring by the Devil, and the seven virtues, with their offspring by Reason. In doing so, it gives a detailed "mirror of men" of all classes in contemporary life. It concludes that all men are corrupt and must turn to the Virgin Mary for mercy and aid.

Spedding, James (1808-1881). English author, editor of Works, Life and Letters of Francis Bacon (14 vols.; 1857-1874) and author of Life and Times of Bacon (1878), both of which have remained standard works. He was a close friend of Tennyson, Thackeray, and Edward FitzGerald.

Speed. In Shakespeare's Two Gentlemen of Verona, an inveterate punster and the clownish servant of Valentine. He is an "illiterate loiterer" whose dilatory ways belie his name.

Spence, Joseph (1699-1768). English biographer who wrote lives of such men as Stephen Duck, the so-called thrasher poet, and Thomas Blacklock, a blind Scottish poet. Spence also collected examples of Alexander Pope's conversation; these were finally published as Spence's Anecdotes in 1820.

Spencer, Herbert (1820-1903). English philosopher and social scientist. He is known for his application of the scientific doctrines of evolution to philosophy and ethics, with a central principle, the "persistence of force," as the agent of all change, form, and organization in the knowable universe. In education, he scorned the study of the liberal arts, and advocated that science be the chief subject of instruction.

Spencer's best-known works include Principles of Psychology (1855), and the 10-volume System of Synthetic Philosophy, the general title of the series that he announced in 1860 and to which he devoted the rest of his life. His Autobiography appeared in 1904.

Spence's Anecdotes. See Joseph Spence.

Spender, Stephen (1909- ). English poet. A friend and follower of W. H. Auden, he was a leading member of the British group of Marxist poets of the 1930's. His poetry, especially in its later development, is more personal, lyrical, and romantic than that of his associates. It deals chiefly with his own emotional reactions as he contemplates unemployment, poverty, suffering, or injustice, or visualizes amelioration in a socialist state; many of his poems, especially his later ones, have an autobiographical basis; much of his work is characterized by imagery appropriate to an industrial and mechanical civilization. His Collected Poems appeared in 1954. Spender's autobiography, World Within World (1951), is valuable for its account of his friends W. H. Auden, Christopher Isherwood, Cecil Day-Lewis, and Louis MacNeice, and of his political beliefs and intellectual development. Spender also wrote The Trial of a Judge (1938), a poetic drama having the same theme as Rex Warner's novel The Professor. His works of fiction include The Burning Cactus (1936) and his works of criticism include The Destructive Element (1935), The Creative Element (1953), and The Making of a Poem (1962). He coedited (with Cyril Connolly) the magazine Horizon during World War I, and coedited the Anglo-American magazine Encounter from 1933.

Spengler, Oswald (1880-1936). German philosopher of history. His noted work The Decline of the West (Der Untergang des Abendlandes; 1918-1922) reflects the pessimistic atmosphere in Germany after World War I. Spengler maintained that history has a natural development in which every culture is a distinct organic form that grows, matures, and decays. He predicted a phase of "Caesarism" in the further development of Western culture, which, he believed, was in its last stage.

Spengler's attitude became very popular with the Nazi government, but he refused to enter into their persecution of the Jews. Being independently wealthy, he managed to exist in Germany, somewhat under a cloud, until the end of his life.

Spenlow, Dora. In Charles Dickens' David Copperfield, a warm-hearted, doll-like woman with no practical views of the duties of life or the value of money. She is the child-wife of David and loves to sit by him and hold his pens while he writes. After she dies David marries Agnes Wickfield. Dora is drawn from Dickens' wife.

Spens, Sir Patrick. See Sir Patrick Spens.

Spenser, Edmund (1552-1599). One of the greatest English poets, and the first major English writer to arise after Chaucer. Born in London, Spenser was educated at the Merchant Taylors' School and Pembroke Hall, Cambridge. He was well acquainted with Plato and Aristotle, whose influences are clear in his works, with the Greek and Latin poets, and with the great Italian epics of Tasso and Ariosto. As early as 1569 he contributed some translations of Petrarch and the French work of Du Bellay to the Theater for Worldlings, an edifying volume of anti-Catholic propaganda. Also in his youth he wrote the hymns In Honor of Love and In Honor of Beauty (not published until 1596) which show his debt to Platonism. While at Cambridge he met Gabriel Harvey, a scholar and something of a pedant, but nevertheless a faithful and helpful friend, and the model for Hobbinol in The Shepheardes Calender. Harvey may have introduced Spenser to Sir Philip Sidney, the nephew of the earl of Leicester; in any event, in 1578 Spenser became a member of Leicester's household, and during this time formed with Sidney, Dyer, and others a literary club known as the Areopagus. Probably from the discussions of this club came the theories expressed in Sidney's Apologie for Poetrie and Spenser's The English Poete, a critical work which is not extant. In 1579, Spenser published his first important work, The Shepheardes Calender. Dedicated to Sidney, it contained 12 eclogues in the style of Vergil and Mantuan and is particularly notable for its use of various meters and its vocabulary, enriched both by foreign borrowings and a reviving of older English words.

By this time Spenser had probably begun to work on his great epic, The Faerie Queene. Most of the following years were spent in Ireland, where he first went in 1580 as secretary to Lord Grey of Wilton, who had been appointed lord deputy of Ireland. In about 1587, Spenser was given possession of Castle Kilcolman in County Cork, and it was here that he wrote Astrophel, an elegy on the death of Sidney. In 1589 he was visited by Sir Walter Raleigh, who urged him to go to London to arrange for the publication of the first three books of The Faerie Queene, and promised to present him to Queen Elizabeth. When Spenser returned to Ireland after an absence of nearly two years he wrote his autobiographical pastoral Colin Clouts Come Home Againe (published, with Astrophel, in 1595), in which he allegorically describes his voyage with Raleigh, his admiration for Elizabeth, and includes an attack on the intrigues at court. During his visit to London, meanwhile, Spenser had been received with favor by Elizabeth, had seen the publication (1590) of the first three books of The Faerie Queen, and had been granted a royal pension of 50 pounds a year. 1591 saw the publication of his Complaints, which included revised versions of some of the poems that had appeared in the Theater for Worldlings; it also contained The Teares of the Muses, a complaint on the current status of poetry; The Ruines of Time, a lament on the deaths of Sidney and Leicester; and Mother Hubberds Tale, a satire in the form of an animal fable thought to be directed against Lord Burghley and the proposed marriage of Elizabeth to the French duc d'Alençon.

Spenser's courtship of Elizabeth Boyle probably occasioned most of the 88 sonnets in the Amoretti, and his marriage to her in 1594 inspired his magnificent Epithalamion (publ. with Amoretti in 1595). The Prothalamion, another marriage-poem, was written for the double wedding of the daughters of the earl of Worcester. In the same year appeared Four Hymns to Love and Beauty, the first two the early poems to earthly love and beauty, the latter two on their celestial counterparts. During the winter of 1595—1596 he was again in London arranging for a reissuing of Books I—III of The Faerie Queene and the publication of the next three books. In 1598 he was recommended as sheriff of Cork; however, it was not long until the outbreak of Tyrone's rebellion, during which Castle Kilcolman was burned and Spenser forced to flee. He died shortly after in London, apparently in bad straits but probably not “for lack of bread,” as Ben Jonson reported. He left two cantos and two stanzas on mutability (publ. 1609), thought to have been intended for a future book of The Faerie Queene. A View of the Present State of Ireland, a prose defense of the repressive policy of Lord Grey of Wilton in Ireland, was not published until 1633.

A Protestant and a Platonist, Spenser was deeply concerned with the religio-historical problems of his age, and reflected in his work the Renaissance conception of poetry as the highest instrument of moral teaching. Deliberately archaic in style, he looked to Chaucer as the pure “well of English undefiled,” but he was no mere imitator of his master, and gave to English poetry both an enriched, romantic language, lines marked by their running sweetness of diction, and stanzas—called Spenserian—adapted from ottava rima but made particularly his own. Both the Spenserian stanza and the archaic language contribute to the mythic romance of The Faerie Queene, enveloping the scenes of chivalry and adventure with a singularly appropriate mistiness of style. An epic to compare with the great epics of the classical world and of Renaissance Italy, The Faerie Queene is simultaneously a nationalistic paean to the greatness of Elizabeth and her England, an imaginative romance, and a moral allegory of the soul of man on his quest for salvation.

Spenserian school. A group of English poets, including William Basse, William Browne, Sir John Davies, and George Wither, who flourished in the first part of the 17th century. In opposition to a growing fashion for more self-conscious, intellectual, and ingenious verse, they preserved the simpler lyric and pastoral tradition of the early Elizabethans, their chief model being Edmund Spenser. Their typical form was the pastoral or pastoral dialogue (eclogue), and their verse was characteristically musical, pictorial, and allegorical.

Spenserian stanza. Stanza devised by Edmund Spenser for The Faerie Queene. Adapted from the Italian ottava rima, it is a stanza of eight decasyllable lines concluded by a ninth six-foot iambic line, or Alexandrine, and rhymes ababbcc:

A Gentle Knight was pricking on the plain,
Ycladd in mightie arms and silver shield,
Wherin old dints of deepe wounds did remaine,
The cruel marks of many a bloody field;
Yet arms till that time did he never wield:
His angry steede did chide his toming bit,
As much disaying to the curie to yield:
Full jolly knight he seemed and faire did sit,
As one for knightly giuists and fierce encounters fit.

The Faerie Queene, I, i

It has the advantage of tending to be less rapid and more sonorous than the Italian form, while still retaining a sense of motion suitable for a long poem dealing with heroic exploits. It was later used by Byron in his Childe Harold.

Speroni, Sperone (1500—1588). Paduan gentleman and author of many dialogues and discourses on varied subjects. Especially important was his Dialogo sull'lingue (Dialogue on Language) of 1540, which was used by such defenders of the vernacular as Du Bellay. He also wrote the influential and controversial tragedy Canace (1542).
Swarock, Bella (1899— ) and Samuel (1899— ). American playwrights and film screenwriters. Mrs. Swarock, born in Hungary, has also written short stories; her husband, born in Russia, is the author of detective stories. They are best known for their plays, including Clear All Wires (1932); Spring Song (1934); Boy Meets Girl (1935), a well-known satire on Hollywood screen-writers; and for the two musical comedies Leave It to Me (1938) and Kiss Me Kate, both with music by Cole Porter.

Spuyer, Leonora (1872—1955). American poet. She won a Pulitzer Prize for her collection Fiddler's Farewell (1926). Among her other collections are Canopic Jar (1921) and Naked Heed (1931).

Spheres. A particular concept in the Ptolemaic system of astronomy. The earth, as the center of the universe, was supposed to be surrounded by nine spheres of invisible space, the first seven carrying the "planets" as they were known: (1) Diana or the Moon, (2) Mercury, (3) Venus, (4) April or the Sun, (5) Mars, (6) Jupiter, and (7) Saturn. The eighth, the Starry Sphere, carried the fixed stars, and the ninth, the Crystalline Sphere, was added by Hipparchus in the 2d century B.C. to account for the precession of the equinoxes. Finally, in the Middle Ages, was added a solid barrier that enclosed the universe and shut it off from Nothingness and the Empyrean. These last two spheres carried neither star nor planet. See MUSIC OF THE SPHERES.

Sphinx. (1) A monster of Greek mythology with the face of a woman, the body of a lion, and the wings of a bird. The offspring of Echidna and Typhon or Orthus, she flew to Mount Phidias, near Thebes. There she preyed on a riddle and devoured those young men who could not answer it. The most famous version of this riddle, a common theme in folk lore, is as follows: What walks on four legs in the morning, on two at midday, on three in the evening? When Oedipus gave the correct answer (man, who crawls as an infant, walks upright as an adult, and uses a staff in old age) the Sphinx killed herself in chagrin.

(2) In Egypt, the Sphinx was represented as a wingless lion with the head and breast of a man, typifying the sun god, Ra. A colossal Sphinx, near the Great Pyramid of Cheops, was ancient when the pyramid was built (c. 3000). Hewn out of the solid rock, it is 140 feet in length and its head 30 feet from crown to chin.

Emerson has a poem entitled The Sphinx (1841), as does Oscar Wilde.

Spielhagen, Friedrich (1828—1911). German author of many realistic, politically liberal novels about problems of his time, the most famous of which is In Reich und Glied (Rank and File, 1867). He also wrote a treatise entitled Beiträge zur Theorie und Technik des Romans (Contributions to the Theory and Practice of the Novel, 1883) which, though advocating realism, was opposed by the writers of naturalism.

Spillane, Mickey [Frank Morrison Spillane] (1918— ). American detective-story writer. He is known for the blend of sex and sadism he lavishes on his blunt narrative; his chief character is Mike Hammer. I, the Jury (1947) is perhaps the best known of these works.

Spgarn, Joel E[lios] (1875—1939). American critic. A student of Benedetto Croce and influenced by the work of Santayana and Huneker in America, Spingarn helped shift critical emphasis away from such external considerations as history and biography and focus it solely on the work of art itself. He first outlined his views in an address called "The New Criticism." Delivered at Columbia University in 1910, it anticipated the New Criticism of the thirties and forties. In 1931 he compiled the most significant critical studies of three decades and published them as Criticism in America: Its Function and Status. Among his other writings are A History of Literary Criticism in the Renaissance (1889), Creative Criticism (1917; revised and expanded, 1931), and Critical Essays of the 17th Century (3 vols., 1908—1909).

Spinoza, Baruch (1632—1677). A famous Dutch philosopher of Portuguese-Jewish parents. He is regarded today as the most eminent exponent of the doctrine of pantheism. He kept aloof from academic obligations by making a living as a grinder of lenses.

Spirit of Laws, The (De l'Esprit des lois; 1748). A treatise on the principles and historical origins of law by Charles de Montesquieu. Its theme may be understood in part by the whole title: "Concerning the spirit of laws, or the relationship which laws must have to the constitution of each government, to mores, religion, commerce, etc." Underlying man-made laws are natural, or universal, laws which may be broadly described thus: universal peace in all nature; the need for food; the need to reproduce in kind; and gregariousness. Once society is formed, it is necessary for human beings to formulate positive laws to govern that society. These positive laws are not deduced a priori but must take into account natural law, and, as the subtitle suggests, such considerations as the mores, climate, religion, commerce, population, and customs of each different society to which the laws apply. In seeking to establish positive laws perfectly just to all peoples, Montesquieu reveals himself to be a universal humanist for whom justice is the supreme political virtue. In this connection, it is interesting to note that he speaks out against slavery, aggressive war, cruel punishments, and religious intolerance. Of the three types of government which he analyzes, monarchic, republican, and despotic, Montesquieu shows a preference for a constitutional monarchy for France. He also admires the English constitution for its separation of powers. The last five books are a technical treatise on the Roman and Germanic origins of French law.

The somewhat incoherent plan of the work does not lessen its value as the first authoritative example of a comparative study of social institutions; it also, by implication, exposed grave abuses in the French monarchy and defects in contemporary civilization. For example, Montesquieu advocated separation of Church and State in legal matters and believed that civil law should not be used to condemn men for heresy or witchcraft. It is generally considered one of the most important political treatises in existence; its influence on practically every constitution in the world (e.g., the American Constitution, and Catherine II's efforts to recodify Russian law) cannot be underestimated. Its literary style makes it eminently readable today.
Spy, The

spiritals. The religious folksongs of the American Negro slaves. While some spirituals are exuberant, the most characteristic express the slave's misery in bondage and his yearning for freedom, generally in Old Testament terms borrowed from the tales of the captivity of Israel, which the slave saw as analogous to his own. Spiritual melodies are often built on the pentatonic or other scales, closer to Greek or Hungarian modes than to the standard major and minor scales of Western music, and their free treatment in the third and seventh degrees often results in the so-called blue notes. While they are eminently susceptible to the simple tonic-subdominant-dominant harmonizations typical of the hymnbook, their rhythms retain the freedom, subtlety, and complexity common in African music. Not surprisingly, these traits were carried over into Negro secular song and dance music and became basic components of early jazz.

Spitteler, Carl. Pen name of Felix Tandem (1845–1924). Swiss poet and novelist, writing in German. He was heavily influenced by Nietzsche. His epic Olympischer Frühling (Olympian Spring, final version 1910) earned him the Nobel Prize in 1919. His prose works, the best known of which is Conrad der Leutnant (Conrad the Lieutenant, 1898), a short novel, show certain features of naturalism.

Spoils of Poynton, The (1897). A novel by Henry James. The “spoils” of the title refer to a great art and furniture collection in a house at Poynton. When Owen Gereth, owner of the house, is unwilling to marry Fleda Vetch, his mother’s choice, Mrs. Gereth removes the art treasures. After Owen’s marriage to Mona Brigstock, he offers Fleda any object in the collection. She arrives at Poynton to find that the house has been destroyed in an accidental fire.

Spondee. In English prosody, a foot of two accented syllables; in classical prosody, of two long syllables. The form in English is rare since most polysyllabic words contain a primary accent; when the spondee does occur, it is usually as two monosyllabic words, such as “ah, joy.” In examining the subject, Poe found only three or four instances where spondee occurs in a single word; “football” was one instance. See meter.

Spooner, William Archibald (1844–1930). English dean and later warden of New College, Oxford. He acquired a (probably exaggerated) reputation for his “spoonerisms,” witty or unwitting transpositions of sounds, technically known as metathesis: For example, “There is a roaring pain” for “There is a pouring rain.” Spoonerisms form part of Joyce’s technique in Finnegans Wake.

Spoon River Anthology (1915). A volume of verse epitaphs by Edgar Lee Masters. The men and women of Spoon River narrate their own biographies from the cemetery where they lie buried. Realistic and sometimes cynical, these free-verse monologues often contradict the pious and optimistic epitaphs written on the gravestones. The poems made their first appearance in Reedy’s Mirror in 1914 and 1915, and William Marion Reedy himself was partly responsible for their inception: he gave Masters a copy of J. W. Mackail’s Select Epigrams from the Greek Anthology, and the style of the Greek poems impressed Masters deeply. New Spoon River (1924) was a less successful sequel.

Sportsman’s Sketches, A (Zapiski okhotnika; 1852). A collection of short stories by Ivan Turgenev. Portraying the life led on one of the typical great feudal estates in Russia, the Sketches with its perceptive descriptions by a fictional narrator of what he encountered on his rambles through the countryside brought Turgenev his first fame as an author. Because of the sympathetic attitude shown to the peasants and the often explicit condemnation of the landowners, the work has been interpreted as an attack on serfdom, which was abolished about 10 years after the book’s publication.

Sporus. A favorite of the emperor Nero. The name was applied by Alexander Pope in his Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot (1735) to Lord Hervey, and implied effeminacy.

Sprat, Thomas (1635–1713). English clergyman and writer. He is best known for his History of the Royal Society of London (1667), dealing with the Royal Society and philosophy in general and noted for the modernity of its style. Sprat was bishop of Rochester.

Sprechstimme (Ger., “speaking voice”). In music, the rhythmic declamation of a text at specified pitches but in a speaking voice. The effect is one of heightened, almost sung speech. The device was first used by Arnold Schoenberg in his song cycle Pierrot Lunaire (1912).

Sprigg, Christopher St. John. See Christopher CAUWWEL.

Spring, Howard (1889— ). English popular novelist. He wrote My Son, My Son! (1938), Fame is the Spur (1940), supposedly based on the life of Ramsay MacDonald, The Houses in Between (1951), and I Met a Lady (1961).

Spring and Autumn Annals (Ch’um-ch’iu). One of the Chinese Five Classics, it is a Chou Dynasty chronicle of the feudal state of Lu for the years 722–481 B.C. Traditionally said to have been compiled by Confucius.

sprung rhythm. A combination of accent meter with certain stylistic devices. It is the term by which Gerard Manley Hopkins designated his approach to rhythm in poetry. The word “sprung,” he said, connoted for him something like “abrupt.” Instead of the intense musicality of most poetry in accent meter, Hopkins sought the sense of halt, of impediments to smoothness. He used such stylistic devices as alliteration, a preponderance of Anglo-Saxon vocabulary, the deliberate use of archaic and provincial words and turns of phrase, and inversion of natural order, in order to suggest the power of Anglo-Saxon poetry, which he said had a great influence on him.

Spurgeon, Caroline (1869–1942). English literary scholar. Her study Shakespeare’s Imagery and What It Tells Us (1935) has been influential.

Spy, The (1821). An historical novel by James Fenimore Cooper. Cooper’s second novel, but his first success, the book is a mixture of fighting, espionage, and love. The central character is Harvey Birch, a Yankee peddler who risks his life as a double spy,
The action takes place in Westchester County, where both British and Americans have troops.

Square, Mr. [Thomas]. One of two tutors to Tom and Blifil in Henry Fielding's Tom Jones. Deistic in thought, Square spouts the "natural beauty of virtue." Actually, he is a great hypocrite. Both Square and Thwackum satirize theological pedantry in education.

Squaring the Circle (Kvadratrua kruga; 1928). A comedy by Valentine Katayev. The play's central characters are two mismatched couples who share a Moscow apartment. Eventually they change partners, thus uniting the two dedicated and the two frivolous ones.

Squeers, Mr. Wackford. In Charles Dickens' Nicholas Nickleby, the vulgar, conceited, ignorant schoolmaster of Dotheboys Hall. He steals the boys' money, clothes his son in their best suits, half starves them, and teaches them next to nothing. Ultimately, he is transported for purloining a deed.

Mrs. Squeers. Squeers' wife, a raw-boned, harsh, heartless virago, without one spark of womanly feeling for the boys in her charge.

Squire, Sir J[ohn] C[ollings] (1884-1958). English Georgian poet and editor. He wrote fine parodies (Collected Parodies, 1921) and collaborated in writing a number of plays, including Berkeley Square (1928), with J. L. Balderston as co-author.

Squire's Tale, The. One of the Canterbury Tales of Geoffrey Chaucer, an unfinished medieval romance. The first part tells of the birthday feast of the Tartar king Cambuscan (or Cambysusan), to whom a mysterious knight brings four magical gifts—a green horse, a mirror, a ring, and a sword—and explains their workings. In the second part Cambusan's daughter Canacee goes out next morning wearing the ring, which enables the bearer to understand and speak with birds. She takes pity on a bitterly distressed falcon who tells her how her terrace lover has deserted her for a kite. The section ends with a promise to describe the adventures of Cambuscan and his two sons, and the fights for Canacee's hand in marriage, but Chaucer never continued the tale. Spenser wrote a continuation in the fourth book of his Faerie Queene.

Squirel-Cage, The (1912). A novel by Dorothy Canfield Fisher. Using the characters of a husband and wife, the book effectively contrasts the materialistic attitude of a social-minded and avaricious woman and the more altruistic attitude of the man she loves.

S.S. The abbreviated name of the Nazi Schutzstaffel (Elite Guard), organized in 1929 by Himmler. Members of the S.S., selected from the larger S.A., served as bodyguards for high officials and as supervisors of the concentration camps. They were also called Blackshirts. See S.A.

Su-ma Ch'ien (145?-90? B.C.). Chinese historian, author of the Shih chi, or Records of the Historian, the first major Chinese historical work. Son of a scholar, he served in the Imperial Court. He organized and edited ancient source materials, writing a masterpiece that set the pattern for all later Dynastic Histories. He was castrated for having incurred the emperor's displeasure, but continued his work until its completion. See Burton Watson, Su-ma Ch'ien: Grand Historian of China (1958).

Stabat Mater (Lat. "The Mother was standing"). Opening words of a medieval Latin hymn which describes the suffering of the Virgin Mary at the foot of the Cross of Christ. It is ascribed to the 13th-century Franciscan Jacopone da Todi. It has been set to music by many major composers: Josquin des Prés, Palestrina, Pergolesi, Haydn, Schubert, Rossini, Verdi, and Dvořák, among others.

Stadler, Ernst (1883-1914). German poet. Influenced by Walt Whitman, Stadler himself contributed to the development of German Expressionism. Collections of his poems are Prülladien (Preludes, 1905) and Der Aufruch (The Departure, 1914). He was killed in World War I.

Staël, Mme de. Born Anne Louise Germaine Necker (1766-1817). Swiss-born French author. Her father, Jacques Necker, was the French minister of finance; her husband, the Baron de Staël-Holstein, was Swedish ambassador to France. She is known for her celebrated salons, which were attended by leading literary and political figures, for her charm, talent for conversation, vigorous mind, and for her influence on ROMANTICISM in France. Among her works are Lettres sur les écrits et caractère de Jean-Jacques Rousseau (1788); De l'Influence des passions (1796); Essai sur les fictions (1795); Considerations sur la Révolution française (1818). Delphine and Corinne are considered by some critics to be the first "modern" feminist, psychological, romantic novels; they anticipate the works of George Sand. In her De la Littérature considérée dans ses rapports avec les institutions sociales (1800), Mme de Staël attempted, among other things, to establish that literature develops qualitatively as social and political freedom increase. It was unanimously criticized because of its superficiality and simplistic literary prophecies. In De l'Allemagne, suppressed by Napoleon in 1811, but later published in London in 1813, she makes invidious comparisons between German and French culture and politics; in it she introduced German romanticism into France, thereby influencing greatly European thought and letters.

Mme de Staël was an outspoken critic of Napoleon, and was exiled from Paris several times. She traveled in Germany, Russia, England, Switzerland, and Sweden—hence her cosmopolitan attitude toward literature and politics. Her marriage was disappointing, and she had several love affairs. She inspired, in part, her Don-Juan-like lover, the Swiss novelist Benjamin Constant de Rebecque, to write his Adolphe. Her influence has been found in the works of Lamartine, Victor Hugo, and Charles Nordier.

Stafford, Jean (1915- ). American novelist and short-story writer. A serious writer and admirable stylist, she is particularly noted for evocative presentations of adolescence and childhood. Her first novel, Boston Adventure (1944), depicts Boston as perceived by a girl, the daughter of immigrants. It was followed by The Mountain Lion (1947), a study of a brother and sister in the years between childhood and adolescence. She has also published one other novel, The Catherine Wheel (1951), and a novella, A Winter's Tale (1954). Children Are Bored on Sunday (1953) is a collection of her short stories.

Staknova, Elena. The heroine of Ivan Turgenev's novel On the Eve. Falling in love with the Bulgarian revolutionary Insarov, Elena leaves the comfort and safety of her home to follow him into the dangers of the battle for freedom in Bulgaria.

Stalin, Joseph. Real name, Joseph Visarionovich Dzhugashvili (1879-1953). Russian political leader. Stalin, who succeeded Lenin as the ruler of Russia and thenceforth governed with an iron, dictatorial hand until his death, was born in Georgia. The son of a shoemaker, he attended a theological seminary in Tiflis for a short time. He joined the Social Democratic Party and actively entered the revolutionary movement in the late 1890's, often thereafter being imprisoned for his activities. In 1903 he sided with the Bolshevik faction, and in 1912 he went to St. Petersburg as a member of the Central Committee. He was imprisoned (1913-1917), but at the start of the revolution he was freed and became Lenin's lieutenant. After the revolution he served as commissar of nationalities until 1922 when he was made general secretary of the Communist Party's Central Committee. From this position he carefully built his power, and when Lenin died (1924) he was able to eliminate the opposition of Trotsky, Kamenev, Zinoviev, and other rivals. By 1927, he was in uncontested command of the Party and the government. Instead of actively attempting to spread international revolution, Stalin concentrated on building Russia's strength, forming his national policy around the doctrine of "socialism in one country" as a base from which Communism could spread. He initiated the Five-Year Plan for industrial construction and the collectivization of agriculture. In the cultural field, he exercised a paternal watchfulness over writers and artists, exhorting them with such platitudes as "writers are engineers of the human soul." One of his most direct acts in the literary sphere was his declaration that the greatest Soviet poet was Vladimir Mayakovsky—a pronouncement that was quickly heeded by Soviet critics. Stalin himself was the object of countless eulogistic writings, which fail to earn attention as literature.

Stalin purged the government and the army so thoroughly in the 1930's that he had complete control of Russia at the outbreak of World War II. In 1936, Russia had supported the Loyalists in the Spanish Revolution in opposition to Italy and Germany, the two fascist nations that helped Franco establish his government. Nevertheless, in 1939, Russia and Germany signed a nonaggression pact. When Hitler violated that treaty and invaded Russia in 1941, Stalin assumed command of the Russian armed forces. Russia suffered tremendous losses during the war, but on Germany's final defeat it was, under Stalin, one of the two great powers in the world, dominating the eastern hemisphere as no other modern nation had done. In his last years Stalin was loved, hated, and feared as no other living man.

After Stalin's death in 1953, a relaxation of controls was felt in Soviet literature. This period of relative freedom received the name of "the thaw," from the title of a novel by Ilya Ehrenburg. The writers were emboldened in their criticisms of past and current Soviet life by Nikita Khrushchev's anti-Stalin speech at the 20th Congress of the Communist Party in 1956. Previously forbidden themes were examined, such as the obstructionism of Soviet bureaucracy (in Vladimir Dudintsev's novel Not by Bread Alone) or the decay of the communist ideal (in the poetry of Yevgeni Yevtushenko). One of the most striking works dealing with the Stalinist regime itself was Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn's short novel, One Day in the Life of Ivan Denisovich, a depiction of life in a prison camp during Stalin's reign.

Stalky and Co. (1899). A collection of boys' stories by Rudyard Kipling. They narrate the adventures of three schoolboys: Arthur Corkran, otherwise known as "Your Uncle Stalky," the Irish McTurk, and Beetle. Beetle is usually taken to be Kipling himself. McTurk is George Charles Beresford (d. 1938), and Stalky is Major General Lionel Charles Dunsterville (1866-1946).

Stalling, Laurence (1894- ). American playwright and author. He is best known for What Price Glory?, a play on which he collaborated with Maxwell Anderson, and for The First World War (1933), a book of photographs and text presenting the horrors of World War I. First Flight (1925) and The Buccaneer (1925) are other plays written with Anderson. Plumes (1924) is a novel, largely autobiographical; Deep River (1926) is an operetta using New Orleans as a background, one of the first to make use of jazz; Rainbow (1928), written with Oscar Hammerstein 2nd, is another operetta set in the Far West. The Doughboys: The Story of the AEF appeared in 1963.

Stampa, Gaspara (c. 1523-1554). Italian Renaissance poet. Stampa spent most of her brief life in Venice. Here she recorded the emotional experiences of that life in a series of sonnets, madrigals, and elegies published as her Rime (1554). This work entitled her to a high place among the poets of the Renaissance period.

Stamp Act. A revenue act, known as Grenville's Stamp Act, passed by the English Parliament in 1765. It required that all legal documents, newspapers, almanacs, and commercial papers in the American colonies carry stamps showing that a tax had been paid on them. Led by Samuel Adams and James Otis, the colonists protested against the measure, and the Stamp Act Congress, the first intercolonial congress, petitioned the king to repeal the act. The request was granted in 1766.

Standard, Battle of the (1138). Battle fought near Northallerton. The English defeated the Scots under King David I, who was contesting King Stephen's right to the English throne on behalf of his niece Matilda.

Standish, Miles or Myles (1584?-1656). Military leader of the Pilgrims. He was largely responsible for the colonists' friendly relations with the Indians and led the party which arrested Thomas Morton of Merrymount. He is the title character of Longfellow's The Courtship of Miles Standish, for which, however, there is no historical foundation.

Stanhope, Lady Hester [Lucy] (1776-1839). English eccentric who established herself in the Levant and became legendary during her lifetime. From 1803 until his death in 1806, she was secretary and housekeeper for her uncle, William Pitt. Four years later, leaving England forever, she made a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, and thereafter traveled widely in the Levant, camping among the Bedouin tribes, until she finally settled among the Druses on Mt. Lebanon. Adopting Eastern dress and practicing her own peculiar brand of religion, based partly on astrology, she gained such influence over the half-civilized tribes by her prophecies and pronouncements that they believed her divinely inspired—"a view that came to be shared by certain English mystics and eventually, by Lady Hester herself. Her life on Mt. Lebanon is described in Eöthen, or Traces of Travel Brought Home from the East (1844) by Alexander Kinglake.

Stanislavski, Konstantin. Stage name of Konstantin Sergeyevich Alexeyev (1865–1938). Russian actor and director. Co-founder (with Vladimir Nemirovich-Danchenko) and director (1898–1938) of the famous Moscow Art Theatre, Stanislavski is also known for his theories of acting, which he set forth in such works as An Actor Prepares (1925), Building a Character (1950), and the autobiographical My Life in Art (1924). He rejected purely external theatrics in favor of a realistic style in which the actor seeks to identify with, or "live," his role, using his own psychological reactions. Sometimes called the Stanislavski system, his theories have been widely accepted by modern actors.

Stanislavski system. A method or discipline of acting developed by Konstantin Stanislavski that seeks to give a performance complete realism. Realism in the theater was not originated by Stanislavski; however, it was in his Moscow Art Theatre that a determined effort was made to achieve a deep realism through long, meticulous rehearsal periods and a precise formula for acting technique.

Stanislavski's productions were founded on three principles: (1) long, careful rehearsals; (2) complete rapport between actor and director, the latter to be a mirror for the actor's creativeness; (3) preparation of the actors themselves.

Norm Houghton in his book Moscow Rehearsals (1938) has enumerated the points in the actor's preparation that lie at the core of the Stanislavski system: (1) development and training of the actor's "instrument," i.e., his voice and body; (2) personal psychology, i.e., the actor must learn to isolate himself "in a circle" and not be distracted by the audience; (3) invention, i.e., the actor's re-creation of a situation in terms of his own impressions, associations, and memories; (4) complete immersion in the situation of the play; (5) "naivete," i.e., the ability of the actor to have absolute belief in what he does and says; (6) contact with the other actors when they are in their roles; (7) memorization of common emotions in order to recall them at any time in any role; (8) rhythm—of the role and of the play; (9) mastery of the intrinsic personality or "kernel" of the character; (10) awareness of the point of the character, i.e., to be able to show in the performance what the character wants and why.

In America, the Stanislavski system has evolved into an acting technique known as "Method acting." The Actors' Studio in New York City, under the direction of Lee Strasberg, has trained many actors under principles based on Stanislavskis's. Marlon Brando, a graduate of the Studio, gave a notable performance on Broadway as Stanley Kowalski in Tennessee Williams' A Streetcar Named Desire (1947). Brando's mannerisms and his appearance on stage in a torn undershirt caused some derogatory remarks, however, about the "grunt-and-groan method" and the "torn-shirt school."

Contemporary critics feel that a great many "Method" actors overlook the fact that Stanislavski emphasized external, as well as internal, training and did not give license to on-stage mumbling and hypernaturalistic twitchings and grimes.

Stanley, Sir Henry Morton (1841–1904). Famous explorer, chiefly remembered for his expedition into Central Africa to find David Livingstone. The expedition was commissioned by James Gordon Bennett of the New York Herald. Stanley reached Livingstone in November 1871, greeting him with the now famous words, "Dr. Livingstone, I presume?" He published a number of books including Through the Dark Continent (2 vols.; 1878); The Congo and the Founding of its Free State (2 vols.; 1885); In Darkest Africa (2 vols.; 1890); etc.

Stanley, Thomas (1625–1678). English poet, translator, and miscellaneous writer. Stanley's love poems and his translations of the works of such poets as Petrarch, Lope de Vega, and Góngora are thought to have exceptional charm. His four-volume History of Philosophy (1655–1662) was for many years the standard work of its kind.

Stanton, Elizabeth Cady (1815–1902). American woman suffragist. The first woman's rights convention was held in Mrs. Stanton's home in Seneca Falls, N.Y., in 1848. With Lucretia Mott, she was one of the first agitators for woman suffrage. She was the first president of the National Woman Suffrage Association (1869–1890) and edited, with Susan B. Anthony, a militant magazine called Revolution. Also with Miss Anthony and Matilda Gage, she wrote A History of Woman Suffrage (6 v., 1881–1922). Elizabeth Cady Stanton's autobiography, Eighty Years and More, was published in 1898.

Stanton, Frank L[ebby] (1857–1927). American newspaperman and poet. He was noted for his daily column, Just From Georgia, in the Atlanta Constitution. Selections from the column were published by his daughter in 1927. He published several volumes of verse; his poem Mighty Lack a Rose (1901) became famous as set to music by Ethelbert Nevin.

stanza. In prosody, a division of a poem containing one or more lines, separated by spacing from other like units; a group of lines standing together, apart from other such groups. Stanzas are defined according to the number of lines they contain as in the terms couplet; triplet or tercet; quatrains; quintet or cinquain; sextet, sexet, or sextain; septet; octave or octet. There are also numerous traditional stanza forms of a set length and rhyme scheme that have names, as: the ballad stanza, rhyme royal, ottava rima, the Spenserian stanza, terza rima, etc.

Stanzas may be of arbitrary length and plan, as in regular stanza forms, or they may be free and irregular, as in the irregular ode or most free verse forms. The thought may be continued from one stanza to another, or the stanza may be a closed thought unit. One stanza may and frequently does constitute a complete poem. On the other hand, many longer poems written in blank verse or heroic couplets are not divided into stanzas at all, but consist of an unbroken flow of lines divided, if at all, into larger parts such as numbered sections or cantos.
Stapledon, [William] Olaf (1886-1950). English novelist and philosopher. He wrote fantastic science fiction as a vehicle for his philosophical ideas. His novels include Last and First Men (1931) and Star Maker (1937).

Staple of News, The (1625). A comedy by Ben Jonson. The profligate young Pennyboy, Jr. becomes enamored of Lady Aurelia Clara Pecuria Do-All, the ward of his uncle, Richer Pennyboy. He woos her in extravagant fashion and ends in destitution—or so seemingly until it is revealed that his "ancient" companion is his wealthy father in disguise, and that he has been named heir to his uncle's wealth. Interwoven with the plot is Jonson's satire against the "Staple of News"—really Nathaniel Butter's The Courant or Weekly News, the first English newspaper—which printed all manner of misinformation to satisfy the appetites of its readers.

Star Chamber. A room in the Palace of Westminster. On its ceiling are gilt stars. Sittings of a very arbitrary and tyrannical court were held here under the early Stuarts. "Court of star chamber" or "star-chamber proceedings" are phrases still applied to any tyrannical tribunal.

Stark, Freya (1893– ). English travel writer. Most of her adventurous traveling was done in the Middle East. She is the author of The Valleys of the Assassins (1934), A Winter in Arabia (1940), East Is West (1945), and The Lycian Shore (1956). Her work is notable for its shrewd observation and original thought.

Starrett, [Charles] Vincent [Emerson] (1886– ). Canadian-born American writer and newspaperman. Starrett's books include such works as Books Alive (1940) and Bookman's Holiday (1942). An authority on Sherlock Holmes, he is the author of The Private Life of Sherlock Holmes (1933). He has also written poetry, short stories, detective novels, a bibliography of Stephen Crane's writings, humorous sketches, biographies, and novels.

Star-Spangled Banner, The. The national anthem of the United States. It was written by Francis Scott Key in 1814 during the War of 1812. During the British bombardment of Fort McHenry, the gateway to the Baltimore defenses, Key was aboard a British man-of-war, detained on a mission to obtain the exchange of an American prisoner. The bombardment lasted throughout the night from September 13 to 14. A part of the poem was scribbled on the back of an envelope, when, after a long night of anxious waiting, "by dawn's early light," Key could see that the Stars and Stripes were still flying over the fort. It was sung to the tune of To Anacreon in Heaven, ascribed to the English composer John Stafford Smith (1750-1836). The Star-Spangled Banner became the national anthem by an act of Congress in 1931, though it had long held that position unofficially.

Starveling, Robin. See Bottom.

Stations of the Cross (Lat. Via Crucis, "the Way of the Cross"). A medieval devotion based on the events of Christ's Crucifixion. It originated in Jerusalem, where pilgrims were allowed the supposed path of Jesus, stopping at the places where specific events had taken place; prayers were said at each station, which number fourteen. Later, frescos, pictures, or sculptural representations were made of these events and placed in churches so that those who could not go to the Holy Land could make the devotion. The events:

1. Jesus is condemned to death.
2. He is made to bear His cross.
3. His first fall under the cross.
4. Jesus meets His sorrowing mother.
5. Simon of Cyrene helps to bear the cross.
6. Veronica wipes the face of Jesus.
7. Jesus falls the second time.
8. Jesus speaks to the daughters of Jerusalem.
9. Jesus falls the third time.
10. He is stripped of his garments.
11. He is nailed to the cross.
12. He gives up the Ghost.
13. He is taken down from the cross.
14. Jesus is laid in the sepulcher.

Statius, Publius Papinius (c. 45-96). Latin poet. He is the author of the Thebais (c. 91), an epic in twelve books dealing with Eteocles and Polynices, the quarrelling sons of Oedipus. He also wrote Achi leis, about the life of Achilles, and the five books of the Silvae, occasional poems. Statius appears as a character in Dante's Purgatorio.

Stavisky, Serge Alexandre (1886-1934). A remarkable Russian-born French swindler. He managed to sell 40 million francs' worth of worthless bonds to the French working people. The discovery of his huge fraud (December 1933) resulted in the downfall of two ministries. A trial that ended in January 1936 led to the conviction of nine persons. Stavisky's sudden death was probably suicide.

Stavrogin, Nikolai Vsevolodovich. The central character in Feodor Dostoevski's The Possessed. A young nobleman tormented by a spiritual sterility, Stavrogin returns to his native provincial town, after several years of listless debauchery and crime in Moscow and abroad. He has capriciously married a crippled half-wit, Marya Timofeyevna Lebyadkin, and has become associated with the revolutionary plotter Pyotr Verkhovenski, who wants Stavrogin as a figurehead for his movement. Unable to lose himself in either crime or political activity, or to find solace in religion, Stavrogin is also unable to respond to the love offered by Liza Vetcha Tushina. For a while he considers starting a new life with the adoring Darya Shatova, but he is unable to make the effort. He is haunted by the memory of a horrible crime which he finally confesses to the monk Tikhon. Some years before, he had violated a young girl and then allowed the frightened, tormented girl to hang herself. (The chapter containing this confession was not allowed to be published when the novel first appeared.) Finally, unable to live with his guilt, Stavrogin hangs himself.

Stealthy School of Criticism. A term coined by Dante Gabriel Rossetti in allusion to criticism published under a pseudonym. It was first used in a letter to the Athenaeum, December 16, 1871, with reference to a pseudonymous attack entitled The Fleshly School of Poetry published in the Contemporary Review of that year.

Stedman, Edmund Clarence (1833-1908). American poet, critic, anthologist, and businessman. Early in his journalistic career, Stedman turned to stock brokerage; he continued to write poetry and anthologize even after his change in vocation. His early verse was inspired by the Civil War and the abolitionist movement, but his best poem is Pan in Wall Street (1867).

Stedman's chief literary importance rests on his criticism and anthologies. He managed to persuade the reading public of the interest of the works of Poe and Swinburne, among others. His two large volumes of criticism, Victorian Poets (1875) and Poets of America (1885), were supplemented by two anthologies: A Victorian Anthology (1895) and An American Anthology (1900). The American volumes, significant for the estimation of Poe and Whitman, were early studies in American literature, a field hitherto barely explored. Stedman's work became very popular, and he was often referred to as the literary dean of his day.

Steel, Mrs. Flora Annie (1847–1929). English novelist. She is best known for On the Face of the Waters (1896), a well-documented relation of the Sepoy Mutiny in India. Among Mrs. Steel's other books, From the Five Rivers (1893) and Tales from the Punjab (1894) also provide good accounts of Indian custom and myth.

Steene, Richard (1672–1729). Irish-born English playwright and essayist, known for his writing in the periodicals The Tatler and The Spectator in association with Joseph Addison. Steele took the initiative in the founding of these two journalistic enterprises, serving as the first editor of The Tatler under the name of Isaac Bickerstaff, and contributing the majority of the essays published in The Tatler. Other works by Steele include The Christian Hero, a pamphlet, and the plays The Funeral (1701), The Lying Lover (1703), The Tender Husband (1705), and The Conscious Lovers (1712). Steele was more journalistic than Addison: his subjects are lighter and less varied.

Steele, Wilbur Daniel (1886– ). American short-story writer and novelist. Steele's best known for his stories and has won the O. Henry Memorial Award four times with For They Know Not What They Do (1919), Bubbles (1926), The Man Who Saw Through Heaven (1927), and Can't Cross Jordan (1931). Among his novels are Storm (1914), Undertow (1930), That Girl from Memphis (1945), and Their Town (1952). He has also written several one-act plays, and with his second wife, Norma Mitchell, a full-length drama, Post Road (1935).

Steep, Marguerite (1894– ). English popular novelist. She is the author of Matador (1934) and The Sun Is My Undoing (1941), a long historical novel about the slave trade.

Steendam, Jacob (1616–1672). Dutch merchant-potter, the first poet of colonial New York. After a trip to the Gold Coast for trade and adventure, he settled in New Amsterdam in 1649, buying property in Long Island and Manhattan. His chief works are the rhetorical Klacht van Niew Nederlands tot Haar Moeder (Complaint of New Netherlands to her Mother; 1659), a versed allegorical history of the colony; and T Lofs van Niew Nederlands (The Praise of New Nederlands; 1661), a 300-line idealized picture of colonial New York designed to encourage immigration.

Steerforth. In Charles Dickens' David Copperfield, David's hero at Crackle's school. Steerforth leads Em'ly Pscottay astray; when he tires of her, he proposes that she marry his valet. Later he is shipwrecked off the coast of Yarmouth, and Ham Peggotty, who tries to rescue him, is drowned with him. Steerforth cuts a dazzling, attractive figure, but is arrogant, selfish, and heartless.

Steffens, [Joseph] Lincoln (1866–1936). American journalist. Born in San Francisco, Steffens had a somewhat restless and unrestrained youth. After studying in Europe, he became a journalist in New York City in 1892; he was managing editor of McClure's Magazine (1902–1906) and associate editor of the American Magazine and Everybody's Magazine (1906–1911). Best known as one of the first muckrakers, Steffens exposed business and government corruption in articles that were collected in such works as The Shame of the Cities (1904), The Struggle for Self-Government (1906), and The Upbuilders (1909). He also wrote a candid and entertaining Autobiography (1931), in which he described his political views and his affiliation with liberal and radical causes.

Stegner, Wallace [Earle] (1909– ). American novelist. With such novels as The Potter's House (1938), On a Darkling Plain (1940), and Country Dance (1948), Stegner became noted for his authentic depiction of American rural life. His short stories, concerned with much the same setting, have been collected in Women on the Wall (1950), City of the Steinbeck, John

Living (1956), and A Shooting Star (1961). One Nation (1945) is a study of minority groups in the U.S. Mormon Country (1942) and Beyond the 100th Meridian (1954) are both nonfiction, the latter a biography of the explorer and conservationist John Wesley Powell. Wolf Willow (1962) is a description of frontier life in Saskatchewan combining fact and fiction.

Steichen, Edward (1879- ). American photographer. He commanded the photographic division of the air service during World War I. A pioneer in experimental photography, he has exhibited in art centers both here and abroad. Director since 1947 of the department of photography of the Museum of Modern Art in New York, he created its famous Family of Man exhibition (1955).

Stein, Charlotte von (1742-1827). The beloved of Goethe, probably the most important woman in his life. She was married to an equerry who was much her intellectual inferior, and Goethe fulfilled her need for spiritual companionship. Goethe, in turn, when he came to Weimar in 1775, was in need of a sobering, stabilizing influence upon his character and it was this that she provided. Austere, highly intelligent, and older than the poet, she resisted his sensual tendencies and taught him the art of renunciation of personal desire. Though the intimate details of their love are not known, it is certain that even if she later did become his mistress, their relationship still remained primarily a spiritual one. Their love lasted unbroken from 1775 until Goethe's departure for Italy in 1786. In Italy, he experienced a sensual reawakening and when he returned, he and Charlotte had little left in common.

Her influence upon him, though, was lasting. The character of Iphigeneia in his Iphigeneia in Tauris (1787) is an adoring portrait of her, and the Princess in his Torquato Tasso (1790), though not a character as completely admirable, seems also to have been modeled after her. And finally, the theme of renunciation, which is extremely important in all Goethe's later works, is largely based on his experience with her.

Stein, Gertrude (1874-1946). American poet, novelist, and critic. For many years a leading American expatriate in Paris, she was the subject of wide literary controversy in the 1920's. Her unique and celebrated style, which was influenced by the psychological theories of William James and by modern French painting, is characterized by the use of words for their associations and sound, rather than for their literal meaning; an intricate system of repetition and variation on a single verbal theme; an avoidance of conventional punctuation and syntax; an emphasis on the presentation of impressions and a particular state of mind, rather than the telling of a story; and concreteness and extreme simplicity of diction, with preference for the common and monosyllabic vocabulary.

Miss Stein, who came of a wealthy family, studied psychology under William James at Radcliffe College and later studied medicine at Johns Hopkins University, specializing in brain anatomy. In 1903 she settled in Paris with Alice B. Toklas, her secretary, supposedly the author of The Autobiography of Alice B. Toklas. She returned to America only once, in 1934, for a brief lecture tour. Becoming interested in such artists as Picasso, Matisse, Braque, and Juan Gris, Miss Stein became both art critic and patron.

Three Lives was her first book. In part an example of primitivist writing, it is regarded by many critics as her best. Tender Buttons (1914) is a poetic series of paragraphs about objects, often witty, often close to automatic writing. After Geography and Plays (1922), Miss Stein finally published The Making of Americans, which was written some 20 years earlier. Of her many later works, the best known are Four Saints in Three Acts, In Savoy or "Yes" is for Yes for a Very Young Man (1946), and Four in America (1947), essays on Washington, Grant, Wilbur Wright, and Henry James.

Miss Stein is noted for several famous lines, notably "A rose is a rose is a rose"; she is also the originator of the phrase, "the lost generation."

Steinbeck, John [Ernst] (1902- ). American novelist and short-story writer. Awarded a Pulitzer Prize in 1940 and the Nobel Prize for literature in 1962, Steinbeck was born in Salinas, Calif. A writer of proletarian sympathies, he is noted for his realistic studies of life among the depressed economic classes of the U.S., especially the itinerant farm laborers of California.

Steinbeck's first book, Cup of Gold: A Life of Sir Henry Morgan, Buccaneer, with Occasional References to History (1929), reflected his long interest in the sea. He had specialized in marine biology at Stanford University and he later published two other books about sea life: Sea of Cortez with Edward F. Ricketts (1941) and The Log of the Sea of Cortez (1951), a reissue of the narrative part of the earlier volume with a biographical sketch of Ricketts.

Pastures of Heaven (1932), a collection of short stories about the inhabitants of the valley of that name, is the first example of Steinbeck's interest in the simple-minded, the "unfinished children of nature." To a God Unknown (1933) presents Steinbeck's strongest statement about man's relationship to the land. Tortilla Flat and In Dubious Battle established Steinbeck's reputation. Of Mice and Men, first conceived as a play, was dramatized the year of its publication. The Long Valley is a book of short stories.

The Grapes of Wrath, Steinbeck's major novel, is, perhaps, the best example of the proletarian fiction of the 1930's. Realistic and naturalistic, it also expresses Steinbeck's mystical affirmation that all life is holy. The Moon Is Down (1942) deals with life in a German-occupied country of Europe during World War II. Bombs Away: The Story of a Bomber Team (1942) was the first of three nonfiction works, the other two being Russian Journal with photographs by Robert Capa (1948) and Once There Was a War (1958), excerpts from his own work as a war correspondent.

Cannery Row and its sequel Sweet Thursday (1954) deal with simple people living in a virtual state of nature. The Wayward Bus (1947) describes the sexual misadventures of a group stranded overnight in a California wayside motel. The Pearl is the story of a Mexican pearl-fisher. Steinbeck's most ambitious work since Grapes of Wrath is East of Eden, a long novel based partly on a biblical story. The novelette The Short Reign of Pippin IV (1957) is a light satire on modern French politics. Steinbeck's latest works are Winter of Our Discontent (1961) and Travels with Charley (1962), the account of his trip across the U.S. in the company of an elderly poodle.

Steinberg, Saul (1914– ). Romanian artist, now a naturalized American citizen (1943). His witty drawings for the magazine The New Yorker have been collected in several volumes.

Steinway, Henry Engelhard (1797–1871). A German piano manufacturer, who began making one of the world's outstanding pianos in New York City in 1853. One of his sons, William Steinway (1853–1896) planned the first subway in New York.

Stella. Lady Fenelope Devereux, the object of Sir Philip Sidney's affection celebrated in his sonnet series Astrophel and Stella. She married Lord Rich.

Stella Dallas (1923). A novel by Olive Higgins Prouty (1882–1950), American novelist. It is a story of a New England woman who sacrifices herself for her daughter's happiness. This widely known work first appeared in serial form in a magazine, became a best seller as a book, was made into a play, a silent movie, a talking picture, and finally became a long-lasting radio soap opera.

Stendhal. Pen name of Marie Henri Beyle (1783–1842). French novelist and critic. Stendhal, one of France's greatest literary artists, played a major role in the development of the modern novel. His place lies somewhere between the romantic and realistic schools, for his plots and subjects are often violently melodramatic, yet his treatment of them is painstakingly realistic. Pointing the way toward the psychological novel, his probing, analytical studies of character deal with proud and egotistical natures involved in love and war. A great admirer of Napoleon Bonaparte and Lord Byron, Stendhal himself participated in several campaigns of the Napoleonic Wars, and his works are in part autobiographical. His most noted works are Le Rouge et le Noir (The Red and the Black), La Chartreuse de Parme (The Charterhouse of Parma), Armande (1827), and the unfinished Lucien Leuwen (1894). Racine et Shakespeare (1823) is a critical discussion of classicism and romanticism, and De l'Amour (1822) is a series of notes on the effects of love on a variety of temperaments.

stentor, the voice of a. A very loud voice. Stentor was a Greek herald in the Trojan War. According to Homer's Iliad, his voice was as loud as that of 50 men combined; hence stentorian, loud voiced.

Stephano. A drunken butler in Shakespeare's The Tempest. Cast ashore with a wine cask during the tempest, he proceeds to involve the jester Trinculo and the monster Caliban in a drinking bout. The three concoct a harmless plot to oust Prospero; they steal his clothing, and are at last brought before him in a Catholic stupor. They provide the low comedy in the play.

Stephansson, Stephan Gudmundsson (1853–1927). Icelandic-Canadian poet and novelist. In 1873 he left Iceland and came to Alberta, Canada, with his family. Directly influenced by the realist movement, Stephansson produced a novel series, Breif og ritgerdfr (4 vols., 1938–1948), which criticized existing social conditions. He also wrote many sensitive and beautiful nature poems; Úti á viðavangi (1894), Andorður (6 vols., 1909–1938), Kolbeinslag (1914), and Vigilóði (1920) are among his collections of verse.

Stephen. In Ben Jonson's Every Man in His Humour, a country bumpkin. He is so stupid that "he shakes his head like a bottle to feel an there be any brain in it!"

Stephen, James Kenneth. Known as J.K.S. (1859–1892). English author of excellent light verse and parodies. His work is collected in the volumes Lapus Calami (1891) and Quo Musa Tenet? (1896).

Stephen, Sir Leslie (1832–1904). English man of letters. Although Stephen took orders as a young man, he later became an agnostic, explaining his views in his Essays on Free Thinking and Plain Speaking (1873) and his Agnostic's Apology (1876). After having edited the Cornhill Magazine from 1871 to 1882, he became the first editor of the Dictionary of National Biography in the latter year. His books include The History of English Thought in the Eighteenth Century (1876), The English Utilitarians (1900), and English Literature and Society in the Eighteenth Century (1904). Stephen's first wife was Harriet Marian, the younger daughter of Thackeray. He was the father of Virginia Woolf; another daughter, Vanessa, married the English art critic Clive Bell.

Stephens, James (1882–1950). Irish poet and fiction writer. He is best known for his whimsical tales and adaptations from Irish legend. The Crock of Gold (1912), a novel that combines humor, realism, and fantasy, is his best-known work. Among his other works of fiction are The Charwoman's Daughter (1912), The Demi-Gods (1914), Irish Fairy Tales (1920), Deirdre (1923), and In the Land of Youth (1924). As a poet, Stephens was a disciple of A.E., but he celebrated the Celtic twilight with more oddness and fantasy. His Collected Poems appeared in 1926. Stephens was associated with the Irish Renaissance.

Stephens, John Lloyd. See Maya.

Steppenwolf, Der (The Wolf of the Steppes, 1927). A novel by Hermann Hess. It is a treatment of the outsider, a very common theme in modern fiction. The hero, Harry Haller, exemplifies in modern terms the typical disintegration of German romantic characters (see Zerrissenheit); he is torn between the frustrated artistic idealism of his inner life and the cold, inhuman nature of modern reality which, in his eyes, is characterized entirely by philistinism and technology. It is his inability to be a part of the world and the resulting loneliness and desolation of his existence that cause him to think of himself as a "Steppenwolf." The novel, which is rich in fantasy throughout, ends in what is called the magic theater, a kind of allegorical side-show. Here, Haller learns that in order to relate successfully to humanity and reality without sacrificing his ideals, he must overcome his own social and sexual taboos, including his prejudice against technology.

Sterling, George (1869–1926). American poet and playwright. Sterling lived most of his life in Carmel and San Francisco and was a member of the Bohemian Club in the latter city. He had many Western admirers, but was known in the East largely through his poem A Wine of Wizardry (1907). He wrote numerous volumes of verse and several plays, such as Rosamund (1920) and Truth (1923). His many volumes of verse include The Testimony of the Suns and Other Poems (1903), Beyond the Breakers and Other Poems (1914), Thirty-five Sonnets (1917), and Sonnets to Craig (1928). Sterling also wrote Robinson Jeffers: The Man and the Artist (1926). He finally took his own life in a mood of depression.

Sterling, John (1806-1844). English essayist and poet. He formed a literary group (1838), the Sterling Club, including such members as Thomas Carlyle, Alfred Tennyson, and John Stuart Mill. His own work, including his best poem, The Sexton's Daughter (1837), is less well known than Carlyle's biography, The Life of John Sterling (1851).

Stern, C[layds] B[ronwyn] (1890– ). English novelist, short-story writer, and critic. She was of Jewish parentage and her best-known novels, those in the Matriarch series (1919-1935), are naturalistic chronicles of Jewish life. In 1947 she was converted to Catholicism. Among her volumes of autobiography are Monogram (1936) and All in Good Time (1954).

Sterne, Laurence (1713-1768). English novelist and clergyman. When, in 1759 at the age of 47, he published the first two volumes of Tristram Shandy, he emerged like a comet on the literary world from the complete obscurity of the small Yorkshire vicarship he had held since 1739. Though Tristram was denounced by Dr. Johnson, Richardson, Goldsmith, and others on both literary and moral grounds, Sterne was well received in London. Successive volumes of Tristram appeared until 1767, accompanied by volumes of Sermons of Mr. Yorick (1760-1769), as well as by A Sentimental Journey. This tremendous output was accomplished in the face of the threns of consumption from which Sterne was to die—an autobiographical circumstance which he treats in volumes 7 and 8 of Tristram. Two views of his character have held sway: Sterne the accomplished scoundrel and Sterne the sentimental humorist. He was both by turns, although it is only fair to say that he did as much in his power to propagandaize the second. See Eliza; Bramine's Journal, the.

Sternhold and Hopkins. The popular name of an English metrical version of the Psalms of David. It was used in England and the American Colonies from the reign of Queen Elizabeth I until the end of the 17th century. It was mainly the work of Thomas Sternhold (d. 1549), and John Hopkins (d. 1570). The completed version appeared in 1562. The poetic style is poor; much of it is doggerel. It was ridiculed by Dryden in Absalom and Achitophel.

Stesichorus (Stesichoros; c. 640-555 B.C.). A Greek lyric poet. He was born in Sicily. The fragments that remain of his works justify the high reputation he bore in classical times, Longinus calling him “most like Homer.” His unusual achievement was to write of heroic subjects with epic sweep, but in lyric verse. He was the first known poet to tell the story of Daphnis. For a famous legend about him, see Helen.

Stevens, Gavin. A character in several works by William Faulkner. Educated at Harvard and Heidelberg, Stevens is a lawyer and later the county attorney in Jefferson, Miss.; he comments philosophically on events in Yoknapatawpha County, although he is rarely directly involved in them. He develops a hopeless love for Eula Varner Snopes in The Town and later for her daughter, Linda, in The Mansion (see The Hamlet); he solves murders in Knight's Gambit and is a somewhat ineffectual but philosophic presence in Intruder in the Dust. Finally, to cure himself of his unrewarded love for Linda Snopes, he marries Melisandre Backus Harris, a wealthy widow who appears in the title story of Knight's Gambit.

Stevens, John (1749-1838). American inventor, instrumental in the passage of the first American patent laws. His steamboat Phoenix (1808), built very shortly after Robert Fulton's Clermont, traveled from New York to Philadelphia and was the first sea-going steamboat in the world.

Stevens, Thaddeus (1792-1868). American statesman. As a member of Congress from Pennsylvania (1849-1853, 1859-1868), Stevens was an outspoken opponent of slavery and a leader of the radical Republicans who advocated a harsh policy toward the defeated South after the Civil War. He favored the impeachment of President Johnson but played a small role in the trial because of declining health.

Stevens, Wallace (1879-1955). American poet. He is known for his poetry influenced by the French symbolist movement, his recondite vocabulary, lavish imagery, metaphors of brilliant originality, and a rhetoric whose intricate stylizations were designed not only to please but to shock. In his later poetry Stevens turned away from his earlier preoccupation with the splendors of the West Indies, and wrote more of the harsher realities of New England, concerning himself with aesthetic problems. But until the end of his life his poetic style remained marked by a kind of intelligent dandyism, never soft or merely pretty, always hard as a diamond and regally controlled.

Part of the poetic renaissance shortly before World War I, Stevens' first works were published in Poetry in 1914. But it was not until 1923 that his first book of poems, Harmonium, was published. He wrote little throughout the 20's, adding only a few poems to the reissue of Harmonium in 1931. The 1930's, however, saw a fairly voluminous output; collections of the period are Ideas of Order (1935), Oul's Clover (1936), The Man with the Blue Guitar and Other Poems (1937). Later volumes are Parts of a World (1942), Notes Toward A Supreme Fiction, Esthétique du Mal (1945), Transport to Summer (1947), Three Academic Pieces, two poems and a prose address (1947), The Auroras of Autumn (1950), The Necessary Angel, Collected Poems (1954), and Opus Posthumous (1957).

A lawyer by profession, Stevens served for most of his life as an executive in an insurance company in Hartford, Conn., writing his poetry in his spare time and keeping the two spheres of interest so separate that some of his insurance colleagues never knew he was the established poet he had long since become. It has often been remarked that his life in business was contradictory to his main aesthetic creed; however, in his essays and in many of his poems, he emphasized the need of imaginatively transforming reality, of infusing an otherwise drab and meaningless existence with the meaning and beauty of poetry. See Peter Quince at the Claviers, Sunday Morning: Monocle de Mon Uncle, L.E.

Stevenson, Adlai Ewing (1900– ). American statesman. The grandson and namesake of a former vice-president of the U.S., Stevenson graduated from Princeton, attended Harvard Law School and Northwestern University Law School, and was admitted to the bar in 1926. He interrupted his Chicago law practice to work for various government agencies, and during World War II was special assistant to the secretary of the navy (1941–1944) and headed a mission to Italy for the Foreign Economic Administration.

His long-time association with the United Nations began in 1945 when he was a member of the U.S. delegation to the UN conference in San Francisco. Later he served as senior adviser to the U.S. delegation to the UN and as alternate delegate. In 1947 he was elected governor of Illinois by a large plurality and instituted many extensive reforms. He was Democratic candidate for president in 1952 and in 1956, but was defeated both times by Dwight D. Eisenhower. He was appointed ambassador to the UN by President Kennedy in 1961.

Stevenson's addresses are remarkable for their insight, their fairness to opponents, their urbanity, and their incisive humor. Among Stevenson's books are Call to Greatness (1954), What I Think (1956), Friends and Enemies (1959), Putting First Things First (1960), and Looking Forward: Years of Crisis at the United Nations (1964).

Stevenson, Robert Louis [Balfour] (1850–1894). Scottish novelist, poet, essayist. A sickly child, Stevenson was tubercular all his life, in spite of which he lived adventurously, traveling widely. He studied civil engineering and prepared for the bar, but never took up the practice of law. A trip to Europe supplied the materials for An Inland Voyage (1878) and Travels with a Donkey in the Cévennes (1879). In France he met Mrs. Fanny Osbourne, followed her to the U.S. and married her, returning to Scotland in 1880. In rapid succession he published the collections of essays Virgibus Puerisque (1881) and Familiar Studies of Men and Books (1882); a collection of tales, New Arabian Nights (1882); Silverado Squatters (1883), his recollections of California; and the novel Treasure Island, one of his most popular books and the one which brought him fortune and renown. The following year, 1885, saw the publication of A Child's Garden of Verses, The Body Snatcher, and Prince Otto, and in 1886 came The Strange Case of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde and the historical romance Kidnapped, both of which have to this day retained their popularity with readers. In 1887, after a series of disappointing visits to European health spas, the Stevensons went to America; while at Saranac Lake, Stevenson wrote The Master of Ballantrae (1888). He and his wife moved on to the West Coast and set out for the South Seas; except for one trip to Sydney, Stevenson spent the last five years of his life on Samoa, living as a planter and chief of the natives. It was there that he wrote The Wrecker, in collaboration with his stepson Lloyd Osbourne (1892), Island Nights Entertainment (1893) and Catriona (1893), a sequel to Kidnapped. While dictating The Weir of Hermiston, Stevenson died suddenly of apoplexy. He was buried on his beloved island.

During his life Stevenson wrote half a dozen plays with various collaborators, among them his wife and stepson, none of them successful; his Letters were published in 1895, after his death. Though his novels are perhaps less successfully accomplished than his brief tales and stories, his work is marked by his power of invention, his command of horror and the supernatural, and the psychological depth which he was able to bring to romance.

Stewart, [John] [Innes] [Mackintosh]. Pen name, Michael Innes (1906– ). English novelist, scholar, and literary critic. Under his own name he is the author of Character and Motive in Shakespeare (1949) and the novel Mark Lambert's Supper (1954). Under his pen name he writes skillful detective stories, such as Hamlet, Revenge! (1937), The Journeying Boy (1949), and The Man from the Sea (1955).
Stickney, [Joseph] Trumbull (1874–1904). Swiss-born American poet and dramatist. After graduating from Harvard in 1895, Stickney studied at the Sorbonne and was the first American to receive that institution's Doctorat des Lettres. He went back to teach at Harvard and died of a brain tumor at the age of 30.

In his studies and in his general philosophy, Stickney was closely associated with William Vaughn Moody, with whom he read much Greek literature. Moody wrote The Fire-Bringer (1904); Stickney preceded him with a work on the same theme, Prometheus Pyrophoros (1900), a group of scenes that pessimistic dramatic scenes, based directly on Greek sources, which sought to present Prometheus as a sort of hero of scientific progress. Stickney also prepared a collection of Dramatic Verses (1902). His Poems were collected in 1905.

Stieglitz, Alfred (1864–1946). American photographer. He sought to establish recognition of photography as an art, and was editor and publisher of Camera Work (1903–1917). After 1909 he began to show in his small Gallery 291 on Fifth Avenue, often for the first time, drawings by Rodin and Matisse, watercolors by Cézanne, works by Picasso, Toulouse-Lautrec, and young Americans such as John Marin and Georgia O'Keeffe, whom he married. He fought with high intelligence for the acceptance of modern art.

Stifter, Adalbert (1805–1868). Austrian novelist whose style reflects the tendency, found in much German literature of the time, away from romantic idealism and toward realism. His attachment to the common people and his sometimes excessive emphasis on the preservation of tradition align him, as well, with the conservative Biedermeier movement. In the preface to his collection of narrative sketches, Bunte Steine (Colored Stones, 1853), he states that a boiling teakettle interests him as much as a volcano, that in even the most trivial phenomena, provided one knows how to look at them, the universal harmony of nature may be recognized. It is primarily this “gentle law” by which all things, small and great, are connected, that is depicted in Stifter's writing and that accounts for his extensive treatment of seemingly insignificant events and characters. His novel Der Nachsommer (Indian Summer, 1857) is one of the finest examples of the BILDUNGERROMAN.

Stijl, de [Style]. A Dutch 20th-century movement towards pure art. It received its name from an avant-garde periodical of that name, which was published between 1917 and 1928. Its founders were Piet Mondrian and the versatile writer and artist, Theo van Doesburg (1883–1931). In its final form, de Stijl reduced artistic elements to the basic form of the rectangle and to the primary colors. It had a considerable influence on the Bauhaus, as well as on contemporary painting, typography, and commercial design.

Still, Clyfford (1904– ). American painter. He formulated an abstract art of intense black areas cleft by vividly colored patches. He exerted a great influence in California, where he taught till 1950.

Stilnovisti. A late 13th-century Tuscan school of Italian poets. They introduced what Dante called a dolce stil nuovo (“sweet new style”) in lyrical poetry. Reacting against the stylized conventions of the Provencal troubadours and the tradition of COURTLY LOVE, they achieved greater simplicity and sincerity in portraying the psychology of love and sorrow. Their poetry of love, however, is imbued with metaphysics and religion; the beloved lady becomes idealized as an “angelic woman,” while love for her becomes an emotionally and spiritually ennobling experience that prepares a man for love of beauty and truth and God. This trend began with Guido Guinizelli; its leading exponents were Guido Cavalcanti and Dante.

Stirner, Max. Pen name of Kaspar Schmidt (1806–1856). German philosopher whose ideas bore the label of anarchist existentialism. He advocated the supremacy of the individual ego and launched an anarchistic attack on all the traditional social institutions that limit the development of the ego. His major work is Der Einzige und sein Eigentum (The Individual and His Property, 1845).

Stockton, Frank R. Real name, Francis Richard Stockton (1834–1902). American novelist, short-story writer, and editor. Although Stockton was widely admired by contemporaries for his humor, his ingenuity, and his narrative skill, his works are little read today, except for a few often anthologized stories, notably The Lady or the Tiger? His novels include Rudder Grange (1879), about a newly married couple who take up residence in an abandoned house boat that ultimately gets adrift in Newark Bay, and The Casting Away of Mrs. Lecks and Mrs. Alewine (1886), about two New England widows who are shipwrecked during an ocean voyage and find shelter on a desert island.

Stoddard, Richard Henry (1825–1903). American poet, book reviewer, editor, and public official. Stoddard held various jobs throughout his career in an effort to help his poverty-stricken family. In 1845, he began to publish his poetry, which he modeled on the work of the English Romantics and Victorians. Largely imitative and sentimental, his work includes Footprints (1849), Poems (1852), The King's Bell (1863), The Book of the East and Other Poems (1871), The Lion's Cub with Other Verse (1890), and Recollections, Personal and Literary (1903). Stoddard's best poem is Abraham Lincoln: An Horatian Ode (1865).

Stoicism. A school of Greek philosophy. It was founded by Zeno of Citium (c. 362-c. 264 B.C.) around 308 B.C. The Stoics were austere, advocating freedom from passions and desires. They equated the real with the material, and defined the active principle in the universe as Force or God. They sought to be in harmony with nature and the divine will, and their philosophy is characterized by a detachment from the outside world. The Stoicism later taught by Epictetus had more of a religious emphasis. Zeno's school was continued by Cleanthes and Chrysippus, and derived its name from the StoA Poikile, a painted colonade or porch at Athens in which Zeno and his successors lectured. Stoicism was highly congenial to the Roman temperament, and has influenced Roman Law. See Marcus Aurelius.

Stoke Poges. A village in Buckinghamshire, England, where Thomas Gray wrote some of his poems. He is buried there in St. Giles churchyard which is believed to be the scene of his Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard.

Members of the Göttinger Hain group, they were influenced by Klopstock and the Sturm und Drang. Friedrich, the more significant of the two, wrote a romance entitled Die Insel (The Island, 1788) and translated Macpherson’s Ossian in 1806. The two together published a collection of Vaterländische Gedichte (Patriotic Poems, 1815). They both accompanied Goethe on his trip to Switzerland in 1775.

Stone, Lucy. Mrs. Henry Brown Blackwell (1818–1893). American woman suffragist; she insisted upon retaining her maiden name after marriage. Lucy Stone’s first opponent in her battle for women’s rights was her father, who refused her financial aid toward higher education. After several years of teaching, she was able to go to Oberlin College. After her graduation, she lectured against slavery and for woman suffrage. Although she had not intended to marry, she relented when Henry Blackwell promised to devote himself to her cause. With her husband, Lucy Stone edited the Woman’s Journal (1872–1893). She helped to form the American Woman Suffrage Association in 1869.

Stone Guest, the. See Dom Juan ou le Festin en Pierre; Little Tragedies.

Stonehenge. The great prehistoric (Neolithic or early Bronze Age) monument on Salisbury Plain. It originally consisted of two concentric circles of upright stones, enclosing two rows of smaller stones, and a central block of blue marble, 18 feet by 4 feet, known as the Altar Stone. Many theories as to its original purpose and original builders have been proposed. It was probably used, if not built, by the Druids and from its plotting, which, it is certain, had an astronomical basis, it is thought to have been the temple of a sun god and to have been built about 1680 B.C.

The -henge of the name seems to refer to something hanging (A.S. hengen) in, or supported in, the air, viz., the huge transverse stones; but Geoffrey of Monmouth connects it with Hengist, and says that Stonehenge was erected by Merlin to perpetuate the treachery of Hengist in falling upon Vortigern and putting him and his 400 attendants to the sword. Aurelius Ambrosium asked Merlin to devise a monument of this event, whereupon the magician transplanted from Killarous, in Ireland, the “Giants’ Dance,” stones which had been brought thither from Africa by a race of giants and all of which possessed magic properties.

Stony Point. A rocky promontory on the west bank of the Hudson, 35 miles north of New York City. American soldiers under General Wayne captured the British fort there in a surprise attack on the night of July 15, 1779. Although the position was abandoned three days later, the victory greatly bolstered American morale.

Stopping by Woods on a Snowy Evening (1923). A lyric poem by Robert Frost. The poet stops his horse to contemplate the beauty of the scene and then continues his journey:

The woods are lovely, deep and keen.
But I have promises to keep,
And miles to go before I sleep . . .

It is one of Frost’s most famous and most frequently discussed poems; he himself once said that he would like to have it printed on one page, followed by “forty pages of footnotes.”

Katerina confesses her infidelity, is hounded by her cruel mother-in-law, and finally commits suicide.

Storm, Theodor (1817–1888). German poet and novelist. He is an unparalleled master of the so-called frame-technique of narrative writing: that is, he often has a character in a story tell another story, so that the second is framed by the first. His novellas, most of which are permeated by a strong feeling for his North German homeland, include Immensee (1850), in which the romantic melancholy of Storm’s early period may be seen; Aquis Submersus (Sunken in the Water, 1876) which, like Immensee, is a story of lost love, but is more realistic; and Der Schimmelreiter (The White-Horse Rider, 1888), a strongly realistic and deeply symbolic story about the man responsible for the dikes upon which his community’s safety depends.

Story of a Bad Boy, The (1870). A semi-autobiographical novel by Thomas Bailey Aldrich. The hero, Tom Bailey, is not really bad; he is, as the author explains, "a real human boy." The book tells of Tom's youth in New Hampshire, and his early years in New Orleans with distant relatives. In Rivermouth, Tom gets into all kinds of mischief. This popular book was a forerunner of Mark Twain's The Adventures of Tom Sawyer (1876).

Lyndall grows into a woman of great beauty and power, but her life is unhappy. She separates Em from her lover, has a child by a man whom she refuses to marry, and soon afterward dies. Waldo, who has always loved her, outlives her only a short while.

Stout, Rex [Todhunter] (1886-1970). American detective-story writer. Stout is famous as the creator of Nero Wolfe, the adipose detective and orchid-fancier who solves all his cases at home and employs the likable Archie Goodwin to do his leg work. Wolfe first appeared in Fer-de-Lance (1934); he and Archie have solved many later cases, including Some Buried Caesar (1939), Three Doors to Death (1950), and Before Midnight (1955).

Stow, John (1525-1605). English historian and playwright. He published The Wooker of Geoffrey Chaucer (1551); Summary of English Chronicles (1565); and A Survey of London (1598, 1603), the most informative and reliable work on old London.

Stowe, Harriet Beecher (1811-1896). American novelist. Mrs. Stowe had two major interests: writing and religion. She was a prominent Congregationalist clergyman, Lyman Beecher, and the wife of another, Calvin Stowe, she was both attracted and repelled by orthodox doctrine. Although she finally became an Episcopalian, at several periods during her difficult life she turned to different kinds of spiritualism.

She was born in Connecticut, but her father moved the family to Cincinnati, where Harriet was married in 1836. She and her husband returned to New England, where she was visited, in 1848, by the vision that inspired Uncle Tom's Cabin. The book brought her immediate fame and fortune; the following year, she and her husband traveled abroad and were well received. During Mrs. Stowe's stay in England, she vigorously championed the cause of Lady Byron in a series of articles and books.

After the publication of articles and a sequel to Uncle Tom's Cabin, she based a number of books on her husband's childhood reminiscences of rural New England. These books, including The Pearl of Orr's Island, Old-Town Folks, and Poganuc People (1878), are among the first examples of local color writing in New England. The other important book by Mrs. Stowe is The Minister's Wooing, in which local color is mixed with a religious theme.

Strabo (c. 58 B.C.-c. A.D. 24). Greek geographer. Born in Pontus, he traveled widely through the Roman world and wrote a description of it in 17 books, The Geography (Geographia), nearly all of which are extant. His history of Rome in 47 books, beginning where Polybius' history ended, is lost.

Strachey, [Giles] Lytton (1880-1932). English biographer and historian. A member of the Bloomsbury group, he revolutionized the art of biography by writing humanized criticism, not panegyric, especially about the Victorians. His urbanity, irony, and witty malice are seen best in his most famous work, Queen Victoria (1921). He also wrote Landmarks in French Literature (1912), Eminent Victorians (1918), Books and Characters (1922), and Elizabeth and Essex (1928).

Stradivarius. See CREMONA.

Strait Is the Gate (La Porte étroite; 1909). A tale by André Gide. Jerome woos his cousin Alissa, but, although she accepts and returns his spiritual love, she will not marry him. Alissa says that she prefers to please God by sacrificing her own worldly happiness to that of her sister, but she is fearful, too, of passion. When the sister no longer needs her sacrifice, Alissa fears that God does not think her capable of such holy selflessness and says she must continue to renounce her own happiness—and Jerome's for him—in order to prove her sincerity. She dies without even coming close to the mystic joy she sought.

strambotto. Italian folk lyric popular during the Middle Ages and the Renaissance with both rustic and aristocratic poets. Of uncertain etymology, the word may reflect an original link with folk dance. Its subject is love, treated either seriously or light-heartedly; its form consists of a stanza of eight 11-syllable lines rhyming a b a b a b b or a b b a b b c c (as in ottava rima). The former scheme was preferred among the Sicilian poets of the 13th century, the latter by the Tuscan writers of the Renaissance, who also called the form a rispetto, perhaps because the poet pays his respect to the lady in these poems. In addition to single stanzas, there were also chains, or longer poems, made up of strambotti or rispetti. It differed from the ottava rima stanza mainly in content, the latter being regularly used for long narrative poems rather than single lyrics. But some rispetti also varied in rhyme schemes to a b a b c e d d.

Among the better known writers who used the form were Poliziano and Lorenzo de' Medici.

Strange Case of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde, The (1886). A novel by Robert L. Stevenson, the disturbing tale of the dual personality of Dr. Jekyll, a physician. A generous and philanthropic man, he is preoccupied with the problems of good and evil and with the possibility of separating them into distinct personalities. He develops a drug that transforms him into the demonic Mr. Hyde, in whose person he exhausts all the latent evil in his nature. He also creates an antidote that will restore him to his respectable existence as Dr. Jekyll. Gradually, however, the unmitigated evil of his darker self predominates until finally he performs an atrocious murder. His saner self determines to curtail these alternatives of personality, but he discovers that he is losing control over his transformations, that he slips with increasing frequency into the world of evil. Finally, unable to procure one of the ingredients for the mixture of redemption, and on the verge of being discovered, he commits suicide.

The novel is of great psychological perception and strongly concerned with ethical problems.

Strange Interlude (1928). A play in nine acts, performed in two parts, by Eugene O'Neill. The plot concerns the emotional and especially the sexual reactions of Nina Leeds, who subconsciously hates her father; she holds him responsible for preventing her from sleeping with her fiancé before he was killed in France. She becomes a nurse and marries good-natured Sam Evans, but when she learns she is about to have a child she resorts to abortion, ostensibly because of a strain of insanity in his family. However, she has an affair with Dr. Darrell, becomes pregnant, and pretends their child is Evans'. When Evans dies, Nina marries a childhood admirer who remains her lover. The play caused a sensation by its use of a stream-of-consciousness technique. The characters speak in asides to reveal their true thoughts, in contrast to their conversation. The play was successfully revived in 1963.

Stranger, The (L'Etranger; 1942). A novel by Albert Camus. It reveals the absurd as the condition of man, who feels himself a stranger in his world. Meursault refuses to "play the game," by telling the conventional social white lies demanded of him or by believing in human love or religious faith. The unemotional style of his narrative lays naked his motives—or his absence of motive—for his lack of grief over his mother's death, his affair with Marie, his killing an Arab in the hot Algerian sun. Having rejected by honest self-analysis all interpretations which could explain or justify his existence, he nevertheless discovers, while in prison awaiting execution, a passion for the simple fact of life itself.

Strangers and Brothers. A series of novels by C. P. Snow, started in 1940. The hero and narrator of the series is Lewis Eliot, a lawyer and government administrator. Time of Hope (1949) describes his childhood, education, and unhappy first marriage; Homecomings (1956) describes his successful later life and second marriage. The Masters and The Affair are set in a Cambridge college. Strangers and Brothers (1940), The Light and the Dark (1947), The New Men, and The Conscience of the Rich (1958) describe crises in the lives of his friends, in science and government. All the novels are about struggles for power and conflicts between private conscience and the public politics of power.

Strap, Hugh. In Tobias Smollett's novel Ron
erick Random, an ineffable Sancho Panza type whose fidelity and generosity is treated with disdain by Roderick.

Straparola, Giovan Francesco (c. 1480-1557). Italian writer. A native of Lombardy, he is the author of two books of novelle, Le piacevoli notte (The Pleasureful Nights, 1550-1553). Of the 75 novelle, some 20 are folk tales, marking the first appearance in European literature of a large group of such stories. Included among these folk tales are such favorites as Beauty and the Beast, Puss in Boots, and The Singing Apple.

Strasser, Gregor (1892-1934). German Nazi. His opposition to Hitler's policies led to his execution in a political purge. He was the brother of Otto Strasser.

Strasser, Otto (1897- ). German political leader. The brother of Gregor Strasser, he was expelled from the Nazi Party in 1930 because of his socialist views. In 1933 he left Germany to conduct a program of opposition to Hitler.

Stratemeyer, Edward. See Rover Boys; Tom Swift.

Strato. In Shakespeare's Julius Caesar, a faithful servant of Brutus. He holds the sword of Brutus as the latter runs upon it to kill himself.

Straus, Oskar (1870-1954). Austrian operetta composer, best known for Der Tapiere Soldat (1908; The Chocolate Soldier, based on Arms and the Man, by George Bernard Shaw).

Strauss, David Friedrich (1808-1874). German theologian. In Leben Jesu (Life of Jesus, 1835) he attributed a secular, mythical origin to the miraculous narrative of the gospels. See Ludwig Feuerbach.

Strauss, Johann (1825-1899). Austrian composer and conductor, known as "The Waltz King." He succeeded to the conducting post of his father, Johann Strauss (1804-1849), also a well-known composer. Many of the younger Strauss's waltzes are still famous—among them the Blue Danube, Artists' Life, Tales of the Vienna Woods. His opera Der Feldermaus (The Bat; 1874) is as much in the public favor as ever.

Strauss, Richard (1864-1949). German composer and conductor. He extended the musical ideas of Richard Wagner and Franz Liszt to their limits in tone poems, such as Don Juan (1889), Till Eulenspiegels Lustige Streichen (1885), and Don Quixote (1898), and in his three greatest operas, Salome (1905; based on Oscar Wilde's play), Elektra (1909; libretto by Hugo von Hofmannsthal), and Der Rosenkavalier (1911; libretto also by Hofmannsthal).

Stravinsky, Igor [Feodorovitch] (1882- ). Russian-born composer. His creative output has spanned and deeply affected the entire development of modern music, from impressionism to neoclassicism and from tonality to polytonality and atonality. His first significant works, commissioned by Sergei Diaghilev's Russian Ballet, were L'Oiseau de Feu (1910; The Firebird), Petrouchka (1911), and Le Sacre du Printemps (1913; Rite of Spring). The latter so startled its first audience that it provoked a riot. Later works seem restrained by comparison: Histoire du Soldat (1918; a pantomime, with narrator and instruments); Oedipus Rex (1927; an “operatoratorio” using the Jean Cocteau version of Sophocles’ play in a Latin translation in order to dissociate the text’s sound from its meaning); Symphony of Psalms (1930); Symphony in C (1940); The Rake’s Progress, an opera to a libretto by W. H. Auden and Chester Kallman; Agon (1957; ballet). Stravinsky has attempted to explain his musical aesthetic in his autobiography, Chronicles of My Life (1936), and Poetics of Music (1948), a group of lectures.

Strawberry Hill. The estate of Horace Walpole at Twickenham, Surrey, England. It was here that he established his private printing press (1757–1789) in the house he converted into “a little Gothic castle.”

stream of consciousness. A narrative technique developed toward the end of the 19th century, often confused with interior monologue, and employed to evoke the psychic life of a character and depict subjective as well as objective reality. The term “stream of consciousness” was first used by William James in his Principles of Psychology (1890); the concept behind it—that ideas and consciousness in general are fluid and shifting, rather than fixed—contributed to a new approach to the novel. This approach was also given impetus by the new Freudian theories of the conscious and unconscious mind, and the Bergsonian concept of time as duration and of consciousness as an indivisible flux. As a literary term, “stream of consciousness” generally refers to the presentation of a character’s thoughts, feelings, reactions, etc., on an approximated preverbal level and with little or no direct comment or explanation by the author. It is frequently difficult to distinguish absolutely between stream of consciousness and interior monologue, and the terms are sometimes used as if they were interchangeable. In general, the term “stream of consciousness” is used as the description of mental life at the borderline of conscious thought, and is characterized by the devices of association, recombination of word- or symbol-motifs, apparent incoherence, and the reduction or elimination of normal syntax and punctuation to simulate the free flow of the character’s mental processes. “Interior monologue” refers to a presentation of thoughts more consciously controlled and on a level closer to direct verbalization. The French writer Édouard Dujardin claims to have been the first to use the interior monologue in his Les Lauriers sont coupés (1887, trans. as We’ll to the Woods No More). Another innovator was the English writer Dorothy Richardson, who recorded the psychic experience of one character in her 12-volume Pilgrimage. James Joyce brought the stream-of-consciousness approach to its highest form in Ulysses and Finnegans Wake. In America, William Faulkner’s The Sound and the Fury is often given as a leading example of stream-of-consciousness writing, though only the first two sections of the book can be described as such; the third section, however, provides a good example of an interior monologue according to the differentiation made above. In England, Virginia Woolf adapted the stream-of-consciousness technique to slightly different uses in To the Lighthouse, Mrs. Dalloway, and The Waves. It is no longer the “experimental” form it was once considered, and aspects of stream-of-consciousness techniques are evident in the work of most of the important writers to appear since the 1930s.

Streetcar Named Desire, A (1947). A play by Tennessee Williams. The winner of a Pulitzer Prize, it is set in the French Quarter of New Orleans where two streetcars named Desire and Cemetery run on a single track. It is the story of Blanche DuBois, a faded Southern belle, who comes to live with her sister, Stella, and the sister’s husband Stanley. Announced at her pretensions to gentility and her flirtatious behavior, Stanley eventually warns a friend who had thought of marrying Blanche. With her hopes of marriage destroyed, Blanche confronts Stanley and provokes him into raping her. Finally, with her illusions still strong, she is taken away to a mental institution.

Street Scene (1929). A play by Elmer Rice. The play, using a naturalistic setting, presents life in a slum tenement and reaches its climax in a double murder. One of the first stage productions to include realistic sound effects throughout the performance, it was the winner of a Pulitzer Prize. Later it was given a musical score by Kurt Weill (1947).

Streicher, Julius (1885–1946). German Nazi journalist and political leader. He was editor of Der Stürmer (The Stormer, 1923–1945), a fanatical anti-Semitic periodical, and was sentenced to death at the Nuremberg Trials.

Strenia. The goddess who presided over the New Year festivities in ancient Rome. Tautius, the legendary Sabine king, entered Rome on New Year’s Day, and received from some augurs palms cut from the sacred grove dedicated to Strenia. After his seizure of the city, he ordained that January 1 should be celebrated by gifts to be called strenae, consisting of figs, dates, and honey. The French word évennne, “a New Year’s gift,” is derived from the name of this goddess.

Strephon. The shepherd in Sir Philip Sidney’s Arcadia who makes love to the beautiful Urania. It is a stock name for a pastoral lover, while the name Chloe is frequently given to a Strephon’s beloved.

Strether, Lambert. See Ambassadors, The.

stricken deer. A term applied to William Cowper by himself and often used as an epitaph for the poet. It occurs in Book III of his poem The Task (1785). The reference is to Cowper’s attacks of insanity and his morbid religious obsession of guilt. It is also the title of a biography of Cowper by Lord David Cecil.

Strickland, Agnes (1796–1874). English historian. She is known chiefly for her Lives of the Queens of England (12 vols., 1840–1848), written in collaboration with her sister Elizabeth Strickland (1794–1875), and for her Lives of the Queens of Scotland and English Princesses (8 vols., 1850–1859). She also edited Letters of Mary Queen of Scots (1843) and wrote several novels.

serving woman and a bankrupted ex-gentleman, Strindberg knew poverty and misery from childhood. Later, he was variously employed as a journalist, a tutor, and an assistant at the Royal Library. His first significant play was Master Olaf (written in 1874 in prose, rewritten in verse in 1878, and first performed in the original version in 1881). It was followed by Lucky Per's Travels (1880), reminiscent of Ibsen's Peer Gynt; and Sir Bengt's Wife (1882), an answer to Ibsen's A Doll's House which Strindberg hated. In 1879, Strindberg first became the subject of literary excitement with his satirical novel The Red Room, which many critics consider the first example of modern Swedish realism. With the publication of the stories in Married (1884–1886) his fame became unpleasant notoriety, for these satirical, bitter narratives involved their author in a prosecution for blasphemy. He was acquitted, but the experience contributed to his feelings of persecution that culminated in his breakdown of 1896.

Strindberg embarked on the first of his unfortunate marriages in 1877. His relations with his wife, the former Siri Wrangel, probably formed the basis for the conflicts in the major plays of his realistic-naturalistic period: The Father, Comrades (1888), and The Creditors (1890). These three works are centered on the duel between the sexes: the woman, ruthless and aggressive, asserts herself as the equal—if not the superior—of the man, usurps his masculine prerogatives of decision and leadership, and destroys him. Not until many years later, in the powerful Dance of Death, did Strindberg write of a husband who enslaves and torments his wife. In Miss Julie, probably the best-known of the plays of this period, Strindberg depicts both sexual antagonism and class conflict in the figure of the aristocratic girl who seduces her father's footman.

In 1891 Strindberg's first marriage ended in a painful divorce. He married again in 1893, but this union lasted only a few years. He was beginning to show increased evidence of emotional disturbance, and his feelings of persecution were intensified by his difficulties in getting his plays produced; he had been forced to establish his own Experimental Theater in Copenhagen to have Miss Julie and The Creditors performed. He became interested in the physical sciences, but his experiments in chemistry were soon transformed into delusions into alchemy, occultism, and mysticism. In July of 1896 he suffered a psychological crisis which brought him to the edge of madness, an experience which he recorded in the autobiographical Inferno (1897) and Legends (1898), and expressed dramatically in the mystical and symbolic plays To Damascus (Parts I and II, 1898; Part III, 1904), Advent (1899), and There are Crimes and Crimes (1899). This period of crisis marks the beginning of what is perhaps the most interesting phase of his creative life; in order to give dramatic form to his new vision of life—a vision in which the inner world has as much, if not more, claim to reality than external experience—he wrote the haunting, surrealistic "dream-plays" that became the forerunners of modern expressionism. Gentler and less bitter than the plays of his realistic period, these dramas have a scope that ranges from the mystic surrealism of A Dream Play (1902) to the nearly naturalistic but tenderly mystical Easter (1901). As his emotional health improved he turned again to Swedish history and wrote a series of dramas probably inspired by the historical plays of Shakespeare. Among them are The Saga of the Volsungs, Gustavus Vasa (a continuation of the story of the Vasa dynasty begun in Master Olaf), Erik XIV, and Gustavus Adolphus. In 1907 he and August Falck established the Intimate Theater in Stockholm, for which Strindberg wrote a series of four "Chamber Plays"; of these, only The Spook Sonata (1907) achieved marked success.

Strindberg's collected writings—plays, fairy tales, poems, short stories, prose sketches, essays, autobiographical writings, novels—amount to 55 volumes. Particularly interesting are his autobiographical works, including The Son of a Servant (1886), A Fool's Defense (1893), and Alone (1903).

Strong, George Templeton (1820–1875). American lawyer, businessman, trustee of Columbia University, and memoirist. Strong, a prominent New Yorker, is famous for the Diary that he kept for 40 years, starting on Oct. 5, 1835. Filled with frank comment about the notable men and events of his time, it is an extremely valuable document; in 1952, Allan Nevins made a selection from the 5 million words, and published four volumes.

Strophe. From the Greek, literally a turn. Originally, that part of an ode which was sung by the Greek dramatic chorus as it moved in one direction, followed by an antistrophe when the chorus reversed the direction of its movement. Hence, in prosody, a stanza.

Struther, Jan. Pen name of Joyce Anstruther (1901–1953). English poet and novelist. Her best known book is Mrs. Miniver.

Strutt, Lord. A verbal caricature of the king of Spain, originally Charles II (who died without issue), which can also be applied to his successor Philippe, duc d'Anson. Bearing the full name of Philip Lord Strutt, he appears in John Arbuthnot's political and allegorical satire The History of John Bull.

Stryver, Bully. In Charles Dickens's A Tale of Two Cities, a loud, aggressive lawyer, attorney for the defense in Darnay's trial at Old Bailey. The brilliant but dissipated Sydney Carton is his clerk and writes all the cases that Stryver pleads in court.

Stuart, Jesse [Hilton] (1907— ). American poet, novelist, and short-story writer. He is known for his regional works dealing with the mountain region of Kentucky and its people. He won his early reputation with his short stories, collected first in Head o' W-Hollow (1936) and later in Men of the Mountain (1941) and other volumes. His first novel, Trees of Heaven (1940), describes a disagreement between two mountain men. Taps for Private Tunnis (1943) presents an amusing and unfavorable account of Kentucky life. Other novels include Hie to the Hunter (1950) and The Good Spirit of Laurel Ridge (1953). Stuart has also published several volumes of verse, including Man with a Bull-Tongue Plow (1934), and The Thread That Runs So True (1949), an account of his experiences as a school teacher.

Stuart, Mary. See MARY, QUEEN OF SCOTS.

Stuckenberg, Viggo (1863–1905). Danish poet. With his friends Clausen and Jørgensen, Stuckenberg initiated the neoromantic movement in Denmark. His poem Den Vilde Joeger (The Wild Huntsman, 1894), mystical and medieval in its mood, marked a departure from the realistic school and its social concerns. Gentle melancholy, wistful tenderness, and a love for nature characterize his verse. Among Stuckenberg's collections of poetry are Flyvende Sommer (1898), Aarsens Tid (1905), and Sidste Dige (1906).

Studs Lonigan (1935). A trilogy by James T. Farrell, consisting of Young Lonigan, The Young Manhood of Studs Lonigan, and Judgment Day. In relentlessly naturalistic style it presents the boyhood, adolescence, early manhood, and finally the death of William (Studs) Lonigan, the son of lower-middle-class Irish Catholic parents in Chicago. Although Studs as a boy displays sparks of vigor and ambition, the combined influences of his social and economic environment, his swaggering and vicious associates, and his narrow family, educational, and religious background serve to aggravate his weaknesses and lead him into a life of futile dissipation, which he recognizes as unsatisfactory, but from which he is unable to escape. The language of the streets, the monotony and crudity of the thought processes of Studs and his associates, and their sordid sexual adventures are all frankly and faithfully reproduced, and there is extensive documentation in the depiction of the social background in the U.S. during the period between 1912 and the early 1930's. Young Lonigan (1932) introduces Studs as a boy of 15 graduating from a Roman Catholic grammar school and starting out on the typical career of his class and time. He dreams of becoming a "great guy" and takes care to conform to the pattern of conduct set for him by his associates. Notable events are his initiation into the mysteries of sex (in which he is assisted by Iris, a promiscuous adolescent girl of the neighborhood) and his first sentimental attachment, of which Lucy Scanlan is the object.

In The Young Manhood of Studs Lonigan (1934), the career of Studs is carried through the period of the 1920's, during which he works as a house painter with his father and participates in the dissipation of the time. The culmination of the novel is a wild New Year's Eve party at which a girl named Irene is raped by Weary Reilley, one of Studs's companions.

Judgment Day (1935) records Studs's declining health, futile dissipation, love affair with Catherine Banahan, fruitless search for a job, and ultimate death from pneumonia. The climax of the novel is a dramatic death scene against the background of family lamentations and quarrels and of Roman Catholic prayers for the dead.

Sturm und Drang (storm and stress). A literary movement in late 18th-century Germany leading toward romanticism. The Sturm und Drang, which takes its name from the title of a play by Maximilian Klinger, was especially rich in drama and lyric poetry. Its other major figures were young Goethe, young Schiller, Reinhold Lenz, Heinrich Wagner, and Gottfried Bürger. In thought, the Sturm und Drang was strongly influenced by Edward Young, Rousseau, and Hamann. In its literary productions, emphasis was usually placed upon the energetic, daemonic, Prometheus-like quality of the individual in opposition to the rationalistic ideal of the enlightenment and the formalism of French-influenced neoclassicism. The representatives of the Sturm und Drang admired Shakespeare and Ossian especially, and the effect of Herder's writings upon them can be seen in their frequent interest in folk material and the German past. They were not, however, so decidedly patriotic as the poets of the Göttinger Hain. Peripheral figures in the movement include Jacobi and Heine.

Stulty, Will. In the English Robin Hood ballad cycle, one of Robin Hood's followers. He was about to be hanged by the sheriff when Robin Hood and his men arrived and saved him at the very last minute.

Stuyvesant, Peter (1592–1672). Dutch director-general of New Netherland (1647–1664) until forced to surrender the colony to England. Pioneering in appearance, a harsh ruler, he appears in Washington Irving's A History of New York (1809) as "Peter, the Headstrong." According to legend, his false leg was made of silver. His farm, Bouwerij (literally, "farm"), included the region of the Bowery in New York City.

stylites or pillar saints (Gr., stylos, pillar). A class of early and medieval ascetics, chiefly of Syria, who lived on top of pillars, from which they never descended. The most celebrated were Simeon Stylites, of Syria, and Daniel the Stylite of Constanti- nople. Simeon (d. 596) spent 86 years on different pillars, each loftier and narrower than the preceding, the last being 66 feet high. Daniel (d. 494) lived for 33 years on a pillar, and was not infrequently nearly blown from it by the storms from Thrace.

Tennyson wrote a poem, St. Simeon Stylites (1842). Paphnutius in Anatole France's Thaïs becomes a stiltie for a time.

Stymphalus (Stymphalos). In Greek mythology, an Arcadian king. He was treacherously murdered by Peleus. The crime caused a famine throughout Greece, which was finally ended by the prayers of the virtuous Aesculapius.

Styron, William [Clark, Jr.] (1925– ). American novelist. A Southerner, Styron shows the influence of Faulkner and Thomas Wolfe. His first novel, Lie Down in Darkness (1951), was highly praised. It concerns an alcoholic father and his daughter, a suicide in her early 20’s. Set This House on Fire (1960), which takes place largely in Italy, was regarded by many critics as less powerful than the earlier book. Styron also wrote The Long March (1957), which appeared in discovery.

Styx. A river. According to classical mythology, it flowed seven times round the infernal regions. The five rivers of Hell are the Styx, Acheron, Cocytus, Phlegethon, and Lethe. Styx is also the deity of the river, a daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, and mother of Zelus (Zeal), Nike (Victory), Bia (Strength), and Kratos (Power).

Dante, in his Divine Comedy, places the rivers in different circles of the Inferno. Thus, he makes the Acheron divide the borderland from Limbo. The former realm is for the “praiseless and the blameless dead”; Limbo is for the unbaptized. He places the Stygian Lake of inkly hue in the fifth circle, the realm of those who put no restraint on their anger. The fire-stream of Phlegethon he fixes to the eighth steep, the Hell of burning, where it snows flakes of fire, and where blasphemers are confined. He places the frozen river of Cocytus in the tenth pit of Malebolge, a region of thick-ribbed ice, the lowest depth of the Pit, where Judas and Lucifer are imprisoned. Lethe, he says, is no river of Hell at all, but it is the one wish of all the infernals to get to it, that they may drink its water and forget their torments. It being, however, in Purgatory, they can never reach it.

Sublime Porte. The central office of the former Ottoman government in Constantinople; hence, the government or the Turkish empire itself. The term is French in origin, derived from the gate (porte) of the Sultan's palace where justice in ancient times was administered.

Sub rosa (Lat., “under the rose”). In strict confidence. The origin of the phrase is wrapped in obscurity, but the story is that Cupid gave a rose to Harpocrates, the god of silence, to bribe him not to betray the amours of Venus. Hence the flower became the emblem of silence. In 1526 it was placed over confessionals.

Subtle. A character in Ben Jonson's comedy The Alchemist (1610). An artful quack, Subtle is an “alchemist” who pretends to be on the eve of discovering the Philosopher's stone. Sir Epicure Mammon, a rich knight, is his principal dupe, but by no means his only one.

Suckert, Curzio Malaparte. See Curzio Malaparte.

Suckist, Lord. An anglicism for Seigneur de Humevesne, defendant in the lawsuit instituted by Lord Kissbreech in Rabelais' Gargantua and Pantagruel. The trial having become hopelessly involved, the court calls in Pantagruel as judge. He insists that all the papers, which serve only to confuse the case, be burned and that the two parties present their arguments in person. Since the court still fails to understand the case, Pantagruel gives a garbled decision which has the unheard-of result of pleasing both parties.

Suckling, Sir John (1609–1642). English poet, courtier, and soldier. Suckling was known in his day for his wit, gaiety, extravagance, and love of gaming. He was implicated in the plot to rescue the earl of Strafford from the Tower of London in 1641 and died a fugitive in France, possibly a suicide, possibly the victim of a vengeful servant.

One of the Cavalier poets, Suckling was, however, influenced in some superficial effects by Donne. His poetry has the kind of ease, knowledgability, and unaffected simplicity of diction that has traditionally formed, in England, the ideal of gentlemanly speech. In his poems he could play both the ardent lover and skeptic—although the latter pose gave more scope for the wit which distinguishes lyrics like the song “Why so pale and wan, fond lover?” from his play Ambrosia (1637). Other works by Suckling include Session of the Poets (1637), a poem containing descriptions of Ben Jonson, Thomas Carew, and other contemporary writers, and Brennoral, or The Discontented Colonel (1639), a play.

Suckow, Ruth (1892–1960). American novelist and short-story writer. Born in Iowa, she is known for her studies, generally realistic, of life in the Middle West. Her best-known work is Country People (1924), her first novel, which told the story of three generations of German-Americans. The Bonney Family (1928) and New Hope (1942) are both about ministers. Young women often occupied her attention, as in The Odyssey of a Nice Girl (1925) and The Kramer Girls (1930).

Sucre, Antonio José de (1795–1830). Venezuelan general and patriot. Considered one of the most high-minded of Hispanic America's revolutionary heroes, Sucre was the chief lieutenant and friend of Simón Bolívar. In 1822, Sucre's victory at Pichincha drove the Spaniards from Ecuador. In Peru he commanded the revolutionary army that defeated the Spaniards at Ayacucho, virtually ending the wars for independence. He fathered the creation of an independent Bolivia and reluctantly became its first president in 1826, only to resign in 1828. He was returning to his home in Quito after an unsuccessful attempt to keep Venezuela in Gran Colombia when he was mysteriously murdered near Pasto, Colombia.

Sudermann, Hermann (1857–1928). German playwright and novelist. In his plays, which include Die Ehre (Honor), 1888, Sodom's End (Sodom's Ende, 1890) and Die Heimkehr (The Return, 1891), Sudermann, using a technique called Magen, he exercised the search for social criticism, which caused him to be associated by critics with the movement of naturalism. His dramatic technique, however, is far from naturalistic; his plots are contrived and he makes frequent use of monologues and asides. His novels include Frau Sorge (Dame Care, 1888), Der Katzensteg (The Narrow Path, 1889), and Das hohe Lied (Song of Songs, 1908), all of which, like his plays, deal with social questions.

Sue, Eugène. Real name Marie Joseph Sue (1804-1857). French novelist. A ship's doctor, he found the material for such sea stories as Flûk et Plok (1831), and La Vigue de Koaoten (1833) among his own adventures. Best known for his popular and sensational romances in the manner of Dumas père, Sue had a prolific and highly successful career. Among his works are The MYSTERIES OF PARIS and Le Juif Errant (The Wandering Jew, 1844-1845).

Sueños, Los (1627). A series of prose satires by Francisco de Quevedo. Supposedly a description of the author's visits to Hell, they are notable for their incisive caricature of the men and institutions of contemporary society. Usually included in the series are El sueño de las calaveras, El alguacil alguacilado, Las sargarbas de Plutón, El sueño del mundo por de dentro, La visita de los chistes, El discurso de todos los diablos, and La hora de todos.

Suetonius. Full Latin name, Gaius Suetonius Tranquillus (A.D. 75?–1150). Roman biographer and historian. He was private secretary to the emperor Hadrian from about A.D. 119 to 121. The work for which he is principally remembered is De Vita Caesariurn (Lives of the Caesars), a detailed account of the life and times of the first 12 emperors from Caesar to Domitian. Suetonius is also the author of a work on literary history, De Viris Illustribus (Famous Men). Of this work we possess only the biographies of Terence and Horace, and a fragment on the life of Lucan.

Sufis. A Muslim sect of mystics, mentioned, for instance, by Omar Khayyâm. They are so named, from the Arabic word suf for wool, because they wore woolen garments to symbolize their renunciation of worldly comforts. Their ultimate goal is blissful union with the Supreme Being who may be reached by following the Law, the Way, and the Truth.

Suggs, Captain Simon. A raconteur character created by the American humorist Johnson Jones Hooper (1815-1862). Hooper's reputation as a humorist is founded chiefly on his account of Some Adventures of Captain Simon Suggs, Late of the Tallaiposa Volunteers (1846). It was Suggs' guiding principle "to be shifty in a new country." The rowdy tales ridiculed many folkways of the South. Hooper wrote several other books, and became secretary of the Provisional Congress of the Southern States when the Civil War broke out. In his Flush Times of Alabama and Mississipii (1853), J. G. Baldwin, another Southern humorist, introduced a character named Simon Suggs, Jr., Esq., "a good trader and the mean boy of the school."

Sui. Chinese dynasty (590–618). Founded by Yang Chien (541–605), a vast canal system was established and the country reunited after a period of disunity following the Han, setting the stage for the Tang Dynasty which followed.

Sukhovo-Kobylin, Aleksandr Vasilievich (1817–1903). Russian dramatist. He is known for his trilogy: Krechinski's Wedding (1859), The Affair (1869), and The Death of Tarelkin (1869).

Suleiman I. Known as the Magnificent (1467–1566). A famous Turkish ruler. He encouraged the arts and sciences.

Sulla, Lucius Cornelius. Surnamed Felix (138–78 B.C.). Roman general, dictator, and reformer. He took part in various campaigns and was elected consul (88 B.C.). During the civil struggle between Sulla and Marius (88–82), Sulla led for the first time an army of Romans against Rome (88). In 81 he was appointed dictator. He reorganized the senate and the judiciary of Rome and was the first in Roman history to use the weapon of proscription.

Sullivan, Sir Arthur [Seymour] (1842–1900). English composer, best known for his collaboration with W. S. Gilbert on the Gilbert and Sullivan operas. He was also an accomplished organist and composer of sacred music and serious opera. His songs The Lost Chord and Onward, Christian Soldiers are widely known.

Sullivan, Frank [Francis John Sullivan] (1892–). American columnist and humorist. Long a columnist for the New York World, Sullivan is perhaps best known for his collection of clichés used in various professions, but he has used his light satiric wit in many fields. His later writings have often appeared in The New Yorker. His books include The Life and Times of Martha Hepplethwaite (1926), Innocent Bystanding (1928), Sullivan at Bay (1939), and Moose in the House (1959).

Sullivan, Louis (1856–1924). American architect. A pioneer in the use of steel frames for high buildings, he practiced his craft principally in Chicago. Among his achievements are the stone Auditorium building (1889) and the Carson, Pirie, and Scott store (1899-1904), both in Chicago. Sullivan's famous dictum, "Form follows function," influenced many architects, among them Frank Lloyd Wright.

Sully, duc de Maximilien de Béthune (1590-1614). French statesman. As finance minister under Henry IV, he reformed France's fiscal system by curtailing expenditures and correcting abuses. His Mémoires des ages et royales oeconomies d'estat, domestiques, politiques, et militaires de Henry le Grand, often referred to as the Economies Royales (Royal Economies, 1638) include a discussion of Henry's well-known though probably apocryphal plan to ensure permanent peace by means of a federation of European states. They are an invaluable historical source.

Sully, Thomas (1783-1872). English-born American painter. Sully established himself in Philadelphia. His fashionable portraits and less well-known historical scenes are noted for elegance and sensibility to color.

Sully Prudhomme. Pen name of René François Armand Prudhomme (1839-1907). French poet. His early work—Stances et Poèmes (1855), Les Solitudes (1869), and Les Vaines Tendresses (1875)—is lyrical and expresses a delicate melancholy. Later volumes, however, such as La Justice (1878) and Le Bonheur (1888), stress impersonality and objectivity—favoring techniques of the Parnassians. In 1901, Sully Prudhomme received the Nobel Prize for literature.

Sumarokov, Aleksandr Petrovich (1718-1777). Russian dramatist and writer. The founder of classical drama in Russia and an important reformer of the poetic language, Sumarokov wrote in almost every classical genre. Among his 10 tragedies is an adaptation of Hamlet. In reaction to the "high" style of solemn odes based on the theory and practice of Mikhail Lomonosov, Sumarokov insisted on greater naturalness in poetic language. He was instrumental in introducing what became the modern love lyric into Russian poetry. He is best known for two classical plays, Khorev (1747) and Zemir (1751).

Sumner. An ancient nation of Mesopotamia. It is the oldest civilization known in the Near East, but its origins are still a mystery. Its language is neither Semitic nor Indo-European. It dominated most of Mesopotamia during the fourth millennium before Christ. Excavations at Ur, Nippur, and other ancient cities have demonstrated that Sumner had a very rich culture. The Sumerian language continued as the hieratic language of Babylonia and Assyria for many centuries after the Sumerians themselves had disappeared and were forgotten. The very existence of Sumner was unknown until the relatively recent decipherment of ancient tablets bearing the cuneiform writing that was probably the invention of the Sumerians and the ancestor of Phoenician script. For much that has been learned of the Sumerian mythology, on which was based much of the mythology of Babylon and Assyria, see AN; Enki; Enlil; Ereshkigal; Inanna; Kur; Nanna; Nintu; Ziusudra.

Summa Theologica. Full title, Summa Totius Theologiae (c. 1265-1274). Major philosophical treatise by St. Thomas Aquinas. A "summary of all theology," it is still recognized as the doctrinal basis for all such teachings in the Roman Catholic Church. It applies the methodology of Aristotelian logic to problems of Christian doctrine, systematizing and quoting from the works of both classical and early Christian thinkers. Aquinas emphasizes the importance of logical argument in matters of reason, but the supremacy of revelation through scriptural and Church pronouncements in matters of faith. The work is in three sections: the first concerns the existence and nature of God and His universe; the second develops a moral philosophy, treating the virtues and vices from the practical viewpoint of society as well as from the theoretical aspect; the third discusses the role of Christ and the sacraments in the salvation of the soul. Aquinas died before he could finish the third section, but his follower Reginald of Piperno completed it later according to Aquinas' design.

Summers, Montague (1880-1948). English Catholic priest and scholar. He is known for his eccentric belief in witchcraft and his popular books on the subject, including The History of Witchcraft and Demonology (1927); he was a friend of Aleister Crowley. He was also an authority on Restoration drama.

Summerson, Esther. See Bleak House.

Summner's Tale, The. One of the Canterbury Tales of Geoffrey Chaucer. The Summoner, very angry at the Friar's Tale, retorts that all friars are consigned to the most repulsive spot in Hell. He then tells a scatological tale of the come-uppance given a particularly greedy and hypocritical friar. Thomas, sick in bed, grows increasingly angry at the friar's use of pious argument to get gold from him, ostensibly for the convent where prayers are being said for the recovery of the invalid. The friar now exhorts him against his ire, telling numerous stories demonstrating how evil anger is. Thomas finally pretends to offer the friar a precious gift if he promises to divide it equally among his fellow friars, instructing him to reach under the covers behind his back because the gift is hidden with him in bed. The friar eagerly complies, and Thomas coarsely revenges himself. The friar roges to the lord of the village about the insult offered his order. The lord and his family, however, simply ridicule him by holding a mock-scholarly discussion as to how the roar and odor of the offering can be equally divided, as stipulated, among the friar's colleagues.

Sumner, Charles (1811-1874). American statesman. After lecturing at Harvard Law School and spending several years in Europe, Sumner became active in Massachusetts politics and in various reform movements. In the U.S. Senate, where he served from 1851 until his death, he was an outstanding opponent of slavery. In 1856 he delivered a speech, later known as "The Crime Against Kansas," in which he denounced several proslavery senators, including Andrew Butler of South Carolina. A few days later, Butler's nephew, Rep. Preston Brooks, attacked Sumner in the Senate chamber, raining blows on him.
with his cane. As a result of his injuries, Sumner was not able to return to the Senate until 1859. During the Civil War he favored emancipation and later opposed the Reconstruction policy of President Johnson. In 1861 he was named chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, a post from which he was removed in 1872 after he made his "Naboth's Vineyard" speech against the proposed annexation of Santo Domingo.

William Graham (1840–1910). American economist and social scientist. A professor of political and social science at Yale, Sumner was a champion of laissez faire, opposing labor unions and government regulation of business. His most enduring work is probably his pioneering sociological treatise Folkways (1907), in which he stressed custom as the basis of social institutions.

sumō. Japanese wrestling. Wrestlers undergo long apprenticeships, starting when young, and are trained to gain strength, agility, and weight. The sport enjoys tremendous popularity, particularly since the introduction of television.

Sumter, Fort. A fort in the harbor of Charleston, S.C., and the site of the first military engagement of the U.S. Civil War. After the secession of South Carolina in December 1860, Major Robert Anderson, U.S. commander in Charleston harbor, withdrew his men to Fort Sumter. The administration then had to decide whether to evacuate the fort or to send reinforcements. Delaying a final decision, President Lincoln dispatched provisions. When state authorities demanded that Anderson surrender, he offered to surrender when his supplies ran out. The South Carolinians, who knew that provisions would soon arrive, rejected Anderson's offer, and shore batteries under Pierre G. T. Beauregard opened fire on April 12, 1861. Historians still disagree as to Lincoln's role in the events preceding the attack, some arguing that he deliberately maneuvered South Carolina into firing the first shot of the Civil War.

sun. The source of light and heat, and consequently of life, to the whole world. Hence it is regarded as a deity and worshiped as such by all primitive peoples. It has a leading place in all mythologies. Shamash was the principal sun god of the Assyrians, Merodach of the Chaldees, Ormuzd of the Persians, Ra of the Egyptians, Tezcatlipoca of the Mexicans, and Helios (known to the Romans as Sol) of the Greeks. Helios drove his chariot daily across the heavens, rising from the sea at dawn and sinking into it in the west at sunset. The Scandinavian sun god Sunna, who was in constant dread of being devoured by the wolf Fenris (a symbol of eclipses), was similarly borne through the sky. In later times Apollo was also a sun god of the Greeks, but he was the personification not of the sun itself but of its all-pervading light and life-giving qualities.

Sun Also Rises, The (1926). A novel by Ernest Hemingway. Considered by many critics to be his finest long work, it deals with "the lost generation" of Americans who had fought in France during World War I and then had expatriated themselves from the America of Calvin Coolidge. The story is told by Jake Barnes, rendered impotent from a war wound. Lady Brett Ashley, who is divorcing her husband, is in love with him. These two go to Spain with a group that includes Michael Campbell, whom Brett plans to marry; Bill Gorton, a friend of Jake; a Greek nobleman; and Robert Cohn, an American–Jewish writer. Brett has an affair with Romero, a bullfighter whom the others respect for his grace and control in the face of danger; she eventually leaves him and returns to Michael. The fact that at the end nothing has really changed in life for any of the characters is exactly the point of the novel: for these disillusioned people, life can have no direction, no point toward which to develop.

Sunday Morning (1923). A poem by Wallace Stevens. The narrator debates with a woman who feels "the need of some imperishable bliss." The lady must learn that "Death is the mother of beauty," that there is no transcendence, and that the earth is "all of paradise that we shall know."

Sung. Chinese dynasty (960–1279). Following the T'ang, this era saw the gradual disunion and partition of the empire. It was a period of great cultural ferment in which Ch' an established itself as the principal Buddhist sect and the Neo-Confucianism of Chu Hsi established Confucianism as the dominant political and ethical force.

Sunken Bell, The (Die versunkene Glocke; 1896). A verse-play by Gerhart Hauptmann. A bell-maker, Heinrich, loses his masterpiece when it falls into a lake. He himself, wandering around in the woods, meets and falls in love with the female elf Rautendelein, and decides to remain with her. His deserted wife Magda, however, throws herself into the lake and rings the bell to remind him of his guilt. Heinrich goes home, but finds Magda gone; he returns to the mountains, but finds Rautendelein married to the Frog King; and finally, he drinks the goblet of death.

Sunna (Arabic, "custom, divine law"). The sayings and example of Muhammad and his immediate followers insofar as they conform to the Koran; hence, applied to the collections of legal and moral traditions attributed to the Prophet, supplementary to the Koran, as the Hebrew Mishna is to the Penta-teuch.

Sunites. The orthodox and conservative body of Muslims who consider the Sunna as authentic as the Koran itself and acknowledge the first four caliphs as the rightful successors of Muhammad. They form the largest section of Muslims and are divided into four sects: Hanafites, Hanbalites, Malikites, and Shafites. See SHIITES.

Sun Yat-sen (1866–1925). Chinese statesman, called in China the "father of the Revolution." He founded the KUOMINTANG. He helped to bring about the revolution against the Manchus (1911), and was elected provisional president of the Chinese Republic. He retired in favor of Yuan Shih-kai, who became president of all China, but soon broke with Yuan over policy. Sun later headed a southern regime at Canton. Under the influence of the communist doctrines of Mikhail Borodin, he opposed General Tsao Kun (1924) and gained more influence in the north. He died of cancer. A large mausoleum was built in his honor at Nanking.

superfluous man. A term used to describe a specific type of protagonist in 19th-century Russian literature. Such a man is exemplified by Pushkin's Eugene Onegin, Lermontov's Pechorin, Goncharov's Oblomov, and Turgenev's Rudin. Characteristics of the type were an inability to act decisively in personal or social matters, and a lack of contact or involvement with the life of the society in which he lived.
The condition was usually brought about by a combination of the character's private inadequacies or maladjustments and the deadening effect of a restrictive political and social regime. The radical critics of the 19th century proposed replacing the socially useless superfluous man with an exemplary positive hero. This task was finally accomplished by decrees after the Soviet regime was in power.

Superman. See ÜBERMENSCH.

French poet, dramatist, fiction writer, who often describes the South American scene. His collections of poetry are: Débarcadères (1922), Poèmes de la France malheureuse (1941), and The Shell and the Ear (1951). The Colonel's Children (Le Voleur d'enfants; 1926), Bolivar (1936), and Robinson (1948) are plays. The Survivor (1928) and Along the Road to Bethleham (1933) are both novels.

Suppliant, The. See SUPPLIANT WOMEN, THE.

Suppliant Women, The (Hiketides; c. 490 B.C.).
The earliest surviving play by Aeschylus, and the first play of a trilogy. It concerns the flight of Danaus and his 50 daughters from Aegyptus, his brother, who has usurped the throne of Egypt. They plead for protection from the people of Argos, where their ancestors Io was born. King Pelasgus grants their request and defies the herald of Aegyptus, who arvives with his 50 sons to demand that the maidens marry them. The play is the first of a trilogy that told the myth of the murder on their wedding night of all but one of the young men by their Danaid brides. The other two plays are lost.

Suppliant Women, The (Hiketides; 421 B.C.).
A drama by Euripides recounting the successful plea of the mothers of the Seven Against Thebes that Theseus, king of Athens, bury the bodies of their sons.

Surrealism. A literary, artistic, and philosopphical movement, founded in 1924. Surrealism sought a reality above or within the surface reality, usually through efforts to suspend the discipline of conscious and logical reason, esthetics, or morality in order to allow the expression of subconscious thought and feeling.

Ever since symbolism there had been a growing interest in the irrational and in the technique of producing impressions through the startling juxtaposition of images. Lautréamont, Rimbaud, Mallarmé, and Jarry were considered the leading precursors of surrealism, and Guillaume Apollinaire seems to have dined the name. World War I heightened the sense of protest against a purely scientific and materialistic world view, and strengthened the conviction that the intellect alone could not achieve complete understanding of life. After first voicing their despair through the DADA movement, the surrealist group announced themselves with André Breton's Manifeste du sur-realisme: Poisson soluble (1924). Based on Freud's theory of the unconscious, it claimed that through "automatic" writing and painting the subconscious would dictate images and symbols in combinations which, however unexpected and incongruous to the conscious mind, which would actually reveal the true nature and content of the human soul. A second manifesto (1930) stressed the importance of investigation of dreams and psychic states.

Breton, with Louis Aragon, René Crevel, Robert Desnos, Paul Eluard, Philippe Soupault, and others, converted (1924) the Dada review Littérature to La Révolution surréaliste. In 1930 the title was changed to Surréalisme au service de la révolution (until 1933) in an attempt to claim that the movement was the representative of Communism in the arts. However, Communist leaders disapproved surrealism so that, forced to choose between them, Aragon officially left for Communism in 1932, Eluard in 1938.

In England Herbert Read tried to introduce "super-realism" as a manifestation of the principle of romance, despite the original name survived; David Gascoyne and Hugh Sykes Davies were English surrealists. Giorgio de Chirico and Salvador Dalí became the leading surrealist painters; others include Yves Tanguy and Max Ernst.

Few other writers and artists produced primarily surrealistic works, but many either were actively associated with movement for a while or were greatly influenced by it: in painting, Paul Klee, Joan Miró, Pablo Picasso, and Pavel Tchelitchew; in literature,
Jean Cocteau, St.-John Perse (France); Dylan
Thomas (England); E. E. Cummings, Henry Miller, Anaïs Nin, William Carlos Williams (U.S.); and García Lorca (Spain).

Surrey, Henry Howard, earl of (1517?–1547), English poet and courtier attached to the court of Henry VIII. Surrey won various distinctions, particularly during the years (1540–1542) that his cousin, Catherine Howard, was married to the king. After her execution, however, his eminence with the Sey-mours finally led to his arrest on a trumped-up charge of treason. He was executed early in 1547.
With Sir Thomas Wyatt, Surrey helped introduce new Italian and French verse forms into English.
His blank verse translations of Books II and IV of Vergil's Aeneid represent the first use of unrhymed iambic pentameter in English, and he is responsible for what is now known as the "Shakespearean" form of the sonnet. Forty of his poems were published in Tottel's Miscellany (1557). His metrical smoothness and elegance led critics, until recent times, to regard him as superior to Wyatt, but many 20th-century critics favor Wyatt's poetry for its greater intensity of feeling.

Sursis, Ie. See Roads to Freedom, THE.

Suttees, Robert Smith (1803–1864). English novelist and sports writer. He wrote the humorous fox-hunting sketches Jorocks' Jaunts and Jollities (1838), which suggested the original plan of Dickens' Pickwick Papers, and other works of light fiction dealing mainly with the hunt. These include Handley Cross (1843), Hillingdon Hall (1845), and Mr. Sponge's Sporting Tour (1853). Although of minor literary value, his books preserve the spirit of the old English sporting life. See Jorocks.

survival of the fittest. A concept of the Darwinian theory of evolution (see Origin of Species).
This principle maintains that the biological species best adapted to its environment will be the one to survive and perpetuate in its offspring. A popular misconception of this idea was that the species surviving was the one able to overcome its rivals in a literal, tooth-and-nail struggle. The phrase itself is said to have been coined by Herbert Spencer in a study on Darwinian natural selection.

Surya. In Hindu mythology, the god of the sun. In the older legends he presides over the gods of the sky, sharing the government of nature with Agni, lord of the gods of the earth, and Indra, lord of the gods of the air. The famous Sun Temple of Konarak, also known as the Black Pagoda, was constructed in the ninth century in eastern India to glorify Surya; its erotic friezes symbolize the multiduinous fertility of the sun, source of all energy.

Susanna and the Elders. A favorite subject among Renaissance and later artists. The Story of Susanna, one of the books of the Old Testament Apocrypha, tells how Susanna was accused of adultery by certain Jewish elders who had unsuccessfully attempted her chastity, how her innocence was proved by Daniel, and the Elders put to death.

Sutpen. A family in William Faulkner's Absalom, Absalom! Thomas Sutpen is the head of the family. Descended from poor whites, Sutpen acquires land in Mississippi from the Indians in 1833, and later marries Ellen Coldfield, daughter of a Jefferson merchant, in order to establish his respectability. Two children, Henry and Judith, are born of the marriage. Henry becomes a close friend of Charles Bon but kills him when he discovers that Bon, who wants to marry Judith, is their half brother and part Negro, the son of Thomas Sutpen and Eulalia Bon, who has Negro blood. After Bon's death, Judith brings up his son, Charles Edeline St.-Valery Bon.

Other characters connected with the Sutpen story are Rosa Coldfield, Ellen's sister, who is at one point engaged to Thomas Sutpen; Clytie (Clytemnestra) Sutpen, the daughter of Thomas and a Negro slave; Jim Bond, the idiot son of Charles E. St.-Valery and the last descendant of Thomas; and Wash Jones, who murders Thomas after the latter rejects the illegitimate child borne to him by Jones's granddaughter.

sutrás. Ancient Hindu aphoristic manuals probably developed from 500 to 200 B.C. They give the rules of systems of philosophy, grammar, and other disciplines, and contain directions concerning religious ritual and ceremonial customs. They form a link between the Vedic and later Sanskrit literature and are so-called from the Sanskrit sutra (thread), the aphorisms being, as it were, threaded together themselves and threading together other things.

In Buddhism sutrás refer to the teachings of the historical Buddha. There are, however, hundreds of sutras composed after his death and many apocryphal ones composed in China. As the sayings of the Buddha they are venerated and are the most important sections of the Tripitaka.

Sutro, Alfred (1863–1933). British playwright and translator of Masterlinck. His best play was The Walls of Jericho (1904).

sūttee (Sans. sati, a virtuous wife). The Hindu custom of burning the widow on the funeral pyre of her deceased husband; also, the widow so put to death. In theory the practice was optional, but public opinion and the very severe form of ostracism the defaulting widow had to endure left her practically no choice. The practice was declared illegal in British India in 1829.

Su Tung-p'o or Su Shih (1036–1101). Chinese poet of the Sung dynasty, noted also for his prose and painting. See Lin Yutang, The Gay Genius (1947).

Sven-Ingelbrigtsson. A Hungarian musician in George du Maurier's novel Trilby. He controls Trilby's stage singing through his hypnotic power. Hence, a Sven-Ingelbrigtsson is one who can exercise a sinister, mesmeric influence over another.

Sveno. In Torquato Tasso's Jerusalemme Liberata, the young Danish prince who is killed by Solimano, the Arab chieftain, before he can bring his forces to relieve the Crusaders assaulting Jerusalem. His sword and the avenging of his death are entrusted to Rinaldo of Este, his friend. The sole survivor of the massacre, Guelfo, tells the story to Goffredo and the other Crusaders.

Svevo, Italo. Pen name of Ettore Schmitz (1861–1928). Italian novelist. His best-known work is the psychological novel La Coscienza di Zeno (The Confessions of Zeno, 1923). Presented as a statement of self-analysis prepared by Zeno for a psychiatrist, it is an introspective study of the perpetual contradiction between his inner and outer desires. Svevo also wrote the novels Una Vita (A Life, 1892) and Senilità (1898). His technique has been compared to that of Joyce and Proust.

Svidrigailov. A sinister profligate in Fedor Dostoevski's Crime and Punishment. He admits to having violated young girls and to have caused the death of one of them. His final attempted seduction is of Rasholnikov's sister, Darya, whom he has followed to Petersburg after having tormented her when she was employed in his household. Svidrigailov shows no remorse for his acts, until one night, after saying he is going off to America, he shoots himself.

Swanhild. An old Norse legendary heroine, the daughter of Sigurd and Gudrun. She is falsely accused of adultery with the son of the king who is wooing her, and the king has his son hanged. She is sentenced to die by being trampled to death by wild horses, but is so beautiful that she must be blanketed before the horses will perform their task.

Swann, Charles. A neighbor and friend of the narrator's family in Marcel Proust's Remembrance of Things Past. Swann, who is partly Jewish, has an affair with Odette de Crécy, whom he later marries, and is the father of Gilberte. Himself a member of high society, he grieves that Odette is not similarly accepted.

Swann's Way. See Remembrance of Things Past.

Swan song. The song fabled to be sung by swans at the point of death; hence, the last work of a poet, composer, or other creator. The fable that the swan sings beautifully just before it dies is very ancient, though baseless.

Swedenborg, Emanuel (1688–1772). Swedish theologian, scientist, and philosopher. During the first half of his career, he devoted himself to scientific research, and spent several years studying in Europe and in England. In 1716, Swedenborg published Sweden's first scientific journal, *Daedalus Hyperboreus, and was appointed to the Royal Board of Mines. During his 25 years as an active member of this board, he published scientific books and articles in almost every field: mathematics, geology, anatomy, physiology, chemistry, and physics. The most important works of this period were Opera Philosophica et Mineralia (1734), Oeconomia regni animalis (1740), and Regnum animale (1744-1745). Between the years 1743 and 1745, Swedenborg experienced a spiritual crisis. Turning away from his former interests, he spent the last 25 years of his life in biblical study and the writing of religious philosophy. His most significant theological works are Arcana Coelestia (8 vols., 1749-1756), Doctrina vitæ pro Nova Hierosolyma (Divine Love and Wisdom, 1763), and Vera Christiana religio (The True Christian Religion, 1771). After his death his followers formed the New Church or New Jerusalem Church. Swedenborg's accounts of his mystical visions have influenced a number of writers, among them the English poet William Blake.

Swedish nightingale. A popular epithet for Jenny Lind, the Swedish singer.

Sweeney. A figure in several poems by T. S. Eliot. He is symbolic of the sensual, brutal, and materialistic man of the 20th century. In Sweeney Ercut and Sweeney among the Nightingales, rhyming, semicomic poems, he is set against the dignity and beauty of the classical past. Sweeney Agonistes, Fragments of an Aristophanes Melodrama (1932), is part of a play, striking in its use of music-hall rhythms and slang speech.

Sweet, Henry (1845-1912). An English philologist, regarded as the founder of modern phonetics.

Sweet Adeline. A well-known sentimental song. It was written in 1896 (publ. 1903) by Richard Gerard and Harry Armstrong. It was sung in colleges throughout the U.S., often in "barbershop quartets," especially by men in their cups.

Swift, Jonathan (1667-1745). English satirist, poet, political writer, and clergyman. Born in Dublin of English parents, Swift received his education in Ireland. In 1689 he went to England and became secretary to Sir William Temple, now retired at Moor Park from his distinguished political career. It was here that Swift met Esther Johnson; it was also here that he learned a great deal about politics and wrote his first important prose: The Tale of a Tub, a Rabelaisian and allegorical satire on the divisions in the Christian religion, and The Battle of the Books. Swift was the major political writer for the moderate Tories in their brief reign (1710-1714) under Robert Harley, producing the Examiner (1710), a newspaper in the Tory interest, and The Conduct of the Allies (1711), a masterly pamphlet of his party's plan for peace in the war of the Spanish Succession. His life during these years is reflected in his Journal to Stella, a series of letters written for Esther Johnson. He was appointed dean of St. Patrick's Cathedral in Dublin (1713) by Queen Anne and remained in Ireland, except for brief excursions, for the rest of his life. He returned to politics again in 1724, this time as an Irish patriot in the person of "M. B. Drapier"; Drapier's Letters were designed to incite the Irish against a new coinage, and a reward of £300 was soon offered for discovering the author. It was well known that Swift was the author, but proof was needed and never obtained, for, by now, he was greatly loved in Dublin; his birthday thereafter was celebrated by Dubliners with the ringing of bells and bonfires. By this time, Swift had almost finished his masterpiece Gulliver's Travels, which contained his bitterest denunciation of mankind. Of his many minor satires, the most celebrated are An Argument Against Abolishing Christianity (1708) and A Modest Proposal, both in prose; and The Day of Judgment (1731) and Ferret on the Death of Dr. Johnson (1739). The 19th-century notion of a demonic, cynical Swift, an exaggeration used to explain the savage indignation of his satire, ignores his playfulness and love of fun, qualities evident throughout his work. Though he called himself a misanthrope, he always wrote for the betterment of mankind. He valued reason as a human attribute and became bitter at its abuse. A master impersonator, Swift often became the person in which he wrote: now he is "Isaac Bickerstaff," a clairvoyant astrologer; now the urbane "Cadenus," now the playful "Presto;" now "M. B. Drapier;" now "Lemuel Gulliver." The "true Swift" is still, and perhaps always will be, uncertain. See Scriblerus Club.

Swift, Tom. A boy-inventor, hero of a long series of novels for boys. Tom's hair-raising adventures with all kinds of contrivances, some of which anticipated actual inventions, became widely popular and brought considerable wealth to his creator, Edward L. Stratemeyer (1862-1950), who also originated the Rover Boys series.

Swinburne, Algernon Charles (1837-1901). English poet and man of letters. He is known for his rebellion against Victorian social conventions and religion, his active sympathies with the movements and leaders of political revolution of his time, and the pagan spirit and musical effects of his poetry. He was an intense admirer of Shelley and Victor Hugo, and was influenced in his own work by Greek legend and Roman classic literature, medieval romance, and Elizabethan drama.

In his early career, Swinburne's behavior was eccentric, violent, and dissipated, calculated to shock the respectable people of his time. As alcoholism was rapidly undermining his health, he was taken into the home of Theodore Watts-Dunton in 1879 and stayed there for the rest of his life.

Swinburne's first published volume, The Queen Mother. Rosamund. Two Plays (1860) attracted no attention. With the publication of Atalanta in Calydon, a drama in classical Greek form, he won fame. In the same year he published Chasteland, the first of three dramas on Mary Queen of Scots. This was followed closely by Poems and Ballads: First Series (1866), lyrics dealing chiefly with sensual love, which caused a scandal and was severely censured by some. A Song of Italy (1867) and Songs before Sunrise (1871) deal with the cause of Italian union and independence. The second drama of the Mary Queen of Scots trilogy was Bothwell: A Tragedy (1874) and Poems and Ballads: Second Series was published in 1878. Mary Stuart, the last of the trilogy, appeared in 1881, and Tristram of Lyonesse, an Arthurian poem in rhymed couplets, considered by some his finest work, in 1882. In Marino Faliero (1885) Swinburne reworks a theme previously treated by Byron. His last volumes of poems are Astrophel (1894), A Tale of Balem (1896), and A Channel Passage (1904). The Duke of Gandia (1908), a tragedy, is his last work. His prose works include Essays and Studies (1875), Miscellanies (1886), and astute critical writings on many modern writers including Blake, the Brontës, and Dickens. His later work is not considered to be as fine as the earlier. Among his best-known single poems are Flower to Artemis, Hymn to Proserpine, Hertha, Laos Veneris, and The Triumph of Time. He wrote two novels dealing with the complexities of love, Love's Cross Currents (1905) and Lesbia Brandon, posthumously published (1952). See FLESHLY SCHOOL OF POETRY.

Swinerton, Frank (1884– ). English novelist and critic; a prolific, professional, witty writer. He achieved fame with Nocturne (1917), a naturalistic novel about dull London people. Among his later novels are The Cats and Rosemary (1948), Faithful Company (1948), and Death of a Highbrow (1962).

Swiss Family Robinson, The, or Adventures in a Desert Island. A story for young people by J. R. Wyss (1813). It relates the adventures of a Swiss clergyman, his wife, and four sons, who are wrecked on a desert island.

Swithin or Swithun, St. (d. 862?). English ecclesiastical and bishop of Winchester. According to legend, he was buried, at his own wish, in the open air of the churchyard, so that the rain might fall from heaven upon his grave. After the new cathedral was built, the monks decided to honor him by removing his body into the church, but, as it rained day after day for 40 days thereafter, they finally assumed that the saint objected to their plan and abandoned it. Since then, tradition says that if it rains on St. Swithin’s day (July 15), there will be rain for 40 days thereafter.

Swiveller, Mr. Dick. In Charles Dickens’ Old Curiosity Shop, a dirty, smart young man, living in apartments near Drury Lane. His language is extremely flowery and interlarded with quotations. He is forever humming some dismal air. Mr. Swiveller is a clerk to Sampson Brass; he is later turned away and falls sick of a fever through which he is nursed by the Marchioness, whom he marries.

Swope, Herbert Bayard (1882–1938). American newspaperman. He was awarded the first Pulitzer Prize in journalism for his dispatches to the New York World as a war correspondent with the German armies (1914–1916). He was executive director of the paper through its most brilliant era (1920–1929).

sword. A long-bladed weapon used for cutting or stabbing. The sword was the chief weapon of the romances. In the days of chivalry, a knight’s horse and sword were his most treasured and carefully kept possessions, and his sword as well as his horse had its own name. The old romances, especially those of the Charlemagne and Arthurian cycles, are full of these names, among the more noteworthy of which are

- Anguладal (Stream of Anguish), Fribbio’s sword.
- Ar’ondight, the sword of Launcelot of the Lake.

Balmung, one of the swords of Siegfried, made by Wieland.

Colada, the Cid’s sword.

Damocles, (the Short Sword), one of the swords of Ogier the Dane; Sauvagine was the other, and each took Munifi cian three years to make.

Curtana, the blunted sword of Edward the Confessor. Durandal, Durandal, or Durandana (the Inflexible), Orlando’s sword.

Excalibur, the sword of King Arthur. (Lat., ex cal[ce] liber are, “to liberate from the stone.”)

Flamberge or Floberge (the Flame-Cutter), the name of one of Charlemagne’s swords, and also that of Rinaldo and Maugis or Maligii.

Glorius, Oliver’s sword, which hacked to pieces the nine swords made by Ansias, Galas, and Munifican.

Gram (Grief), one of the swords of Siegfried.

Joyeuse (Joyous), one of Charlemagne’s swords; it took Gallas three years to make.

Mimung, the sword that Wittich lent Siegfried.

Morglay (Big Glaive), Sir Bevis’s sword.

Nageirling (Nail-Ring), Dietrich’s sword.

Philippian, the sword of Antony, one of the triumvirs.

Sword Blades and Poppy Seed (1914). A collection of poems by Amy LOWELL. The second book of poetry that she published, it was especially important in its use of free verse and in containing the first English examples of polyphonic prose—rhythmic prose characterized by all the devices of verse except strict meter.

sword of Damocles. See DAMOCLES’ SWORD.

Sybarite. An inhabitant of Sybaris, in South Italy, proverbial for its luxurious living and self-indulgence. The Sybarites piped their chief product, wine, down to the sea, so that they would not have to transport it. A tale is told by Seneca of a Sybarite who complained that he could not rest comfortably at night, and, being asked why, replied that he found a rose leaf doubled under him, and it hurt him. Sybaris was destroyed as a significant power in a war with nearby Crotona. Fable has it that the Sybarites taught their horses to dance to a pipe. When the Crotonians marched against Sybaris, they played on their pipes, whereupon all the Sybarite horses began to dance, disorder so prevailed in the ranks, and the victory was quick and easy.

Sybil, or the Two Nations (1845). A novel by Benjamin DISRAELI. The two nations are the rich and the poor working class in England during the 1840’s. The novel deals with the Chartist movement and the distressed condition of the laboring class during this period.

Sycorax. The evil witch who originally inhabited the island of Prospero in Shakespeare’s The Tempest. She imprisoned Ariel in a pine rift and left to posterity her son, the subhuman Caliban. When Prospero reaches the island, she is already dead.

sylphs. Elemental spirits of air. They are so named in the Middle Ages by the Rosicrucians and Cabalists, from the Greek silph, a kind of beetle, or a grub that turns into a butterfly. Any mortal who has preserved inviolate chastity may enjoy intimate familiarity with these gentle spirits, and deceased virgins were said to become sylphs, “and sport and flower in the fields of air.” Sylphs play an important part in Pope’s Rape of the Lock.

Sylvander. In Robert BURNE’S correspondence with Mrs. McLehose, the name taken by Burns, while Mrs. McLehose was called Clarinda. The correspondence was published in 1802, later withdrawn, and republished in 1845.

Sylvester, Joshua (1563–1618). English poet. He is best known for his translation of La Semaine by Guillaume du Bartas, which appeared in English as Divine Weekes and Workes (1605).

symbolists (Fr. symbolistes). A group of French poets who were active during the last 30 years of the 19th century. Although the work of each writer was unique, and neither the aims nor the techniques of the movement were at all rigid, the poets did share certain basic convictions and used similar poetic methods. Symbolism in France began as a revolt against the cold impersonality of the realistic novel, and its minute descriptions of an objective, external reality. The rebel poets turned inward, in order to explore and express the shifting, subtle states of the human psyche. They believed that poetry should evoke and suggest, raising itself above the level of objective description only; hence, they sought poetic techniques that would make possible the re-creation of human consciousness. The symbol and the metaphor enabled them to suggest mysterious and inexpressible subjective emotion. Often the symbols were highly personal, and their use resulted in obscure, esoteric verse. At its finest, however, symbolist poetry achieved a richness of meaning, and created an awareness of the mystery at the heart of human existence.

As symbolism sought freedom from rigidity in the selection of subject matter, so it desired to free poetry from the restrictions of conventional versification. The art that seemed most to resemble poetry was, not that of the sculptured precision of plastic forms, but music; fluid melody and delicate lyricism characterized symbolist poetry. Poe, Baudelaire, and Wagner were admired by the symbolists; Rimbaud, Verlaine, and Mallarmé are generally considered the leaders of the school. Other members included Gustave Kahn, Henri de Regnier, Jules Laforgue, E. J. Corbière, Francis Viélot-Griffin, Jean Moréas, Maurice Maeterlinck, Marcel Schwob, Lautréamont, and Villiers de L'Isle Adam. Among the numerous symbolist reviews were Vogue (1886–1889), Revue indépendante (1886–1893), Ermitage (1890–1906), and Revue Blanche (1891–1903).

Symbolism, as a literary movement, was predominant in Russia from about 1896 to 1910. Its characteristics were an interest in mysticism and exotic lore, an intense concern with the aesthetic aspects of art, and an impressionistic poetic style. The main sources and influences on the group were the French symbolists, the Russian poets Turgenev and Fet, and the philosophical ideas of Vladimir Soloviov. The earlier symbolists included Valeri Bryusov, Konstantin Balmont, Dmitri Merezhkovski, Fedor Sologub, and Zinaida Hippius. Best known among the younger generation were Vyacheslav Ivanov, Andrei Bely, and Aleksandr Blok, the greatest poet to emerge from the movement.

Symbolism did much to add new life to Russian poetry, which had fallen into decline during the last part of the 19th century because of the preponderance of great prose writers. The great amount of fine work produced by the symbolist poets earned 'the symbolist period—the most fruitful period since the time of Pushkin—the name of "the second golden age" (or "the silver age") of Russian poetry.

During the 20th century the use of symbolism became a major force in British literature. Symbolist poetry was introduced and popularized by Arthur Symons, George Moore and the members of the RHYMERS' CLUB imitated it; W. B. Yeats was influenced by it in his early career and based his mature style on it; T. S. Eliot adapted it in the development of his individual style and praised it in his criticism, influencing the critical tenets of the CAMBRIDGE CRITICS and the New Critics. But the most outstanding development of symbolism was in the art of the novel. The great 20th-century British novelists, James Joyce especially, but also Joseph Conrad, D. H. Lawrence, E. M. Forster, and Virginia Woolf, wrote novels in which much of the meaning is conveyed through patterns of images and ideas and central suggestive symbols rather than through the traditional method of narrative and overt discourse.

Symonds, John Addington (1840–1893). English historian, scholar, and translator. He is best known for his History of the Renaissance in Italy (1875–1886), a study, often consisting of a series of impressionistic essays on separate subjects under the main heading, 'of the politics, culture, art, and literature of Italy in the 15th and 16th centuries. He also translated the Autobiography of Benevenuto Cellini (1888) and did other translations, notably of the Greek poets and the Italian Renaissance poets. In addition, he wrote verse and literary criticism.

Symons, Arthur (1865–1945). English critic and poet. His most important work was The Symbolist Movement in Literature (1899), which introduced English readers to the work of the French symbolist poets (see symbolism); it particularly influenced William Butler Yeats. Symons wrote poetry in the manner of the Decadents and displayed in himself the neurasthenic characteristics of that group. He described his irregular life and his spells of amnesia and madness in his Confessions: A Study in Pathology (1930).

Symphonie pastorale, La. See Pastoral Sym-phony, The.

Symplegades. The "clashing rocks." They guarded the entrance to the Black Sea and crushed ships between them by moving quickly together. When the Argonauts passed through them safely, by the advice of Phineus and the help of Hera, the rocks became fixed to the sea bottom and were harmless thereafter.

Symposium (Symposion; Banquet). A dialogue by Plato. Each guest at the banquet speaks in honor of love, mainly between males. Phaedrus treats love mythically, Pausanias sophisticatedly, Agathon poetically, and Aristophanes comically. Socrates says that the priestess Diotima has taught him that love may take an intellectual form, creating the desire to produce things of beauty; poets and legislators experience this sort of love. The dialogue ends with the speech of Alcibiades, praising Socrates.

synesthesia. A medical (or psychological) term describing the occurrence when, stimulating one sense organ another responds. It is as though nerve paths to the brain had become crossed like telephone wires. It is as though in eating one were to receive strong visual sensations of color rather than or along with sensations of taste. As a literary device, synesthesia has been used in certain types of poetry of the 19th and 20th centuries, especially that of the symbolists and their forerunners and disciples, to present imagery with extra vividness and to express intense and unusual experience. Poe, Rimbaud, and Hart Crane used synesthesia in their poetry, and Rimbaud's Sonnet of the Vowels, expressing the sounds of the common vowels in terms of colors, is an excellent example of the use of this device.

Synge, John Millington (1871-1909). Irish dramatist. Synge's tragically brief career established him as the foremost dramatist of the Irish Renaissance. He began his career by settling in France, where he spent his time translating the poetry of Mallarmé and other French symbolists. Here he met William Butler Yeats who persuaded him to return to the Irish countryside, where the peasants' speech still exhibited vigorous, exuberant, poetic qualities unmatched elsewhere in the world. Synge followed Yeats's advice with the result that he claimed his plays amounted to literal transcriptions of the language of western Ireland's peasants. His plays include In the Shadow of the Glen (1903); Riders to the Sea (1904), a one-act tragedy which achieves an almost Aeschylean starkness and grandeur; The Well of the Saints (1905); Playboy of the Western World, generally regarded as his masterpiece; The Tinker's Wedding (1907); and the nearly completed Deirdre of the Sorrows (1910), one of the most distinguished recreations of Irish myth of the Celtic revival.

synoptic gospels. The first 3 books of the New Testament: the gospels according to Matthew, Mark, and Luke. They are so called from the Greek word synoptikos meaning a general view. These three accounts of Jesus' life have a similarity in matter, language, and order. Mark is thought to be the oldest; both Luke and Matthew use Mark as a source. A lost book containing the sayings of Jesus was also used by the authors of Matthew and Luke. This lost book, called Q from the German word Quelle (source), was one of the earliest Christian documents. Since it was probably only an anthology of Jesus' wisdom, Bible scholars have postulated that Mark was written to accompany Q, and supply biographical material.

The synoptic problem concerns the relation of these three gospels arising from their common features.

Syntipas, Tales of. See Seven Wise Masters, The.

Syrinx. An Arcadian nymph of Greek legend. On being pursued by Pan she took refuge in the river Ladon, and prayed to be changed into a reed. The prayer was granted, and of the reed Pan made his pipes. Hence the name is given to the Pan pipe, or reed mouth organ, and also to the vocal organ of birds.
Tabernacles, Feast of. A Jewish festival. It lasts eight days, beginning on the 15th of Tishri (toward the end of September). It is kept in remembrance of the sojourn in the wilderness.

taboo. A custom among the South Sea Islanders that prohibits the use of certain persons, places, animals, things, or the utterance of certain names and words. It signifies that which is banned, interdicted or devoted in a religious sense. Thus, a temple is taboo and so is he who violates a temple. Not only so, but everyone and everything connected with what is taboo becomes taboo also. Captain Cook was taboo because some of his sailors took rails from a Hawaiian temple to supply themselves with fuel, and, being "devoted," he was slain.

With us, a person who is ostracized, or an action, custom, etc., that is altogether forbidden by society is said to be taboo or tabooed.

tabula rasa (Lat., "a scraped tablet"). A clean slate—literally and figuratively—on which anything can be written. Thus we say that the mind of a person who has been badly taught must become a tabula rasa before he can learn anything properly.

Tacitus, Cornelius (a.d. 55?-117?). Roman historian. His most ambitious works were the Historiae, a history of his own times, from a.d. 69 to 96, and the Annales, a detailed account of events from the death of Augustus to the year 69. These two historical works were originally published in 36 books, only 11 of which have been preserved in complete form while 4 have survived in fragments. Tacitus is also famous for his Germania, a careful study of the manners and mores of the peoples of Germany. As a reporter and historian, he always sought to be scrupulously impartial, and, not content with a simple narration of events, he searched constantly for causes. His style, especially in his later work, is colored now and then with poetic diction, but is at the same time tightly organized, precise, and epigrammatic.

Tadzio. See DEATH IN VENICE.

Taft, Robert A[phonso] (1889-1953). American statesman. The son of President William Howard Taft, he served as U.S. Senator from Ohio from 1939 until his death, becoming known as "Mr. Republican." In 1940, 1948, and 1952, he was an unsuccessful candidate for his party's presidential nomination. Taft's calm courage in the face of a painful death from cancer led to the writing of John and June Robbins' Eight Weeks to Live (1954). Taft was the author of A Foreign Policy for Americans (1951).

Taft, William Howard (1857-1930). 26th president of the U.S. (1909-1913). After graduating from Yale University and Cincinnati Law College, Taft held several posts in the Ohio and federal judiciary. As the first civil governor of the Philippines (1901-1904), he introduced various reforms and established limited self-rule. He served as secretary of war (1904-1908) under Theodore Roosevelt and was the latter's choice to succeed him in the presidency. During his term in office, Taft continued his predecessor's policies and strongly enforced the antitrust laws, but he later broke with Republican progressives and with Roosevelt himself. In 1912 he ran unsuccessfully for a second term against Woodrow Wilson and Roosevelt, who had founded the Bull Moose Party after failing to receive the Republican nomination. In 1913 Taft became professor of constitutional law at Yale and served until 1921 when he was named chief justice of the Supreme Court.

Tages. In Etruscan mythology, a mysterious boy with the wisdom of an old man who was plowed up, or who sprang from, the ground at Tarquini. He is said to have been the grandson of Jupiter and to have instructed the Etruscans in the arts of augury. The latter wrote down his teaching in 12 books, which were known as "the books of Tages," or "the Acherontian books."

Taggard, Genevieve (1894-1948). American poet. A writer and interpreter of poetry, she founded and edited The Measure, a Journal of Verse (1920-1926), and taught English at Mount Holyoke and Sarah Lawrence colleges. Among the numerous volumes of her collected verse are For Eager Lovers (1922), Hawaiian Hilltop (1923), Not Mine to Finish (1934), and Slow Music (1946). She also wrote The Life and Mind of Emily Dickinson (1930) and edited several anthologies.

Tagore, Rabindranath. Also written Ravindranath Thakura (1861-1941). Indian poet, novelist, story writer, and essayist in Bengali, awarded the Nobel prize for literature in 1913. He is known in his country for his lyrics and songs on nature, love, and childhood, and for his Ravindranasangeet, or poems set to music. In the West he is generally considered a poet of mysticism and religious feeling, and for three decades after the Nobel prize Tagore coteries and cults tended to misinterpret much of the fine poetry as Oriental mysticism. His early work strongly impressed Ezra Pound, who found in it a "new Greece," and W. B. Yeats, who did the introduction to Gitanshi (1912). Since then Tagore’s influence in the West has steadily declined though in his homeland it is a massive literary phenomenon. He was also an educationist, founder of the “world university,” Santiniketan, 100 miles from Calcutta. In his “dance dramas” (such as Valmiki Pratima) he employed opera for the purposes of the Bengali stage; in his last years he emerged as a symbolist painter of startling vividness and richness. He was knighted in 1915, but in 1919 resigned the honor in protest against the British repressive measures in Jallianwala Bagh in the Punjab. English translations of his work include: The Crescent Moon (1913), One Hundred Poems of Kabir (1914), Chitra (1916), a play; The Gardener (1917), Lectures on Personality (1917), Red Oleanders (1925), Fireflies (1928), The Religion of Man (1931), on his ideas of God; Broken Ties, and Other Stories (1923), The Child (1931), The Golden Boat (1932), Collected Poems and Plays (1936), Farewell My Friend (1940).

Tatische. See GREAT LEARNING, THE.

Taine's Tub, who impersonates a young English boy and sings the doings of his family and emigrated to England. Darnay is now falsely accused of reasonable activities. He is saved by the presence of Sydney Carton, a dissolute young man, who bears a striking resemblance to Darnay; Stryver, the defense counsel, points out the resemblance, stating that legal identification is impossible. Darnay and Carton become friends; both are frequent callers on the Manettes and both love Lucie. Darnay marries Lucie and they have a baby. Some time later, he hears from Paris that an old faithful servant has been unjustly imprisoned and hastens to his aid. In the revolution-torn city, Darnay, as a member of a hated aristocratic family, is imprisoned and sentenced to the guillotine. Sydney Carton now appears and intervenes; with bribery, and aided by his resemblance to Darnay, he drugs the latter, spirits him out of prison to safety, and takes his place on the guillotine. This he does out of his great love for Lucie and complete cynicism about himself. Darnay and Lucie are happily reunited in England. See Jerry Cruncher.

Tales from Shakespeare. See Charles Lamb.

Tales of a Traveller (1824). A collection of 32 tales and sketches by Washington Irving. The book is divided into four parts; the first three concern, respectively, the tales of an English gentleman, the adventures of Buckthorne, a young writer, and the doings of some Italian brigands. The last section, The Money Diggers, is the best; set in Dutch New York, it gives Irving a chance to exploit folklore and sentiment in his most successful manner. The high point of the section, and of the book, is the story The Devil and Tom Walker.
Tales of a Wayside Inn (1863). A collection of narrative poems by Henry Wadsworth Longfellow. The work's structure is modeled on Chaucer's Canterbury Tales and Boccaccio's Decameron. Each of the tales is narrated by one in a group seated around the fireside of a New England tavern. Many of the stories reflect Longfellow's interest in the Middle Ages. Even when the event related is not ancient, as in the popular Paul Revere's Ride, it is presented as though it occurred long, long ago. Some of the more interesting tales include Elisabeth, The Battle of Camilkan, Emma and Eginhard, and The Saga of King Olaf.

Tales of Hoffmann (1881). A fantastic opera by Jacques Offenbach (1818), based on three tales by the German author E. T. A. Hoffmann. The successive acts deal with the love affairs and other adventures of the poet Hoffmann, which he recalls over the wine in a Nuremberg tavern.

Tales of My Landlord. The general title for several novels by Sir Walter Scott. The tales are supposedly told by the landlord of the Wallace Inn, a Scottish tavern. The novels are arranged thus: Series I, The Black Dwarf and Old Mortality; Series II, The Heart of Midlothian; Series III, The Bride of Lammermoor and The Legend of Montrose; Series IV, Count Robert of Paris (1832) and Castle Dangerous.

Tales of the Grotesque and Arabesque (1840). A collection of short stories by Edgar Allan Poe. His first book of tales, it includes The Fall of the House of Usher and Berenice. In the preface, Poe explains that he based his tales, not on German Gothicism, but on the terror of the soul.

Tales of the Heike, The (Heike monogatari). Japanese military chronicle detailing the late 12th-century battles for control of Japan between the Taira (Heike) and Minamoto families. Stemming from oral traditions, the work achieved its present form in the mid-13th century.

Taliesin (fl. 550?). Early medieval Welsh bard. According to many sources, he produced a prodigious amount of fine poetry. He is mentioned in Idylls of the King (1859-1872) by Tennyson and is prominent in The Misfortunes of Elphin (1829) by Thomas Love Peacock. The architect Frank Lloyd Wright gave the name Taliesin to his residences in Wisconsin and Arizona.

talisman (Ar., tilasman, from late Gr., telesma, mystery). A charm, magical figure, or word, such as the abraxas, which is cut on metal or stone under the influence of certain planets. It is supposed to be sympathetic to these influences, which it communicates to the wearer.

To Arabia, a talisman consisting of a piece of paper on which are written the names of the Seven Sleepers and their dog is used to protect a house from ghosts and demons. In order to free any place of vermin, a talisman consisting of the figure of the obnoxious animal is made in wax or consecrated metal, in a favorable planetary hour.

Talisman, The (1825). A historical novel by Sir Walter Scott, relating the adventures of Sir Kenneth, prince royal of Scotland, as a knight in disguise in the Holy Land under Richard Coeur de Lion. Richard and his noble enemy Saladin are leading characters. The talisman is an amulet of singular healing powers with which Saladin effects the cure of Richard's sickness.

Talleyrand-Périgord, Charles Maurice de (1754-1838). French statesman, commonly known as Talleyrand. He was minister of foreign affairs from 1797 to 1807, and was made grand chamberlain (1804) by Napoleon. He opposed Napoleon's Russian and Spanish policies, and after Napoleon's fall he helped restore the Bourbons. Louis XVIII made him minister of foreign affairs (1814) and grand chamberlain (1815). He represented France at the Congress of Vienna (1815) where his diplomatic tact succeeded in maintaining his country's territorial integrity. He resigned after Napoleon's defeat at Waterloo. In 1830 he became ambassador to Great Britain and helped form the Quadruple Alliance (1834). His Mémoires were published in 1891. See Mme de Vernor.

Talmud (Heb., "instruction"). The body of Jewish civil and religious law, not contained in, but largely derived from the Pentateuch. The Talmud is divided into the Mishnah and the Gemara. The Mishnah gives a simple statement of a law or precept; the Gemara presents the discussion and debate on it.

When the Talmud is spoken of without any qualification, the reference is to the Babylonian Talmud, one of the two recensions of the Gemara. The other is the Palestinian Talmud, which is only one fourth the size of the Babylonian and is considered by Jews to have less authority.

Work on the Mishnah began in the time of the Maccabees. The 4,000 rules and postulations were codified and arranged by subject by Rabbi Judah I (c. 135-220). The schools in Palestine had codified their Gemara by the fourth century; the Babylonian scholars finished their Gemara in the sixth century.

Talus (Talos). (1) In Greek myth, the guardian of Crete; a giant of brass fashioned by Hephaestus for Minos. He kept strangers off the island by throwing huge rocks at approaching ships, or he would make himself red-hot and burn trespassers to death in his embrace. A single vein of blood ran from his head to his foot, where it was closed with a nail. Medea, coming to Crete with the Argonauts, charmed the nail out by her magic, and Talos bled to death. In Spenser's Faerie Queene (Bk. vi) he is the "iron man" attendant upon Sir Artegal, and representing executive power—"Swift as a swallow, and as lion strong."

(2) An apprentice of Daedalus, also known as Perdix. Daedalus, according to a Greek myth, grew jealous of his skill as an artisan and threw him into the sea, but he was saved by being turned into a partridge (perdix). The invention that incited Daedalus' enmity is said to have been the saw.

Tamar, and Other Poems (1924). A collection of poems by Robinson Jeffers. The little poem is loosely based on the biblical story of Tamar, the daughter of King David who was seduced by her brother. It deals with a modern Tamar living on the Monterey coast, who seduces her brother, a neighbor, and her father, communicates with the dead, and finally brings destruction to her entire family.

Tamburlaine. See TAMERLANE.

Tamburlaine the Great (in two parts; probably acted first in 1587, published in 1590). A romantic tragedy by Christopher Marlowe, based on the history of TAMERLANE. A Scythian shepherd who becomes a fierce bandit and finally the victorious conqueror and king of Persia, the Tamburaine of Part I is an embodiment of the Renaissance spirit: bold, defiant, eager to explore the possibilities of human life.

Marlowe creates a hero who is free to act, unhampered by fate or external circumstance. At the end of Part I he is at the height of his glory; in Part II, however, his lust for power and his cruelty finally end in ruin. His character loses its magnetic ability to hold the play together, and before death conquers him, he himself disintegrates.

Tamerlane or Tamburaine. Corruption of Timur i Leng, or Timur the Lame (1336–1405). Mongol conqueror, great-great-grandson of Genghis Khan. After establishing his capital at Samarkand, he conquered great parts of Russia, Persia, India, and central Asia, and died while preparing to invade China.

TAMURLAINE THE GREAT, a blank verse tragedy, was Christopher Marlowe's first play. In it Tamburaine becomes a bloodthirsty, inhuman villain and the action consists of one atrocity after another. In Rowe's play Tamerlane (1702), the warrior appears as a calm, philosophical prince, out of compliment to William III. There is a poem called Tamerlane by Edgar Allan Poe.

Tamerlane and Other Poems (1827). A collection of poems by Edgar Allan Poe. This group of youthful poems, published "by a Bostonian," was not successful. The poems reveal the influence of Byron and Shelley, and deal with Poe's favorite themes: pride, love, beauty, and death.

Taming of the Shrew, The (c. 1594). A comedy by William Shakespeare. The "shrew" is Katharina, a maiden of such violent whims and tempers that it seems unlikely she will ever find a husband. Her father, Baptista, refuses to allow her lovelorn younger sister Bianca to marry any of her numerous suitors until Katharina is off his hands. Finally Petruchio appears, marries Katharina in short order, and by his own abrupt high-handedness "tames" her to such good effect that he wins a bet with two other men on a test of their wives' obedience. Meanwhile, Lucentio, through the ruse of becoming Bianca's tutor while her servant Tranio assumes his name and clothing and presses his suit with her father, has succeeded in winning her hand. The entire play is enacted for the benefit of Christopher Sly, a drunken tinker who, in the opening "induction" scene, is taken to a nobleman's castle where he is fooled into thinking he is a nobleman himself.

The relationship of Shakespeare's play to an earlier anonymous play, The Taming of a Shrew, is disputed by scholars, but the plot elements of the two plays are similar. The opening episode concerning the induction of the drunken Sly is a common one in folk tales, as old as the Arabian Nights. The subplot involving Bianca and Lucentio is based on Ariosto's I Suppositi, translated by Gascoigne in 1566.

Tammany Hall. The headquarters (formerly on Union Square) of the controlling organization of the Democratic Party in New York City and State; hence, the party itself, and, as this has been the political target for so-called party abuses, the term "Tammany" is figuratively employed for municipal malpractice.

Tammany was the name of a 17th century Delaware chief, and the patriotic, anti-British leagues of pre-Revolutionary days adopted the name "St. Tammany" to ridicule the titles of loyalist organizations. Societies of St. George, St. Andrew, and so on. After the Revolution these leagues became anti-aristocratic clubs, but all soon died a natural death except "Tammany Society, No. I," which was that of New York. This flourished, and was converted into a political machine by Aaron Burr in his conflict with Alexander Hamilton (c. 1798), and in 1800 played a prominent part in the election of Jefferson to the presidency.

Tamuz. A Near Eastern god of fertility. In some obscure manner, Ishtar's love for him caused his death, and he descended into the underworld, leaving the earth barren. Ishtar mourned him, and eventually followed him into the underworld, from which, with the help of Ea, she rescued him. With his father, Ningishzida, he became a gatekeeper at the palace of Anu, the god of heaven.

Tamuz was important, under one name or another, throughout the Near East. His earliest known form was the Sumerian shepherd-god, Dumuzi. He was most widely known in later times in the modified form of Adonis.

Tamora. See TITUS ANDRONICUS.

Tam o'Shanter (1791). A narrative poem by Robert Burns, based on the legend that no manner of spirit or sprite could cross the middle of a running stream. On his way home one night, a little drunk, Tam sees witches and warlocks dancing in the Kirk of Alloway. Delighted, he calls out to one "winsome wench" among the beldams, "Weel done, Cutty Sark!" Immediately the lights go out, and the witches come down on Tam who rides for his life until he has reached the middle of the bridge over the Doon. Being past the middle of the stream, he is out of the witches' power, but his mare's tail is not, and Cutty Sark catches hold of this and pulls it off.

Tanced or Tancredi. Known as Tancered or Al tavilla or of Sicily (d. 1112). Norman soldier and crusader. During the First Crusade (1096–1099), he took part in the siege of Jerusalem and the battle of Ascalon; he eventually became ruler of the principalties of Edessa and Antioch.

The character of Tancred in Tasso's Gerusalemme Liberata is based upon him. In the poem, he is second only to Rinaldo of Este in bravery and fighting ability among the crusaders encamped before Jerusalem. He is loved by two women, the Syrian maiden Erminia and the Persian warrior-maid Clorinda, but it is the latter whom he loves. In a night attack, he unwittingly wounds Clorinda, who dies in his arms after receiving baptism from him and granting her forgiveness. His grief is tremendous, but he recovers in time, aided by a vision of her in heaven, to defeat the infidel champion Argante and speed the capture of the holy city.

He was the subject of an opera, Tancredi (1813), by Rossini and a musical drama Il Combattimento di Tancredi e Clorinda (1624) by Monteverdi.

Tancred, The Revenge of. A tale from Giovanni Boccaccio's The Decameron. Tancred sends to his daughter Ghismonda her murdered lover's heart in a gold goblet; she pours poison into it, drinks it, and dies.

Tancred, or the New Crusade (1847). A novel by Benjamin Disraeli. Tancred is a young and high-born visionary who leaves the social circles of 19th-century London to travel in the East. In the Holy Land he experiences the great Asian mystery, which is to work regeneration for the West.

Tandem, Felix. See Carl Spitteler.

Tandy, Napper. See Theobald Wolfe Tone.

Taney, Roger Brooke (1777-1864). American statesman. He was secretary of the treasury from 1833 to 1834. He became chief justice of the Supreme Court following John Marshall and is remembered for his association with the Dred Scott Decision in 1857.

T'ang. Chinese dynasty (618-906). The "Golden Age" of Chinese civilization, which saw vast expansion of the empire, great developments in Buddhism, particularly Ch'an, and a flowering of literature, science, and the arts. Such foreign religions as Zoroastrianism, Nestorian Christianity, and Manichaeism were introduced, and Taoism flourished. Poetry reached heights unequalled in later centuries, Po Chü-i, Li Po, Tu Fu, and Wang Wei being products of this age. Prose literature gained stature, the compilation of dictionaries and encyclopedias made great advances, and the prototypes of later drama and fiction can be traced to this period. Japan was greatly influenced by all phases of the culture of the T'ang Dynasty.

Tanglewood Tales (1853). A book for children by Nathaniel Hawthorne. The author retells six Greek myths, dealing with the same themes, revenge, the effects of time, strange transformations, that interest him in his major work. The book is a sequel to A Wonder-Book for Boys and Girls.

Tanguy, Yves (1900-1955). French surrealist painter. With the carefully controlled brushstroke, precision, and detail that is typical of the surrealist movement, Tanguy painted semi-abstract shapes against a background of distant horizons. By suggesting the infinity of space, his pictures create a mood of nostalgia and loneliness, which is offset by the whimsical, slightly comic quality of his forms. Mama, Papa Is Wounded (1927) is a characteristic work.

Taniguchi Buson (1716-1783). Japanese painter and haiku poet. He is generally ranked next to Matsuo Bashô as the greatest poet of the Tokugawa period (1600-1868).

Tanizaki Jun'ichirô (1886-1965). Japanese novelist. Dealing with both modern and ancient subjects, he has produced a large number of successful works. Best known are a modern version of the Tale of Genji and Sasame yuki (Thin Snow, 1942-48), translated as The Makioka Sisters by Edward Seidensticker. The latter details at length the everyday life of four sisters in Osaka in the late 1930's. Other works include: Tade kuu mushi (Some Prefer Nettles, 1929), translated by Seidensticker and Kagi (The Key, 1950), translated by Howard Hibbet.

tanka. The classic form of Japanese poetry, fixed centuries ago in a standard arrangement of five lines (with 5, 7, 5, 7, 7 syllables). It reduces, through the strict limits of its form, all poetic raw material to the concentrated essence of one static event, image, mood, etc. An example by Saigo Hoshi:

Now indeed I know that when we said "remember," and we swore it so,
it was in "we will forget"
that our thoughts most truly met.

See HAIKU.

Tannhäuser (13th century). A minor German minnesinger, or lyrical poet. He led a wandering life and went on a Crusade to the Holy Land. He was associated with the knight Tannhäuser of popular ballads, which relate how he discovers Venusberg (or Hörselberg), a magic land reached through a subterranean cave, and stays to enjoy its pleasures with the goddess Venus. At last he becomes conscious of having sinned, and journeys to the upper world to ask the Pope for absolution. The Pope replies that he should no more expect God's forgiveness than he could expect the papal scepter to bring forth green leaves. Tannhäuser departs in despair, but on the third day the papal staff bursts into blossom. Messengers are sent after him, but the knight has disappeared, having returned to Venusberg.

In Wagner's adaptation for his opera Tannhäuser (1845) the hero returns from Venusberg to the court of the landgrave of Thuringia, where the landgrave's niece Elizabeth has been faithful to her love for him. His friend WolfRak von Eschenbach persuades him to take part in the singing contest, for the winner is to marry Elizabeth. The last to sing, Tannhäuser bursts unwillingly into a song in praise of Venus, so wildly pagan that the other knights draw their swords to kill him. Elizabeth begs for his life, and he departs with a group of pilgrims to seek forgiveness at Rome. The Pope gives the legendary reply, and Tannhäuser returns weak and dejected. He is just in time to see the funeral of Elizabeth, who has died despairing that he would never return. He falls sorrowfully dying on the bier just as more pilgrims arrive carrying the Pope's leaf-bearing staff.

Tansillo, Luigi (1510–1568). Italian poet. Born at Venice, he traveled widely in the military service of the Spanish viceroyal government centered at Naples. His experiences on land and sea are reflected in his didactic and humorous poems, one of which, the Vendemmiatore (The Vintage) was placed on the Index. In repentance, he wrote his Lagrima di San Pietro (The Tears of Saint Peter), one of the first poems in the counter-reformation style; it was used by Southwell in England and Malherbe in France. His sonnets, influenced by Petrarch and Charlevoix, were also popular with lyricists of the late 16th century. See Bruno.

Tantalus (Tantalos). In Greek mythology, a son of Zeus or Tmolus and progenitor of the house of Atreus. He is best known for the punishment he suffers in Hades: suffering hunger and thirst, he stands in the midst of a lake, but when he bends to drink it dries up; a fruit-laden bough flies up when he reaches for it; and an overhanging stone threatens to crush him. The word tantalize recalls its tortures.

The punishments were inflicted for various crimes. A favorite of Zeus, Tantalus betrayed his secrets and gave ambrosia to his friends. Offering a banquet to the gods on a Lydian Mount Sipylus, he served his dismembered son Pelops. His theft of the golden dog that had watched over the infant Zeus caused Zeus to crush him under Sipylus. By Eurynassa, he was the father of Pelops, Niobe, and Broteas.

Tantras, the. Sanskrit religious writings, forming the holy scriptures of Sāktism, a Hindu sect. The adherents worship the divine power in its female aspect (sakti). The Tantras consist of magical formulas, for the most part in the form of dialogues between Shiva and his wife Kali, and deal with the creation and ultimate destruction of the world, divine worship, the attainment of superhuman power, and final union with the Supreme Spirit (purusha). They are of comparatively recent date (sixth or seventh century). Tantra is Sanskrit for thread, or warp, and is used here as groundwork, order, or doctrine of religion.

Taoism. Chinese religious system based on the teachings of Lao Tzu and Chuang Tzu. Developing almost contemporaneously with Confucianism, it called for a flight from conventional social obligations and envisons a transcendental world of the spirit. It opposed the pompous respectability of Confucianism’s insistence on social order and duties, and provided a release from the burdens of the official philosophy. Emphasizing mystic, undefined words, Taoism gradually degenerated into a search for eternal life, and survived in a welter of superstition, eventually became a popular folk religion. Many of its teachings were absorbed by Confucianists and Chinese Buddhists. Early Buddhist texts were first translated from Sanskrit into Chinese using Taoist technical terms.

Tao te ching. Chinese Taoist text attributed to the sage Lao Tzu. A brief work in 81 paragraphs, it combines both verse and prose passages of a mystic tone. Its meaning is highly obscure and thus subject to a great variety of interpretations. The work posits an Absolute or Tao, which is indescribable and precedes all things in the universe. It advocates a passive, unfocused, yielding attitude that will permit one to remain in harmony with the Tao. The most reliable translations are: Arthur Waley, The Way and its Power (1935); J. J. L. Duyvendak, Tao te ching, the Book of the Way and Its Virtue (1954). See Taoism.

Tatley, Mark. Martin’s invariably cheerful servant and companion in Charles Dickens’ Martin Chuzzlewit. Whatever the circumstances, he believes things will “come out jolly.” He shares Martin’s miseries in America, and on his return to England becomes landlord of the Blue Dragon inn.

tar or Jack Tar. A sailor. It is probably an abbreviation of tarpaulin, of which sailors’ caps and overalls were made. Tarpaulins are tarred cloths, and are commonly used on board ship to keep articles from sea-spray.

Tara. A site in Meath, Ireland. There the kings, the clergy, the princes, and the bards used to assemble in a large hall to consult on matters of public importance. The name Tara’s Psaltery or Psalter of Tara was given to the great national register or chronicles of Ireland, read to the assembled princes when they met in Tara’s Hall in public conference.

Tarakee. A hero of Brahminical legend and miracle of ascetic devotion. He is fabled to have lived 1100 years, and spent each century in some astounding mortification.

tarantula. A large and hairy venomous spider (so-called from Taranto, a town in Apulia, Italy, where they abounded). The bite of a tarantula was formerly supposed to be the cause of the dancing mania known as tarantism. This was an hysterical disease, common, epidemically, in southern Europe from the 15th to the 17th centuries. From this same insect the tarantella gets its name. This is a very quick Neapolitan dance (or its music) for one couple, and is said to have been based on the gyrations practiced by those whom the tarantula had poisoned.

Taras Bulba (1835). A short novel by Nikolai Gogol. It is set during the 17th-century wars between the Poles and the Cossacks in the Ukraine. The old Cossack, Taras Bulba, and his two sons, Andri and Ostap, join the Cossacks in a campaign against the Poles. Andri falls in love with a Polish girl and deserts his comrades to be with her inside a besieged Polish fortress. Meeting Andri in a skirmish outside the fort, Taras kills his traitorous son. Meanwhile Ostap is captured and tortured to death by the Poles. Taras later suffers the same fate. The novel is rich not only in battle scenes but also in the language in which the Ukrainian countryside is described. The work ends with a famous description of the Dniester River with a wild duck, called in Russian a gogol, included in the scene.

The story has a biographical connection with Gogol. One of his Cossack ancestors, named Ostap Gogol, sided with the Poles during the 17th-century wars and once surrendered a fortress to them.

Tar Baby (1880). One of the best-known stories of Joel Chandler Harris. It first appeared in book form in Uncle Remus, His Songs and His Sayings and later in The Tar Baby Story and Other Rhymes by Uncle Remus (1904). A tar doll set up by the roadside so irritates Brer Rabbit by its unresponsiveness that he strikes it until he is stuck tight.

Tarde, Gabriel (1843–1904). French sociologist and criminologist. His works include Les Lois de l'imitation (1890), La Criminalité comparée (1898), and Études de psychologie sociale (1898). Tarde viewed man as essentially dominated by the social environment, which supplies the goals of his motivations.

Tardieu, Jean (1902– ). French poet and dramatist. His Théâtre de Chambre (1955) and Poèmes à jouer (1960) are collections of one-act plays. Poetry collections include Poèmes (1944) and Jours pétillés (1948).

Tarkington, [Newton] Booth (1869–1946). American novelist and playwright. After studying at Princeton, where he founded the Triangle Club, Tarkington served in the Indiana House of Representatives in 1902–1903; his concern for politics is reflected in The Gentleman from Indiana, his first novel, and In the Arena (1905). He also is noted for his stories of childhood and adolescence, particularly Penrod and Seventeen. The title Growth (1927) was later given to his trilogy about urban life in the Midwest, which appeared as The Turmoil (1913), The Magnificent Ambersons, for which he was awarded a Pulitzer Prize, and The Midlander (1923). He received another Pulitzer Prize for Alice Adams. His other novels include Monsieur Beaucarie, The Conquest of Canaan, The Plucerat (1926), Mirthful Haven (1931), The Lorenzo Bunch (1936), and The Heritage of Hatcher Ide (1941). He also wrote 25 plays, 11 of them with Harry Leon Wilson, notably The Man from Home (1907), which contrasts American innocence with European sophistication. The World Does Move (1928) is his autobiography, and Your Amiable Uncle (1949) consists of letters to his nephews.

Tarlton, Richard (d. 1588). English actor. A popular comedian, Tarlton became one of the Queen Elizabeth's Men in 1583. He was famous for his improvisations of doggerel verse, and may perhaps have been the prototype for Shakespeare's Yorick. Many collections of anecdotes supposedly originating with him were published, notably Tarlton's Jests in three parts (1592–1611).

Tarot cards. A pack of fortunetelling cards. Their figures are said to be very ancient; they were used by the Egyptians, and may have originated in the rituals of fertility religions. T. S. Eliot (in The Waste Land), Charles Williams, Lawrence Durrell, and other modern writers refer to the cards.

Tarps, Spurius Metius. A famous Roman critic of the Augustan age. He sat in the temple of Apollo with four colleagues to judge the merit of theatrical pieces before they were produced in public.

Tarpeian Rock. An ancient rock or peak (now no longer in existence) on the Capitoline hill, Rome. The name comes from Tarpeia, a vestal virgin and daughter of Spurius Tarpeius, governor of the citadel. According to legend, he agreed to open the gates to the Sabines if they would give his daughter "what they wore on their arms" (meaning their gold bracelets). The Sabines, thereupon, crushed her to death with their shields, and her body was hurled from the Tarpeian Rock. Subsequently, traitors were cast down from this rock, and so killed.

Tarquin. The family name of a legendary line of early Roman kings. Tarquinius Priscus, the fifth king of Rome, is dated 617–578 B.C. His son, Tarquinius Superbus, was the seventh (and last) king of Rome; it was his son, Tarquinius Sextus, who committed the rape of Lucrece, in revenge for which the Tarquins were expelled from Rome and a republic established. See Lucretia.

Tarr (1918). A novel by Wyndham Lewis. It is a psychological drama about a group of Paris art students of various nationalities. The hero is Frederick Tarr, an Englishman, but the center of interest is Otto Kreisler, a German student through whom Lewis attacks German romanticism, nihilism, and militarism.

Tarsia, Galeazzo di (1520–1553). Italian Renaissance poet. He is best known for his lyrics, mainly sonnets of a Petrarchan nature; forged in bitter exile, they echo his national sentiment.

His Cansoniere (Song Book) was not published until 1617.
Tartarin. A famous comic character created by Alphonse Dauret. He is the hero of Aventures prodigieuses de Tartarin de Tarascon (1872) and Tartarin sur les Alpes (1885). Tartarin, a native of Provence, is an amusing bragart who bubbles over with good humor and with hilarious, fantastic tales of his own escapades.

Tartarus (Tartaros). The infernal regions of classical mythology. Used as equivalent to Hades by later writers, by Homer it was placed as far beneath Hades as Hades is beneath the earth. It was here that Zeus confined the Titans.

Tartini, Giuseppe (1692–1770). Italian violinist and composer of many concertos and sonatas. His Devil's Trill is a favorite showpiece.

Tartuffe, Le (Tartuffe, 1664). A witty comedy by Molière. The religious hypocrite Tartuffe worms his way into the household of Orgon, a credulous fool who deeds all his property to the impostor and intends to marry his daughter to him. Orgon’s wife Elmire tricks Tartuffe, who is unaware that Orgon is watching, into trying to seduce her; Orgon, finally understanding Tartuffe’s true nature, orders him from the house. But Tartuffe, owning the house, evicts the family instead and arranges Orgon’s arrest. The king intervenes at the last moment and Tartuffe is hauled off to jail. The word tartuffe has come to mean religious hypocrite in the French language. The play itself was twice suppressed before permission to perform it freely was finally given.

Tarzan. A fabulous character created by Edgar Rice Burroughs (1875–1950). Although Burroughs wrote many other stories about the fantastic and unearthly, his main claim to fame is the Tarzan series. First appearing in Tarzan of the Apes (1914), this 20th-century folk hero is depicted as the son of an English nobleman, abandoned in Africa in his infancy. He is brought up by apes, learns to speak their language (and that of other animals as well), and goes through a long series of breathless adventures. Eventually Tarzan marries, has a son, and finally a grandson. Millions of copies of the Tarzan books have been sold, and they have been translated into 56 languages. Innumerable films have been made of his adventures, and he has long been a comic-strip favorite.

Task, The (1785). A long poem by William Cowper (1731–1800), its purpose being, according to a statement by the author himself, “to discontinue the modern enthusiasm after a London life, and to recommend rural ease and leisure as friendly to the cause of piety and virtue.” In its six books (The Sofa, The Time-piece, The Garden, etc.) it deals with a number of subjects in which the author was interested, such as nature, rural life, animals, simple, hard-working people, and social reform. Cowper’s Christian orthodoxy, his insistence on the fallen state of man and on a God found necessarily in revelation and not merely in nature, make him bitterly hostile to Deism and limit his sympathy with scientific discovery to prove divine design. In its recollections of the inspiring and healing qualities of nature, and in its use of blank verse, it is considered a forerunner of some of the poetry of Wordsworth. The poem contains perhaps Cowper’s most famous aphorism: “God made the country and man made the town.”

Tasman, Abel J. (1602–1659). Dutch navigator. He went to the South Seas and discovered what he called Van Diemen’s Land after the governor of the Dutch East Indies. It is the modern Tasmania.

Tasso, Bernardo (1493–1569). Italian diplomat and poet. He wrote Petrarchan lyrics and classical odes, as well as a romantic epic, Amadigi (1560), based on Amadis of Gaul. He was the father of Torquato Tasso.

Tasso, Torquato (1544–1595). Italian poet. He was born at Sorrento and educated by the Jesuits at Naples and by his father Bernardo Tasso, himself a distinguished man of letters. At Padua, he studied the law, then philosophy and eloquence under the influence of Speroni. Though only 18, he wrote a romantic epic, Rinaldo, about the adventures of the hero, a cousin of Orlando (Roland) the paladin. In 1565, he went to Ferrara to serve the Este family and began work on his masterpiece, the Jerusalem Liberata (Jerusalem Delivered). During the decade he composed several discourses on the art of poetry and wrote the Aminta, first performed at the Este court in 1573. A few years later, his physical and mental health began to disintegrate as his sensitive nature was wrecked by doubts about the critical and religious orthodoxy of his work and by suspicions of hostility towards him on the part of patrons and friends. In 1579 the duke of Ferrara placed him in an asylum, where he languished for seven years in misery, despite such visitors as Montaigne and many expressions of sympathy from the literary world. The fact that his writings in the asylum reveal an unanguished rather than a deranged mind prompted later writers like Goethe to picture him as the victim of a romantic but forbidden attachment to the duke’s sister Leonora (see TORQUATO TASSO). In 1586, upon his release, he found himself universally honored for his Jerusalem, which had appeared during his imprisonment. Despite further wanderings and continuing poor health, he completed in 1590 a tragedy, Torriamondo, and a creation poem, the Mondo creato (1607) as well as more critical treatises and many letters. In 1593, he completed a revised version of his masterpiece, called Jerusalem conquisitata (Jerusalem Conquered), to meet critical and ecclesiastical objections. But in Italy and elsewhere, the first version was and remains the celebrated work; the second version has lived only as a document of biographical value. In 1594, Pope Clement VIII planned to crown him with the laurel on the Capitol in Rome, but the poet died in April of 1595, before the ceremony could take place. From the time of Edward Fairfax’s translation into English of the Jerusalem Delivered (1594 and 1600), Tasso strongly influenced English poets from Spenser to Byron.

Tassoni, Alessandro (1565–1635). Italian poet. He wrote a celebrated mock-heroic epic La Secchia Rapita (The Rape of the Bucket, 1624). It is made up of 12 cantos of octaves that narrate in epic style a struggle between the cities of Bologna and Modena over possession of a bucket.

Tate, John Oxley (1899– ). Australian poet and critic. A graduate of Vanderbilt University, Tate was associated with the Fugitive and the Southern Agrarians. Like them he tended toward social and political conservatism, seriously stirred by the nonindustrial South. He contributed Remarks on the Southern Religion to the Fugitive symposium I’ll Take My Stand (1930). Tate was Southern editor of Hound and Horn (1931–1934) and editor of the Sewanee Review (1944–1946).

His poetry is marked by a classical severity of form, with a tendency toward religious symbolism, satire, and intellectual complexity. His best-known poem is perhaps the much anthologized Ode to the Confederate Dead. His verse has appeared in Mr. Pope and Other Poems (1928), Poems: 1928–1931 (1932), The Mediterranean and Other Poems (1936), and Poems: 1922–1947 (1948). The Fathers (1928) is his one published novel.

Tate is as distinguished a critic as he is a poet. Instrumental in the New Criticism, he has published several collections of essays, including Reactionary Essays on Poetry and Ideas (1936), Reason in Madness (1941), The Hovering Fly and Other Essays (1945), and The Porlorn Demon (1953). He has also written biographies of Stonewall Jackson (1928) and Jefferson Davis (1929) and has edited several anthologies.

Tate, Sir Henry (1819–1889). English philanthropist. He built the Tate Gallery in London as a gallery for modern paintings (opened in 1897). Today it is the National Gallery of British Art.

Tate, Nahum (1652–1715). English playwright and poet. He is best known for his bowdlerized versions of works of more famous authors, particularly for his adaptation (1681) of Shakespeare's King Lear which gave the play a happy ending and remained the standard acting version until 1840. He collaborated with Dryden on the second part of Absalom and Achitophel and with Nicholas Brady on a New Version of the Psalms (1696), a widely used hymnal. His best independent work is Panacea, a poem on Tea (1700). Tate was poet laureate from 1692 to 1715.

Tatler, The. A series of periodical essays started by Richard Steele under the pseudonym of Isaac Bickerstaff (1709–1711). Joseph Addison and Jonathan Swift were also contributors. The essays are predominantly light satires and allegorical criticisms of contemporary mores which fall into five categories: entertainment, poetry, domestic and foreign news, and miscellaneous subjects. The Tatler was succeeded by The Spectator.

Tattersall, Richard (1724–1795). English horseman. Tattersall's horse-auction headquarters in London (1766) are known all over the world. The word tattersall is used in various languages as a synonym of horse market.

Tauchnitz, Christian Bernhard (1816–1895). German publisher, member of a family of printers and publishers. He is especially known for the "Tauchnitz Edition" (started in 1841) of a Collection of British and American Authors. The Tauchnitz volumes were English-language editions for sale on the Continent, not legally to be taken into American or British territory.

Taunay, Viscount. Alfredo d'Escagnolhe (1843–1899). Brazilian novelist and historian. Of French ancestry, Taunay fought in the Paraguayan war (1864–1870); A Retraite da Laguna (1871), which was originally written in French as La Retraite de Laguna, is an epic account of a famous retreat during the war. His fiction, which reflected the growing interest of Brazilian intellectuals in social problems, tends toward realism. Inoçência (1872), his best-known novel, is a tragic love story, notable for its depiction of the Brazilian hinterland.

Taylor, Bayard (1825–1878). American man of letters. Apprenticed to a printer, Taylor left his work for a walking tour of Europe. He sent letters from Europe to several periodicals; they were collected in Views Afoot; or, Europe Seen with Knapsack and Staff (1846). The book, full of enthusiasm and good description, was an immense success. Taylor was then sent by the Tribune to report on the 1849 California gold rush. These experiences were published in another successful book, Eldorado, or, Adventures in the Path of Empire (1850). Taylor traveled widely as a journalist, even serving as historian on Commodore Perry's expedition to Japan. Throughout his career, however, Taylor thought of himself as a serious poet. In his Home Pastoral (1875) he dealt realistically with his own experience, but most of his verse is romantic, as in Poems of the Orient (1855). The best-known poem is the Bedows Song. Taylor also wrote parodies and several novels; his translation of Goethe's Faust (1870–1871) won his academic recognition and the post of minister to Germany (1879).

Taylor, Edward (1842–1879). English-born American poet and clergyman. In 1868 he sailed to Massachusetts, entered Harvard College, and in 1871 became a minister in the frontier town of Westfield, Mass. An ultraconservative in theology, Taylor began to write pamphlets attacking the liberal ideas of Solomon Stoddard, the grandfather of Jonathan Edwards. In 1862, at the age of 40, he began to compose the Preparatory Meditations, 217 poems in six-line stanzas, written one a month for 44 years. The poems, intended to "stir up" the affections before observing the Lord's Supper, celebrate in the metaphorical manner the glory, and also the difficulty, of man's relation to God. Around 1865, Taylor began his major long poem God's Determinations Touching His Elect.

Only two of Taylor's poems were published in his lifetime. A selection from his verse first appeared in 1839, but no complete edition of the Meditations was published until 1960. Still in manuscript are Taylor's sermons, and his Metrical History of Christianity. Most critics of American literature now consider Taylor the most important American poet before the 19th century.

Taylor, Jeremy (1613–1667). English clergyman and writer. His best-known work is the devotional book Holy Living and Dying. Taylor's prose is noted for its warmth and eloquence, its splendor of cadence and vivacities of metaphor.

Taylor, John (1580–1653). English author, known as "the Water Poet" because he worked for a time as a waterman on the Thames River. He wrote a vast number of pamphlets and verses on a variety of subjects which were first collected in 1630. Among his best-known prose works is The Penitent Pilgrimage (1618), an amusing account of a journey from London to Edinburgh. Taylor was known for his eccentric exploits, one of which was sailing on the Thames in a boat made of brown paper.

Taylor, John (1808-1887). Leader in the Mormon Church. He took the side of Brigham Young and accompanied him to Utah. After Young's death in 1877, he became acting head of the church, accepted polygamy and was forced to hide from arrest by the government in 1884.

Taylor, Philip Meadows (1808-1876). English novelist and administrator in India. His best-known book, Confessions of a Thug (1839), deals with thuggism, the Indian terrorist cult of assassins of the early 19th century. His other novels provide an accurate and engaging picture of Indian life and history from the 17th to the 19th century. See Thug.

Taylor, Tom (1817-1880). English dramatist. Some of his better-known plays include the comedies * Masks and Faces* (1854, written with Charles Reade) and Our American Cousin (1858); the latter was a success in the U.S., and it was the play Lincoln was watching when he was assassinated at Ford's Theater in Washington by John Wilkes Booth. Taylor's serious melodrama Ticket of Leave Man (1863) is notable for its celebrated character Detective Hawkshaw.

Tchaikovsky, Peter Ilyich (1840-1893). Russian composer. His music, while having definite Russian characteristics, is not as fiercely nationalistic as that of his contemporaries, the St. Petersburg "Five." His music owes much to French and German models; the composer himself recognized his most serious weakness, a weak formal sense, when he said "I cannot complain of lack of inventive power, but I have always suffered from want of skill in the management of form." His strong points, warm and expansive melodies and moments of intense dramatic expression, have made many of his works popular with a wide audience. His best-known works are his three last symphonies (No. 4 in F minor, 1877; No. 5 in E minor, 1888; No. 6 in B minor, the Pathétique, his last work, 1893); the first piano concerto, in B flat minor (1875); the violin concerto (1878); symphonic poems, especially Romeo and Juliet (1869, 1880); and his three ballets: Swan Lake (1876), Sleeping Beauty (1889), and Nutcracker (1891-1892). The most popular of his 11 operas are Eugene Onegin and The Queen of Spades, both based on works by Pushkin. See Nadzheva von Mšck.

Teach, Edward. Known as Blackbeard (d. 1718). English pirate. Originally a privateer during the War of Spanish Succession, he cruised the Spanish Main and was killed in action. He is famous in pirate stories.

Teapot Dome. A tract of oil-bearing government land in Wyoming which figured in a major scandal of the Harding administration. A Senate investigating committee revealed that the Teapot Dome reserve and one at Elk Hills, Calif., had been transferred from the navy to Secretary of the Interior Albert B. Fall, who in turn had secretly leased the fields to private oil operators in 1922. It was also disclosed that the oilmen had lent Fall substantial sums of money. The leases were later canceled by the government, and Fall was convicted of bribery. The scandal inspired Upton Sinclair's novel Oil! (1927).

Tearsheet, Doll. A violent-tempered prostitute in Shakespeare's Henry IV: Part II.

Teasdale, Sara (1884-1933). American poet. Known for the evocative intensity of her lyrics, she was for a time associated with the group that gathered around Harriet Monroe in Chicago. Other collections of her poetry include Sonnets to Dusk and Other Poems (1907), HeLEN of Troy and Other Poems (1911), Rivers to the Sea (1915), Plains and Shadow (1920), Dark of the Moon (1926), and Strange Victory (1933). She also edited an anthology for young people, Rainbow Gold (1922). More and more withdrawn as the years went by, she committed suicide.

Tebaldi, Antonio. Also known by the Latinized name il Tebaldeo (1463-1537). Italian poet. Tebaldi is noted for his exaggerated Petrarchism, used in the manner of Serafino and Cariteo. His best-known work is the Opere d'Amore (Amaraty Verse, 1534).

Tecumseh (1767-1813). Shawnee chief, considered one of the greatest American Indian leaders. Determined to check the westward expansion of U.S. settlers, Tecumseh and his brother, the Prophet, formed a league of Northwest Indian tribes, which was supported by British officials in Canada. While Tecumseh was away, General William Henry Harrison defeated the Indians at the battle of Tippecanoe (1811) in what is now Indiana. During the War of 1812, Tecumseh, who had allied himself with the British, was killed at the battle of the Thames in Canada.

Te Deum laudamus (Lat., "We praise thee, O God"). Opening words of a Christian hymn of praise to the Trinity, attributed to Nicetas (c. 340), bishop of Remesiana in Dacia. It is traditionally sung at Matins or Morning Prayer services, and on occasions of great public thanksgiving, such as the end of a war. It has been set to music hundreds of times; notable settings are by Purcell, Handel, Haydn, Bruckner, Dvořák, and Verdi.

Tegnér, Esaias (1782-1846). Swedish poet, scholar, and bishop. After a university education at Lund, Tegnér was appointed a lecturer in aesthetics in 1803. By 1812 he was a professor with a chair of Greek; the leader of an intellectual circle, he remained at the university until 1826. Tegnér had been ordained in 1812, and he left the academic life to devote himself to his duties as bishop of Växjö. His finest poetry appeared in the collections of Krigsång för skånska landstaben (1808), Sång till solen (1813), Juliten (1813), Nattvardsgömm (1820), trans. by Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, The Children of the Lord's Supper, (1842), and Friðhöfta Saga (1825). Although he is noted for the clarity of language and expression in his philosophical lyrics, Tegnér also wrote some fine love poetry.

Telesio, Bernardino (1500–1588). Italian philosopher. One of the key figures in the Renaissance trend toward the modern scientific approach to nature, Cosenza was influenced by the naturalistic school of Padua, where he studied and taught. His major work, De rerum natura insta propria principia (The Phenomena of Nature According to Its Own Principles, 1565–1586), outlined his approach.

Telford, Thomas (1757–1834). Scottish engineer. He built the Caledonian Canal, many bridges and roads in North Scotland, improved Scottish harbors, and constructed the Gota Canal between the Baltic and North Seas. He was a friend of Thomas Campbell and Robert Southey.

Telipinu. Hittite god of fertility. The harsh, infertile winter was ascribed to his sleep, and seasonal rituals were performed to wake him and calm his anger at being awakened, thereby bringing back fertility to the earth. A myth explaining these rituals in terms of divine precedents was discovered on clay tablets in the ancient Hittite capital of Hattusas, now Boghazköy, Turkey. The earliest of the tablets are from the 15th century B.C., but the myth itself is far older.

At the beginning of the story, which may have been enacted annually as a ritual drama, Telipinu is so impatient to be off and find a quiet grove where he can sleep that he puts his boots on the wrong feet. When he is gone, the earth loses its verdure and gods as well as human beings live in misery. After the gods have searched in vain for Telipinu, a bee is sent to find him and sting him awake. It only succeeds in angering him until he nearly destroys the earth with floods. Man is called in to help and participates in a long series of magical rites led by the Kamrusepas, which succeed in luring Telipinu back from his retirement and eventually in appeasing his anger. Fertility returns to the earth and there is a great celebration.

Tell, Wilhelm or William. The legendary national hero of Switzerland. In the 14th-century Swiss uprising against Austrian rule, he was supposedly a popular leader. Because of his refusal to salute the cap of Gessler, the imperial governor, as a sign of allegiance to Austria, he was forced to attempt to shoot an apple from the head of his own son with his crossbow. He succeeded in doing so, but afterward dropped an arrow from his jacket. When Gessler asked him what the second arrow was for, Tell replied, “To shoot you, if I had killed my son.” Gessler then ordered his imprisonment, but he was rescued by the peasantry and led his country to freedom from Austrian domination.

This legend is the subject of plays by Lemierre (1766), Schiller (1804), and Knowles (1840), and of Rossini’s opera William Tell (1829).

Saxo Grammaticus tells a similar story about the Danish Toki who killed Harold, and many other variations of the legend are found in Scandinavian and English folklore.

Téllez, Fray Gabriel. See Tiro de Molina. Telling the Bees (1858). A poem by John Greenleaf Whittier. The title is derived from the New England custom of telling the bees and draping their hives when a member of the family has died. A young man, coming to visit his beloved, sees that the hives are being covered. He assumes that her grandfather has died, but discovers that it is the girl himself.

Tell-Tale Heart, The (1843). A story by Edgar Allan Poe. The murderer of an old man buries the dismembered body beneath the floor in his room. While the police are investigating, he begins to hear the heartbeats of his victim. He confesses in a frenzy. When the body is recovered, the murdered man's watch is found to be ticking.

Tellus (Lat., "earth"). An ancient goddess of Rome, the symbol of fertility.

Temora, An Epic Poem (1763). One of the principal poems by James Macpherson and attributed by him to Ossian. Its title comes from the name given to the royal residence of the kings of Connaught. Cairbar has usurped the throne, having killed Cormac, a distant relative of Fingal (see Fingal, An Ancient Epic), and Fingal has raised an army to dethrone the usurper. The poem begins with an invitation from Cairbar to Oscar, son of Ossian, to a banquet. Oscar accepts the invitation, but during the feast a quarrel is hatched in which Cairbar and Oscar are each killed by the other's spear. When Fingal arrives, a battle ensues in which Fillan, son of Fingal and the Achillies of the Caledonian army, and Cathmor, brother of Cairbar and the bravest of the Irish army, are both slain. Victory finally crowns the army of Fingal, and Ferad-Artho, the rightful heir, is restored to the throne of Connaught.

Tempe. A valley in Greece, between Mount Olympus and Mount Ossa. The word was employed by the Greek and Roman poets as a synonym for any valley noted for its cool shades, singing birds, and romantic scenery.

Tempest, Lady Betty. In Oliver Goldsmith's epistolary novel The Citizen of the World, a lady of beauty, fortune, and rank, whose head is turned by plays and romances. Having rejected many offers of marriage because her suitors do not come up to her ideal, she is gradually left in the cold until she becomes company only for aunts and cousins, a wallflower in ballrooms, and "a piece of fashionable lumber" in society generally.

Tempest, Marie. Stage name of Dame Mary Susan Tempest (1866-1942). English actress. She was best known in her early years for her roles in musical comedies, later changing to dramatic roles. She became a theatrical manager in 1911, and starred in her own productions. She was made a Dame of the British Empire in 1937.

Tempest, The (c. 1611). The last play of William Shakespeare. Prospero, magician and philosopher, reigns over an enchanted island with his daughter Miranda. By use of magic, Prospero raises a tempest, causing a boat and its occupants to be washed ashore on the island. The boat contains the enemies who usurped Prospero's dukedom of Milan twelve years previously and cast him adrift on a bark with Miranda. The plot, planned by his brother Antonio and Alonso, the king of Naples, miscarried through the kindness of Gonzalo, an old counsellor, who had fitted Prospero's bark with supplies, unknown to his masters. Ferdinand, son of Alonso, is feared drowned by the others, but has landed alone on another part of the island, discovered Miranda, and fallen in love with her. Alonso, Antonio, and the others are led by the music of Ariel, the invisible sprite who serves Prospero, as they search for Ferdinand. At last they meet Prospero, who chastises them and orders them to right his wrongs. Alonso, rejoicing at finding Ferdinand alive, blesses the union of the young lovers and restores Prospero to his dukedom, whereupon Prospero renounces his magic and frees Ariel from his spell.

The play contains some of Shakespeare's famous lines and is among his most beautiful works. The existence of analogues to the play in Italian literature and elsewhere suggest the possibility of a source now lost. Prospero's speech denouncing magic was taken from a passage in Arthur Golding's translation (1565-1567) of Ovid's Metamorphoses, well known to Elizabethans. See Caliban; Sebastian.

Templars or Knights Templars. An order of knighthood founded about 1118 to guard the passage of pilgrims to Jerusalem. Begun in poverty—the seal shows two knights riding on one horse—it was joined by many noblemen who brought great wealth to the order. Their independent conduct on the battlefield eventually became an embarrassment rather than an aid to the king of Jerusalem, and their wealth and political power a threat to the kings in Europe. Thus the order was savagely crushed by many rulers and officially suppressed by the Pope in 1312.

Temple. The site, in London, between Fleet Street and the Thames, formerly occupied by the buildings of the Knights Templars. The Temple Church, dating from 1185, was the last of these buildings to remain standing. Since 1346 the Temple has been in the possession of doctors and students of the law, who, since 1609, have formed the two Inns of Court known as the Inner and Middle Temples. The area was thoroughly wrecked by Nazi bombs in World War II.

Temple, Charlotte. See Charlotte Temple.

Temple, The (1633). A collection of 160 religious poems by George Herbert. Deeply influential in its day, it inspired such works as Richard Crashaw's Steps to the Temple (1646).

Temple, Sir William (1628-1699). English diplomat, statesman, and author. At his estate at Moor Park in Surrey, Jonathan Swift worked as his secretary (1689 et seq.) helping him with his memoirs. It was here that Swift met Esther Johnson, a dependent of Temple's, when she was nine years old; he later immortalized her as "Stella."

Temple's best-known essay, Of Ancient and Modern Learning, started a controversy between Richard Bentley and Charles Boyle, the editor of a series of epistles which he and Sir William were satisfied had been written by the Sicilian tyrant Phalaris. Bentley showed them to be spurious. This wrangle brought forth Swift's famous The Battle of the Books.

Temps retrouvé, Le. See Remembrance of Things Past.

Tencin, Claudine Alexandrine Guérin de (1682-1749). French letter-writer, novelist, leader in Parisian intellectual circles, and mother of d'Alexerm (whom she callously left on a church doorstep). Her salons were the meeting place of many famous men, among whom were Marivaux, Montesquieu, and Bernard le Bovier de Fontenelle. The best of her Three romances is the Mémoires du comte de Comminges (1735). Though her conduct was considered scandalous and immoral, such men as the cardinal de Fleury, the grand-nephew of the cardinal de Richelieu, and Lord Chesterfield found it worthwhile to correspond with her because of her frank wit and vivacious style.

Ten Commandments. The Decalogue (Gr., “ten words”), or the laws revealed at Mount Sinai to Moses on the 3rd month after the Israelites' deliverance from Egypt. The Ten Commandments forbid polytheism, idolatry, murder, adultery, theft, false testimony, and covetousness while commanding that God's name be revered, the Sabbath kept holy, and one's father and mother be honored (Exod. 20:1–17). They were transcribed by Moses on two tablets of stone.

Tendai. A Japanese Buddhist sect. It teaches an elaborate, comprehensive form of Buddhism. Introduced to Japan by Sōkei (767–822), it is based on Chinese T'ang-T'ao and emphasizes the teachings of the Lotus Sutra. Its headquarters were at Mt. Hiei, near Kyoto. The popularity of esoteric Shingon Buddhism obliged Tendai to incorporate Shingon's doctrines during the Heian period (794–1185). Mt. Hiei was long the center of Japanese learning and culture, and the leaders of almost all the new sects of Japanese Buddhism had their early training here.

Tender Is the Night (1934). A novel by F. Scott Fitzgerald. In the hedonistic setting of post-World War I Europe, a wealthy mental patient, Nicole, falls passionately in love with her young psychiatrist, Dick Diver. She finds her cure in marrying him, but as she achieves mental stability and emotional independence, he deteriorates. Finally Nicole leaves him for a man who will be her lover and not her caretaker, and Dick begins an irreversible decline into alcoholism and dissolution. Diver is perhaps a reflection of Fitzgerald himself, who had painful experiences with his mentally disturbed wife, Zelda. Despite the book's many terrifying scenes, the warm tenderness of its writing lifts it into the realm of genuine tragedy. Fitzgerald kept reworking the book after its publication and initial failure with the public. After his death Malcolm Cowley made a new version (1951), in which the episodes were placed in chronological order and the flashback technique of the original version was abandoned.

Tennant, Kylie (1912– ). Australian novelist. She was born in New South Wales, and educated at Brighton College and the University of Sydney. Her books appear to have grown out of her personal experiences. Tiburnian (1935), a prize-winning novel, is a realistic and grim story of the depression. The Battlers (1941) drew on the same locale and circumstances. Her writings always show a definite sense of place, and her descriptions are poetic. Her other books include Foreaux (1939), Ride on Stranger (1943), Time Enough (1943), and Lost Haven (1946).

Tenniel, Sir John (1830–1914). English illustrator and cartoonist on the staff of Punch. He is best known as the illustrator of Alice's Adventures in Wonderland and Through the Looking Glass by Lewis Carroll. His illustrations have defined Carroll's characters in the public mind as sharply as the author's own descriptions. The cheery chubbiness of Tweedledum and Tweedledee, the outsized head of the Duchess, the calf's head and feet of the Mock Turtle, and the Hatter's hat with its price tag “In this style 10/6” are all the products of the illustrator's fancy. Tenniel's pictures so perfectly capture the illogic and whimsy of the text that few editions of the books have been printed without them.

Ten Nights in a Bar-Room and What I Saw There (1834). A story by Timothy Shay Arthur (1809–1885), American editor and reformer. A melodramatic temperance tale, it was a favorite among American readers for more than 20 years; in 1858, Arthur's book was dramatized by William W. Pratt. As a play, it was more in demand than any other, with the exception of Uncle Tom's Cabin. An important influence in the passage of many temperance laws, its climax was little Mary's song at the saloon door, “Father, dear Father, come home with me now.”

Tennyson, Alfred. 1st Baron Tennyson, commonly called Alfred, Lord Tennyson (1809–1892), English poet. Appointed Poet Laureate in 1850, he is considered highly representative of the Victorian age in England. In his early career, Tennyson was influenced by the English romantic poets, particularly John Keats. His poetry reflects the sensibility and the intellectual and moral values of his time and of the dominant Victorian social class, and is a characteristic of Tennyson's manuscript of The Throstle.

"Summer is coming, summer is coming, I know it, I know it, I know it.
Light again, rest again, joy again.
Yes, my baby, the poet.
Sing the line thee in versit the line
That year you sang it as gladly,
"Now, now, now, now!" It is then so new.
That you should care to mangle.
Yes, again, sing, again, rest again,
Rest a prophet so long!
And hardly a day as yet, like friend,
See, this is hardly a day.

"Here again here, here, here, happy ye,"
For words, unbidden, unbidden.
Summer is coming, it is coming, no door,
And all the winter we hidden.

response of his time and class to the encroachments of science in the domain of religious faith. He was the favorite target for the attacks of English and American poets of the late 19th and early 20th centuries who, rebelling against Victorian standards, denounced him for sentimentality, insipidity, intellectual shallowness, and narrow patriotism. Later critics have praised him for his metrical skill and the distinguished imagery of some of his brief lyrics; his longer poems, however, are still regarded as suffering the aforementioned weaknesses.

Tennyson's works include the following: Poems by Two Brothers (1827), early verse with his brother Charles Tennyson Turner; Poems, Chiefly Lyrical (1830); Poems (1842); Lockley Hall; The Princess; In Memoriam, often considered his greatest poem, though long; Ode on the Death of the Duke of Wellington (1852); Maud; Idylls of the King; Enoch Arden; Queen Mary (1875), Harold (1876), and Becket (1884), historical tragedies in verse; Tiresias, And Other Poems (1885); Lockley Hall Sixty Years After (1886); Demeter, And Other Poems (1889); The Death of Oenone (1892).

Tennyson was immensely popular and successful throughout his later career; the one enduring shadow in his life, aside from those inspired by his sensitive and somewhat melancholy temperament, was caused by the death of his friend Arthur Hallam. This early bereavement led not only to In Memoriam, but to a lifelong conflict between faith and doubt. See Break, Break, Break; Charge of the Light Brigade, The; Crossing the Bar; Higher Pantheism, The; Lord of Burleigh; May Queen; Palace of Art; Revenge, The.

Tenochtitlán. The capital of the Aztec empire and the site of modern Mexico City. Founded about 1325, the city was built on two marsh-bound islands in Lake Texcoco, which were connected to the mainland by a system of causeways; the islands were subsequently enlarged by means of floating gardens. It is said that Cortez wept when he saw the ruins of the city, completely destroyed in 1521 as a result of bitter fighting between Aztecs and Spaniards.

Ten Plagues. The plagues that facilitated the Jews' departure from Egypt (Exod. 7-12). All of these events are still common in this part of the world today. The first plague, the death of the Egyptian first-born, may have affected only the pharaoh's family. The first plague, the Nile turning to blood, was a flood of red silt from the Abyssinian headwaters. Following closely on each other, these plagues seemed miraculous. In the Bible, they are attributed to the power of God acting through Moses and his brother Aaron. A recitation of the 10 plagues is part of the PASSOVER ritual.

Tenth Muse Lately Sprung Up in America, The (1650). The first volume of poems written in North America, by Anne Bradstreet. Included in the collection are a Dialogue between Old England and New, and the ambitious Four Elements, Four Constitutions, Four Ages of Man, Four Seasons, and Four Monarchies, the last an incomplete attempt at writing universal history. Contemplations, which appeared in 1678 in the second edition of The Tenth Muse, is generally considered her best work; it is a meditative and descriptive poem, probably influenced by Edmund Spenser and Giles Fletcher.

tercet. In prosody, a synonym for triplet or stanza of three lines. Specifically, a tercet is a three-line stanza used in the terza rima form and in the two three-line divisions of the sestet of the Italian sonnet.

Terence. Full Latin name, Publius Terentius Afer (1857–159 B.C.). Comic playwright of ancient Rome, second only to Plautus. Born in Carthage within a year of the death of Plautus, he was taken as a man of 21 to Rome as the slave of the senator Terentius Lucanus. Impressed by the wit and learning of the young Carthaginian, his master set him free and helped him to continue his studies. His first play, the Andria (Maid of Andros) won him entry into what was called the "Scipionic Circle," the group of artists which was subsidized and encouraged by Scipio Africanus the Younger and his friend Lelius. His better-known works include the Eunuchus, the Phormio, and the Adelphi. He died at the age of 26.

Unlike his predecessor Plautus, Terence wrote thoughtful, psychologically refined comedies. He did not aim at strong wit or farcical effect but at sharp delineation of character and elegance of form. His faults stem, accordingly, from his virtues: he is sometimes dry and excessively refined, and often his plots display more skill than wit.

Teresa or Theresa, St., known as Santa Teresa de Jesús or St. Teresa of Avila. Real name: Teresa de Cepeda y Ahumada (1515–1582). Spanish nun and mystic. Born near Avila, she was devout even as a child and ran away from home at the age of seven to seek martyrdom among the Moors. In 1534 she became a Carmelite, later becoming mother superior of the order and the founder of 17 new convents. The story of her intense spiritual life, with its moments of ecstasy and depression, and of her struggles to reform the order is told in her letters, over 400 of which have been preserved, and in the autobiographical Libro de su vida and Libro de las fundaciones. She was canonized in 1622.

Her finest mystical work is Las moradas or El castillo interior (1583), in which she guides the reader through the "abodes" of the human soul until he reaches the innermost chamber, the dwelling-place of God. She also wrote the Camino de perfección (1583), which discusses ways of achieving perfection in the religious life.

Though her meaning is occasionally obscure, her style is artless and vivid, offering an excellent example of colloquial Castilian of the 16th century.

Tereus. Mythical king of Thrace. He married Procris, daughter of King Pandion of Athens, but later seduced her sister Philomela, then cut out the latter's tongue so that Procris should not learn of his act. Philomela told the story in a piece of embroidery, and Procris avenged herself on Tereus by feeding him their son Ilys at a banquet. Tereus tried to kill the two women, but was turned into a hoopoe, and they into a nightingale and a swallow. In the original Greek story, it is Procris who is the nightingale, but later Latin writers make Philomela the nightingale. Tereus appears in his form as a hoopoe in Aristophanes' The Birds.

Termagant. The name given by the Crusaders, and by the authors of medieval romances, to a Saracen idol or deity. The Saracens were popularly supposed to worship the Termagant. He was introduced into the Morality plays as a most violent and turbulent person in long, flowing Eastern robes, a dress that led to his acceptance as a woman, whence the name came to be applied to a shrewish, violently abusive virago.

Hamlet speaks of "outdoing Termagant." In old drama the degree of rant was the measure of villainy. Termagant and Herod, being considered the beau-ideal of all that is bad, were represented as settling everything by club law, and bawling so as to "split the ears of the groundlings."

Terminus. The Roman god of bounds. A boundary stone with a bust of the god was called a termus.

Terpander (c. 675 B.C.). Greek musician. He established at Sparta the first Greek school of music.

Terpine. See FAERIE QUEEN, THE.

Terpsichore. One of the 9 Muses of ancient Greece, the Muse of dancing and the dramatic chorus, and later of lyric poetry. She is usually represented seated, holding a lyre. Hence the adjective terpsichorean, pertaining to dancing.

Terre, La (The Soil). (1888). A novel by Emile Zola. One of the ROUGON-MACQUAI series, the theme deals with greed for land. The characters, French peasants, are portrayed with merciless realism.

Terre des hommes. See WIND, SAND, AND STARS.

Terror. See REIGN OF TERROR.

The rhyme scheme is thus a-b-a, b-c-b, c-d-c, d-e-d-e or a-b-a, b-c-b, c-d-c, d-e-d-e. Terza rima may be written in any meter, but iambic pentameter is preferred in English. Dante's Divine Comedy was written in this form, which was introduced into England by Sir Thomas Wyatt in the 16th century and has been used by Shelley, Byron, and other English poets.

Teseida. The first Tuscan epic, written in octaves by Giovanni Boccaccio. In addition to prefiguring the Orlando poems of Boiardo and Ariosto, the Teseida was used by Chaucer for The Knight's Tale, by Fletcher in The Two Noble Kinsmen, and by Dryden for his *Palamon and Arcite."

Tess of the D'Urbervilles, A Pure Woman. (1891). A novel by Thomas Hardy. Here Alec, the son of the house, forces Tess into sexual relations with him, and she becomes pregnant. The child, however, dies in infancy, and Tess hires herself out as a dairymaid on a farm. She falls in love with Angel Clare, a rector's son, and they marry. On their wedding night they indulge in mutual confessions. Though he expects to be forgiven for his own sinful past, Angel cannot forgive Tess for her past, in which she was victimized rather than sinful, and he deserts her. Some time later, Alec, now a preaching fanatic, entreats Tess to return to him. She does so in the belief that Angel will never leave her, and in the face of growing poverty. When the repentant Angel returns, and finding Tess with Alec, prepares to leave once again, Tess stabs and kills Alec in despair. She and Angel hide out for a time, but finally Tess is arrested and sentenced to death.

Thackeray, William Makepeace. (1811-1863). English novelist and satirist, best known for his satirical and moralistic studies of upper- and middle-class English life. Born in India of a wealthy merchant family, Thackeray moved to England at the age of six upon the death of his father. Leaving Trinity College, Cambridge, without a degree, he read law but abandoned the idea of the bar in order to explore journalism and art. Losing his inheritance in 1833, he spent three years in Paris studying unsuccessfully to be a painter. In 1836 he married Isabella Shawe and returned to England, resolved to try his luck as a writer. Thackeray gained a degree of recognition as a contributor of sketches to the Times and to Prazer's Magazine and as the author of such works as The Yellowplush Correspondence (1838), A Shabby Gentleman's Story (1840), The Paris Sketch Book (1840), The Fitz Boodle Papers, The Irish Sketch Book (1843), and Notes of a Journey from Cornwall to Grand Cairo (1846). His literary success, however, had been tragically offset in 1840 when his wife, having borne him three daughters, lost her sanity and never recovered it, though she survived Thackeray by 30 years.

From 1842 to 1851 Thackeray was on the staff of Punch, to which he contributed the satires later published as The Book of Snobs (1848). With the appearance of this work and of Vanity Fair, he won a popular and critical reputation that he went on to consolidate with such novels as Pendennis; Henry Esmond and its sequel, The Virginians; and The Newcomes. His other works include the Memoirs of Barry Lyndon; several Christmas books, among them Mrs. Perkins's Ball (1846), Rebecca and Rowena, and The Rose and the Ring; The English Humorists of the Eighteenth Century (1851) and The Four Georges (1855), lectures delivered in Great Britain and the U.S.; The Adventures of Philip; and The Roundabout Papers (1863), essays written for the Cornhill Magazine, of which Thackeray was editor from 1860 to 1862. A novel, Denis Duval (1864), was left unfinished at his death. Shortly before he died, Thackeray was reconciled with Charles Dickens, with whom he had been feuding since 1858.

Thaís (1890). A novel by Anatole France. Inspired by one of the tales in the Golden Legend, it is an ironic story of Phanputhis, a young Alexandrian debauché turned monk. Leading an ascetic life in the desert, he interprets his voluptuous dreams of the famous courtesan Thaís as a call to convert her to Christianity. He succeeds in this aim, and she lives a short but saintly life as a hermit. Phanputhis, however, still dreams of her. In his attempt to hide from himself his lust for her, he mortifies his flesh relentlessly, and even spends some time as a stylite atop a high pillar. Finally he realizes his true feelings and tries to persuade her to flee the convent with him. As she dies, the abbess sends him away, horrified at the savagery that is finally revealed on his face.

One of the magicians, Abdalaur, seeks to kill Thalaba, but dies in the attempt. Thalaba takes a magic ring from Abdalaur's finger; from the ring he learns that his father was slain by one of the magicians. He learns that he will accomplish his revenge with faith and that the ring will protect him from the magicians. He succeeds in destroying Domdaniel and the sorcerers, but sacrifices his own life in so doing. He is ultimately united with his wife Oneiza in Paradise.

Thales (c. 624–c. 546 B.C.). A Greek philosopher of the MILESIAN SCHOOL. Regarded by some as the founder of Greek philosophy, he was considered one of the seven wise men of ancient Greece. He made several discoveries in geometry and astronomy, on one occasion accurately predicting an eclipse. Not satisfied with the answers provided by mythology, he searched for the primary substance in the universe, so that he could explain change as well as stability. He believed that water was this substance.

According to tradition, Thales replied to the charge of being an impractical philosopher by going into the olive-oil business, and becoming very wealthy.

Thamyris. A Thracian bard. He is mentioned by Homer (Iliad, ii.595). He challenged the Muses to a trial of skill, and, being overcome in the contest, was deprived by them of his sight and power of song.

Thanatopsis (1817). A poem by William Cullen Bryant. Inspired by the English Graveyard School of poetry, Bryant's poem seeks comfort in Nature for death. The earth, tomb of mankind, will cover all who now laugh or chase their "favorite phantoms." The poet advises, then, that when our time comes to join the "innumerable caravan":

Like one who wraps the drapery of his couch
About him, and lies down to pleasant dreams.

Thanet, Octave. See Alice French.

Thatcher, Becky. A young girl in Mark Twain's Adventures of Tom Sawyer. She is lost in the cave with Tom.

Thaumasté (Gr., "admirable"). In Rabelais' Gargantua and Pantagruel, a great English scholar who goes to Paris attracted by the rumor of the great wisdom of Pantagruel. He proposes a disputation over philosophy, geomancy, the cabala, and other abstruse subjects to be carried on, not in words, but in gestures alone, "for these subjects are too profound for human words to explain them to my satisfaction." Panurge offers to dispute as his master's disciple, while Pantagruel arbitrates. The ensuing description of their pantomime is a masterly satire on the mechanical and empty arguments of the last of the scholastics. Finally, Thaumastus declares that he is fully satisfied, for "Panurge had told him even more than he had asked."

thaw, the. The name applied to the period of relative relaxation in Soviet life and culture following Stalin's death in 1953. The name was taken from the title of a novel by Ilya Ehrenburg, which was one of the first of a growing stream of works criticizing aspects of Soviet life. The unaccustomed freedom of writers to comment openly, if carefully, on their society reached its peak in 1956 with the publication of such works as Dudintsev's Not by Bread Alone, and Aleksandr Yashin's story Levees. Previously outlawed older writers such as Yuri Olisha, Isaak Babel, and Anna Akhmatova were reprinted at this time. The growing concern of Soviet authorities at the criticism, spurred by the 1956 Hungarian revolution, brought a curtailment of the limited freedom the writers had been allowed.

Theaeetetus (Theaicetus). A dialogue by Plato on the nature of knowledge. Theaeetus, an Athenian mathematician, has been mortally wounded in the Corinthian War, and the news recalls to a friend a conversation Theaeetus and Socrates had once had. The subject is resumed in the dialogue called the Sophist which includes Socrates' comment that he is the midwife of men's thoughts.

It has specialized in giving the plays of George Bernard Shaw and Eugene O'Neill as well as reviving old plays and giving plays by newer American authors.

Théâtre de l’Oeuvre. See Aurélien-François Lugné-Poë.

Théâtre Libre. See André Antoine.

Théâtre National Populaire. A theater created by the French government, under the direction of Jean Vilar. The aim of the new theater was to revitalize drama and to convey the life and excitement of the stage world to a wide audience. The plays, produced at the Palais de Chaillot in Paris, appeal to a range of interests: they are both French and foreign, classic and modern. Vilar is a director well suited to the attempt to establish a sense of communion between actors and audience. His staging is starkly simple; he imposes no footlights or elaborate props between the play and the playgoers.

Theban Eagle. An epitaph applied to Pindar, born at Thebes (c. 520-435 B.C.). He was also called the Theban Lyre.

Thebes (Thebae). Called The Hundred-Gated, the chief town of the Thebaid, on the Nile in Upper Egypt, said to have extended over 23 miles of land. Homer says out of each gate the Thebans could send forth 200 war chariots.

It is here that the vocal statute of Memnon stood, and here too are the tombs of the kings, the temple of Karnak, and large numbers of sculptures, sphinxes, etc. The village of Luxor now marks the spot.

Thebes (Thebais). Called the Seven-Gated, the chief city of Boeotia, according to legend named after the nymph Thebe (see Ampion). Founded, according to legend, by Cadmus, it was the birthplace of Dionysus and the scene of the tragic events that began with the birth of Oedipus and continued through the wars of his sons (see Seven Against Thebes) and grandsons, the Epigoni. It was still an important city in classical times.

Théélême, abbey of (Gr., "will, pleasure"). In Rabelais' Gargantua and Pantagruel, the abbey given by Gargantua to Friar John for the aid he rendered in the war against Picrochole. Built like a magnificent castle, it was the very reverse of a convent or monastery. Thélémites were free to leave when they chose; they could marry, own wealth, and live in perfect freedom. The only rule was "Do as thou wilt."

Themis. In Greek mythology, one of the Titans, and goddess of Natural Law and Justice. She was regarded as an earth-goddess, and was one of the earliest patronesses of the Delphic Oracle.

Themistocles ('Themistokles; c. 528-c. 462 B.C.). An Athenian statesman and general. Thucydides spoke of him as a man of genius. He persuaded the Athenians to concentrate on the development of sea power, building up their fleet to 200 triremes. When the Persians led by Xerxes invaded Greece, Themistocles tried vainly to persuade the united Greeks to engage them by sea in the Bay of Salamis, where their more maneuverable vessels would have a tactical advantage. He then sent a message to the Persians that the Greeks were about to flee in disarray. The message had the intended effect, and the Persians at once surrounded the deliberating allies at Salamis. The battle (480 B.C.) was a great victory for the Greeks.

It was on Themistocles' advice that the Athenians rebuilt the walls of Athens and erected a walled way to her port at Piraeus. After the war, Themistocles became unpopular; he was banished and reportedly accessible to bribes. Ostracized, he moved to Argos, but was accused of treason. In time, he fled to the Persian court of Artaxerxes, where he was awarded the Asin Kingdom of Magnesia. At his death, the Magnesians erected a statue of the "savior of Greece" in their market place.

Theocritus ('Theokritos, early 3d century B.C.). A Greek poet. He was probably born in Syracuse. He is regarded as the inventor of the pastoral. Only about 30 of his works are extant; they include mainly the Idyls.

Theodora (508?-548). Empress of the Byzantine Empire, wife of Justinian I. She was an actress and noted for her beauty. She had great influence over Justinian and on the political and religious thinking at court.

Theodoric the Great (c. 454-c. 526). A king of the Ostrogoths who invaded Italy, then ruled it in peace after 493. He is the origin of the heroic Dietrich of Bern in Germanic legends such as the Heldenbuch and the Nibelungenlied, but there he is described as fleeing from Italy to the court of Etzel (Attila, king of the Huns).

Theognis (6th century B.C.). He expressed his distaste for the lower classes in elegiac verse. The collection attributed to him also contains the work of other poets.

Theon. A satirical poet of ancient Rome. He is noted for his mordant writings; hence, Theon's tooth means the bite of an ill-natured or carping critic.

Theophrastus (c. 370-285 B.C.). A Greek philosopher, successor to Aristotle. Originally named Tyrtamus, he was called Theophrastus or divine speaker by Aristotle, because of his eloquence. As the leader of the Peripatetic School, he continued the work of Aristotle in natural history and botany. The surviving fragments show very little originality of conception, and the whole school seems to have kept strictly within the boundaries sketched by Aristotle.

Theory of the Leisure Class, The (1899). An economic treatise by Thorstein Veblen. Veblen held that the feudal subdivision of classes had continued into modern times, the lords employing themselves uselessly (as in hunting animals) while the lower classes labored at industrial pursuits to support the whole of society. The leisure class, Veblen said, justifies itself solely by practicing "conspicuous leisure and conspicuous consumption"; he defined waste as any activity not contributing to material productivity. H. L. Mencken later attacked Veblen in Prejudices (1919), calling the economist's theory of conspicuous waste "one per cent platitude and 99 per cent nonsense."

Theosophy (Gr., theos, god; sophia, wisdom). A term applied in the 17th century to describe speculation that sought a deeper knowledge and control of nature than the current philosophical methods could achieve; this deeper knowledge of nature was to be obtained through a knowledge of God found in secret books and derived from a mystical interpretation of tradition. The term was specifically applied to the system of Jacob Boehme.

Later the term was adopted by the Theosophical Society founded (1875) in New York by Col. H. S. Olcott, Mrs. Blavatsky, and others. Their aims included the promotion of study of Eastern literature, religions, and sciences, and a study of the unfamiliar laws in nature and latent faculties in man.

Theotocopoulos, Kyriakos. See El Greco.

Theresa of Avila, St. See Teresa de Jesús.

Théodore desqueyroux (1927). A novel by François Mauriac. The title character, feeling herself stifled by the bourgeois proprieties of her marriage, attempts to poison her husband. She is acquitted at her trial, however, through her family's efforts to avoid scandal.

There Shall Be No Night (1940). A play by Robert E. Sherwood. Set in Finland, it deals with a brilliant neurologist who refuses to face the threat of war. When his native country is drawn into war with Russia and his only son is killed, he takes a stand. At his death, his American wife is left alone to defend their home. The play was awarded a Pulitzer Prize.

Thermidorian (from Gr., thermē, "heat," and doron, "gift"). 11th month in the French Revolutionary Calendar, containing 30 days beginning July 19.

Thermopylae. The designation used for the milder French Revolutionists who took part in the coup d'état that overthrew Rossbrueville and Thermidor 9 of the second republican year (July 27, 1794), thus bringing to a close the Reign of Terror.

Thermopylae, Battle of. See Persian Wars.

Thersander (Thersandros). In Greek mythology, a son of Polyneices. By bribing Epiphylus, he won the support of her son Alcmaeon, who led the successful war of the Epigoni on Thebes to avenge their fathers. According to some stories, Thersander joined the expedition against Troy, but was killed in Myia. In the Aeneid, however, he is one of the Greek soldiers who hid in the Trojan Horse.

Thersites. In Homer's Iliad a deformed, scurilous officer in the Greek army at the siege of Troy. He was always railing at the chiefs; hence, the name is applied to any dastardly, malevolent, impudent railler against the powers that be. Achilles felled him with his fist and killed him. In Shakespeare's Troilus and Cressida he is "a slave whose gall coin sands like a mint."

Those Thirteen (1931). A collection of short stories by William Faulkner. This volume contains one of the best known of all Faulkner's stories, A Rose for Emily. It tells of an aristocratic, eccentric, and aging Southern spinster, Miss Emily Grierson, who has been courted by Homer Barron, a Yankee construction worker, who then disappears. When Miss Emily dies years later, having become a legend, the townspeople find the skeleton of Barron locked in an upstairs bedroom. The volume also contains two stories dealing with the Indians who inhabited the land before the white settlers arrived: Red Leaves and A Justice.

Theseus. The chief hero of Attica in ancient Greek legend; son of Aegeus and the performer of innumerable exploits. He is sometimes also described as the son of Poseidon. He was brought up by his mother Aethra, but when he became strong enough to lift the stone under which his father's sword was hidden, he was sent to the court of Athens, where, in spite of the efforts of his father's wife Medea, he was recognized as heir to the throne. Among his deeds were the slaying of Procrustes, Sciron, Sinis, and the Crommyonian sow; the capture of the Marathonian bull; the slaying of the Minotaur with the aid of Ariadne, whom he subsequently deserted in Naxos; his war against the Amazons; his part in the expedition of the Argonauts, and the hunt for the Calydonian boar. He defends Oedipus in Sophocles' Oedipus at Colonus.

There are numerous versions of his war against the Amazons. He married the Amazonian queen who opposed him, known as either Antiope or Hippolyta (according to some accounts there were two sisters of these names) and took her home with him. After the death of this queen, he married PHAEDRA whose ill-fated infatuation with her stepson Hippolytus has formed the subject of many tragedies in which Theseus plays a part. In his old age he became unpopular with his people and was foully murdered by Lycomedes in Scyros, where he had taken refuge. He is the hero of two fine historical novels by Mary Renault, The King Must Die and The Bull from the Sea.

According to medieval legend, Theseus' title was duke of Athens and his duchess was Hippolyta. Under this title he plays a part in Chaucer's Knight's Tale. In the Knight's Tale, he marries Hippolyta, and as he returns home with his bride and Emily, her sister, he is accosted by a crowd of female suppliants who complain of Creon, king of Thebes. The duke forthwith sets out for Thebes, slays Creon, and takes the city by assault. Many captives fall into his hands, among them the two knights Palamon and Arcite.

As the duke of Athens, Theseus appears in Shakespeare's Midsummer Night's Dream. He is betrothed to Hippolyta, queen of the Amazons, and it is because of him that the action of the play takes place.

Thesmophoriazusai (411 B.C.). A comedy by Aristophanes. The plot is based on the notion that the women of Athens plan to kill Euripides for presenting them in so harsh a light in his plays—a crime of which, in real life, Euripides was not guilty. He tries to persuade the effeminate tragic poet Agathon to attend in women's dress the annual festival of Athenian women, the Thesmophoria, in order to plead Euripides' case. Agathon refuses, but lends his women's clothes to Euripides' father-in-law Mnesilochus. The Women Who Celebrate the Thesmophoria (the meaning of the title) resent Mnesilochus' arguments and, on penetrating his disguise, threaten to burn him. Euripides comes to the rescue and both men play several roles from Euripides' plays in hilarious attempts to outwit the women and a policeman. Finally Euripides is reconciled with the women.

Thespis (6th century B.C.). An Attic poet, regarded as the father of Greek tragedy. His chief contribution to drama, of which he may be considered the inventor, seems to have been that he gave lines of dialogue in dramatic narratives to specific members of the chorus, hitherto entirely performed by the whole chorus. Thus he would have performed a service similar to that of the unknown priests who first assigned the Quae sunt quae sunt? line from the Easter gospel to individual voices, thereby giving birth to medieval drama.

Thessalonians, The First Epistle and The Second Epistle of Paul the Apostle to the. Two books of the New Testament. The first letter is possibly the oldest portion of the New Testament to be preserved in its original form. It was written c. A.D. 50 to the church at Thessalonica to answer questions about the expected second coming of Jesus. The second letter elaborates on the first.

Thetis. Greek sea-goddess, daughter of Nereus. She was loved by Zeus and Poseidon, but, when Themis or Prometheus disclosed that she was fated to bear a son greater than its father, Zeus quickly wedded her to the hero Peleus. Their wedding was a brilliant celebration attended by the gods, but marred by the incident of the Apple of Discord. Thetis bore Achilles and proceeded to immortalize him by dipping him in the river Styx; only the heel by which she held him remained mortal. In another version, she held him in the fire, but when Peleus saw her and cried out, she dropped the child on the floor and left the house forever. When Achilles was grown to manhood, she warned him to return home from Troy in order to live a long life, but he preferred a short, glorious one. The tragic events recorded in the Iliad resulted in part from her plea to Zeus to punish the Greeks for having offended her son. It was Thetis and Eurynome who caught Hephaestus when he was thrown out of heaven. She aided the Argonauts to pass through the Clashing Rocks.

Thévenin, Denis. See Georges Duhamel.

They Knew What They Wanted (1924). A play by Sidney Howard. Tony Patucci, a California winegrower, misleads his mail-order bride-to-be, Amy, by sending her a picture of his handsome young hired man Joe. On their wedding day Tony breaks both his legs, and Amy, humiliated and confused, allows Joe to seduce her and becomes pregnant. Tony nearly kills the younger man, but finally allows Amy to stay. The play was awarded a Pulitzer Prize. It was later filmed, and still later became the basis of the musical The Most Happy Fella (1957) by Frank Loesser.

Thibault, Jacques Anatole François. See Anatole France.

Thibaults, Les (1922–1940). Novel series by Roger Martin de Gard. In the tradition of the 19th-century naturalists, this work is marked by objectivity and the amassing of precise detail. Two brothers, Jacques and Antoine Thibault, react as individuals to their bourgeois environment. Antoine leads a simple, dutiful existence while Jacques succumbs to his rebellious, adventurous temperament. The personal histories of the two main characters are set against a sweeping backdrop of World violence and chaos; both men die in the First World War.

Thief, Penitent. See Dismas.

Thief, The (Vor; 1927). A novel by Leonid Leonov. The book is set during the time of the New Economic Policy in Soviet Russia. The hero of the novel, Mitka Vekshin, has fought courageously during the civil war but emerges from the combat with inner conflicts about whether the killing was worthwhile. Disaffected with the humdrum life of building a society he is not sure he wants, he becomes a thief. The picture of the Moscow underworld, with its odd characters and the psychological probing of their personalities, reveals Dostoevski's influence on Leonov in this work. A further similarity is to be found in the novel's frenetically paced prose. The disillusionment with Soviet society implied in Leonov's description of life during the NEP period caused the novel to be severely criticized by Soviet reviewers. For years the work was not included in Leonov's collected works, and it is only after he recently revised it that it was reprinted at all.

Thiers, Louis Adolphe (1797–1877). French statesman and historical writer. A leader of the liberals (1863–1870) against Napoleon III (see July Revolution), Thiers negotiated the peace treaty with Germany in 1871. He disposed of the Paris Commune, and was elected the first president (1871–1873) of the Third Republic. His most famous works are Histoire de la Revolution francaise (1823-1827) and Histoire du consulat et de l'empire (1845-1862).

third estate. The third of the social classes, or "estates," according to political theory of medieval and feudal times. It comprised peasants, serfs, yeomen, and the early bourgeois; the nobles and clergy constituted the first two estates. In France the third estate was known as siers etat and was without representation until the Revolution of 1789, at which time it declared itself to be the National Assembly. The three estates together formed the etats-generaux or States-General, which was something like the English Parliament.

Third Man, The (1950). A thriller by Graham GREENE. Concerned with love and intrigue in postwar Vienna, it was later made into a movie directed by Carol Reed.

Third Reich (Third Empire). The name given to Germany by Hitler during his dictatorship (1933-1945). In his terminology, the Holy Roman Empire was the First Reich and the German Empire of Bismarck the Second. The Third Reich, Hitler prophesied, would last a thousand years.

Thirkell, Angela (1890-1961). English novelist. She was the daughter of J. W. Mackail, granddaughter of Edward Burne-Jones, and cousin of Rudyard Kipling. She wrote light, popular novels about Anthony Trollope's BARESHIRE: The Brandons (1939), Northbridge Rectory (1942) and Coronation Summer (1953).

Thirteen Questions of Love. An episode in Giovanni Boccaccio's prose romance FILOCOLO. The hero, shipwrecked at Naples, is invited to join a party in a garden. One of the young ladies, Fiammetta, is chosen to preside over a discussion of love problems and to render a decision in each case. Since the statement of the problem involves the telling of stories, the whole scene is THE DECAMERON's frame story in embryo.

Thirty-Nine Articles, The. The articles of faith of the Church of England, the acceptance of which is obligatory on its clergy. They were originally issued in 1551 as 42, but in 1563 were modified and reduced to their present number. They received parliamentary authority in 1571.

Thirty-Nine Steps, The (1915). An adventure romance by John BUCHAN. Its hero and narrator, Richard HANNAY, uncovers a spy ring and forestalls an invasion of Britain. It was filmed by Alfred Hitchcock.

Thirty Tyrants, the. (1) The 30 magistrates appointed by Sparta over Athens at the termination of the PELOPONNESIAN WAR. This reign of terror, after one year's continuance was overthrown by THRAPEUS (403 B.C.).

(2) In the Roman empire, those military usurpers who endeavored, in the reigns of Valerian and Gallienus (253-268), to make themselves independent princes, are also called the Thirty Tyrants. The number must be taken with great latitude, as only 19 are given, and their resemblance to those of Athens is extremely fanciful.

Thirty Years War (1618-1648). A war that devastated central Europe, especially Germany, and eventually involved most of the nations of Europe. It was originally a religious conflict between Protestants and Roman Catholics; northern Germany, supported by the former, and southern Germany, led by Austria, supported the latter. Later, political issues overshadowed religion as Sweden and France entered the struggle in an effort to crush the power of the Hapsburgs. The immediate cause of the war was a revolt (1618) of Bohemian Protestants whose religious rights had been violated by Austria. The Peace of Westphalia (1648) made territorial concessions to France and Sweden, recognized the independence of Switzerland and the Netherlands, and upheld the autonomy of the states of the German empire. It also confirmed the Peace of Augsburg (1555), which granted freedom of worship to the princes and free cities of Germany, and extended its provisions to include Calvinists.

Thisbe. See PYRAMUS.

This Side of Paradise (1920). A novel by F. SCOTT FITZGERALD. Amory Blaine, a handsome, wealthy, spoiled and snobbish young man from the Middle West, attends Princeton University and acquires a refined sense of the proper "social" values. Lacking all sense of purpose, he interests himself primarily in literary cults, vaguely "liberal" student activities, and a series of flirtations with some rather predatory young ladies that culminate in a genuine but ill-fated love for Isabelle Borgé, who rejects Amory to marry a wealthier young man. During the war Amory serves as an officer in France, and upon his return home he embarks upon a career in advertising, world-weary, cynical, regretful, and not yet thirty years old. Virtually a record of the "lost generation" in its college days, the novel treats Fitzgerald's characteristic theme of true love blighted by money-lust and is remarkable for its honest and detailed descriptions of the early "Jazz Age." The book established Fitzgerald's reputation.

Thomas, St. One of the 12. He was the disciple of Jesus who doubted (John 21:25); hence the phrase, a doubting Thomas, applied to a skeptic. The story told of him in the Apocryphal Acts of St. Thomas is that he was deputed to go as a missionary to India, and, when he refused, Christ appeared and sold him as a slave to an Indian prince who was visiting Jerusalem. He was taken to India, where he baptized the prince and many others, and was finally martyred at Melaipore. His day is December 21.

Another legend has it that Gondoforus, king of the Indies, gave him a large sum of money to build a palace. St. Thomas spent it on the poor, "thus erecting a superb palace in heaven." On account of this he is the patron saint of masons and architects, and his symbol is a builder's square. Still another legend relates that he once saw a huge beam of timber floating on the sea near the coast, and the king unsuccessfully endeavoring, with men and elephants, to haul it ashore. St. Thomas desired leave to use it in building a church. When his request was granted he dragged it easily ashore with a piece of pack thread.

Thomas, Dylan [Marlais] (1914–1953). Welsh poet and prose writer. His poetry is remarkable for its lyrical power, its surrealism, its compact, vivid metaphors, its use of Christian and Freudian imagery, and its puns and intricate patterns of sound and meaning, influenced by the work of Gerard Manley Hopkins. It expresses Thomas’ personal religion, celebrating the glory and wonder of procreation, growth, and death. He published his first volume of poetry, Eighteen Poems, in 1934; the leaders of the New APOCALYPSE movement in poetry imitated and advocated his visionary style. His Collected Poems appeared in 1953. Among Dylan Thomas’ best-known individual poems are And death shall have no dominion, Altarwise by Owl-light (a sonnet sequence), A Refusal to Mourn the Death, by Fire, of a Child in London, Do not go gentle into that good night, In My Craft and Sullen Art, and Fern Hill.

Thomas’ earliest prose works were surrealistic short stories; they were not published until 1955 when they appeared as Adventures in the Skin Trade. In the 1940’s he worked on film and radio scenarios; he began to write more popular and humorous but still poetic prose, expressing his exuberant love of life. Portrait of the Artist as a Young Dog (1940) is a collection of stories about his childhood and youth; the title reflects Thomas’ admiration for James Joyce. Unwnd Milk Wood (1954) is a radio play for voices. He also wrote Quite Early One Morning (1954) and A Prospect of the Sea (1955).

Through his radio work and his poetry readings in England and the U.S., Thomas achieved wide popular appeal. His reputation thrived on the storms of his private life, his tempestuous marriage with his wife Caitlin, and his alcoholism. His death in New York in 1953 was regarded as an international event, symbolic of the plight of the artist in modern society.

Thomas, Edith Matilda (1854–1925). American poet. A friend of Helen Hunt Jackson, she published several books of verse, including A New Year’s Masque and Other Poems (1885), Lyrics and Sonnets (1887), and The Flower from the Ashes (1915).

Thomas, [Philip] Edward (1878–1917). English poet and critic. Associated with the GEORGians, he was for some years dismissed as just another old-fashioned nature poet, but he has recently been rediscovered as an original writer about life and the human consciousness. He was a friend of Robert Frost and the two poets’ work is in many ways alike. He was killed in action during World War I. His Collected Poems, with a preface by Walter de la Mare, appeared in 1920; among his best-known single poems are Old Man, Adlestrop, and The Glory. His widow, Helen Thomas, wrote moving accounts of their relationship in As It Was (1926) and World Without End (1930).

Thomas, Norman [Mattoon] (1884– ). American political leader and socialist. A graduate of Princeton University and an ordained Presbyterian minister, Thomas founded and edited World Tomorrow from 1918 to 1921. Eventually he resigned his ministerial duties to devote his entire time to writing and speaking for social reform and pacifism. As a Socialist Party candidate he ran unsuccessfully for many offices, including the presidency (1928–1948). His books include The Challenge of War (1925), Socialism of Our Time (1929), A Socialist’s Faith (1951), and The Great Dissenter (1961).

Thomas, Theodore (1835–1905). German-born American conductor. He founded in 1862 an orchestra bearing his name, which he conducted on many tours in America. He was the conductor of the New York Philharmonic from 1877 to 1891 and of the Chicago Symphony from 1891 to 1905.

Thomas à Becket, Sir. Also known as St. Thomas Becket or Thomas of London (1118–1170). English prelate, archbishop of Canterbury (1162–1170). Against the lay interference of Henry II, he defended the rights of the Church without compromise. In 1164 he was forced to flee to France. Papal pressure brought about the king’s reconciliation with him, but, after his return to England in 1170, he was murdered on December 29 in Canterbury Cathedral by four overzealous knights of Henry’s court. Two years later he was canonized. His shrine was plundered by Henry VIII, and his name erased from the English church calendar. The lively company in Chaucer’s Canterbury Tales are making a pilgrimage to St. Thomas à Becket’s shrine. His martyrdom is the subject of T. S. Eliot’s play Murder in the Cathedral and of Jean Anouilh’s play Becket.

Thomas à Kempis. More properly, Thomas Hammerken von Kempen (c. 1380–1471). German monk and writer. He is generally regarded as the author of the Imitation of Christ. He entered the Augustinian monastery of Mt. St. Agnes in 1407, where he spent the rest of his life in meditation and writing.

Thomas Aquinas, St. See St. Thomas AQUINAS.

Thomism, Thomists. See St. Thomas AQUINAS.

Thompson, Benjamin, Count Rumford (1753–1814). American-born adventurer and scientist. A loyalist during the American Revolution, he entered the service of the elector of Bavaria and was created a count of the Holy Roman Empire. In England he made improvements in heating and cooking equipment for houses and helped organize the Royal Academy.

Thompson, Daniel Pierce. See GREEN MOUNTAIN BOYS, THE.

Thompson, Dorothy (1894–1961). American journalist. One of the most able newspaperwomen of her generation, she established her reputation as a foreign correspondent in Germany and Vienna during the 1920’s. Later she wrote the widely syndicated column On the Record, in which she discussed foreign and domestic affairs. One of her books, The New Russia (1928), involved her in a controversy with Theodore Dreiser, whom she accused of plagiarizing from it. From 1928 to 1942 she was married to Sinclair Lewis; their marriage is the subject of Dorothy and Red (1963), an account by Vincent Sheean.

Thompson, Francis (1859–1907). English poet. He studied medicine in his early youth, but never received a degree. He was extremely unpractical and was unable to make a living for himself in London, failing at such diverse attempts as shoe-making, errand-running, and match-selling. He became addicted to opium, starved, and attempted suicide. During this period of misery, he wrote his earliest poems, some of which were accepted for publication by Wilfred Meynell in his magazine Merry England. Thereafter, Thomson lived with Wilfrid and Alice Meynell who nursed him and encouraged him in his writing.

His Poems (1893) contains his famous poem, The Hound of Heaven; later publications include Sister Songs (1895), New Poems (1897), and the prose pieces Health and Holness (1905), Life of St. Ignatius Loyola (1909), Essays on Shelley (1909), and Life of John Baptist de la Galle (1911). In color and imagery, Thomson’s work shows the marked influence of Keats and Shelley, and in spirit and tone it is often akin to that of the metaphysical poets. A devout Roman Catholic, Thomson frequently presented ecstatic visions of heaven in his mystical poetry.

Thomson, Sadie. See Miss Thomson.

Thomson, James (1700–1748). Scottish-born English poet, known as a forerunner of romanticism in a period when neoclassicism held sway in literature, and except for Alexander Pope, the most celebrated poet of the first half of the 18th century. His best-known works are The Seasons and The Castle of Indolence. Both poems are marked by their love of nature, fantasy, and sensuous imagery, all romantic qualities unique at the time of composition. Thomson was one of the first to write nature poetry in the manner of the later romantics. He also wrote A Poem Sacred to the Memory of Sir Isaac Newton (1727); Sophonisba (1731), a tragedy; Liberty (1735–1736), a long poem, which he considered his best work, setting forth the view that political liberty was attained in Greece, lost in the Middle Ages, and regained in Great Britain; and the masque Alfred (1740), in which he collaborated with David Mallet, and which contains the famous Rule, Britannia.

Thomson, James (1834–1882). English poet, known for his savage melancholy, atheism, and political radicalism. Thomson had an extremely unhappy life. His alcoholic father was paralyzed when the poet was six. Two years later his mother, who had suffered from acute religious melancholy, died. The virtually orphaned child was sent to an institution. For a time he was an army instructor in Ireland, there meeting the love of his life, a beautiful 16-year-old girl, Matilda Weller, who died before they could be married. Later he became a radical journalist and held a number of miscellaneous, precarious jobs. His death came as the result of chronic alcoholism. The despair engendered by his experience (and the philosophical pessimism of the late 19th century, as well) is best expressed in his The City of Dreadful Night, in which the poet pursues the enigma of fate through a magnificently realized, terrifying city of nightmare. Much of Thomson’s work is in this vein, but some poems, such as his accounts of Cockney life in Sunday at Hampstead (1863) and Sunday up the River (1883) reveal a humorous, realistic side of his talent. His volumes of poetry include The City of Dreadful Night (1880); Vane’s Story and Other Poems (1881); Insomnia (1881); and the posthumous A Voice From the Nite (1884). Many of his poems were published under the pseudonym Bysshe Shelley and B.V., a compound of the names of Percy Bysshe Shelley and Novos. He also wrote critical studies of Whitman, Heine, and numerous English writers, as well as notable translations of Leopardi.

Thomson, Virgil (1896–). American composer and music critic. An intimate friend of Gertrude Stein, he wrote two operas to her librettos: Four Saints in Three Acts and The Mother of Us All (1947), the latter based on Susan B. Anthony’s fight for women’s rights. His witty and perceptive musical criticism is the basis of several books: The State of Music (1939), The Musical Scene (1945), The Art of Judging Music (1948), and others. He has also written some fine film music, including the score for Robert Flaherty’s Louisiana Story (1948).

Thomps, Sir. One of the Canterbury Tales of Geoffrey Chaucer, a stanzaic parody of minstrel romances, begun by Chaucer when the Host asks him for a tale. In greatly exaggerated detail Sir Thophs is described as an exemplary knight of Flanders who rides out, determined to love no one but an elf-queen. He meets the giant Olifaunt, escapes the stones thrown at him, and goes home to get his armor so he can give battle. At this point the Host interrupts, calling the rhyme “doggerel” and worse. Chaucer then offers to tell a “little thing in prose”: see Mellbee.

Thor. In Norse mythology, the Aesir god of thunder, second in importance to his father Odin. Perhaps the most widely worshiped of the gods, he was popular as the benevolent protector of man. His most precious possessions are his magic hammer, the thunderbolt Mjölnir, a belt of strength, and a pair of iron gloves. The giant who built the residence for the gods was paid by Thor with his mallet. When this hammer had fallen into the possession of the giant Thrym, Thor recovered it by dressing himself in Freya’s clothes, pretending to be the fair goddess whom the giant wanted to be his bride in exchange for the hammer. Thor killed the Midgard serpent with his hammer but was drowned in his flood of venom. He was represented as a vigorous, red-haired youth, whose goat-drawn chariot created the thunder as it rolled by. From his name comes the word Thursday.

Thoreau, Henry David (1817–1862). American essayist, naturalist and poet. Born at Concord, Mass. and educated at Harvard, Thoreau began his career as a teacher. Through his older friend and neighbor, Ralph Waldo Emerson, he became a part of the Transcendentalist circle.

During Emerson’s trip abroad in 1843, Thoreau took over the editorship of The Dial. Later that year he went to New York to tutor the children of Emerson’s brother, William. He quickly returned to Concord, finding it a far more congenial place to live.

In 1845, Thoreau built a cabin at Walden Pond, on land owned by Emerson. He lived there for two years, two months, and two days; the experience was later described in his best-known work, Walden. During his stay at the pond, Thoreau was no hermit. He visited and entertained friends, worked his small plot of land, recovered observations of natural phenomena, and wrote the account of his trip with his brother, John. His first book, A Week on the Concord and Merrimack Rivers, was finally published in 1849.

During Thoreau’s stay at Walden, he spent a night in jail, when he refused to pay his poll tax. He performed the gesture of civil disobedience to indicate his disapproval of the Mexican War. Later he explained his action in his essay on Civil Disobedience.

Since his first book had sold so poorly, Thoreau was unable for five years to find a publisher for Walden. During this period he worked as a laborer and a surveyor and served in the family pencil business. He traveled to Maine, Canada, Cape Cod, and New York; these excursions were the basis of a series of post-humously published books and essays, including A Yankee in Canada, The Maine Woods, and Cape Cod.

Speaking publicly against the Fugitive Slave Law, he eloquently defended John Brown after Brown's capture in 1859. He died of tuberculosis in 1862. Soon after his return from a trip to Minnesota. Politically the most conscious of the Transcendentalists, an acute observer of natural and social facts, Thoreau was an outstanding prose stylist. The Journal he kept from 1837 to the end of his life, the source of all his books, is an important literary document.

Thorndike, Dame Sybil (1882– ). English actress and theatrical manager. She toured Egypt, Palestine, Australia, and New Zealand in the 1930's. She has starred in many moving pictures in England and the U.S. She was made a Dame of the British Empire in 1931.

Thorndike, Sir William. The uncle of Dr. Primrose's villainous landlord in Oliver Goldsmith's novel The Vicar of Wakefield, who disguises himself as Mr. Burchell. Having exhausted a fortune by benevolence, he protects himself by acquiring a reputation for eccentric stinginess. After straightening out the affairs of the Primrose family, he marries Sophia Primrose.

Squire Thornhill. Nephew of Sir William Thornhill, he is a libertine who abducts Olivia Primrose and casts the Vicar into jail. The unscrupulous squire is brought to terms by his uncle.

Thoth. In Egyptian religion, the god of wisdom, inventor of arts, sciences, and the system of hieroglyphics. He is represented with the head of an ibis on a human body. Sometimes he is shown holding in his hand the heart and tongue of Ra, the sun god, to symbolize his control of the intelligence of that great deity. The Greeks and Romans identified him with Hermes or Mercury. See Isis.

Thou, Jacques Auguste de (1553–1617). French magistrate and historian. His Histoire de mon temps, published first in Latin (1604–1620) and finally in French translation (1734), is remarkable for its exactitude and its intelligent assessment of the period of the religious wars.

Thoughtless, Miss Betty. The heroine of a novel of that name by Mrs. Heywood (1659–1758). A virtuous, sensible, and amiable young lady, utterly regardless of the conventionalities of society, she is wholly ignorant of etiquette. She is consequently forever involved in petticoat scrapes most mortifying to her sensitive mind. Even her lover is alarmed at her gauche, and deliberates whether such a partner for life is desirable. Mrs. Heywood's novel is said to have suggested the more important Evelina of Fanny Burney.

Thousand Souls, A (Tysyacha dush; 1858). A novel by Alexei Pissevski. It traces the career of Kalinovitch, an ambitious young man determined to make his way however he can. The title of the novel refers to the 1,000 serfs, or 'souls,' belonging to the woman Kalinovitch marries to further his career.

Thrale, Hester Lynch, born Salusbury (1741–1821). English Bluestocking. She met Samuel Johnson in 1764, and became perhaps his closest confidante until 1784, when, after the death of her first husband, he broke with her over her marriage to the Italian musician Gabriel Piozzi. After Johnson's death she published the Anecdotes of Johnson (1786) and Letters to and from Johnson (1788). Her diaries, published under the title Thraliana (1942), form a valuable source for Johnson's biography, as well as a delightful record of her volatile personality. Her letters to Queeney, her oldest daughter, are particularly notable.

Thrasea Paetus, Publius Clodius (d. A.D. 66). Roman senator and Stoic philosopher. He was a friend of Seneca and one of the keepers of the Sibyline Books.

Thrasybulus (Thrasybooulos). Athenian general. He aided Alcibiades in his victories over the Spartans (411–410 B.C.). He was exiled from Athens; upon his return he helped institute a more democratic form of government. In 389 B.C. he commanded the fleet against the Spartans and was killed in battle.

Threadneedle Street. The street in the City of London from Bishopsgate to the Bank of England. The Bank of England, which stands in this street, was nicknamed "the Old Lady of Threadneedle Street" in the late 18th century.

Three. The perfect number of the philosopher Pythagoras. It is expressive of "beginning, middle, and end," wherefore he makes it a symbol of Deity. A Trinity is by no means confined to the Christian creed. The Hindu Trimurti consists of Brahma, the Creator, Vishnu, the Preserver, and Siva, the Destroyer. The world was supposed by the ancient Greeks to be under the rule of three gods: Zeus (heaven), Poseidon (sea), and Hades (underworld). The Fates are three, the Furies three, the Graces three, the Harpies three, the Sibylline books three times three (of which only three survived); the fountain from which Hylas drew water was presided over by three nymphs; the Muses were three times three; the pythoness sat on a three-legged stool, or tripod; and in Scandinavian mythology we hear of the Mysterious Three: Har the Mighty, the Like-Mighty, and the Third Person, who sat on three thrones above the rainbow.

Man is threefold (body, soul, and spirit); the world is threefold (earth, sea, and air); the enemies of man are threefold (the world, the flesh, and the devil); the Christian graces are threefold (Faith, Hope, and Charity); the kingdoms of nature are threefold (mineral, vegetable, and animal); the cardinal colors are three in number (red, yellow, and blue), and so on.

Three Lives (1929). A book of three stories by Gertrude Stein. Written in a clear and masterly style, free from any of its author's later stylistic mannerisms, it consists of three character studies of women. The Good Anna deals with a kindly, but domineering German serving woman; Melanchta is concerned with an uneducated but sensitive Negro girl; and The Gentle Lena is about a pathetically feeble-minded young German maid.

Three Men in a Boat. See Jerome K. Jerome.
Three Musketeers, The (Les Trois Mousquetaires; 1844). A famous historical romance by Alexandre Dumas. With its sequels Twenty Years After and The Viscount of Bragelonne, the novel covers the period of French history from 1625 to 1665. The central figure, D'Artagnan, is a real historical personage (Charles de Bataz d'Artagnan, 1623-1673), and much of the story's material is drawn from his memoirs. His three friends also have counterparts in history, even to their names. D'Artagnan, a gaspy Gascon, arrives in Paris on a rawboned, yellow pony, with only three crowns in his pocket. Determined to become one of Louis XIII's guardsmen, he immediately involves himself in duels with Athos, Porthos, and Aramis, three of the most renowned fighters of the day. They welcome him into the fellowship of the Three Musketeers, and the narrow escapes and amazing exploits of these four friends form the subject matter of Dumas' exciting narrative.

Threepenny Opera, The (Die Dreigroschenopera; 1928). A ballad opera by Bertolt Brecht with music by Kurt Weill, based on John Gay's The Beggars' Opera. Although Brecht follows the general outline of Gay's work, he concentrates more on depicting the social evils that drive individuals into crime. It is written in the style Brecht called Epic Theater.

Three Sisters, The (Tri sestri; 1901). A play by Anton Chekhov. Written in four acts, it is regarded by some critics as the best work in modern dramatic literature. The Prozorov sisters, Olga, Masha, and Irina, along with their brother Andrei, drag out a dull existence in a small provincial garrison town. Only the diversions afforded by the officers and the ever present dream of some day moving to Moscow keep the sisters going from one drab day to the next. Andrei, who has had dreams of becoming a professor, makes a bad marriage that thwarts his ambition and adds to his sisters' troubles. His wife, Natalya Ivanovna, becomes a domestic despot. Masha, who is married to the pedantic schoolmaster Kulygin, tries to find happiness in a love affair with the officer Vershinin. The youngest sister, Irina, attempts to escape the drabness of her life by marrying Baron Tuzenbakh, another officer. The removal of the regiment from the town undoes Masha's plans, because Vershinin is married and cannot take her with him. Tuzenbakh is killed in a duel. The three sisters are left as they were at the beginning, deriving some faint pleasure from the cheerful sounds of the regiment band as it marches away, still clinging to their hopes for a better life.

Three Soldiers (1921). A novel by John Dos Passos. The book deals with three representative soldiers in the American army during World War I: Dan Fuselli, an Italian-American; Chrisfield, a farmboy from Indiana; and John Andrews, a sensitive musician who longs to be a composer. Dos Passos was interested mainly in the story of Andrews, who joins the army hoping to find comfort but contributing to a righteous cause. Instead he encounters tyranny, aimlessness, red tape, and boredom. Eventually he deserts, and in the French countryside he begins to write music, only to be captured and taken away, leaving the sheets of his unfinished composition to be scattered and destroyed. That part of society represented by the military is the real villain of the book; it is possible to see in this early novel seeds of the later U.S.A. (q.v.).

three treasures (Sans., trivatna; Ch., san-pao; Jap., sambô). In Buddhism, the Buddha law (dharma) and the order (sangha).

three worlds. The concept of the universe in Hindu (Vedic) mythology. The triloka (Sans. tri, three and loka, world) or the universe was visualized as consisting of the earth, the middle space or atmosphere, and the ether or sky. By another interpretation it may also signify the world of men, of semi-divine creatures, and of gods. It sometimes refers to heaven, earth, and the territory of the demons. The three-forked river mentioned in Kalidasa's play Shakuntala refers to the descent of the holy river Ganges from heaven into the matted hair of Shiva who, in the midst of his severe practice of penance, received it on the earth.

Threnody (1847). An elegy on the death of his son by Ralph Waldo Emerson. The poet's consolations is the belief that the dead person is "in Godhead found."

Through the Looking Glass (1872). A children's tale by Lewis Carroll. A sequel to Alice's Adventures in Wonderland, the book tells of Alice's experiences when, curious about the world behind the mirror, she climbs over the mantel through the glass. In looking-glass country, everything is reversed, just as reflections are reversed in a mirror. Brooks and hedges divide the land into a checkerboard, and Alice finds herself a white pawn in the whimsical and fantastic game of chess that constitutes the bulk of the story. On her trip to the eighth square, where she at last becomes a queen, Alice meets talking flowers, looking-glass insects, a man in a white paper suit, such nursery-rhyme characters as Humpty Dumpty and the Lion and the Unicorn, and many others. When, after her coronation, Alice begins shaking the red queen, the red queen turns into Alice's cat, and Alice awakens from her dream. The ballad Jabberwocky is found in the tale.

Thrums. The scene of many of Sir James Barrie's stories, notably Window in Thrums (1889) and The Little Minister. It represents Kirriemuir, Barrie's birthplace.

Thucydides (Thoukydides, c. 460–400 B.C.). An Athenian historian. He became a general and was sent to defend the Greek city of Amphipolis in Thrace (424 B.C.). Failing in his mission, he was exiled from Athens for 20 years. He was recalled in 403 B.C.; he is supposed to have been assassinated soon after.

During his exile he wrote a history of the Peloponnesian War admirable for its objectivity in discussing contemporary events, its direct and descriptive style, and the author's grasp of cause and effect. It begins by tracing the history of the Hellenic race, and ends, unfinished, in 411 B.C., seven years before the wars ended. The best-known passages are those relating Pericles' Funeral Oration, the plague at Athens, and the Sicilian Expedition. The painstaking reporting and acute political analysis vindicate Thucydides' claim that the work is a "possession for all time." See illustration on page 1006.

thug. Originally, a member of a religious body of northern India. Kali, the goddess of death in her aspect worshiped by this sect, could be propitiated only by human victims who had been strangled.
Hence, the thugs became a professional fraternity of stranglers who supported themselves by the plunder obtained from those they strangled. Their native name is p'hasîgârs ("stranglers"); that of thug ("cheat") was given them in 1810. Their methods were rigorously suppressed under British rule, and they were practically extinct by 1840. The word is now used in English for any ruffian.

Thule. The ancient name of an island or point of land 6 days' sail north of Britain. It was considered to be the extreme northern limit of the world. The name is first found in the account by Polybius (c. 150 B.C.) of the voyage made by Pytheas in the late fourth century B.C. Pliny says, "It is an island in the Northern Ocean discovered by Pytheas, after sailing six days from the Orcades." Others consider it to be Shetland, in which opinion they agree with the descriptions of Ptolemy and Tacitus. Still others assert that it was some part of the coast of Norway. The etymology of the name is unknown. Ultima Thule means the end of the world, the last extremity.

Thibs down (Lat., pollice verso). A sign ordering death for a fallen gladiator. At the gladiatorial contests in ancient Rome, the winning gladiator turned to the spectators to ask whether he should kill his fallen enemy. If the spectators held out their arms with thumbs down, the victim must die; thumbs up meant that he was to be spared.

Thundertentronchkh, Arminius von. A pseudonym under which Matthew Arnold wrote a number of satiric essays, chiefly for The Pall Mall Gazette. They were brought together in book form under the title Friendship's Garland (1871).

Thurber, James [Grover] (1894–1961). American essayist, short-story writer, and humorist. Thurber began his career as a journalist; in 1927, he met E. B. White, who introduced him to Harold Ross, the editor of a newly founded magazine, The New Yorker. During Thurber's years as a staff member he did much to establish the tone, style, and popularity of the magazine. Thurber turned his humor, his satire, and his irony on the follies of men and women, which he revealed in his lucid prose and inimitable drawings; nevertheless, he affirmed the power of love in a fantastic, often nightmarish world. His story The Secret Life of Walter Mitty, later made into a movie, describes the fantasies of a Caspar Milque-toast who imagines himself a hero. Among Thurber's other works are Is Sex Necessary? (1929), with E. B. White; The Seal in the Bedroom and Other Predicaments (1932); The Middle-Aged Man on the Flying Trapeze (1935); Let Your Mind Alone (1937); The Male Animal (1940), a play with Elliot Nugent; Fables for Our Times (1940); The Thurber Carnival (1945); Alarms and Diversions (1957); and The Years with Ross (1959), a memoir of Ross. Lanterns and Lances (1961) is a book of essays; Credos and Curios (1962) was published posthumously.

He was emperor when Jesus was crucified.

Tickell, Thomas (1685-1740). English poet who contributed to Steele and Addison's Spectator. The fact that he published his intention to translate the Iliad caused a famous quarrel between Addison and Pope. Pope thought that Tickell's work was in reality instigated by Addison in opposition to Pope's own prior proposals to translate Homer. Tickell collected and edited the works of Addison (1724) to which he prefixed the famous lines To the Earl of Warwick on the Death of Mr. Addison. Among his best-known works are Kensington Gardens, a mock-heroic poem and Colin and Lucy, a ballad.

Ticknor, George (1791-1871). American historian and scholar. Ticknor studied Latin, Greek, Spanish, and French as a boy. After his graduation from Dartmouth he was admitted to the bar, but his scholarly interests drew him to the German university at Göttingen. There he admired German historical criticism, and returning to teach at Harvard, accepted the new Smith professorship of French, Spanish, and belles lettres. He reorganized his own department along the lines of Göttingen, and prepared a model Syllabus of the Spanish Literature Course (1823). Resigning from his teaching post in 1835, he wrote a three-volume History of Spanish Literature (1849, 1872). In 1864, he wrote a biography of his friend William Hickling Prescott. On his death, Ticknor left his collection of rare books on Spanish literature to the Boston Public Library.

Pierre de Craon, architect of cathedrals, is set apart from life by his leprosy. Violaine Vercors kisses him in pity, and the affliction makes her a recluse, separated from earthly happiness and devoted to a religious vocation. Her fiancé, Jacques Hury, marries her sister Mara. But one Christmas Eve their infant dies, and Mara comes to Violaine, desperately demanding that Violaine hold the child and through her faith restore its life. Although Mara takes home a living baby, she notices that its eyes are now the color of Violaine's, and later murders her sister.

Tieck, Ludwig (1773-1853). German author. In his early career, he was a leading representative and popularizer of German Romanticism, but later turned to realism. He contributed some sections to the pace-setting romantic work of his friend Wackenroder, Herzensergiessungen eines kunstliebenden Klosterbruders (Outpourings of the Heart of an Art-loving Lay Brother, 1797); his play Der gestiefelte Kater (Puss in Boots, pub. 1797) is a classic example of romantic irony; his novel Franz Sternbald's Wanderungen (Franz Sternbald's Wanderings, 1798) is the definitive German Künstlerroman; and he also wrote a number of Märchen (tales). The most significant work from his realistic period is the novella Des Lebens Überfluss (Life's Overflow, 1837). Among his friends were Novalis and the brothers Schlegel.

Tiger at the Gates (La Guerre de Troie n'aura pas lieu; 1935). A play by Jean Giraudoux. It was translated into English by Christopher Fry in 1955. The setting of the play is Troy just before the outbreak of the Trojan War. Peace-loving Hector keeps repeating ironically that "the Trojan War will not take place," eventually persuading Paris, Helen, and even the willing but dubious Ulysses to cooperate in avoiding battle. But the Trojan people have been inflamed for various reasons, and it is finally not the leaders' decision, but the inevitable consequence of a warmonger's lie, that precipitates the war.

Tighe, Mrs. Mary (1772–1810). Irish poet whose major poem Psyche (1805) was praised by John Keats.

Tikhonov, Nikolai Semionovich (1896– ). Russian poet and short-story writer. His early verse—including his first collection The Horde (Orda; 1922)—revealed the influence of the Acmeist Nikolai Gumiliov in its concentration on adventurous themes and its precise, clear style. An early member of the SERAPION BROTHERS, Tikhonov later began the attempt to develop a narrative poetry for the recounting of revolutionary themes under the influence of Khlebnikov and Mayakovsky. His work in the 1930's tended more toward realistic treatments, as is obvious in his collection The Shadow of a Friend (Ten Drugs; 1935), and in the stories contained in The Venturesome Man (Ris'kovannyi chełovek; 1927).

Tilbury. An imaginary New England town created by Edwin Arlington Robinson. Used as the setting for many of Robinson's poems, it was derived in large part from his own home town of Gardiner, Me. Its inhabitants include Richard Cory, Minver Cheevey, Flammonde, old Eben Flood, and other protagonists in the poems who are either privately or publicly outcast from the town.

Tilden, Samuel Jones (1814–1886). American statesman. He was governor of New York State from 1875 to 1876. An electoral commission was created to examine the contested returns in certain states. The committee reported in favor of Hayes, who was elected by one electoral vote. Tilden always believed that he had been wronged. The fortune that he bequeathed was used to establish a free public library in the city of New York.

Till or Tyll Eulenspiegel, Ulenspiegel, Howle-glas, or Ovilglass. See EULENSPIEGEL.

Tillich, Paul (1886– ). German-born American philosopher and theologian. Forced to leave Germany because of the rise of Nazism, Tillich came to New York. He taught at the Union Theological Seminary from 1933 until 1955, when he became University Professor at Harvard. One of the leading contemporary American theologians, Tillich bases his theology on the estrangement of existence from its essence, of man from the divine, an estrangement symbolized by the Fall; the ultimate concern of man is to be reunited with the divine, with Being. Rather than emphasizing Jesus as either a historical personage or a social and ethical reformer, he sees Jesus as the Christ, the bearer of the New Being or creative power capable of overcoming the estrangement and reconciling existence with its essence. His major work is his Systematic Theology, in three volumes which appeared in the years 1951, 1959, and 1963. Among his other works are The Courage to Be (1952), Love, Power and Justice (1954), The New Being (1955), Biblical Religion and the Search for Ultimate Reality (1955), Dynamics of Faith (1957), and Theology and Culture (1959).

Time and the Conways (1937). A play about time by J. B. Priestley. The Conway family experiences a future event in the present.

Time, Forward! (Vremya, vpered!; 1932). A novel by Valentin Katayev. Portraying the construction of the Magnitogorsk chemical works during Russia's First Five-Year Plan, it admirably conveys the rapid tempo of construction by its quickly shifting scenes, reminiscent of the cinematographic devices of John Dos Passos' early works.

Time Machine, The (1895). A science-fiction story by H. G. Wells. The inventor of the time machine travels into the future and visits stages in the evolutionary degeneration of life. He sees the stage when the evil, apelike Morlocks (the descendants of our age's industrial workers) live underground and farm and eat the beautiful, aristocratic Eloi. He witnesses, too, the stage when giant crabs are the only surviving living things, and the sun and the earth are dying.

Time of Your Life, The (1939). A play by William Saroyan. A blend of social consciousness and poetic symbolism, it is set in a waterfront saloon and takes as its theme the need to make the most of life, to be compassionate to the weak, and to oppose the enemies of life. A collection of lovable eccentrics represent the weak and Detective Blick of the Vice Squad personifies the forces of evil. The play was given the New York Drama Critics' Award and also the Pulitzer Prize for 1940, which Saroyan refused.

Timoleon (1891). A volume of poetry by Herman Melville, his last published work. Many of the poems were written early in the 1860's. Among the most interesting are Art, The Garden of Meteors, and After the Pleasure Party.

Timon of Athens (c. 1607). A tragedy by William Shakespeare, perhaps written only in part by him. Timon, a generous host and patron of the arts, finds himself in financial difficulties and discovers, as the cynical Aemilianus had predicted, that the so-called friends who had previously fawned on him now refuse to help him. Cursing mankind, Timon leaves Athens and settles in a cave where he finds a buried treasure of gold. There he meets Alcibiades, a general who has been banished by the Athenian senate when he pleaded for the life of a condemned soldier. Timon finances an expedition that Alcibiades is preparing against Athens and rewards his faithful servant Flavius, exhorting him to show charity to no one. When word reaches Athens of Timon's gold, the senate sends a delegation to ask his aid against Alcibiades, but Timon rejects the request. Alcibiades, however, negotiates with the Athenians and is allowed to enter the city when he agrees to seek vengeance only from his and Timon's enemies. Just as the peaceful compromise is reached, it is learned that Timon has died in his cave, still inveighing against the human race.

The principal source of the play is Plutarch's Life of Marcus Antonius, translated into English (1579) by Sir Thomas North and retold also in Paynter's Palace of Pleasure (1567), though the story of Timon the Misanthrope was well known to Elizabethans.

Timoteus (446-357 B.C.). A renowned Greek musician and poet, referred to in Alexander's Feast by John Dryden.

Timothy. In the New Testament, one of the early Christians, a convert and associate of Paul.

Timothy, The Epistles of Paul the Apostle to. Two New Testament books. With The Epistle of Paul to Titus, they are called "the Pastoral Epistles" because of their theme of "care of the church." They are traditionally ascribed to Paul, but scholars feel that they were written by a disciple of Paul after his death in 65. Together they outline a course for church administration.

Timrod, Henry (1833-1867). American poet and journalist. A member of the Charleston School, he is known for his intensely emotional poems written in classical forms. During the Civil War, Timrod earned the title Laureate of the Confederacy. His Collected Verse was published in 1873. Timrod's best-known poems are The Cotton Boll and Ethnogenesis.

Tin Pan Alley. A popular and journalistic term for the section of New York City of the writers and publishers of popular songs. Later, it was applied by extension to the industry as a whole. Tin Pan Alley was at first located in the district around 14th Street, but later moved uptown to the Times Square area.

Tintern Abbey. A medieval abbey dating from the 13th century, located in Monmouthshire, England, on the river Wye. An ivy-covered ruin, it is well preserved except for the vaulting. Wordsworth wrote a poem, Lines Composed a few miles above Tintern Abbey, on Revisiting the Banks of the Wye, popularly though somewhat inaccurately known as Tintern Abbey.

Tintoretto. Real name, Jacopo Robusti (1518-1594). Venetian painter. Called Il Furioso because of the excess rapidity with which he painted, he executed fine portraits and large decorative canvases, mainly in the Scuola di San Rocco and in the doge's palace of his native city. His vast imagination often took a mystical turn as he experimented with the mysterious effects of barely lighted interior and exterior scenes. A master of movement, he used perspective and foreshortening to give drama and excitement to his scenes from the New Testament. His leading works include the San Rocco frescoes—the largest collection of works by one painter in a single building to be found anywhere. The best known of these are The Annunciation and The Agony in the Garden. In the ducal palace are Four Allegories of Venice and Bacchus and Ariadne. In the Venetian Accademia are his paintings on the Legend of the Body of St. Mark. Having painted a Crucifixion from a revolutionary side view, he turned to the theme of the Last Supper and avoided frontality by setting the table in diagonal perspective. This latter, perhaps his single best-known work, is in the Church of San Giorgio Maggiore in Venice. Tintoretto's influence was immediately felt by Rubens and Rembrandt.
Tiphys. In Greek legend, the name of the pilot of the Argo, the vessel of the ARGONAUTS.

Tippecanoe and Tyler too. The campaign slogan of the Whig party during the American presidential campaign of 1840. William Henry Harrison (1773–1841), the successful candidate for president, was nicknamed “Tippecanoe” from his victory over the Indians at Tippecanoe, Ind., in 1811. His running mate was John Tyler (1790–1862), who became president when Harrison died of pneumonia one month after his inauguration.

Tirant lo Blanch (Tirant the White, 1490). A Spanish romance of chivalry, dealing with the exploits of Tirant, a Breton prince. The first three parts were written by Johan Martorell, and a fourth was added by Martí Johan de Galba. The work first appeared in Catalan, but it may have been originally written in Portuguese. It was praised by Cervantes in Don Quixote.

Tiresias (Teiresias). In Greek mythology, a Theban seer. His predictions played an important part in the lives of Oedipus and his descendants. Blinded in his youth at seeing Athene bathing, he received a second sight as a consolation. He was transformed for a time into a woman as a result of seeing snakes coupling. As a result of this unusual experience, he was asked to settle an argument between Zeus and Hera as to whether men or women more deeply enjoyed the pleasures of love. He voted nine to one in favor of women. His blinding was recounted in The Baths of Pallas, a poem by Callimachus; in Euripides’ Bacchae he is a convert to Dionysian rites. For his prophecies, see Oedipus, Seven against Thebes, and Antigone. After prophesying the fall of Thebes before the Epigoni, he died, his life having spanned seven generations. His bisexual appearance as a theme in T. S. Eliot’s The Waste Land and in Apollinaire’s play Les Mamelles de Tirésias (1903).

Tir et Sidon (Tire and Sidon, 1608). A tragedy in 2 parts by the French playwright Jean de Schelander (c. 1585–1635). Set in Phoenicia during the war between Tyre and Sidon, this long play centers on the ill-starred love of Belcar, prince of Sidon, and Méliane, princess of Tyre. Though originally culminating in four deaths, the play was rewritten 20 years later as a tragicomedy in the manner of Alexandre Hardy, a happy ending being substituted for the earlier catastrophe. The preface to the revised play, written by the cleric François Ogier, defends the mixing of comic and tragic elements on the stage as being closer to life than either the dramas of the ancients or those of modern imitators.

Tirpitz, Alfred von (1849–1930). German admiral who organized the Imperial Navy that challenged British supremacy of the seas. As supreme commander of the fleet (1911–1916), he supported unrestricted submarine warfare during World War I.

Tirso de Molina. Pen name of Fray Gabriel Téllez (c. 1583–1648). Spanish dramatist. Born in Madrid, Tirso studied at Alcalá and became a Mercenarian friar in 1601. Thereafter he lived in Toledo, Santo Domingo, Salamanca, and Barcelona, rising to important positions in the order. In 1625 the Council of Castile recommended that he be enjoined from writing any more plays because of the scandal they were causing.

An avowed disciple of Lope de Vega, Tirso geared his plays to popular taste. He is said to have written more than 300 dramas, of which about 80 are extant. The finest of these is El burlador de Sevilla, in which the now universally known character of Don Juan was definitively delineated. His other plays include El condado por desconfiado, considered the best religious drama of Spain; La prudencia en la mujer, a historical work dealing with the dowager queen Doña María, whose wisdom saves the throne for her son, Ferdinand IV; Don Gil de las calzas verdes, a cloak-and-sword play; and Marta la piadosa, about a female hypocrite. He also wrote two miscellaneous collections of verse, drama, and stories: Los cigarriles de Toledo (1624) and Delettar aprovechando (1635).

Tisaferno (Tisaphernes). In the Gerusalemme Liberata of Tasso, one of the leading infidel warriors from India. Tisaferno is in love with Armida, the witch, and has sworn to kill Rinaldo of Este, but he is killed by the latter in the final battle for the holy city.

'Tis Pity She's a Whore (c. 1627). A tragedy by John Ford about the fatal attraction of Giovanni for his beautiful sister, Annabella. She returns his affection and hesitates to choose between her suitors: Soranzo, Grimaldi, and Bergetto. The first of these has been having an affair with Hippolita, the wife of Richardetto, and has sworn to marry the lady when she becomes a widow. When word comes that Richardetto has been lost at sea, Soranzo rejects his pledge and continues to press his suit with Annabella. Meanwhile, Richardetto, disguised as a physician, has returned to watch his wife with her lover. When Annabella chooses Soranzo for her husband, Richardetto and the jealous Grimaldi join forces to kill him but murder the innocent Bergetto by mistake. At the wedding feast, Hippolita, double-crossed by Soranzo’s servant Vasques, drinks a cup of poisoned wine she had intended for her erstwhile lover. Soon the reason for Annabella’s marriage becomes apparent—she is pregnant by Giovanni. Soranzo plans to avenge himself by revealing the facts at a splendid banquet. To save her honor, Giovanni kills Annabella, proclaims her death at the banquet, stabs Soranzo, and is himself killed by Soranzo’s followers.

Titan, The (1914). A novel by Theodore Dreiser. It is the succeeding volume to The Financier and the second in the trilogy dealing with Frank Cowperwood. Having married Aileen Butler, his former mistress, and moved to Chicago, Cowperwood almost succeeds in his dream of establishing a monopoly of all public utilities. Dissatisfaction with Aileen leads him, however, to a series of affairs with other women; when the Chicago citizenry frustrate his financial schemes, he Opens for Europe with Berenice Fleming, the lovely daughter of the madam of a Louisville brothel. Cowperwood, a powerful, irresistibly compelling man driven by his own need for power, beautiful women, and social prestige, at last experiences “the pathos of the discovery that even giants are but pignics, and that an ultimate balance must be struck.” In the final volume, The Stoic (1947), which Titus was published posthumously, Dreiser concludes "the trilogy of desire" with an account of Cowperwood's life in England and his death after his return to the U.S.

Titania. The queen of the fairies and wife of Oberon in Shakespeare's Midsummer Night's Dream. Her name is mentioned by Ovid as an alternative for Diana, the moon goddess.

Titanic. The White Star liner that struck an iceberg in the Atlantic on April 14, 1912, during her maiden voyage and sank with the loss of over 1500 lives. A fabulous vessel whose 15 watertight bulkheads supposedly made her "unsinkable," the Titanic carried only enough lifeboats for 52%, of the 2207 persons on board. Walter Lord's A Night to Remember (1955) is a minute-by-minute account of the disaster.

Titans (Titanes). In Greek mythology, offspring of Uranus and Ge. They appear to have been pre-Hellenic nature deities, consigned to near oblivion by the new pantheon headed by Zeus. Their names are Cronos, Oceanus, and Iapetus, males, and Rhea, Tethys, and Themis, females. Under the leadership of Cronos, they emasculated Uranus, who had hidden all but Cronos in the womb of earth. Rhea and Themis were both earth-goddesses, Oceanus and his wife Tethys were the progenitors of the sea-gods—according to some accounts, all the gods. Besides the six above-mentioned Titans named in Hesiod's Theogony, there were Hyperion, a sun god; Koios (Coeus), Krios (Crisus), Theia (Thia), Phoebe, and Mnemosyne. In many sources their descendants are also called Titans. It is generally believed that the protracted war that the Titans fought with Zeus, after he had overcome his father Cronos with the aid of his mother Rhea, reflects the prolonged conflict between the ancient Pelasgian inhabitants of Greece and their Hellenic conquerors.

Tite et Bérénice (1670). A tragedy by Pierre Corneille. The emperor Titus is about to marry Domitia, who is actually in love with his brother Domitian, when the arrival of Bérénice, queen of Judea, reawakens his love for her. Realizing that her presence places Titus in jeopardy, Bérénice abandons hope of marrying him and departs. Titus in his turn surrenders Domitia to Domitian, who loves her. It is believed that the duchesse d'Orléans encouraged Racine and Corneille to write plays on this subject, each in ignorance that the other was doing the same. Corneille's intricacies of plot contrasted poorly with the simplicity of Racine's treatment, and Corneille's play was judged inferior. See Bérénice.

Tithonus. A beautiful Trojan of Greek legend, son of Laomedon, and beloved by Eos. At his prayer, the goddess granted him immortality, but as he had forgotten to ask for youth and vigor he grew old, and life became insupportable. He now prayed Eos to remove him from the world. This, however, she could not do, but she changed him into a grasshopper.

Tennyson has a poem entitled Tithonus.

Titian. Real name, Tiziano Vecelli (c. 1477–1576). Italian painter. Titian was the greatest master of the Venetian school and one of the most influential artists in history. During a long and productive life, he gained a mastery of color that enabled him to achieve increased movement by disregarding symmetry of composition while restoring unity through chromatic balance. He also relied on color, rather than on the intensity of tone, to model forms and to describe lavish textures. Among his celebrated religious works are the Louvre Entombment, the Frari Assumption (1518), the Pesaro Madonna, and the moving Pietà of his final phase. His mythological works include the Rape of Europa, Bacchus and Ariadne, Nymph and Shepherd, and Diana and Acteon. Of his allegories, the best known are Sacred and Profane Love (c. 1510) and The Three Ages (1510). A superb portraitist, Titian did many versions of his patron, the Emperor Charles V, as well as the celebrated portrait of Pietro Aretino. He is now regarded as an important link between Renaissance and baroque painting, through his influence on such followers as Rubens, and in his appeal to the impressionists the remote antecedent of their style.

Titinius. In Shakespeare's Julius Caesar, a friend of Brutus and Cassius. At Phillippi he is sent by Cassius to determine the identity of some nearby troops. When Titinius is surrounded, Cassius erroneously concludes that the soldiers belong to the enemy army and, despairing of victory, orders Pindaros to kill him. Returning to find Cassius dead, Titinius takes his own life.

Titivillus. See TUTIVILLUS.

Titrel. The first guardian of the Holy Grail according to medieval legend, and grandfather of Armfotras. WOLFRAM Von ESCHENBACH wrote a fragmentary verse epic Titrel (13th century), apparently intended as a prelude to his PARZIVAL, telling the early history of the Grail and the heroes designed to build a chapel for it.

Titus. Full Latin name, Titus Flavius Sabinus Vespasianus (A.D. 39–81). Roman Emperor (79–81). He completed the Colosseum and erected the triumphal arch known as the Arch of Titus. On this arch (still standing in modern Rome), the emperor had friezes carved to represent his conquest of the Jews (A.D. 70) and the looting and destruction of the Temple in Jerusalem.

Titus, The Epistle of Paul to. See TIMOTHY, THE EPISTLES OF PAUL THE APOSTLE TO.

Titus and Gisippus. A tale from Boccaccio's Decameron. It is the story of Titus, a Roman youth studying philosophy at Athens, who falls in love with Sophronia, the betrothed of his best friend, the Athenian Gisippus. The latter decides to give her up to Titus, who replaces him in the darkened nuptial chamber. Despite the clamor of outraged relatives, Sophronia accepts Titus as her husband and the two leave for Rome. Gisippus is left to face the combined anger of family and friends; this takes the form of rejection, which coupled with poor luck in his affairs, soon reduces him to abject poverty. He then goes to Rome in a wretched state, hoping to find Titus; but when he meets his friend, the latter fails to recognize him in his present state. Believing himself snubbed, he decides to end his life by accepting the guilt for a murder committed by another. As he is being tried by the triumvir Octavianus Caesar, Titus wanders into the court and soon realizes the identity of the defendant. Titus promptly tells Octavianus that he, not Gisippus, is guilty. This magnanimity stirs the true murderer to confess his crime, whereupon all three are freed. Finally, Gisippus marries Titus' sister, and the two couples live together in perfect joy and harmony thereafter.

Titus Andronicus (c. 1590). A tragedy by William Shakespeare, based on Senecan models. The aging Titus Andronicus returns to Rome after a victorious war against the Goths, bringing as captives their queen Tamora and her three sons, one of whom is sacrificed by Titus to appease the souls of the slain members of his family. Declared emperor through Titus' intercession, Saturninus claims Titus' daughter Lavinia as his wife. When Saturninus' brother Bassanius abducts Lavinia, Saturninus marries Tamora, who has sworn to avenge the death of her son. Through the intrigues of Tamora and her Moorish lover Aaron, Tamora's sons kill Bassanius, rape Lavinia, and cut off her tongue and hands. Two of Titus' sons are accused of the murder and executed; another son, Lucius, is banished and proceeds against Rome with a Gothic army. Determined to exact vengeance for the crimes against his family, Titus kills Tamora's sons and serves their remains to her in a pie. After he has killed Lavinia to end her shame and has stubbed Tamora, Titus is slain by Saturninus, who is himself killed by Lucius. Lucius then tells the tale of his family's wrongs and is proclaimed emperor.

Neither the direct source of the play nor the extent of Shakespeare's share in the authorship has been clearly determined.

Titus (Titios). A giant of Greek mythology. His body covered nine acres of land. He tried to defile Lero, but Apollo cast him into Tartarus, where a vulture fed on his liver, which grew again as fast as it was devoured.

To Althea from Prison (1649). A poem by Richard Lovelace. The poet maintains that true liberty, which comes from freedom of soul, cannot be threatened by chains or fetters. The last stanza contains the well-known lines:

Stone walls do not a prison make,
Nor iron bars a cage.

To a Waterfowl (1815). A poem by William Cullen Bryant. The poem describes the flight of a bird, which renewed Bryant's belief in divine guidance.

To tobacco Road (1932). A novel by Erskine Caldwell. Jeeter Lester is an impoverished Georgia sharecropper who lives on Tobacco Road with his starving old mother, his sickly wife Ada, and his two children, 16-year-old Dude and Ellie May, who has a harelip. A third child, Pearl, has been married at the age of 12 to Lov Bensey, a railroad worker. When Jeeter's widowed preacher sister Bessie Rice induces Dude to marry her by buying him a new automobile, Dude accidentally wrecks the car and kills his grandmother. Pearl runs away from Lov Bensey; Ellie May happily goes to live with him; and Jeeter and Ada, left alone one night, perish when their shack burns down. The hapless Lesters, at once comical and shockingly degenerate, became widely familiar to the public through Jack Kirkland's dramatization (1933), which ran for 3,182 performances on Broadway.

Tobey, Mark (1890— ). American artist. He is the originator of “white writing,” a calligraphy of white lines inspired by Chinese writing, which he has also reduced to dense networks of thin angular white lines on a darker background.

Tobias. In the Apocrypha, the son of Toar. He left Nineveh to collect a loan for his father. Guided by the archangel Raphael, in disguise as Azarias, Tobias fell in love with and married his cousin Sara, seven of whose betrothed lovers had been carried off by the evil spirit Asmodeus. With Raphael's aid, Tobias drove Asmodeus away.

Tobino, Mario (1910— ). Italian novelist. His writings reflect his experiences as a practicing psychiatrist and his interest in the history of the anti-Fascist resistance movement during World War II. Among his more recent works are The Women of Maglione (Le Libere Donne di Magliano; 1953), inspired by his medical experience in hospital wards; Il Deserto dello Littia (1952); the short story La Brace dei Biazoli (1956); and the novel Il Clandestino (1962), a lengthy chronicle of the resistance movement on the Tuscan coast. Il Clandestino has been critically acclaimed as an honest, fully documented account of the controversial partisan “war” against the Nazi-Fascist government of 1943–1945.

Tobit. The principal character of the Book of Tobit, a romance included in the Apocrypha. As a Jew in captivity at Nineveh, he buried the Hebrew dead, despite civil bans. Growing impoverished, miserable, and blind, he sent his son Tobias to collect a loan. When he returned, Tobias cured his father's blindness by applying to his eyes the gall of a fish, which had attacked him on the Tigris and which the archangel Raphael had helped him catch.

Toqueville, Count Alexis [Charles Henri Maurice Clérel] de (1805–1859). French historian. De Toqueville is known for his studies of the nature and operation of democracy. He sought to advance the rule of the people while simultaneously controlling undesirable tendencies. One of his best-known works, Démocratie en Amérique (Democracy in America, 1835–1839), is considered the first impartial and systematic study of American institutions. L'Ancien Régime et la Révolution (The Old Regime and the Revolution, 1856), a history of the French Revolution, was left unfinished at the time of his death. De Toqueville held a number of official positions in the French government, at one time serving on a special mission to the U.S. He was later a deputy and then a minister under Louis Napoleon, a position from which he retired after the coup d’état of December 2, 1851.

To Have and Have Not (1937). A novel by Ernest Hemingway. It deals with the effort of Harry Morgan, a native of Key West, to earn a living for himself and his family. He has operated a boat for rental to fishing parties, but during the depression of the 1930’s he is forced to turn to the smuggling of Chinese immigrants and illegal liquor. While assisting a gang of bank robbers to escape, he is shot and mortally wounded. He dies gasping, “One man alone ain’t got... no chance.”

To Have and to Hold (1900). A historical novel by Mary Johnston. One of the most popular historical novels published in the U.S., it is set in 17th-century Virginia. When Ralph Percy goes to Jamestown to choose a wife from a shipload of girls sent over from England, he little suspects the noble birth of the beautiful young woman who throws herself on his mercy. Jocelyn—fleeing the loathsome advances of Lord Carnal—at first despises Ralph, who becomes her husband. But, subsequently, adventures on land and sea reveal his courage, and love finally blossoms.

To His Angry God (1648). A poem by Robert Herrick. After describing a period of spiritual affliction, the poem expresses confidence in its early termination.

To His Coy Mistress (1650). A poem by Andrew Marvell, one of the great English love lyrics. The poet requests the lady’s immediate favor; he would like to spend an aeon in compliment, as she deserves:

> But at my back I always hear > Time’s winged chariot hurrying near;
> And yonder all before us lie
> Deserts of vast eternity.

Toilers of the Sea (Les Travailleurs de la mer; 1866). A novel by Victor Hugo. Much of the tale’s action centers about the steamboat La Durande and its trips between the isle of Guernsey and St. Malo. Tragically unrequited love, blissful young romance, and exciting adventure make this work another of Hugo’s imaginative melodramas.

Tokugawa. Japanese period (1600–1868). Under the leadership of Tokugawa Ieyasu (1542–1616), the country was unified under a feudal government, the shogunate, located in Edo (Tokyo), and the continued warfare of the previous centuries was replaced by a peace that lasted over 250 years. The imperial court was without power, foreigners were rigidly excluded and Christianity banned. A rigid feudal system, based on neo-Confucianism, assured a strict control of the nation by the Tokugawa family. A new bourgeois or merchant-oriented literature arose in Osaka, the commercial capital. The kabuki and joruri plays of Chikamatsu Monzaemon, the haiku of Matsuo Bashō, the stories of Ibara Saikaku and the ukiyoec wood-block prints were all products of this time. Economic decline, the rise of a merchant class, the arrival of Western nations, particularly the Americans under Admiral Perry, all contributed to the restoration of the imperial rule with the establishment of the Meiji government in 1868.

Tokyo. The world’s largest city and capital of Japan. It was formerly known as Edo, when it was the capital of the shōgunate during the Tokugawa period (1600–1868).

Tolkien, J[ohn] R[onald] R[uel] (1892–). English author and scholar, professor of medieval English literature and philology. He wrote a series of books about the Hobbits, imaginary gnomelike creatures who have a world, language, and mythology of their own, and whose adventures involve struggles between good and evil. His trilogy The Lord of the Rings (1954–1956) consists of The Fellowship of the Ring, The Two Towers, and The Return of the King.

Toller, Ernst (1893–1939). German dramatist. He figures in the movement of expressionism, and was well known for his frequent and outspoken advocacy of a social revolution to follow World War I. He entered the German Army as a volunteer, but soon underwent a change of heart and, after his release in 1916, took part in pacifist movements for which he was imprisoned. His own development is reflected in that of the hero in his first play, Die Wandlung (The Change), 1919), who is prompted by the horrors of war to renounce his patriotism and commit himself to the cause of peace and a people’s revolution. But Toller was no simple slave of socialist ideology; he was well aware that mass movements often injure the very social and moral ideals that they seek to promote, and his concern with this problem is seen in both the highly abstract Masse Mensch (Man and the Masses, 1920) and the historical Die Maschinenstürmer (The Machine-Wreckers, 1922). Toller was moving away from the simple idea of revolution, and in another play, Hinkemann (1922), he all but left the realm of ideas to concentrate on the tragic human problems faced by a returning soldier. And finally, in his Hoppla, wir leben! (Hurray, We’re Living!), 1927), a kind of political panorama, he expressed complete disillusionment with postwar Europe. Later, driven into exile by the Nazis, he committed suicide in New York.

Tolemei, Claudio (1492–1555). Sienese critic. In 1539 he published an important treatise on Tuscan poetry in which he argued for the use of classical meter, in preference to modern accentual meter. His ideas were influential among Renaissance authors who supported this losing cause.

Tolstoi, Aleksei Nikolayevich (1833-1945), Russian novelist, short-story writer, and dramatist. Born a count, Tolstoi was distantly related to Count Leo Tolstoi and to Ivan Turgenev on his mother's side of the family. He fought with the Whites during the civil war, emigrated in 1919, and returned to the Soviet Union in 1923, where his writings became extremely popular. His best-known works of fiction are Krotki defekt krestyan (Road to Calvary, 1921), 1927, 1941), which is a trilogy describing the years before, during, and just after the revolution, and Peter the Right (Piter the First, 1929-1945), a highly regarded historical novel. Tolstoi became one of the first Soviet science fiction writers with the publication of Aelita (1924), an account of a Russian landing on Mars.

Tolstoi or Tolstoy, Count Leo (Lev Nikolayevich; 1828-1910). Russian novelist and moral philosopher. Best known for his novels, he also wrote short-stories, plays, and essays. With Dostoevski, Tolstoi made the Russian realistic novel a literary genre that ranks in importance and influence with classical Greek tragedy and Elizabethan drama. Aside from his literary work, Tolstoi holds an important place in his own country's cultural history as an ethical philosopher, and religious reformer. He is especially known, both inside and outside of Russia, as an early champion of the non-violent protest and the source of much of that doctrine's moral force. He was an influential factor in the social restlessness that swept Russia before the 1917 revolution.

Tolstoi was born, one of four brothers, on the family estate of Yasnaya Polyana, south of Moscow. His father, Count Nikolai Ilyich Tolstoi, was a veteran of the 1812 Russian campaign against Napoleon. His mother died when Tolstoi was not quite two years old. In 1837 the family moved to Moscow so that the boys could receive a formal education, and that same year their father died, the care of the children passing to their aunts. The story of his happy childhood and the later years was described by Tolstoi in his autobiographical trilogy, Childhood, Boyhood, and Youth.

In 1844 Tolstoi enrolled in the University of Kazan, intending to study Oriental languages. His interest flagged, however, and he left the university in 1847 to settle on the Yasnaya Polyana estate. While at the university he had acquired the life-long habit of keeping a diary of his thoughts, plans, and accomplishments. This diary has been an invaluable source of information for his biographers. Entries for 1847 show that Tolstoi intended to follow a rigorous course of self-study while living on the estate; instead he turned his attention to running the estate and improving the condition of his peasants, but encountering the serfs' mistrust, he soon gave up this idea, also. The next few years were spent enjoying the pleasures of Moscow society. His diary shows that this enjoyment was often followed by periods of self-castigation and vows to improve himself.

In 1851, Tolstoi went to the Caucasus, joined the army, and took part in the Russian efforts to suppress the rebellious Caucasian mountain tribes. During the next year he completed and published the first volume of his trilogy, Childhood, which was published in the journal Sovremennik (The Contemporary). In 1854, he was transferred to Sevastopol where he took part in the defense of the city against the British and French during the Crimean War. During these years he completed several short works, including The Raid (Nadez, 1853), Boyhood; and The Woodcutter (Rubka lesa; 1855). His greatest success, however, was his stories based on the defense of Sevastopol—Sevastopol in the Month of December (Sevastopol v dekabre moyetsa; April, 1855), Sevastopol in May (Sevastopol v maye; June, 1855), and Sevastopol in August 1855 (Sevastopol v auguste 1855 goda; December, 1855). These stories, generally known as the Sevastopol Sketches, made their author famous and opened St. Petersburg's literary circles to him. Tolstoi's aristocratic aloofness and youthful bravado alienated many of the literati, including the novelist Ivan Turgenev with whom Tolstoi was to have intermittent quarrels for years.

In 1857, Tolstoi made his first European trip, Western life made a bad impression on him. He recorded his reactions in a short piece entitled Lucerne (1857). After his return to Yasnaya Polyana, Tolstoi became interested in education for the children of his peasants. He opened a school for them on the estate in 1859, and took another trip abroad that year to study European educational methods.

In 1862, Tolstoi married Sofya Andreyevna Behrs. She was then 18 years old and he was 34. The following year he published one of his best early works, The Cossacks, on which he had been working for several years. He also began writing his great novel, War and Peace, with which he had been occasionally occupied since 1860. He had originally planned to set the time of the book in the 1850's and to make the hero one of the Decembrist rebels who had been exiled to Siberia in 1825. This plan gradually changed. Tolstoi moved the time of the main action to 1825, the year of the Decembrist revolt, and finally to the period before the 1812 invasion by Napoleon.

Tolstoi's next major work was Anna Karenina, his second greatest novel. While at work on this book, he was best with those metaphysical torments which he described in A Confession. Following his rejection of Orthodoxy and conversion to a religion of love based on a literal interpretation of the Sermon on the Mount, Tolstoi concentrated more on philosophical and religious writings than on pure literature. Even the works of fiction he produced are weighted with didactic messages. One outstanding work that successfully carries such an extraliterary burden is the story The Death of Ivan Ilyich. Tolstoi's belief in the simple life of poverty and toil had its counterpart in his new attitude toward art, which he expressed in his treatise on aesthetics, What is Art? The didactic moral element is also particularly noticeable in such works as The Kreutzer Sonata (Kreutzerova sonata; 1890), Father Sergei (Otech Sergei; 1896), the novel The Resurrection, and The False Coupon (Fal'shivyi kupon; 1904).

Tolstoi's main interest was in working out his religious and philosophical ideas. He wrote commentaries on the gospels and made translations of them and produced many tracts and pamphlets on religious subjects. His larger works on these subjects include
Tommy

A Criticism of Dogmatic Theology (Kritika dogmatitcheskogo bogosloviya; 1885), What I Believe (V chions moya vera; 1883), and What Then Must We Do? (Tak chto zhe nam delat'; 1886).

Tolstoi stressed the moral and ethical side of Christianity; he believed in the mystical doctrine of the inner light. He rejected the divinity of Jesus, regarding him only as the greatest of ethical teachers. He also rejected the ideas of an afterlife or a personal god. The main principles on which he based his teachings were love for all mankind and freedom from all forms of hatred and violence, including the appetites of greed, anger, and lust. From these principles sprang his doctrine of passive resistance to evil (with its corollaries of hatred of war and of the demands of the state, both of which are forms of violence). Tolstoi condemned capitalism, private property, and the division of labor. Civilization in general he regarded as bad, emphasizing the need to make life as simple and primitive as possible. He extolled the virtues of physical labor, of earning one's livelihood by the sweat of one's brow. Tolstoi himself undertook to make his own shoes and wore simple peasant blouses. While some of his followers tried to build social utopias on the basis of his ideas, Tolstoi himself was generally content to criticize the existing society in the light of his ideas. He was an effective and fearless critic. His criticisms of the government and of the church were answered by these two closely connected powers in 1901 in the form of Tolstoi's excommunication from the Russian Orthodox Church. Instead of harming his standing with the general public, the action seemed to make Tolstoi more popular. When the Czarist government executed numbers of people after the 1905 revolution, Tolstoi issued a scathing criticism of the policy in I Cannot Be Silent (Ya ne mogu molchat'; 1908).

Besides his moral and religious writings, Tolstoi produced a number of moralizing tales for the people. Several of these are small masterpieces, despite their didacticism. They include God Sees the Truth, But Waits (Boz pravdu vidit, da ne skoro skashet; 1872), What Men Live By (Chem lyudi zhiv? 1881), Two Old Men (Dva starika; 1885), and Alyoshka Gorshok (1905). These stories were written in the simple, plain narrative manner that Tolstoi conceived as the best style for all good literature. Despite his self-restrictions regarding style, Tolstoi managed to produce several fine works of art in his later years. These include Master and Man (Khozyain i rabotnik; 1899) and the short novel Hadzhi Murad. He also wrote three major plays: The Power of Darkness, Fruits of Enlightenment (Plody proveshcheniya; 1890), and The Living Corpse (Zhiboi trup; 1900).

Tolstoi's ideas and way of life after his conversion put a strain on his family life. His views on the evil of private property and his desire to put all his literary work in the public domain especially irritated his wife, who knew that only the royalties from Tolstoi's books supported the large family. After years of estrangement from his wife and all of his children save his youngest daughter Alexandra, Tolstoi left Yasnaya Polyana in November, 1910, accompanied by Alexandra and his doctor. He was on his way to a monastery, but he was taken ill during the train journey and died at the small railway junction of Astapovo.

To Lucasta, Going to the Wars (1649). A poem by Richard Lovelace. In it the poet asks his lady to forgive him for leaving her to go to war. The poem closes with the famous lines:

I could not love thee, Dear, so much,
Lov'd I not Honour more.

The Lucasta to whom Lovelace addressed this and other poems is said to have been his fiancée, Lucy Sacheverell.

Tom Jones[ , a Foundling, The History of (1749). A novel by Henry Fielding, generally considered one of the masterpieces of English literature. Squire Allworthy, who lives with his sister Bridget, returns home after a long absence to find an infant on his bed. Suspecting his servant Jenny Jones to be the mother, he names the baby Tom Jones, determines to rear him himself, and Jenny leaves town. Soon after, Bridget marries Captain Blifil, a fortune-hunter; they have a son, and Captain Blifil dies. Tom and young Blifil are raised together, taught by Squares and Thwackums. Blifil, a malevolent boy, seizes every opportunity to misrepresent Tom and get him into trouble. Tom is a lusty, imprudent boy, but essentially benevolent. A rivalry over the attentions of Sophia Western, daughter of the neighboring Squire Western, arises between them. Because of an affair with the gamekeeper's daughter, and because of Blifil's treachery, Tom is sent packing by Squire Allworthy. In the Picarresque section that follows, Tom meets with many adventures, some of them of a dissipated nature, on the road to London. Sophia, in the meantime, flees to London to escape the marriage which her father is trying to force with Blifil, who is only interested in her fortune. Soon the whole cast of characters is on the scene; Jenny Jones turns up to reveal that Squire Allworthy's sister Bridget, not she, is the mother of Tom. Blifil's cruelties to Tom over the years are exposed, Tom, promising to mend his ways, marries Sophia, and becomes the heir of Squire Allworthy. As a hero, Tom Jones is not overheroic; he is perhaps a model of generosity and manly spirit, but mixed with dissipation. Lord Byron called him "an accomplished blackguard."

Tomlinson, H[enry] M[ajour] (1873–1958). English writer. He is the author of reflective novels, essays, and travel books, all of which deal with ships and the sea. The Sea and the Jungle (1912), an account of a voyage to Brazil, is the best known of his books. Gallions Reach (1927) and Morning Light (1946) are among his novels; The Turn of the Tide (1945) is a fine collection of essays.

Tommy or Tommy Atkins. A British private soldier, as a Jack Tar is a British sailor. At one time all recruits were served out with manuals in which were to be entered the name, age, date of enlistment, length of service, wounds, medals, and so on of the holder. With each book was sent a specimen form showing how the one in the manual should be filled in, and the hypothetical name selected, instead of the lawyer's John Doe or Richard Roe, was Thomas Atkins. The nickname was popularized by Kipling.

For it's Tommy this, and Tommy that, and "Tommy wait outside"; But it's "Special train for Atkins" when the trooper's on the tide.

Tommy and Grizel. See Sentimental Tommy.

Tom o' Bedlam. A mendicant who asks charity on the plea of insanity. In the 16th and 17th centuries applications for admission to Bedlam became so numerous that many inmates were dismissed half cured. These "ticket-of-leave" men wandered about chanting mad songs and dressed in fantastic costumes to elicit pity. Posing as these harmless innocents, a band of sturdy rogues appeared. Called "Abram men," they committed great depredations.

Tompson, Benjamin (1642-1714). Puritan poet and teacher, the first native-born American to publish a volume of poems in America. Born in Braintree (now Quincy), Mass., and brought up by foster parents, Tompson graduated from Harvard in 1662 and five years later became master of the Boston Latin School. In 1676 he published New England's Crisis, modeled on Francis Quarles's History of Sampson (1651). The title poem of the collection describes the town of New England at the time of King Philip's War. It is especially notable for its use of pidgin English and Indian dialect, and for its concluding picture of a group of women building a fortress to protect Boston. Tompson was the first poet in colonial America to make extensive use of the contemporary scene.

Tom Sawyer, The Adventures of (1876). A novel by Mark Twain. Tom, a shrewd and adventurous boy, is at home in the respectable world of his Aunt Sally, as well as in the self-reliant, parentless world of Huck Finn. The two friends, out in the cemetery under a full moon, attempt to cure warts with a dead cat. They accidentally witness a murder, of which Muff Potter is later wrongly accused. Knowing that the true murderer is Injun Joe, the boys are helpless with fear; they decide to run away to Jackson's Island. After a few pleasant days of smoking and swearing, they realize that the townspeople believe them dead. Returning in time to hear their funeral eulogies, they become town heroes. At the trial of Muff Potter, Tom, unable to let an innocent person be condemned, reveals his knowledge. Injun Joe flees. Later Tom and his sweetheart, Becky Thatcher, get lost in the cave in which the murderer is hiding. They escape, and Tom and Huck return to find the treasure Joe has buried.

Clemens wrote three sequels to this popular book: The Adventures of Huckleberry Finn, Tom Sawyer Abroad (1894), and Tom Sawyer, Detective (1896).

Tom Thumb. The pygmy hero of an old nursery tale, popular in the 16th century. The History of Tom Thumb was published by R. Johnson in 1621 and a similar tale by Perrault (Le Petit Poucet), in 1630. The American midget Charles Sherwood Stratton (1838-1883) exhibited at side shows by P. T. Barnum was popularly called "General Tom Thumb."

Tom Thumb the Great (1730). Best-known, shortened title of The Tragedy of Tragedies; or, The Life and Death of Tom Thumb the Great, a satirical burlesque by Henry Fielding. Fielding's satire was directed at contemporary and Restoration drama, particularly heroic drama. Tom Thumb himself, in his diminutiveness, burlesques the grandness of the heroic hero. Fielding describes him as a little hero with a great soul.

Tom Titivil. The name of the devil in many of the medieval English morality plays.

Tone, [Theobald] Wolfe (1763-1798). Irish revolutionist who founded the United Irishmen with Thomas Russell and Napper Tandy of the United Irishmen. (Napper Tandy is mentioned in the beginning of the famous Irish song The Wearing of the Green.) He set forth his policy of unity for Ireland in A Review of the Conduct of Administration (1790), Hibernicus (1790), and An Argument on behalf of the Catholics of Ireland (1791). Tone negotiated for a landing of the French in Ireland, but the fleet was scattered by a storm in 1796. The British captured him with a small French squadron off Lough Swilly in 1798 and were preparing to prosecute him for treason when Tone committed suicide.

structed the famous dome of the Florence cathedral. The bulk of his work is lost, despite his great reputation. His arguments for an Atlantic route to the East may have influenced the voyages of Columbus.

Toscanini, Arturo (1867–1957). Italian conductor, perhaps the greatest of this century. He was the principal conductor successively of La Scala, the Metropolitan Opera, the N.Y. Philharmonic, and the NBC Symphony Orchestra (organized especially for him in 1937). His repertory included many symphonic and operatic works, all of which he memorized. His interpretations of Verdi and Beethoven were especially admired.

totem. A North American Indian (Algonquin) word for some natural object, usually an animal, taken as the emblem of a person or clan on account of a supposed relationship. Totemism, which is common among primitive peoples, has a distinct value in preventing intermarriage among near relatives, for if persons bearing the same totem (as, for instance, in the case of brothers and sisters) intermarry, the punishment is death. Another custom is that one is not allowed to kill or eat the animal borne as one's totem.

totem pole. The post standing before a dwelling on which grotesque and, frequently, brilliantly colored representations of the totem were carved and hung. It was often of great size, and sometimes so broad at the base that an archway was cut through it.

To the Lighthouse (1927). A novel by Virginia Woolf. Using the techniques of stream of consciousness and symbolism, it has little plot, but a great deal of atmosphere, emotion, and poetry. The characters' moment-by-moment actions, sense impressions, and thoughts are described. The first section, called "The Window," describes a day during Mr. and Mrs. Ramsay's house party at their country home by the sea. Mr. Ramsay is a distinguished scholar and, in the eyes of Virginia Woolf, a typical male, whose mind works rationally, heroically, and rather icily. He is drawn from her father, Sir Leslie Stephen. Mrs. Ramsay is a warm, creative, intuitive woman, the center of the household. Among the various guests is Lily Briscoe, an artist. The Ramsays have arranged to take a boat out to the lighthouse the next morning, and their little son James is bitterly disappointed when a change in the weather makes it impossible. The second section, called "Time Passes," describes the seasons and the house, unused and decaying, in the years after Mrs. Ramsay's death. In the third section, "The Lighthouse," Mr. Ramsay and his friends are back at the house. He takes the postponed trip to the lighthouse with his now 16-year-old son, who is at last able to communicate silently with him and forgive him for being different from his mother. Lily Briscoe puts the last touches to the painting Mrs. Ramsay once inspired. The lighthouse, everyone's goal, symbolizes many things to many people. More like a prose poem than a conventional novel, the whole book is a statement about time and death and the permanence of art.

To the Virgins, To Make Much of Time (1648). A poem by Robert Herrick whose theme is explicit in the title. It was set to a number of melodies, and the first lines gained proverbial familiarity:

Gather ye rosebuds while ye may,
Old time is still a-flying
And this same flower that smiles to-day,
Tomorrow will be dying.

Tottel's Miscellany (1557). Popular title for Songs and Sonnets, a "miscellany" or collection of poems by various authors, published by Richard Tottel in England. It contained 271 poems, chiefly lyrics, although epigrams, epitaths, elegies, satires, pastoral, and narrative verse were included, as well as translations of Latin, Italian, and French poems. It introduced the use of terza rima, octava rima, rondeau, the first English sonnets, and possibly the first original English blank verse. In the collection were 97 poems attributed to Sir Thomas Wyatt, 40 to the earl of Surrey, 40 to Nicholas Grimald, and 94 to "Uncertain Authors." The majority of these poems had never before appeared in print, for courtier-poets, such as Wyatt and Surrey, circulated their verses among the court in manuscript. It was not considered fashionable for them to publish their own work (this rule did not hold in the case of translations of poems from foreign languages) and as a result contemporary poetry reached the general public only rarely, if at all.

The first publication of its kind, Tottel's Miscellany was extremely popular. It went through eight editions in thirty years, and was followed by a host of imitators which are known generally as the Elizabethan anthologies. They are of less importance than the original, which is considered to mark the beginning of modern English poetry.

Tottenham in Boots. A popular toast in Ireland in 1731. Mr. Tottenham cast the vote which threw out a government bill very obnoxious to the Irish, on the subject of the Irish Parliament. He had come from the country, and rushed into the House of Commons without changing his boots, just in time to give his vote, which prevented the bill from passing by a majority of one.

Touchstone. In Shakespeare's As You Like It, a court jester who accompanies Rosalind to the Forest of Arden. He is a witty, cynical fellow who lists "the seven degrees of affront" in a famous speech:

(1) the retort courteous,
(2) the quip modest,
(3) the reply churlish,
(4) the reproof valiant,
(5) the countercheck quarrelsome,
(6) the lie circumstantial,
(7) the lie direct.

His wit is realistic and biting, usually aimed at the foibles of mankind, and he openly insults his betrothed Audrey, who is too stupid to realize it.

Toulouse-Lautrec [Monfa], Henri [Marie Raymond] de (1864–1901). French painter. Descended from an old French family and physically misshapen, he became the supreme portraitist of Montmartre night life, with its dancers, actresses, singers, and women of the demimonde. He probed the emotional significance of his subjects, picturing them with an elegant, nervous line, expressively revealing. At first influenced by Edgar Degas and Japanese prints, he soon developed his own original style. His decorative posters and lithographs are also highly distinguished.
Tourgée, Albion W[inegar] (1838–1905). American novelist. Born in Ohio, Tourgée lived in several parts of the U.S. After practicing law, he served in the Federal army. In 1865, he moved to North Carolina and played an active part in the work of the Reconstruction. Ultimately forced by hostile pressure to return to the North, Tourgée wrote several novels, among them A Foot's ERRAND and BEECHWOOD STRAW. These once widely read volumes describing the problems and inevitable failure of the Reconstruction made Southern themes current in American literature. During the last eight years of his life, Tourgée served as consul at Bordeaux, France.

Tourneur, Cyril (c. 1575–1626). English dramatist. He is the probable author of the bloody Senecan tragedy THE REVENGER'S TRAGEDY and of the somewhat milder ATHIE'S TRAGEDY.

In 1791 he led a successful revolt against white rule in San Domingo (Hispaniola [Haiti and the Dominican Republic] of today) and, through his administration, brought law and order to the island by 1801. When he asked Napoleon for approval of a constitutional form of government, Napoleon sent a French expedition against him under General Leclerc. Captured and taken back to France, he was imprisoned and died there 10 months later. He is the central figure of a historical novel, The Hour and the Man (1840), by Harriet Martineau. Black Majesty (1928) by John W. Vandercook is his biography, and he is a major character in the drama The Revolutionists by Selden Rodman. Tower, The (Der Turm; 1925). A verse-play by Hugo von Hofmannsthal. It is freely adapted from Calderón's Life Is a Dream, the most important of Hofmannsthal's additions to the original work being the character of Olivier, a demagogical dictator who assumes power after the old king's deposition and executes Prince Sigismund. Thus, Sigismund's final triumph, which is real in Calderón's work, becomes entirely symbolic in Hofmannsthal's.

Tower Beyond Tragedy, The (1924). A play in verse by Robinson Jeffers. This poetic drama is based on Agamemnon and The Libation Bears, the first two plays of the ORESTIA trilogy of Aeschylus, but Jeffers gives an enlarged role to Cassandra, the prophetess, and emphasizes the contrast between the incestuous desires of Electra and the desire of Orestes to break away from her and from all ties with humanity.

Toynbee, Arnold J[oseph] (1858– ). English historian and student of international affairs. From 1920 to 1938 he wrote the yearly Survey of International Affairs. His greatest work is his 12-volume A Study of History (1934–1961), a condensed version of which became a best seller. Comparing the history of 21 different civilizations, he traces a cyclical pattern of growth, maturity, and decay in them all. He believes that societies thrive best in response to a challenge, and that a society's most important task is to create a religion; though our Western civilization is in its decay stage, he sees hope for the future formation of one spiritually oriented world society. Despite all his encyclopedic knowledge, Toynbee is more of a poet, mythologist, and metaphysician than an empirical historian.

Korea, which proved inconclusive. A patron of the arts, he is revered in folklore and legend as one of Japan’s greatest military geniuses. His successors lost control of the nation to Tokugawa Ieyasu (1542-1615), founder of the Tokugawa shogunate.

Tozzi, Federico (1883-1920). Italian novelist. His works are characterized by their descriptions of the author’s unhappy adolescence in his native Siena (Tuscany). Tozzi’s youthful protagonists are projections of himself at a time when he strove to find a sense of spiritual peace and intellectual understanding in a society dominated by irrational passions. His most outstanding novels are Con Gli Occhi Chiusi (1919), an idyllic tale about the innocent, selfless love of two sensitive adolescents; Tre Croci (1920), the title of which refers to the crosses that mark the graves of three brothers whose lack of moral fiber led them to three varieties of catastrophe; and Il Padre e i Ricordi di Un Impiegato, both published posthumously in 1921.

Trachinian Women, The. See Heracles.

Tracts for the Times (1833-1841). A series of 90 papers on theological and liturgical subjects. Published at Oxford, it is sometimes called the Oxford Tracts. They consist of extracts from 17th-century High Church divines and church fathers, and contributions from John Henry Newman, Richard Hurrell Froude (1803-1836), E. B. Pursey, John Keble, and Isaac Williams. The tracts were launched with the object of asserting “the advance of Liberalism in religious thought,” and reviving “the true conception of the relation of the Church of England to the Catholic Church at large.” The series came to an end (at the request of the bishop of Oxford) with Newman’s Tract No. 90 in which he stated that it is possible to interpret some aspects of the Thirty-Nine Articles of the Church in a manner not inconsistent with the Council of Trent. This tract was condemned by several bishops and heads of colleges, and a group of Tractarians, including Newman, entered the Roman Catholic Church. See Oxford Movement.

Tradiciones peruanas (1872-1906). The aggregate title of 10 volumes by Ricardo Palma, consisting of tradiciones, or traditions, a literary form that Palma himself originated. Virtually defyng classification, Palma’s traditions are short sketches combining history, anecdote, and satire. Using a formula that called for a soufflé of truth, a great deal of invention, and painstaking style to attention, Palma covered virtually every aspect of the Peruvian past, though he was most at home describing the intrigues and amorous escapades of 18th-century Lima. Written in a pungent, ironical style reminiscent of that of the 17th-century Spaniard Francisco Quevedo, Palma’s traditions have often been imitated but never equaled.

Tradition and the Individual Talent (1919). An essay by T. S. Eliot. In this influential poetic manifesto the author asserts that a poet cannot write significant poetry in the 20th century unless he is steeped in the tradition and poetry of the past. The past will teach him to avoid romantic, autobiographical writing, and to concentrate on technique and impersonal, detached poetry.

Trafalgar, battle of (Oct., 1805). The greatest British naval victory, off Cape Trafalgar on the southwest coast of Spain, in the Napoleonic wars. Fifteen French and Spanish ships were either captured or destroyed by the British, who did not lose a single vessel. Nan Hardwick’s father was hanged for sheep-stealing; she now lives with her uncle and his tormenting wife. The aunt tells Dick Gurvil, whom Nan loves, about the death of Nan’s father and he leaves her to marry the aunt’s daughter. After this humiliation, Nan learns of her father’s innocence. Unable to endure any more, she stabs Dick to death and goes to drown herself.

While the play is sordid and grimly realistic, it is written in a beautiful folk-poetry idiom.

Tragic Muse, The (1890). A novel by Henry James. Traberne, Thomas (1636-1674). English poet and clergyman. One of the later metaphysical poets, Traberne is known for the emphasis placed in his poetry on what he regarded as the direct and un- tutored apprehension of truth on the part of children. His work is marked by simple diction and a vivid presentation of the common things of everyday life as the vehicles of mystical revelation. Traberne was not discovered as a poet until early in the 20th century; his manuscripts, which were recovered in 1895 from a London bookbaw, were at first ascribed to Henry Vaughan. His best-known verse is included in Poetical Works (1903) and Poems of Felicity (1910). Centuries of Meditations (1908) is a collection of his prose sketches.

Traill, Catherine Parr [Strickland] (1802-1899). English-born Canadian writer and naturalist. Mrs. Traill came to Canada with her husband and her sister, Susanna Moodie, in 1832 and settled near Rice Lake, Ontario. The two sisters wrote of the many trials and occasional rewards of frontier life with a frankness designed to disillusión the dupes of land agents. Mrs. Traill’s The Backwoods of Canada (1836), a series of letters to her mother, is a good example of her candor and dry humor. Canada’s natural beauties are described in Rambles in the Canadian Forest (1859) and other works.

Trail of the Lonesome Pine, The (1908). A novel by John Fox, Jr. The hero of this once enormously popular sentimental novel is John Hale, a young engineer who comes to the Kentucky mountain region in an attempt to industrialize the area.

Transcendentalism. An American philosophic and literary movement centered in New England during the 19th century. A reaction against scientific rationalism, it relied upon intuition as the only way to comprehend reality in a world where every natural fact bodies forth a spiritual truth. Its chief spokesman, Ralph Waldo Emerson, expressed the Transcendentalist belief that everything in man's world is a microcosm of the universe when he stated that "the world globes itself in a drop of dew." Emerson thus stressed the essential unity of all things, which are ordered by a Supreme Mind or Over-Soul. Man's soul is identical with the Over-Soul; it is this belief in the divinity of man that allowed Transcendentalists to disregard external authority and tradition, and to rely on direct experience. "Trust thyself," Emerson's motto, became the code of Henry David Thoreau, Bronson Alcott, Margaret Fuller, and other members of the Transcendental Club, an informal group organized in 1836 by the Rev. George Ripley.

An idealistic philosophy, Transcendentalism was shaped by the ideas of Plato and Plotinus. It took its name and many of its ideas from Kant's CRITIQUE OF PRACTICAL REASON (1788). The American writers were influenced by Continental thinkers, including Hegel, Schelling, Fichte, and Goethe. The doctrines of the German Transcendentalists were reflected in the works of Carlyle, Coleridge, and Wordsworth, to whom the Americans owe a great debt. Emanuel Swedenborg's mystical doctrines of contact with the spiritual world also profoundly influenced the New England writers.

Basic contemporary statements of Transcendental belief may be found in Emerson's essay Nature (1836) and in his lecture The Transcendentalist (1842).

Traubel, Horace Logo (1858–1919). American editor and biographer. A friend of Walt Whitman during the poet's later years, Traubel was deeply influenced by Whitman. As a youth he had worked at various jobs; later he founded and edited two periodicals, The Conservator (1890–1919) and The Artsman (1903–1907). His political philosophy, a mixture of socialism and poetic mysticism, was expressed in these magazines and in Traubel's books: Chants Communal (1904), Optimus (1910), and Collects (1914). The titles reveal Whitman's influence, but Traubel's own work was unimpressive. As one of Whitman's three literary executors, he helped to publish several volumes by and about the poet. His own contribution was With Walt Whitman in Camden (3 v., 1906, 1908, 1914), part of a meticulously kept diary of daily conversations with Whitman. A fourth volume, edited by Scully Bradley, appeared in 1953.

Among the ship's crew is Long John Silver and some of his followers who are after the treasure for themselves. Trial, The (Der Prozess; 1925). An unfinished novel by Franz Kafka. Insofar as it depicts the confrontation of an individual and a baffling bureaucracy, it is similar to Kafka’s The Castle. The hero of The Trial, a bank assessor named Joseph K., is accused, by a mysterious legal authority whose headquarters are in a rundown tenement, of an unnamed crime of which he knows nothing. The novel treats his many fruitless attempts to obtain justice from the system and with which he cannot even effectively communicate, and culminates in his utter frustration, his complete loss of human dignity, and his death like a dog. Like The Castle, this novel has been interpreted allegorically; but whereas The Castle is seen as a quest for divine grace, The Trial depicts a struggle for divine justice. On another level, Joseph K.’s relationship to his judges has been seen as symbolic of the psychological (and perhaps autobiographical) fact of inner guilt feelings based on no actual crime. A short section of The Trial was completed and published separately in 1919 under the title Before the Law (Vor dem Gesetz) in the collection A Country Doctor (Ein Landarzt). See K., JOSEPH.

To protect himself from his creditors, Witgood counters with a breach-of-promise suit which Hoard settles by paying Witgood’s debts. At the wedding feast, the widow is unmasked but promises to make Hoard a good wife. At the same time, Witgood announces that he has married Mistress Joyce, Hoard’s niece. She becomes a great singer under his mesmeric influence, but loses her voice when he suddenly dies of heart failure. She sickens and dies soon after.

Trilling, Lionel (1905– ). American critic, short-story writer, and novelist. Trilling’s first published work was Matthew Arnold (1939); in this book, he applied the methods of modern psychology and anthropology in his study of E. M. Forster (1943), The Liberal Imagination (1950) and The Opposing Self (1955) are two collections of literary essays. He has also written The Middle of the Journey (1947), a novel, and several short stories which have been frequently anthologized.

Trim, Corporal. In Laurence Sterne’s novel TRISTRAM SHANDY, Uncle Toby’s orderly. He is, like his master, a devotee of military ways, but, in sharp contrast to Uncle Toby, extremely eloquent.

Trimalchium. The vulgar and ostentatious multimillionaire of PETRONIUS’ Satyricon. He is the subject of allusion on account of the colossal and extravagant banquet that he gave. He was the literary prototype of Jay Gatsby in F. Scott Fitzgerald’s novel The Great Gatsby (1925), which was originally to be entitled Trimalchium’s Banquet.

trimeter. In prosody, a line of verse containing three metrical feet in any meter. It is usually identified together with the name of the meter, as iambic trimeter, trochaic trimeter, etc.

Trismurti (Sans., tri, three; murti, forms). In Hindu metaphysics, the triune aspect of Brahman, the Supreme Spirit: BRAHMA the Creator, VISHNU the Preserver, SHIVA the Destroyer. The three, however, are one, since whatever is created must necessarily die after passing through a period of preservation.

Trinculo. In Shakespeare’s The Tempest, a “dull fool,” the jester of Alonso. See STEPHANO.

Trinity, the. Also called the Holy Trinity. In Christianity, the name of God as he exists in his three persons or hypostases: the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit. They are coequal, coeternal, and indivisible. The Father is thought of especially as the Creator, the Son as the Redeemer, and the Holy Spirit as the Enlightener. The Trinitarian doctrine was evolved and enunciated in early Church councils; its various definitions have caused great controversies and schisms. Whether the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father alone, or from the Father and the Son still divides the Eastern and Western Churches, the Eastern Church holding the former position (see FILOQUE CONTROVERSY).

The Latin word trinitas was first used c. 380 when the doctrine began to take form. The three-person nature of God is nowhere expressly stated in the Old Testament. In the New Testament, however, the doctrine of the Trinity is expressly and frequently taught, as, for example, in I John 5:7. The essence of the Trinity is considered a mystery by the Church: a full understanding is not possible through human intelligence. The Trinity can be known only through divine revelation.

The concept of a three-person god is not unique to Christianity: such a relation exists in Hindu mythology (see Trimurti; three).

Triolet, Elsa. See Louis Aragon.

Tripiṭaka. (Pali, "three baskets"). A three-part collection of sacred Buddhist writings: the Vinaya-piṭaka, rules of discipline for Buddhist monks and nuns; the Sutta-piṭaka, aphorisms and parables for laymen; the Abhidhamma-piṭaka, an analytic study of consciousness and metaphysics.

Triple Alliance. (1) A treaty between England, Sweden, and Holland against Louis XIV in 1688. It ended in the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle.

(2) A treaty between England, France, and Holland against Spain, 1717. In the following year it was joined by Austria, and became a Quadruple Alliance.

(3) A military alliance initiated between Germany and Austria-Hungary in 1879, which Italy joined in 1882. It lasted until the outbreak of World War I.

Triple Entente. See Entente.

triplet. In prosody, a stanza containing three lines, also called tercet.

Triptolemus (Triptolemos). A Greek hero and demigod. He was worshiped chiefly at Eleusis as the one who gave grain to man and was the first instructor in agriculture. He was generally described as a son of Celeus and Metaneira. See Demeter.

Trishanku. In Hindu mythology, a king of Ayodhya (the modern Oudh in central India) of the solar dynasty who asked Vashishtha to do special penance for him so that he might ascend to heaven with his body. The request horrified Vashishtha and Trishanku was condemned as a chandala (outcaste). In spite of the objections of the gods and Brahmans, the sage Vishvamitra agreed, but when Indra learned of this, he ordered Trishanku hurled through space. The fall was stopped by Vishvamitra's penance, but Trishanku continues to hang in mid-space as one of the stars. There is a meaningful reference to him in Kalidasa's Shakuntala.

Trissino, Giangiorgio (1478-1550). Italian poet and dramatist. Born in Vicenza, he wrote the first modern tragedy on Greek rather than Roman models, the Sofonisba (1515; see Sophonisba). Influenced by the Poetics of Aristotle, he wrote the play in the Greek style and pioneered experiments with Italian versions of Pindar and Horace. In 1547, he published a "correct" Homeric epic, L'Italia Liberata dai Goli (Italy Liberated from the Goths), which had taken 20 years to compose.

Tristan or Tristram. Hero of the great medieval cycle Tristan and Isolde, and sometimes a knight of the Round Table in the legends of King Arthur. He is generally depicted as a great lover, great warrior, great musician, champion dragon killer, skillful hunter, excellent seaman, a poet, and marvelous teller of tales (which is to say, some insist, that he was an expert liar). In addition, he is supremely handsome. But due to the accidental drinking of a magic potion, his life is governed by an undying love for Isolde of Cornwall, even though she is married to his uncle, King Mark of Cornwall. See Palamedes; Tristram of Lyonesse.

Tristan and Isolde. A great medieval cycle of tales revolving about the figures of Tristan and Isolde. Evolving from Celtic sources with a theme irresistible to writers right up to the present day, this legend has been called one of the world's greatest love stories. The core motif is the Celtic tale of elopement of the king's nephew with the wife of the king (See Deirdre; The Pursuit of Diarmuid and Grainne). Tristan goes to Ireland to bring the beautiful princess, Isolde, to Cornwall where she is to become the bride of his uncle, King Mark. On the way, the pair drink a potion that causes them to become eternally in love with one another; this love gives rise to the drama of the cycle. The cycle incorporates many folk themes, such as the ambiguous oath. No major, complete version of the cycle survives. Malory's Morte d'Arthur incorporates the Tristan and Isolde legend into Arthurian legend.

The story of Tristan and Isolde has been used by Tennison in his Idylls of the King (1859-1885), by Wagner in the music drama Tristan und Isolde, and by Edwin Arlington Robinson in Tristram (1927), to name a few. See Sir Tristram of Lyonesse.

Tristan L'Hermite. See François L'Hermite.

Tristram (1927). A narrative poem in blank verse by Edwin Arlington Robinson. The third of Robinson's Arthurian trilogy, preceded by Merlin (1917) and Lancelot (1920), the poem emphasizes and contrasts Tristan's love for Isolde, the wife of his old uncle, and his neglect of his own wife, Isolde of Brittany. The longed-for is unattainable, and the attainable, neglected.

Tristram of Lyonesse, Sir. In The Book of Sir Tristram of Lyonesse from Malory's Morte d'Arthur, one of the most valiant knights of the Round Table. The story was drawn from the Tristan and Isolde tradition, a cycle originally separate from the legends of Arthur. Malory makes Tristram a knight of the Round Table and second only to Sir Launcelot. In this version, King Mark is a vengeful and ignoble enemy.

Tristram Shandy (1759-1767). Shortened title of The Life and Opinions of Tristram Shandy, Gentleman, a novel by Laurence Sterne in which Sterne declares that his one rule is to be spontaneous and untrammeled. The form is ostensibly a chaotic account by Tristram of his life from the time of his conception to the present and shows how much Sterne was influenced by John Locke's theory of the irrational nature of the association of ideas. The historian, however (except for a few brief flashes), never gets beyond the second or third year of his life. In between are sandwiched his "Opinions," long-winded and philosophical reflections on everything under the sun including his novel, and accounts of the lives of Yorick, his father Walter Shandy, his mother, and his Uncle Toby. The form of the book is in fact the character of Tristram himself, doomed by improbably fantastic fatalities to write a hodge-podge instead of a history, to spend two years describing one, to describe events whose chain of causation is cosmic, whose significance is comically petty for all but the exasperated historian.

For Sterne, the actual content of consciousness, what passes through the mind of the character at a given moment, "writing to the moment," and the accompanying reactions and gestures are of primary importance.

The novel is sprinkled with many typographical eccentricities such as a profusion of dots, dashes, asterisks, one-sentence chapters, blank pages and unfinished sentences. See Hafen Slawkenberghius.

Triton. In Greek mythology, a merman. Tritons are usually depicted as blowing on conch horns, and appear as minor figures in Greek legends.

Triumph of the Egg, The (1921). A collection of "impressions from American life" by Sherwood Anderson. The title story refers to a farmer whose failure in life is symbolized by his inability to perform a simple trick with an egg.

Triumvirate, First. In Roman history, an alliance formed (60 B.C.) by Caesar, Pompey, and Crassus to divide the power among them. Caesar received the consulship for the year 59 and a command in Cisal-pine Gaul (extended to Transalpine Gaul) and Illyricum. Pompey received assignment of lands for his veterans and administration of the grain supply for himself. By a renewal of the Triumvirate in 56, Pompey received the consulship and command in Spain; Crassus obtained the consulship and command in the East, where he was killed in 53. The alliance between Pompey and Caesar was formally broken with the outbreak of civil war in 49. See Rubicon.

Triumvirate, Second. In Roman history, an alliance formed (43 B.C.) by Octavius (later Augustus), Mark Antony, and Lepidus. The triumvirs were to have consular power for three years, they appointed magistrates, and their decrees were valid as laws. The empire was divided among them: Octavius obtained Africa and the islands; Antony, Gaul; Lepidus, Spain and Narbonensis. The alliance was followed by the overthrow of the republicans under Cassius and Brutus at Philippi (42). Eventually, Lepidus, whose position in the alliance was minor, was banished and by the Treaty at Brundis-sium, Octavian received the West and Antony the East. Their union was broken in 31, and Antony was defeated at Actium. This left Octavius sole ruler, and in gradual steps, he completed the transformation of Rome from a republic to an empire, as Augustus, its first emperor.

trivium. See quadrivium.
trochee. In English prosody, a metrical foot consisting of two syllables, the first accented and the second unaccented. The word "careful" is a trochee.
The meter made up of such units is called trochaic meter, and the following lines are a good example:

TEll me/NOT in/MourNFul/numBers
Llife is/BUT an/EMPty/dream fOr the/souL is/DeaD that/slumbers . . .
Longfellow (Psalm of Life)

trochilus. A small Egyptian bird fabled by the ancestors to enter with impunity the mouth of the crocodile and to pick its teeth, especially of the leech, which greatly tormented the crocodile. Allusions to it are common in 16th- and 17th-century literature.

troglodytes, les. The cave dwellers in Letters XI-XIV of Montesquieu's Lettres Persanes. Their behavior illustrates satirically Montesquieu's belief that man must have a sense of justice if he is to organize and maintain society.

-Troilus (Troilos). In classic myth, one of the sons of Priam. He was killed by Achilles in the Trojan War. The loves of Troilus and Cressida, celebrated by Shakespeare and Chaucer, form no part of the old classic tale. Their story appeared for the first time in Dares Phrygius and Dictys Cretensis, then about the 12th century in Benoît de St-Maure, and in the 13th century in Guido delle Colonne.
Later it passed to Boccaccio, whose Il Filostrato (1344)—where Pandarus first appears in his role of pander—was the basis of Chaucer's Troilis et Criseyde. Shakespeare's drama by the same name, Troilus and Cressida (c. 1609) follows the general outline of Chaucer's narrative. In the classic myth Cressida or Cressid, daughter of Calchas, a Grecian priest, is beloved by Troilus. They vow eternal fidelity to each other, and as pledges of their vow Troilus

Troilus dragged from his horse by Achilles. From a Greek vase painting (fifth century B.C.).

Trotsky, Leon

Audis, The Trojan Women, Helen, and Andromache. Homer and most later Greek authors wrote of the war in a heroic vein, but Euripides consistently, if mainly by implication, attacked it as the cause of senseless horror and suffering. The fall of Troy is also recounted at the beginning of Vergil's Aeneid, which claimed Aeneas as the founder of Rome.

The custom of claiming noble Trojan ancestry was widespread among European nations for a thousand years. As late as Elizabethan times Albion (England) was said to have been founded by Brutus, a descendant of Aeneas. In the Middle Ages, the legends of the Trojan War were best known through two Latin works attributed to Dictys Cretensis and Dares Phrygius, two supposed contemporaries of the war. On these two books BENOIT DE SAINTE-MAURE based a long romance called the Roman de Troie, which became immensely popular and was the source in turn for many other medieval romances. See TIGER AT THE GATES.

Trojan Women, The (Troades; 415 B.C.). A tragedy by Euripides. It relates the fate of the family of Priam at the fall of Troy. Priam and Hector are dead; their widows, Hecuba and Andromache, and the mad Cassandra are to be slaves. Troy is in flames; yet the Greek generals, fearful of the future, sacrifice Hector's sister Polyxena to the ghost of Achilles and fling his son Astyanax from the walls to end the royal line. In the midst of the horrors, Helen appears and, through sheer sexual attraction, easily sways her husband Menelaus from his intention to kill her. Her presence, vain and frivolous as ever, demonstrates the futility of the war that was fought for her sake.

In this play, which portrays the Greeks as cruel and cowardly, Euripides implicitly rebuked the Athenians for their recent brutal slaughter of the natives of Melos for remaining neutral in the war with Sparta. It is one of the most powerful indictments of war ever written.

Trollope, Anthony (1815-1882). English novelist. Although a post office official for many years, Trollope was a prolific writer, producing a large number of novels dealing with Victorian life. He declared that "a novel should give a picture of common life enlivened by humor and sweetened by pathos," which is a fair estimation of his own work. His best-known novels are those included in the two series, the so-called Chronicles of Barsetshire and the Parliamentary novels. The latter, in which the British Parliament is the connecting thread, and which were overshadowed by Disraeli's popular novels of the same type, include Phineas Finn (1869), Phineas Redux (1874), The Prime Minister (1876), and The Duke's Children (1880). Among his other novels are The Belton Estate (1865), The Claverings (1867), The Eustace Diamonds, Aylas Angel (1881), and Dr. Wortle's School (1881). He also wrote a number of travel books, a study of W. M. Thackeray, and an Autobiography (1883).

See BACHESTER TOWERS.

Trollope, Frances, born Milton (1780-1863). English author of novels and travel books, mother of Anthony and Thomas Trollope. Her first book, the famous and derogatory Domestic Manners of the Americans (1832) was written after a three-year stay in the United States. Thereafter she wrote many travel books and novels, including The Vicar of Wrexhill (1837); The Widow Barnaby; and The Lottery of Marriage (1846).

Trollope, Thomas Adolphus (1810-1892). English novelist and essayist, son of Frances, elder brother of Anthony Trollope. His books, which deal mainly with Italian life and history, include A Decade of Italian Women (1859); Marietta (1862); and Beppo the Conscript (1864).

trolls. In Teutonic mythology, the dwarfs who were said to live in underground caverns or beneath hills; they were represented as stumpy, misshapen and humpbacked, inclined to thievery, and fond of carrying off children and substituting their own. Because Thor used continually to fling his hammer after them, these hill people were especially averse to noise. The Troll King is a character in Ibsen's Peer Gynt (1867).

trope. (1) In rhetoric, a figure of speech employing a word or phrase out of its ordinary usage in order to give life to an idea; the most important types are metaphor, metonymy, synecdoche, and irony.

(2) In music, (a) historically in liturgical music a final melodic or verse phrase added as decoration in Gregorian chant or the sung parts of the medieval Mass, and (b) a basic group of chords in the 12-tone scale, used by Josef Hauer.

Trophonius (Trophonios). An architect. He is celebrated in Greek legend as the builder of the temple of Apollo at Delphi. With his brother Agamedes, he also built a treasury for King Hyrieus in Boeotia, but so constructed it that they could easily steal from it. When Agamedes was trapped there, Trophonius cut off his head so that he might not be recognized. After his death he was deified and had an oracle in a cave near Lebadeia, Boeotia, which was so awe-inspiring that those who entered and consulted the oracle never smiled again. Hence a melancholy or habitually terrified man was said to have visited the cave of Trophonius.

Tropic of Cancer (1934). An autobiographical book by Henry Miller. Tropic of Cancer was originally published in Paris, and was immediately banned by U.S. customs officials on the grounds of obscenity. When the first American edition (1961) appeared, it became a best seller. The book is a history of Miller's life in Paris during the early 1930's. Penniless and starving, he underwent a complete physical and spiritual degradation. The numerous philosophical ruminations that intrude on his story explain the poet's "heroic descent to the very bowels of the earth, the dark and fearsome sojourn in the belly of the whale." The poet's ascent from this abyss and his final emergence as "a bright, gory sun god cast up on an alien shore" are intended to inspire the reader with the same joy of life that Miller found after his sufferings.

Trotsky or Trotski, Leon. Real name, Lev Davidovich Bronstein (1879-1940). Russian Communist leader. First arrested for his revolutionary activities in 1898, he was sent to Siberia, but escaped under the alias of Leo Trotsky, the name he used for the rest of his life. After his escape he went to London where he worked with the exiled Lenin. Trotsky returned to Russia in 1905 to take part in the revolutionary attempt of that year. Once more arrested and sent to Siberia, he again escaped. He spent the next 12 years in exile in Europe and America.

When Czar Nicholas II abdicated in 1917, Trotsky again made his way home to Russia. After the Bolshevists seized power, Lenin and Trotsky emerged as the two top men in the new government, the latter becoming the commissar for foreign affairs. Trotsky negotiated the treaty of Brest-Litovsk with Germany. In 1918 he was replaced as foreign minister and as commissar for war, a position he held until 1924, organized and directed the armies that repelled invasion on four fronts. Lenin, supported by Stalin, and Trotsky began to differ on ideological matters as early as 1919. When Lenin died in 1924, Stalin openly attacked Trotsky, and appointed him to less and less important positions. In 1927, Trotsky was exiled to Turkistan and, in 1929, banished from the U.S.S.R. He was assassinated in Mexico City (1940); his followers claimed that he was murdered on orders from Stalin, a claim later verified.

Trotsky viewed the Russian Communist Party as an instrument of international social revolution. He differed from Lenin and Stalin because he was not satisfied to concentrate on the consolidation of the Russian state and withdraw active support to the cause of immediately exporting the revolution beyond the Soviet Union's borders.

A brilliant intellect, Trotsky wrote many important books and pamphlets on the Communist revolution. His works include The Defense of Terrorism (1921), Literature and Revolution (1925), My Life (1930), and The History of the Russian Revolution (3 vols., 1932).

Trotsky, Miss Betsey. In Charles Dickens' David Copperfield, great-aunt of David. She lives with the likable lunatic, Mr. Dick. Miss Betsey's snappishness and briskness conceal great tenderness of heart. She takes in the runaway David, defends him against Mr. Murdstone, and becomes devoted to him.

troubadours. Poet-musicians of Provence in the 11th, 12th, and 13th centuries. They wrote short poems in the langue d'oïl following elaborate formal conventions, principally celebrating chivalry and the tradition of courtly love. The leading troubadours, Bertran de Born and Bernard de Ventadour, were received at the court of Eleanor of Aquitaine. Through her influence Provençal poetry was introduced at the courts of northern France, and its emphasis on romantic love began to enter the verse epics there (see trouvères). Other troubadour poets include Geoffrey Rude, Peire Vidal, Guiraut de Bornell, and Guilhem de Cabestan.

Troubled Sleep. See Roads to Freedom, The. trouvères. Medieval poets of northern France. They wrote in the langue d'oïl, principally narrative poems like the chansons de geste and shorter lyrics somewhat influenced by the Provençal poetry of the troubadours.

Trovatore, II (The Troubadour, 1853). An opera by Giuseppe Verdi based on a Spanish drama by García Gutiérrez. It has one of the most complicated plots in all opera.

Troyat, Henri. Real name Lev Tarassov (1911–1950) is a trilogy of historical novels that traces the effect of the 1917 revolution on an upper-class Russian family and describes their emigration to Paris. It includes My Father's House, The Red and the White, also translated as Sackcloth and Ashes (Les Sac et la cendre), and Strangers on the earth (Etrangers sur la terre). The cycle The Seed and the Fruit (Les Semailles et les moissons; 5 vols., 1953–1958), set in the early 20th century, concerns a middle-class French family, Amélie and Pierre and their daughter Elizabeth. A third series, The Light of the Just (La Lumière des Justes; 1959–1960) goes back to the time of Napoleon in Russia.

Truce of God. A Church attempt in 1041 to limit private war. The Church decreed that there should be no hostilities between Lent and Advent or from the Thursday to the next Monday at the time of great festivals. This Truce of God was confirmed by the Lateran Council in 1179, and was agreed to by England, France, Italy, and other countries; however, little attention was ever paid to it.

Truffaldino. In Matteo Maria Boiardo's Orlando Innamorato, a fersicious pagan king killed by Rinaldo. The latter had vowed Truffaldino's destruction for causing the death of the young maiden Albarosa.

Trulliber, Parson Oliver. A selfish, slothful, pig-raising high-church divine sharply contrasted with Parson Adams in Joseph Andrews by Henry Fielding.

Truman, Harry S. (1884–1972). 33rd president of the U.S. (1945–1953). Unable to obtain a college education, Truman managed his father's farm and clerked in a bank for a while. He served in the armed forces during World War I, then started an unsuccessful business venture as a haberdasher. Through the influence of Thomas J. Prendergast, the political boss of Kansas City and the surrounding region, he won a series of public offices: county judge, presiding judge of the court, U.S. Senator from Missouri. In the meantime, he had attended the Kansas City Law School for two years.

Having been elected vice-president as Franklin D. Roosevelt's running mate in 1944, Truman succeeded to the presidency when Roosevelt died on April 12, 1945. He made many momentous decisions toward the end of World War II, the most important of which was perhaps the use of the atomic bomb to end the war against Japan. He gave unwavering support to the United Nations and formulated the Truman Doctrine of aid to the free peoples of the world resisting attempted subjugation by armed minorities or outside pressures." He generally followed his predecessor's policies in domestic matters.

In the 1948 election Truman surprised most experts by defeating Thomas E. Dewey. In what he regarded as his own presidency, he gave U.S. aid to the U.N. when North Korea, assisted by Russia and China, invaded South Korea in 1950. To him must be credited the Marshall Plan, designed to aid European rehabilitation and check communist expansion. Refusing to seek a third term, Truman returned to his home in Independence, Mo., where he prepared his memoirs, published as Years of Decision (1955) and Years of Trial and Hope (1956). He also wrote Mr. Citizen (1960).
Trumbull, John (1750-1831). American poet, a member of the Hartford Wits, known as the author of satires and bombastic patriotic poems in the neoclassic style. His works include The Progress of Dulness (1772-1773), a satire on contemporary methods of education; An Elegy on the Times (1774), a patriotic piece; M'Fingal, an anti-British satire, issued in more than 30 editions in its time; essays in the style of The Spectator; several anonymous revolutionary essays; and a number of incident-related poems. He also collaborated with Joel Barlow and other members of the Hartford Wits on The Anarchiad.

Trumbull, in his time the most widely read poet of the Hartford school, came of an outstanding Connecticut family and was a child prodigy. He learned to read and write at the age of two, passed the Yale entrance examinations at seven, and entered the college at 13. During the period just before the Revolution, he studied law in the office of John Adams in Boston and took part in the political agitation of the times. Later he was a representative in the Connecticut legislature and a judge in the superior and supreme courts of that state. Washington's nickname for him, "Brother Jonathan," has become a stock phrase to denote the typical American.

Trumnion, Commodore Hawser. The hero's choleric uncle in Tobias Smollett's novel Peregrine Pickle. Trumnion is a one-eyed naval veteran who, though retired from the service because of injuries received in naval engagements, still keeps garrison in his own county house, which is defended with drawbridge and moat, and observes the routine of a battle-ship. He sleeps in a hammock, makes his servants sleep in hammocks, takes his turn on watch, and indulges his naval tastes in various other ways. Lieutenant Jack Hatchway is his companion. When he goes to be married, he rides on a hunter which he steers, like a ship, according to the compass.

Tuatha Dé Danann (Gael, "the peoples of the goddess Dana or Danu"). In the Gaelic MYTHOLOGICAL CYCLE, one of the five original races to invade and inhabit prehistoric Ireland. They defeated the people before them, the Fir Bolg, and also were victorious on several occasions over the Fomorians, notably in the BATTLE OF MOYTURA. Ultimately, they themselves were conquered by the next invaders, the Sons of Míl, last of the five races. After defeating the Tuatha Dé Danann, the Sons of Mil came to worship them as gods. Traditionally, they were given the lower half (underground) of Ireland and they dwell there, in the mounds, to this day. Among the heroes of the Tuatha Dé Danann who later were worshiped as gods by the Sons of Mil are Dadga, Lug, Mananan Mac Lir, Mórrigan, and Ogma. In modern folklore, the Tuatha Dé Danann are the Irish faeries and come out of the mounds on Samain Eve.

Tuckerman, Frederick Goddard (1821-1873). American poet. Trained as a lawyer, Tuckerman spent most of his life as a recluse at Greenfield, Mass. In 1860, he published a slim volume of sonnets, which elicited high praise from Tennyson. After two further editions during the poet's lifetime, his work was neglected; in 1931, the poet Witter Bynner prepared an edition with a long and enthusiastic introduction. Since then, modern poets have admired Tuckerman's free use of the sonnet form in his melancholy verse.

Tudor, Henry. See HENRY VII.

Tu Fu (712-770). Chinese poet of the T'ang Dynasty. He and Li Po are regarded as the greatest Chinese poets. A great stylist who endured much personal misfortune, his works reveal an unsurpassed depth and command of the poetic art of his time. Contrasting with the Taoistic flavor of Li Po's writings, Tu Fu was partial to Confucianism.

Tun-huang. Oasis in Northwest China, present-day Kansu. It is the site of Buddhist caves where a walled-up library, hidden for a thousand years, was discovered by Sir Aurel Stein (1900). A vast cache of Buddhist texts, Chinese popular literature, and the like contributed much new knowledge to sinology. Here was found the world's first printed book, the Diamond Sûtra (868). Most of the material was brought to England by Stein and to Paris by Paul Pelliot.

Turandot. Opera by Giacomo Puccini, first performed in 1926, two years after the composer's death. Act III was completed by Franco Alfano from the composer's sketches. The libretto is based on a play (1762) by Gozzi. Ferruccio Busoni also wrote an opera Turandot (1917) based on the same play.

Turberville, George (1540–1610?). English poet and translator. He is best known for his translation of Ovid's Heroides (The Heroical Epistles, 1567), which contains some early experiments with blank verse. He also popularized, in translation, the Elogies of Mantuan (The Eclipses of the Poet B. Mantuan, 1567). His original poems are collected in Epitaphs, Epigrams, Songs, and Sonnets (1567).

Turenne, vicomte de. Henri de la Tour d'Auvergne (1611–1675). French military leader. Turenne served in the Thirty Years' War and helped to bring about the Peace of Westphalia. He fought against the Fronde (1651) and recovered Paris for the king. In 1667 and 1672, he commanded armies under Louis XIV.

Turgenev, Ivan Sergeyevich (1813–1840), Russian novelist. Turgenev was born in Orol in south-central Russia and raised on the family estate at Spasskoye. His childhood was troubled by the continual bad feelings between his mother and father. His mother's feelings of resentment were often taken out on the children and servants.

In 1837 Turgenev graduated from the University of St. Petersburg, and the following year went to Germany to continue his studies at the University of Berlin, concentrating on classical languages, literature, and, especially, philosophy. Among his fellow Russian students at the university was Nikolai Stankevich (1813–1840), who had headed one of the famous philosophical circles of students at Moscow University in the early 1830s. Another fellow student of Turgenev's was the future anarchist leader Mikhail Bakunin. The intense interest in philosophical questions, the incessant talk, and the personality of Bakunin were all used to some extent in Turgenev's first novel, Rudin. In 1841, Turgenev returned to Russia, intending to make his career as a philosopher. The government abolished the teaching of philosophy, however, and the idle scholar spent his time going to the theater, carrying on a romance with Tatiana Bakunin, Mikhail's sister, and meeting the leaders of the intelligentsia. In 1843 he met the renowned Vissarion Belinski with whom he established a close friendship. Turgenev's despot mother objected to his idleness, and in June he obtained a minor appointment in the civil service, which he held for almost two years.

During the winter of 1843, Turgenev made one of the most fateful meetings of his life, with Pauline Viardot-Garcia, a singer who was the wife of the French writer Louis Viardot. Turgenev fell in love with her almost at once, and the unrequited relationship continued for the rest of Turgenev's life. Pauline continued to live with her husband and to pursue her singing career, returning to Russia for concerts in each of the winters between 1843 and 1846. She did not return in 1846, however, and Turgenev went to France to see her. He lived on the Viardot estate and in Paris from 1847 to 1850. During this period he wrote the work that was to bring him his first literary success, A Sportsman's Sketches. He also wrote some of his best plays at this time, including A Month in the Country.

Since Turgenev's mother had died in 1850, he was at last financially independent and was freed from having to write all the time for living expenses. He became a member of the editorial board of Sovremennik (The Contemporary), which was headed at that time by the poet Nikolai Nekrasov. Turgenev left this literary milieu in 1856 to go abroad again; he returned to Russia in 1858, and during that summer he lived on his estate at Spasskoye, completing his second novel, A Nest of Gentlefolk. The following year his third novel, On the Eve, appeared, and the autobiographical story, Pervaya lyubov (First Love). On the Eve did not appear in Sovremennik, as had most of Turgenev's previous work. The journal had virtually been taken over by the radical critics. Nikolai Chernychevski and Nikolai Dobrolyubov, Turgenev disagreed with their utilitarian view of literature, and they thought him too much of an aesthete. Another literary quarrel beset Turgenev in 1860. The novelist Ivan Goncharov, whose mental health was in decline, accused Turgenev of having plagiarized his novel Obry (The Precipice, 1869) for parts of On the Eve and of having intercepted his letters to steal his ideas. Turgenev demanded that a panel of three literary men judge the case. This was done, and Turgenev was cleared. The novelist had more trouble to face, however, when his major novel, Fathers and Children, was published. The depiction of the central character, Bazarov, outraged both conservatives and radicals. The furor of criticism induced Turgenev to leave Russia, and thereafter he only returned for short visits to his native land. His next novel, Smoke, was, in part, a retaliation against the radicals and also against the conservative Slavophiles. Neither, Turgenev maintained, were on the right track. There was nothing in Russia nor the Russians worth working with. The salvation of the country could only come, Turgenev claimed, by turning to the civilization of the West. This novel, naturally, was not well received in Russia, which only further embittered Turgenev. The work also was the central point of a famous argument in Baden-Baden between Turgenev and Dostoevski. The two men had not been on good terms since the 1840's when both had been in the circle of young writers gathered around the critic Belinski. At that time Turgenev had reputedly enraged the sensitive Dostoevski with his barbed wit, and Dostoevski now supposedly paid back Turgenev by needling him about the poor reception of Smoke.

Turgenev's best work of his late years was the short novel Veshnye Vody (Torrents of Spring, 1872). His last attempt at a novel, Virgin Soil, was another effort to deal with the revolutionary movement in Russia, and again Turgenev met with hostile criticism. Ill with cancer of the spine, he made a few visits to Russia in his last years, on one of which he made peace with Tolstoi after a rift of almost 20 years' duration. In 1882 his Stikhotozeroiya v proze (Poems in Prose), his last notable work, was published. Turgenev died in 1883 on the estate at Bougival, France, which he shared with the Viardots. Pauline Viardot was at his bedside.

Turgenev was the first major Russian novelist of the late 19th century to become well known outside his own country. His reputation in the West diminished somewhat when the more powerful talents of Tolstoi and Dostoevski were revealed, but the esteem... accorded Turgenev's artistic ability has remained high.

Turgot, Anne Robert Jacques. Baron de l'Aulne (1727-1781). French statesman, economist, and reformer, considered one of the founders of political economy. As comptroller general under Louis XVI, and disciple of the Physiocrats, he considered agriculture the sole source of wealth, and advocated greatly increased freedom (including freedom from taxation) for commerce and industry. He contributed articles to the Encyclopédie and influenced Adam Smith.

Turner, Charles Tennyson (1808-1879). English poet, older brother of Alfred Tennyson. He wrote several volumes of poetry, mostly sonnets in a Wordsworthian style. These include Sonnets and Fugitive Pieces (1830), Sonnets (1864), and Collected Sonnets (1880). In 1830 he adopted the name Turner by the terms of his great-uncle's will.

Turner, Frederick Jackson (1861-1932). American historian. Jackson is best known for his “frontier hypothesis,” which he first presented at a meeting of the American Historical Association in 1893 in a paper called The Significance of the Frontier in American History (1894). Rejecting the traditional emphasis on the influence of the East and of Anglo-Saxon political institutions, Turner claimed that the form and spirit of American democracy were the direct product of the frontier with its free land, its stimulation of ingenuity and resourcefulness, and its dominant individualism. His thesis was immediately recognized as a historical idea of great importance and it opened up a new area for historical investigation; later historians, however, have challenged many of his interpretations.

Turner, who taught at the University of Wisconsin and at Harvard, also wrote The Rise of the New West (1906), The United States, 1830-1850 (1935), and two collections of essays, The Frontier in American History (1920) and The Significance of Sections in American History (1932).

Turner, Joseph Mallord William (1775-1851). English painter. He began by painting vivid, romantic landscapes in the style of Claude Lorrain and Nicolas Poussin, but became increasingly concerned with the imaginative representation of light. He is famous for scenes of Venice in which forms lose their solidity and their outlines in the intense light of sky and water, and for storms at sea and effects of mist, smoke, and light. John Ruskin extolled him in Modern Painters (1843).

Turn of the Screw. The (1898). A novelette by Henry James. It is told from the viewpoint of the leading character, a governess in love with her employer, who goes to an isolated English estate to take charge of Miles and Flora, two attractive and precocious children. She gradually realizes that her young charges are under the evil influence of two ghosts, Peter Quint, the ex-steward, and Miss Jessel, their former governess. At the climax of the story, she enters into open conflict with the children, as a result of which Flora is alienated and Miles dies of fright. Some critics, notably Edmund Wilson, have interpreted the ghosts as products of the disordered mind of the governess, but most critics now agree that James intended them to have actual, objective existence, even though their exact nature remains ambiguous. The story was dramatized by William Archibald as The Innocents (1950) and was made into an opera by Benjamin Britten (1954).

Turnus. In Vergil’s Aeneid, the king of the Rutulians. His suit for Lavinia, daughter of Latinus, is favored by Amata, her mother. When Aeneas is promised the hand of Lavinia, Turnus, incited by the Fury Acteo, wages war on the Trojans. He is finally killed by Aeneas in single combat.

Turpin, Archbishop (d. 800?). French churchman, elected archbishop of Reims about 753. According to some legends, such as the Chanson de Roland, he was the religious leader among Charlemagne's paladins and died with Roland at Roncesvalles in 778. More frequently, he is erroneously considered the author of the Historia de vita Caroli Magni et Rolandi (usually called the Chronicle of Charlemagne), a Latin history of Charlemagne's exploits in Spain, actually written by monks in the 11th and 12th centuries.

Turpin, Richard. Known as Dick Turpin (1706-1739). English robber. The son of an alehouse keeper and partner of a highwayman, Tom King, whom he accidentally killed while firing at a constable, Turpin has been the subject of many ballads and legends. The incident of his famous ride from London to York in a single night on his steed, Black Bess, to establish an alibi first appeared in the novel Rookwood (1834), the fictionalized account of Turpin's life by Harrison Ainsworth. Turpin himself was finally hanged at York, having been convicted of horse stealing.

Tushina, Lizaveta Nikolayevna. In Fedor Dostoevski's The Possessed, the young woman who gives herself to Stavrogin, only to learn that he is incapable of returning love to anyone. She is murdered by a rampaging mob at the scene of the fire where the Lebyadkins were killed.

Tusser, Thomas (c. 1524-1580). English poet. He is known for his advice on domestic and farm problems presented in a form resembling later farmer's almanacs, but written in verse throughout. They were very popular in their day with the farmers and housewives of England. His works in this vein include A Humphreth Good Points of Husbandry (1557); A Hundreth Good Points of Husbandry (1570); and Five Hundreth Good Points of Husbandry, United to as Many of Good Huswifery (1573). Religious verse and moral maxims were included among information on crops, soil cultivation, weather, and the like.

Tutivillus. Later Titivillus. A demon in medieval legend. He collects all the words mumbled or skipped over by priests in the performance of services, and bears them to hell to be recorded against the offender. Later the word is used for any tattletale fiend. See Tom Titivillus.
Tutt, Ephraim. See Arthur Train.

Tvardovski, Aleksandr Trifonovich (1910- ). Russian poet and editor. His first book of poems was The Road to Socialism (Put k sotsializmu; 1930). In 1936 he published The Land of Muravia (Strana Muraviiya), a long narrative poem for which he received a Stalin prize. Vasilii Tsiorkin, another narrative poet about a jovial, courageous soldier, was published between 1941 and 1945 in installments. At the height of the post-Stalin thaw, Tvardovski published parts of a long poem, Horizon Beyond Horizon (Dal’ za dal’yu; 1956), which spoke out in favor of freedom in literary work. He is editor of Novyi Mir, the Soviet literary journal which often publishes the most nonconformist of Soviet writings.

Twain, Mark. Pen name of Samuel Langhorne Clemens (1835-1910). American humorist, newspaperman, lecturer, and writer. Born in Hannibal, Mo., Twain drew on his boyhood along the Mississippi River for characters and incidents in his best work. His formal schooling ended early, and he learned the printing trade. After writing for the Hannibal newspapers, he left for St. Louis, Philadelphia, and New York in 1853. Returning to the river in 1857, he became a Mississippi steamboat pilot until the Civil War ended river traffic. He wrote of this period in Life on the Mississippi; from river slang for two fathoms deep, he received his pen name.

Twain met Artemus Ward in mining camps in Nevada, learning from him the technique of lecturing successfully. Next he went to California as a roving correspondent, and worked for Bret Harte. His fame as humorist and storyteller was established with the publication of The Celebrated Jumping Frog of Calaveras County. His lectures increased his reputation, but The Innocents Abroad, product of a European trip, gave him a place in the world of letters and enough financial security to marry Olivia Langdon.

In the following year Twain wrote Roughing It, Tom Sawyer, A Tramp Abroad (1880), The Prince and the Pauper, Life on the Mississippi (1883), Huckleberry Finn, and A Connecticut Yankee in King Arthur’s Court. After a protracted European lecturing tour, during which one of his daughters died, he continued to write. Among the books published were The Tragedy of Pudd’nhead Wilson, The Man That Corrupted Hadleyburg, and The Mysterious Stranger. In his last years Twain became a bitter satirist, famous for cynical epigrams. Some of his last essays, included in Letters from the earth, were first published in 1962. They reveal Twain as bitter and disillusioned in his last years.

A careful and conscious artist, Twain became a master of the technical devices of exaggeration, irreverence, and deadpan seriousness; sensitive to the sound of language, he introduced colloquial speech into American fiction. See 1601: Gibled Age, The.

’Twas the Night Before Christmas. The popular title of A Visit from St. Nicholas.

Tweed, William Marcy (1823-1878). American politician, head of Tammany Hall. Known as “Boss” Tweed, he and the Tweed Ring of politicians swindled the treasury of New York City out of millions of dollars. Samuel J. Tilden was chairman of the Democratic State Committee that effected Tweed’s downfall. Thomas Nast’s remarkable cartoons in Harper’s Weekly and the editorial views of The New York Times (1870) were significant influences on public opinion.

Tweedledum and Tweedledee. Names satirizing two quarrelling and negligibly different schools of musicians. They were invented by John Byrom (1692-1763). Used, to mean persons or opinions “as like as two peas.”

Some say compared to Bononcini
That Myneheer Handel’s but a nannie;
Others aver that he to Handel
Is scarcely fit to hold a candle.
Strange all this difference should be
’Twixt Tweedleendum and Tweedledee.
J. Byrom

The duke of Marlborough and most of the nobility took the side of G. B. Bononcini (c. 1672-c. 1752), but the prince of Wales, with Pope and Arbuthnot, was for Handel. See Gluckists.

Lewis Carroll introduced Tweedleendum and Tweedledee into his Through the Looking-Glass, the sequel to Alice in Wonderland, where they sing the famous ditty of The Walrus and the Carpenter.

Twelfth Night. January 5, the eve of Twelfth Day, or the Feast of the Epiphany, twelve days after Christmas. It was formerly a time of great merrymaking, as the end of the secular celebration of Christmas.

Twelfth Night, or What You Will (c. 1600). A comedy by William Shakespeare. The main plot hinges on the physical likeness between Sebastain and his twin sister Viola, who are separated after a shipwreck off the coast of Illyria, each believing the other to be dead. Disguising herself as a boy and taking the name of Cesario, Viola becomes the page of Orsino, the duke of Illyria, and falls in love with him. The duke, however, cherishes a hopeless passion for Olivia, who is in mourning for her dead brother and, aided by her pompous steward Malvolio, has forced her entire household to share her grief. When Cesario is sent by the duke to further his suit, Olivia is instantly smitten with the disguised Viola. Arriving in Illyria, Sebastian is mistaken for the page by Olivia, who sends for a priest and marries the astonished young man. The ensuing confusion is cleared up when Viola and Sebastian meet and recognize each other. Yielding Olivia to Sebastian, the duke decides to marry Viola, who has confessed her love for him.

The subplot concerns the machinations of Maria, Sir Toby Belch, and Sir Andrew Aguecheek against the pretentious Malvolio. Their efforts to remove him from Olivia’s favor result in some of the finest low comedy in Shakespeare.

The play is based on an old Italian comedy Gli’Innanginati (1537) and later versions of it by Bandello, Belleforest, and Barnabe Rich.

Twelve, The (Dvenadzat'; 1918). A long poem by Aleksandr Blok which is regarded as one of the best literary works produced by the Russian Revolution. The scene is the chaotic streets of St. Petersburg in the early days of the revolution, rendered by a striking mixture of poetry, bits of popular songs, and coarse colloquialisms. The 12 are a detachment of Red Guards patrolling the snowy streets. An ambiguous note was introduced by Blok when he in-served the figure of Jesus at the end of the poem. Blok's own explanation for this insertion did little to clarify the meaning of Jesus' presence in the work.

Twenty Thousand Leagues Under the Sea (Vingt mille lieues sous les mers; 1870). A romance by Jules Verne, remarkable for its prognostication of the invention of submarines. The central characters of the tale, in the process of exploring marine disturbances, are captured by the megalomaniacal Captain Nemo. An underwater tour in a strange craft and their ensuing escape conclude the work.

Twenty Years After (Vingt Ans après; 1845). A historical romance by Alexandre Dumas, sequel to The Three Musketeers. In this novel, the four friends find themselves on opposite sides of the uprising against Cardinal Mazarin known as the Fronde. D'Artagnan and Porthos, still guardsmen, must support the regime. Athos, now a country gentleman, and Aramis, who has finally entered a monastery, join the intrigue. This second novel contains a generous share of excitement and adventure.

Twice-Told Tales, The (1837, 1842). A collection of tales and sketches by Nathaniel Hawthorne. The name of the volume is probably derived from the line in King John: "Life is a tedious as a twice-told tale." Among the most interesting pieces are Howe's Masquerade, The Grey Champion, The Great Car- buncle, and The Minister's Black Veil.

It claims that scientists are not sufficiently appreciated and that English society is divided into two cultures: the scientific, and the literary and humanistic. The literary and humanistic culture is of upper-middle-class origin, part of the Establishment, and conservative. The scientific culture is of lower-middle-class origin and of low status, but at the center of progress.

Two Deaths of Christopher Martin, The. See Finch Martin.

Two Gentlemen of Verona, The (c. 1592). A comedy by William Shakespeare. The "two gentlemen," are Valentine and Proteus, close friends at first, but later rivals for the hand of Silvia, daughter of the duke of Milan, who wants her to marry Thurio. Proteus forgets his old love Julia, plays his friend false, and brings about his banishment. Silvia escapes to the forest to join Valentine, who has become an outlaw, and is pursued by Proteus and his page, who is really the doting Julia in disguise. Proteus finds Silvia and is about to make her submit to him when she is rescued by Valentine, who generously forgives his wayward friend. The duke then arrives on the scene and, impressed by Valentine's manly conduct, freely bestows his daughter upon him, while the repentant Proteus contents himself with marrying Julia.

The play is one of Shakespeare's lesser comedies. Its principal source is Jorge de Montemayor's Diana (1559), and its form is based on the early Italian comedies.

Two Noble Kinsmen, The (pub. 1634). A romantic drama by Beaumont and Fletcher, probably written in collaboration with Shakespeare. The play takes place in Athens after the defeat of Thebes by Theseus. Two valiant Theban knights, Palamon and Arcite, spy Emilia, Theseus' sister-in-law, from their prison window. Each immediately falls in love with her. Later Arcite is released and Palamon escapes with the help of the jailer's daughter. They meet and duel in a forest where they are discovered by Theseus, who plans a great tournament. The winner will have the hand of Emilia; the loser will be executed. Palamon loses the tournament and is about to be beheaded when word comes that Arcite has been killed in a fall from his horse. With his last breath, Arcite relinquishes his right to Emilia's hand in Palamon's favor. The story of Palamon and Arcite was first told in Boccaccio's Teseida. See Philip Massinger.

Two on a Tower (1882). A novel by Thomas Hardy. It deals with the mutual love of the young astronomer Swinthin St. Cleve and Lady Viviette Constantine. An early secret marriage between them is set aside by later developments, and, when St. Cleve finally returns from South Africa to the familiar observatory tower to propose marriage, Viviette falls dead in his arms.

Two Years Before the Mast (1840). A narrative by Richard Henry Dana, Jr. It is based on his own journal, written while he was a sailor. The book dwells on the brutality of the ship's captain, and the sailors' lack of redress. It did much to arouse public opinion, and led to legal action. In 1859, Dana added a final chapter describing a second trip to California. He continues the stories of several men he mentioned in the earlier part of the narrative. The book influenced both Melville and Conrad.

Tybalt. In Shakespeare's Romeo and Juliet, Lady Capulet's nephew and Juliet's cousin. Although the hot-tempered Tybalt recognizes Romeo at the Capulet's ball, old Capulet forbids him to harm a guest. Later he tries to pick a quarrel with Romeo, but the latter, Tybalt's kinsman since his secret marriage to Juliet, refuses to be baited. After Tybalt has slain Mercutio, however, the infuriated Romeo kills him.

Because Tybalt has the same name as the cat in the beast-epic Reynard the Fox, Mercutio addresses him as "rat-catcher" and "good king of cats."

Tyler, Royall (1757-1826). American jurist, dramatist, and novelist. Although Tyler was a practicing lawyer who served as chief justice of the Vermont Supreme Court and as professor of jurisprudence at the University of Vermont, he is remembered as the virtual founder of American drama; his play The Contrast was the first comedy to be written by a native American. Tyler also wrote The Georgia Spee, or Land in the Moon (1797), a comedy satirizing the Yazoos Frauds, and The Algerine Captive, a novel.

Tyler's Rebellion. Also called the Peasants' Revolt (1831). Insurrection of the peasants of Kent and Essex. They demanded abolition of seignior, the poll tax, and all restrictions on the freedom of labor and trade; under the leadership of Wat Tyler they sacked Canterbury, then several official buildings in London. The young Richard II met with Tyler and was having charters drawn up according to his demands; but Tyler insolently presented fresh demands the next day, and in the fighting that ensued Tyndale was killed by William Walworth, Lord Mayor of London. In 1382 Parliament revoked the concessions that Richard had made. John Gower described the revolt in his Vox Claminantis, Robert Southey in his dramatic poem Wat Tyler (1817).

Tyndale, William (d. 1536). English Protestant preacher, known for his translation of the Bible into English. It was first printed at Cologne in 1525. He sent copies of his translation into England for distribution, but they were condemned by the bishops and burned. Tyndale also wrote pamphlets supporting the authority of the Bible and the king over the power of the Church and the Pope, and for awhile was favored by King Henry VIII, although he soon lost this favor when he disapproved of the king's divorce. He carried on a vigorous controversy with Sir Thomas More, and in 1536 was strangled and burned at the stake in Antwerp as a heretic. See Bible, English Versions.

As one of the Hundred-handed Giants (Hekatoncheires), he warred against the gods and was banished by Zeus to Tartarus under Mount Aetna. Typhon is also the name used by the Greeks for the Egyptian Set, the god of evil, who killed his brother (or father) Osiris.

tyrant (tyrannos). An absolute ruler. In ancient Greece the tyrant was merely the absolute ruler, the despot of a state, and at first the word had no implication of cruelty or what we call tyranny. Many of the Greek tyrants were excellent rulers, as were Pisistratus and Pericles, of Athens; Periander, of Corinth; Dionysius the Younger, Gelon, and his brother Hiero, of Syracuse; Phidion, of Argos; Polycrates, of Samos. The word tyrannos soon, however, obtained much the same meaning as it has with us.

Tyutchev, Feodor Ivanovich (1803–1873). Russian poet. After graduating from Moscow University in 1821, Tyutchev entered the diplomatic service and spent 20 years abroad, mostly in Germany. While there he became the friend of Heine and Schelling. He was one of the first Russian translators of Heine. Tyutchev wrote and published in literary journals during his years of diplomatic service. It was not until the mid-1850's that his work was issued in a separate volume. From that time on, he was held in high esteem as a poet. His renown faded somewhat toward the end of the 19th century. It was revived through the influence of the symbolist poets, who considered Tyutchev one of their precursors. A distinctive feature of his work is his nature poetry, which often deals with the duality caused by the apparent order of the universe and the chaos that lies just beneath this seeming order. This idea is expressed clearly in one of his most famous lyrics, Ne to chto mnite vy priroda (Nature is not what you think, 1836). A duality of feeling is also evident in Tyutchev's love poems, where love is sometimes called "the key of life" and sometimes an "unequal struggle of two hearts." Many of his finest love lyrics were occasioned by Tyutchev's affair with Elena Aleksandrovna Deniseva, his children's governess. Among the more famous of Tyutchev's poems are Silentium (1833) and Son na morye (Dream at Sea, 1836).

Tzarar, Tristan (1896–1963). Romanian-born French poet, best known for having founded the Dada movement in 1916. Tzarar is the author of several dramatic or epic poems in a surrealist style, such as L'Homme approximatif (1936).

Tzvetayeva, Marina Ivanovna (1892–1941). Russian poet. Much of Tzvetayeva's verse was published abroad, where she lived after 1922, having supported the Whites during the civil war. Some of her best poetry, which is typically written in powerful, staccato rhythms, is based on folk literature and legends. Tzvetayeva returned to the Soviet Union in 1939 and committed suicide two years later. Her poetry was admired by Boris Pasternak.
In England, "upper class." See Non-U.

Ubaldo of Sweden. In Torquato Tasso's Gerusalemme Liberata, a crusading knight sent along with Guelph to bring back Rinaldo the Christian champion, who had left the camp in anger. He and Guelph are assisted by the Hermit of Ascalon, who gives them a magic wand to ward off animals and a mirror-like shield in which Rinaldo will see his disgrace. They travel to the distant Fortunate Isles, where the enchantress Armida keeps Rinaldo in bondage and free him. Ubaldo is believed to symbolize the power of reason over the senses in the allegorical scheme of the poem.

Übermensch (Ger., superman). A term in Nietzsche's Thus Spake Zarathustra. The word, which had first occurred, only in passing, in Goethe's Faust, was used by Nietzsche to designate the goal of human existence. Despite the Nazi interpretation of his works, Nietzsche did not believe that the Germans were a race of supermen, nor did he believe that self-discipline and training, or racial purity, would ever develop such a race. The substance of his belief was simply that whereas every distinct human culture has its own unique goals, there exists a single universal human goal, the sum of all particular cultural goals, and this is the "Übermensch." He believed that man should completely commit himself to his earthly goals, that he should sacrifice his life for them, and that out of the self-destruction resulting from such sacrifice, the "Übermensch" would arise. It is not clear whether Nietzsche conceived of the "Übermensch" as an actual being or as an idea.

Ubu Roi (King Ubu, 1896). A play by Alfred Jarry which grew out of a farce written with a classmate at 15 to ridicule a pompous math teacher. A stylized burlesque, it satirizes the tendency of the successful bourgeois to abuse his authority and to become irresponsibly complacent. Ubu enchainé (1900) less successfully parodies the tragic style.

Uccello, Paolo. Real name, Paolo di Dono (1397–1475). Florentine painter. In spite of his concentration on the elements of perspective and foreshortening—the contemporary discoveries of Alberti and Brunelleschi with which he was fascinated—his works, such as St. George and the Dragon, have the charming simplicity of a toylike world because of their decorative use of simplified forms and sharply outlined patterns of color. His best-known works are the three battle scenes he painted to commemorate the defeat of the Sienese by the Florentines at San Romano in 1432. They were commissioned by Lorenzo de' Medici for his palace, but the three component paintings have now been separated and are located in Florence, Paris, and London.

Udall or Udal or Uvedale, Nicholas (1504–1556). English playwright, translator, and schoolmaster. Udall, Headmaster at Eton from 1534 to 1541, is chiefly remembered as the author of the first English comedy, Ralph Roister Doister. Something similar to Plautus' Miles Gloriosus, it was probably first performed c. 1553, but not published until 1566. Udall also translated Terence, and wrote plays in Latin on theological subjects. He appears as a character in Ford Madox Ford's novel The Fifth Queen.

Ugarit. Ancient city on the sea-coast of Syria. For some centuries it was under the dominion of Egypt, but, after the battle of Kadesh, it came into the Hittite sphere. In both cases, however, Ugarit was an autonomous power. It is particularly important for the light its excavation has shed on the widespread Semitic culture of this period, which may have extended as far as Minoan Crete. Several important ancient documents have been discovered at Ugarit: The Poem of Baal, The Poem of Ahab, and The Poem of the Gracious Gods, which have been useful to students of the Old Testament.

Ugolino. Count of Pisa (c. 1220–1289). Guelph leader whose history is one of the most famous episodes in Dante's Inferno. He is found frozen in the ice of the ninth circle, that of the traitors, gnawing on the head of the Ghibelline Archbishop Ruggiero, who first was Ugolino's ally in the betrayal of Pisa, then turned on him and imprisoned him with his four sons until they starved to death.

Uhland, Ludwig (1787–1862). German romantic poet. He is most famous for his ballads in folk style. He was a serious student of folklore, and his collection of Alte hoch- und niederdeutsche Volkslieder (Old South and North German Folk-Songs, 1844–1845) is an important scholarly work. His dramas, Herzog Ernst von Schwaben (Duke Ernest of Swabia, 1818) and Ludwig der Bayer (Ludwig the Bavarian, 1819), seek to further both the regional and national cultural awareness of Germany. Uhlund himself was a politically active liberal. See Justinus Kerner; German Romanticism.

Ullman, James Ramsey (1907- ). American writer. Before he became a successful popular writer, Ullman wrote plays and then became a producer on Broadway. He was coproducer of Men in White (1930), which won a Pulitzer Prize, but after several failures he went to South America where he followed the Amazon to the sea. The result was his book The Other Side of the Mountain (1938). The trip also provided the background for his later novel, River of the Sun (1951). High Conquest (1941) is a history of mountaineering; The White Tower (1945) is a novel about mountain climbing. Among his other books are the novels Windom’s Way (1952), inspired by the story of Dr. Gordon Seagrave, and The Day on Fire, based on the life of Rambaud.

It was forfeited to the Crown in James I’s reign in consequence of the rebellions of Tyrconnel and Tyrone, and colonized (1609-1612) by English and Scottish settlers, who were forbidden to sell land to any Irishman. Since then the Ulstermen have been intensely English and anti-Irish in sentiment and action and have refused on any terms to coalesce with the original inhabitants, who have ever been anti-British.

Ulyanov, Vladimir Ilyich. See Lenin, Nikolai.

Ulysses. The Roman name of the Greek Odys- seus, hero of Homer’s Odyssey and a prominent character in the Iliad. He is called Ulysses in most English poetry, including the earlier translations of Homer. Tennyson wrote a poem Ulysses (1842), in which the hero in his old age speaks of his still active longing for adventure. In a modern reincarnation as Leopold Bloom, he is the hero of James Joyce’s novel Ulysses.

Ulysses (1922). A novel by James Joyce. First published in Paris, and banned in the U.S. until 1933, it is now generally recognized to be the greatest 20th-century novel written in English. Its obscurity has made it the subject of much controversy. Virginia Woolf, William Butler Yeats, and Ezra Pound admitted to their confusion upon a first reading; T. S. Eliot, immediately recognizing its greatness, said the book would be a landmark because it destroys our civilization.

In Ulysses, Joyce has shifted from the personal, lyrical style of A Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man to the detached and impersonal style of the epic. Whereas his earlier book is affirmative in tone, Ulysses is a disillusioned study of estrangement, paralysis, and the disintegration of society.

The novel records the events of one average day, June 16, 1904, in the lives of its three leading characters: Leopold Bloom, his wife Molly, and Stephen Dedalus. The chronological pattern of these events provides the only narrative sequence in the book. Journeys about the city of Dublin are matched by inward journeys into the consciousness (see Stream of Consciousness), which Joyce expresses through journeys into the nature of language itself. On one level Joyce’s style is as unrelentingly naturalistic as a movie reel; every detail, from a newspaper ad to a bodily function is recorded and dispassionately analyzed. But by means of these details, he captures the chain of stimulus and response—the material of experience—with a degree of accuracy and immediacy never before achieved in fiction. And by means of careful orchestration, these details become significant as symbols and raise the work above the level of simple naturalism.

It has been said that in order to fully understand Ulysses one must, at the very least, be familiar with the theology of the Roman Catholic Church, the history of heresy, Irish legend, European history, mythology, astronomy, Hebrew, Latin, Gaelic, and Gypsy slang. Joyce’s method relates the time-world of Dublin to the timeless patterns of myth, history, and religion. The plan of the book parallels the Odyssey. Ulysses’ 19 years of wandering is paralleled by the one-day pilgrimage of Bloom, an advertisement canvasser, and the commonplace occurrences of his day echo episodes in the Odyssey. Stephen is related to Telemachus, and Molly Bloom to Penelope, although through a complex network of literary and historical allusions, each character is associated with many other figures as well. The central theme, that of exile, is one that preoccupied Joyce. Both Stephen and Bloom are exiled from their home and family life, their... country, and their religion. However Stephen is rejected because of his rejection of his dying mother—in a larger sense his rejection of Ireland—while Bloom is rejected by Ireland as a Jew. Bloom—in a sense a symbol for humanity—searches for fulfillment in social, political, and ethical terms, while Stephen—the artistic and uncompromising mind—searches for spiritual and emotional values. Whereas Ulysses on his odyssey gradually discovers the truth about himself and his relation to the gods, and finally returns to his homeland, Joyce's two exiles cannot find the key to their loneliness and frustration, and their potentialities for growth seem fated to be stunted by their environment. But the final section of the book belongs to Molly Bloom, an embodiment of the feminine, regenerative principle of the universe. Her famous soliloquy, in one uninterrupted long sentence, ends with the word yes—her affirmation of life and love.

Believing that man is rooted in matter, Joyce was the first novelist to give physical actualities the importance they have in life. In Ulysses he perfected the interior monologue. Throughout the book he parodies a variety of literary styles.

Una. The heroine of the 1st book of Spenser's Faerie Queene. She personifies Truth, her name being derived from the Latin unus, one. With the Red Cross Knight as her champion, she sets forth to relieve her royal parents who are being besieged by a dragon. She is soon parted from her knight, however, and she encounters a lion that becomes her attendant. She sleeps in the hut of Superstition, and on awakening meets Archimago (Hypocrisy) dressed as her knight. As they journey together, Sansloy overthrows them, exposes Archimago, kills the lion, and carries off Una to a wild forest. Fauns and satyrs rescue her and try to worship her; when she restrains them, they pay homage to her donkey. After she is delivered by Sir Satyrane, Archimago tells her that the Red Cross Knight is dead, but she subsequently learns that he is being held captive by the giant Orgoglio. She asks for help from King Arthur, who kills Orgoglio and rescues the knight whom Una takes to the house of Holiness, where he is carefully nursed back to health. Eventually, the Red Cross Knight kills the dragon, whose destruction was their original quest, and Una leads him to Eden where their marriage takes place. She is taken to represent Protestantism and Queen Elizabeth, as well as abstract truth; in this connection she is strongly contrasted with Dulce.

Unamuno [y Jugo], Miguel de (1864-1936). Spanish philosopher, poet, and novelist. The leading member of the Generación del '98, Unamuno is considered one of the major figures in the history of modern thought. The principal elements of his philosophy deal with tyranny and freedom and the problem of death versus life—here he advanced conclusions which anticipated modern existentialism, and the problem of 20th-century materialism. However, it is the second of these categories in which he most excelled. Unamuno explored the problems resulting from man's scientific awareness of the reality of death; this led him to the vision of the tragic nature of life—the agony of the spirit. In this he came quite close to the existential concept of the "absurd" or the "alone." His philosophical works include Del sentimiento trágico de la vida en los hombres y en los pueblos (The tragic Sense of Life in Men and in Peoples, 1913), his best-known work, and La agonía del Cristianismo (The Agony of Christianity, 1924). Among his novels, Paz en la guerra (1897), Niebla (Mist, A Tragi-Comic Novel, 1914), and Tres novelas ejemplares (Three Exemplary Novels, 1920) are the most highly praised. In the closing scene of Mist, the protagonist Augusto Pérez addresses the author himself, calling Unamuno a mere fiction, in a turn that is reminiscent of Pirandello. Unamuno was a prolific writer, and all his work involves whatever form abounds with his philosophical ideas.

Unanimism. A French school of thought in the early 20th century (c. 1907), based on the theory that the group is of prime importance and that the individual, especially the poet, can attain power and significance only by merging himself with a social aggregation of one kind or another, he himself being far less important than the collective whole. Georges Duhamel and Jules Romains were among the literary men associated with the school. Unanimism spread through the Abbaye Group. In 1908 Romains published a volume of poetry entitled La Vie unanime, and the unanimist influence is considered to be found in the collective emphasis of his Men of Good Will.

Uncle Remus, His Songs and His Sayings (1880). A famous book of folk tales by Joel Chandler Harris. They are told to a small white boy by whimsical, lovable Uncle Remus, an aging Negro servant, whose stories are based on traditional fables of his race. The tales, which include the story of Tobacco, are ones that Harris himself heard as a boy and are fine examples of dialect and regional writing. Many of the characters are animals endowed with human qualities.

Uncle Sam. A commonly accepted personification of the U.S. government. It was originally a derogatory nickname for the federal government used by New Englanders opposed to its policies during the War of 1812. Uncle Sam may have been inspired by the nickname of a government inspector in Troy, N.Y., one Samuel Wilson, or it may represent an extension of the initials of the U.S. The Adventures of Uncle Sam (1816) by "Frederick Fiddfady" seems to be the earliest use of the name in a book.

Uncle Toby. The lovable but almost totally inarticulate military uncle of the hero in Laurence Sterne's Tristram Shandy. His principal activity (he is incapacitated by a wound in his thigh) is to instruct all the military campaigns of Marlborough in miniature on a small bowling green. His speech is largely the whistling of tunes and a vain attempt to communicate his ideas through military palaver. See Widow Wadman; Corporal Trim.

Uncle Tom's Cabin, or, Life Among the Lowly (1852). A novel by Harriet Beecher Stowe. The book relates the trials, suffering, and human dignity of Uncle Tom, an old Negro slave. Cruelly treated by a Yankee overseer, Simon Legree, he dies as the result of a beating. Uncle Tom is devoted to Little Eva, the daughter of his white owner, Augustine St. Clare. Other important characters are the mulatto girl, Eliza; the impish Negro child, Topsy; Miss Ophelia St. Clare, a New England spinster; and Marks, the slave catcher. The setting is Kentucky and Louisiana. The two most famous scenes are the death of Little Eva and the pursuit of Eliza and her baby over the Ohio River's ice floes. Eliza's husband, George, later joins her by using the underground railroad.

The book, which Mrs. Stowe said was written by God, was a contribution to the abolitionist movement, but treats the situation in a balanced manner. There is admiration for the best of Southern gentility; the villain is a Vermonter. The book, extraordinarily popular, was followed by sequels and answers and counteranswers before 1860.

Uncle Tom's devotion to his white master led to the use of the pejorative term "Uncle Tomism," meaning undue subservience to white people on the part of Negros.

Uncle Vanya (DYADYA VANYA; 1899). A play by Anton Chekhov, subtitled Scenes from Country Life in Four Acts. Uncle Vanya, Ivan Petrovich Voinitzki, for years has managed the estate of his brother-in-law, Aleksandr Vladimirovich Serebryakov, a retired professor. Vanya has given up his own dreams and ambitions to provide support for Serebryakov, whom he thinks is a great scholar. When he finally realizes that the old professor is somewhat of a fraud, Vanya feels cheated. His rancor against Serebryakov is increased by his love for the professor's young second wife, Yelena Andreyevna—a love that is not returned. He is thrown into fury and despair by Serebryakov's plan to sell the estate that Vanya has labored to make profitable. He unsuccessfully attempts to shoot the professor, then contemplates suicide. Serebryakov agrees not to sell the estate, and Vanya reconciled to his lot prepares to continue his drudgery.

Under Milk Wood (1954). A radio play for voices by Dylan Thomas. Written in poetic, inventive prose, it is full of humor, a joyful sense of the goodness of life and love, and a strong Welsh flavor. It is an impression of a spring day in the lives of the people of Llaregub, a Welsh village situated under Milk Wood. It has no plot, but a wealth of characters who dream aloud, converse with one another, and speak in choruses of alternating voices.

Under the Net (1954). A novel by Iris Murdoch. It recounts the adventures of Jake Donaghy, who gets himself involved in film-making, horse racing, blackmailing, and dog-stealing, and finally becomes a hospital orderly. Unable to build for himself the kind of structured, successful life all his friends lead, he remains free—the goal of the existentialist. The "net" of the title refers to both the cage in which society tries to trap him and the falsifications it constructs through illogical words and theories.

Under the Volcano (1947). A novel by Malcolm Lowry. Through the central character, Geoffrey Firmin, an ex-British consul and alcoholic living in Mexico, Lowry explores the gradual disintegration of a human being in despair. The book, which uses a variety of experimental techniques, is notable for its stylistic brilliance, as well as for the subtlety and depth of its characterizations.

He confesses the truth to the revolutionaries and is beaten, deaftened, and run over by a tram car; finally he returns to Russia. The "Western eyes" are those of an Englishman who reads and comments on Razumov's journal.

Undine (1811). A tale by Friedrich von Fouqué about the tragic love between the water-spirit Undine and a knight. Fouqué later made it into a libretto which was set to music by E. T. A. Hoffmann, first performed in 1816. Jean Giraudoux adapted the story of Undine in his play Undine (1939).

Undset, Sigrid (1882-1949). Norwegian novelist. She is best known for her novels dealing with life in the Scandinavian countries during the Middle Ages. The daughter of a university professor, Sigrid Undset acquired her love of the medieval while helping her father with his research. She presents a vividly realistic picture of the past, combining with her scholarly knowledge a keen sense of psychological analysis and a powerful style. Among her historical works are KRISTIN LARVANSDATTER; THE MASTER OF HESTVIKEN (orig. title Olav Audunssøn, 1925-1927), a tetralogy which includes THE AXE (1928), THE SNARE PIKE (1929), IN THE WILDERNESS (1929), and THE SON AVENGER (1930); and DEN BRAENDENDE BUSK (The Burning Bus, 1930). Undset's novels of the modern era concern themselves with social and psychological problems; her conversion to Roman Catholicism in 1924 is reflected in her fiction and in such studies as NORSKE HELGNER (Saga of Saints, 1934). Her personal life, too, was patterned on her medieval interests; she spent the later years of her life in a restored house dating from the year 1000, and dressed in the gown of a Norse matron of the Middle Ages. In 1928, Sigrid Undset was awarded the Nobel Prize for literature.

Ungaretti, Giuseppe (1888- ). Italian prose writer and poet of the metaphysical "hermetic" school (see HERMETICISM). His poetry, characterized by a classically intoned style, treats themes of personal grief and sorrow. First introduced to the public in 1917 by Giovanni Papini, Ungaretti's verse is chiefly autobiographic in content. Collections of his poems include L'Allégria (1919), Sentimento del Tempo.
The unicorn was a symbol of medieval writers as having the legs of a buck, the tail of a lion, the head and body of a horse, and a single horn—white at the base, black in the middle, and red at the tip—jutting from the middle of its forehead; its body is white, head red, and eyes blue. The earliest author to describe it is Ctesias (400 B.C.). The medieval notions concerning it are summarized in the following extract:

The unicorn has but one horn in the middle of its forehead. It is the only animal that ventures to attack the elephant; and so sharp is the nail of its foot, that with one blow it can rip the belly of the beast. Hunters can catch the unicorn only by placing a young virgin in his haunts. No sooner does he see the damsel than he runs towards her, and lies down at her feet, and so suffers himself to be captured by the hunters. The unicorn represents Jesus Christ, who took on Him our nature in the virgin's womb, was betrayed to the Jews, and delivered into the hands of Pontius Pilate. Its one horn signifies the Gospel of Truth. —Le Béatirre Ditiss de Guillaume, Clerc de Normandie (13th century)

The heraldic supporters in the old royal coat of arms of Scotland are two unicorns. When James VI of Scotland came to reign over England (1603), the unicorn supplanted the red dragon, representing Wales, as the emblem of the supporters of the English shield, the other being the lion. The animosity that existed between the lion and the unicorn is allegorical for that which once existed between England and Scotland. A battle between the Lion and the Unicorn is an episode in Through the Looking-Glass (1872) by Lewis Carroll, and Spenser mentions it in his Faerie Queene (1590).

Union Rose. The combined emblematic rose of the houses of York and Lancaster. The petals are white and red: white representing York, and red representing Lancaster.

Unitarian. The name is derived from the belief that God is one single unit in person, as opposed to the doctrine of the Trinity. The father of English Unitarianism was John Biddle (1615–1662).

United Irishmen. An Irish revolutionary organization founded in 1791 by Theobald Wolfe Tone, committed to the forcible overthrow of English rule in Ireland. Developed in the aftermath of the American and French revolutions, the society adopted an aggressive, belligerent character which paralleled these earlier rejections of tyranny. In its formative years the organization was identified as an essentially middle-class, Protestant faction, but its consistent support of Catholic enfranchisement enlisted many Catholics to its ranks. In 1794 the organization was outlawed and began to function as an underground movement. Increasing suppression resulted in an attempt on the part of the United Irishmen to engage in an alliance with Napoleon, with the purpose of driving the English from Ireland. Negotiations with the French resulted in a disorganized attempt to stage a rebellion in 1798. The rebellion, however, had been anticipated by the English, and, by the time the French forces arrived to assist the rebels, the uprising had been put down. Wolfe Tone, who later committed suicide in prison, and the other Irish leaders were captured. The rebellion's chief effect lay in hastening the political union of England and Ireland, which occurred in 1800. The United Irishmen continued to function in small isolated groups after the rebellion, but never regained its former effectiveness.

United Nations. An international organization set up after World War II. The foundation for the UN was established during the war when the Allied powers, at various conferences, agreed upon the need for creating "a world family of democratic nations." Its initial meeting in San Francisco in 1945, with representatives of 51 nations present, resulted in the adoption of the UN charter. Within five years the UN had permanent headquarters in New York City, and by 1963 it had more than doubled its original membership, largely as a result of the admission of many newly independent African and Asian countries.

The principal bodies of the UN include the General Assembly, in which each nation has one vote; an 11-member Security Council, in which each of the five permanent members—the U.S., the U.S.S.R., the United Kingdom, France, and Nationalist China—has the veto power; a Secretariat, headed by the Secretary-General, which handles administrative and technical tasks; an Economic and Social Council with various regional commissions; and the International Court of Justice, the chief judicial organ of the UN. In addition, there are several subsidiary organizations, such as the World Health Organization, the Food and Agricultural Organization, and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development (World Bank).

unities, the. The three dramatic unities: the rules governing the so-called classical drama. They are founded on Renaissance interpretations of passages in Aristotle's Poetics, and are hence sometimes styled the Aristotelian unities. Their principles are that in drama there should be (1) unity of action, (2) unity of time, and (3) unity of place. Aristotle lays stress on unity of action, meaning that an organic unity, or a logical connection between the successive incidents is necessary; but unity of time was deduced by Castelvetro, the 16th-century Italian scholar and critic, from the passage in the Poetics where Aristotle, in comparing epic poetry and tragedy, says that the former has no limits in time but the latter "endeavors, as far as possible, to confine itself to a single revolution of the sun, or but slightly to exceed this limit." The unity of time thus established, the unity of place followed almost perforce.

The theory of the three unities was formulated in Italy nearly a century before it was taken up in France, where it became, after much argument, the cornerstone of the literary drama. Its first modern offspring was La Sophonisbe (1629) by Mâitre, though it was not till Corneille's triumph with Le Cid (1636) that the convention of the three unities can be said to have been finally adopted. The principle had little success in England, despite the later championship of Dryden (cf. his Essay on Dramatic Poesy), Addison (as exemplified in his Cato), and... others. Ben Jonson's The Alchemist (1610) is perhaps the best example of the small class of English plays in which the unities of place and time have been purposely adhered to. In France, on the other hand, the three unities were much more strictly observed, and not until the momentous performance of Victor Hugo's Hernani did the old classical theories really give way to those of the modern romantic movement.

University Wits. A name for a group of young English writers of the later years of the 16th century. All had received their training at Oxford or Cambridge and came to London to embark on careers in literature. They were primarily pamphleteers and dramatists; many of them took part in the Marprelate controversy and contributed to the growth of English satire. As dramatists they developed the Senecan revenge-tragedy, the use of bigger-than-life characters, such as Tamburlaine, the chronicle play, and the romantic comedy. Chief among them was Christopher Marlowe; others were Robert Greene, John Lyly, Thomas Nashe, Thomas Lodge, and George Peele.

Unnamable, The (L'Innommable; 1953). A novel by Samuel Beckett. It is an account, through the technique of stream of consciousness, of the empty existence of the most immobilized of Beckett's characters: he lives legless and armless in a large jar. The novel is linked to Molloy and * Malone Dies.*

Unofficial Rose, An (1962). A novel by Iris Murdoch. When an elderly gentleman becomes a widower and tries to return to his former mistress, his action precipitates a general round of "change partners" among his family and friends. His son Randall decides to leave his dull wife Ann, the unoffcial or hedge rose of the title, for a more exotic woman. But the comedy and irony of the story are that no one decides anything through the exercise of free will, but is manipulated by circumstances and by other self-interested persons. Randall finds he has merely exchanged one servitude for another, and will probably return to Ann. This comic, philosophic novel qualifies the existentialist idea of freedom expressed in Under the Net.

Unruh, Fritz von (1885- ). German playwright and short story writer, a major figure in expressionism. Though an officer in World War I, he became known afterward for his passionate denunciations of war in such plays as Ein Geschlecht (A Clan, 1918) and Platz (The Square, 1920). He also attempted to further his democratic and humanistic ideals as a member of the Reichstag, but the rise of Nazism forced him to leave his homeland in 1932. His best-known narrative work is the story Opfergang (The Way of Sacrifice, written 1916, pub. 1919).

Untermeyer, Louis (1885- ). American poet and anthologist. Untermeyer is widely known for such anthologies as Modern American Poetry (1913), The Book of Living Verse (1931), and New Modern American and British Poetry (1950). He has published several volumes of his own poetry, including Burning Bush (1928) and Food and Drink (1932). His superb parodies were reissued in Collected Parodies (1926). Among his other works are: American Poetry Since 1900 (1923); Moses, a novel (1928); a biography of Heine (1937); an autobiography, From Another World (1939); and a series of compact biographies, Makers of the Modern World (1955).

Unto This Last (1862). A collection of 4 essays by John Ruskin. Dealing with employment and wages, the essays were originally published successively in 1860 in Cornhill Magazine, where they caused such disturbance that they were discontinued by the editor Thackeray. Although at the time Ruskin's ideas were thought to be chimerical, today practically every reform he advocated has been adopted.

Unvanquished, The (1938). A collection of interlocking stories by William Faulkner. Set during the Civil War, it deals with the Sartoris family, whose modern history Faulkner recounts in Sartoris. Composed of seven stories, which first appeared separately in magazines, the book centers primarily on the adventures of Bayard Sartoris and his Negro companion, Ringo. Colonel John Sartoris and Miss Ross, Bayard's grandmother, also figure prominently.

unwashed. In the phrase, the great unwashed. The first application of the term to the mob has been attributed to Edmund Burke and also to Brougham; perhaps to others, too. Carlyle has "Man has been set against man, Washed Against Unwashed." (French Revolution, II. ii. 4).

Upanishads. The oldest speculative literature of the Hindus (10th century B.C.), a collection of treatises on the nature of man and the universe, forming part of the Vedic writings. They reveal great subtlety and sophistication, and combine abstract discussion with dialogue and illuminating metaphor. The word itself means "a sitting down (at another's feet)," in order to obtain spiritual truth. The basic Upanishadic contributions are: (1) the idea that the supreme Godhead, because it is completely attributeless, is incommunicable, but "realizable." (2) The individual, personal self (atman) is also the universal Self, but is unaware of this. (3) The phenomenal world of appearance exists on the relative plane of the lower truth and appears to be real without being so. (4) Yoga, or physical and spiritual discipline, is necessary for realizing the nature of and achieving the union between atman and Brahman.

Updike, John [Hoyer] (1932- ). American novelist and poet. Considered one of the most promising of the younger contemporary novelists, Updike writes mainly of the lives of ordinary people in small-town Pennsylvania settings. His first book was a collection of poems, The Carpentered Hen (1958). The Poorhouse Fair (1959), a novel, was widely acclaimed, as was Rabbit, Run (1960). The Centaur (1963) was conceived as a kind of sequel to Rabbit, Run and deals with a central character who, in direct contrast to "Rabbit," is overburdened with a sense of responsibility and guilt. The Same Door (1959) and Pigeon Feathers (1962) are collections of short stories. Telephone Poles and Other Poems appeared in 1963.

Upelluri. In Hittite mythology, a giant who holds earth and heaven on his shoulders. Like the Greek Atlas described by Homer, Upelluri carries earth as well as heaven, and stands in the middle of the ocean. Also like Atlas, he is not very intelligent and, consequently, is easily exploited. He was unaware that earth and sky were being piled on his shoulders, and did not notice when the gods separated them with a magic knife. Later, he is equally ignorant of the fact that the stone monster Ullikummi is standing on his right shoulder and growing to stupendous size.

Upham, Charles Wentworth (1802-1875). American clergyman, public official, historian, and biographer. After graduating from Harvard University, Upham became associate pastor of a Unitarian church. His sermon, The Scripture Doctrine of Regeneration, was printed in 1840. He also served in the Massachusetts legislature, was elected to Congress in 1853, and wrote a campaign biography of John C. Frémont. More important was his careful investigation of Salem Witchcraft (1867). He was married to Ann Susan Holmes, sister of Oliver Wendell Holmes. Nathaniel Hawthorne, who was removed from a post in the Salem Customs House as a result of Upham's political maneuvering, disliked the man intensely; he is supposed to have modeled the second Judge Pynecheon in The House of the Seven Gables on Upham.

Ur. Sumerian city dating from 4000 B.C. In its long history it rose and fell, was destroyed and rebuilt many times. The changing course of the Euphrates River finally robbed it forever of its greatness, leaving it stranded in the desert. Ur was the birth-place of Abraham. The site has been extensively excavated by Sir Leonard Woolley. Among the finds was a small gold statuette of a goat caught in a thorn bush which is reminiscent of the ram sacrificed in place of Isaac.

Urania. The Muse of astronomy in Greek mythology, usually represented pointing at a celestial globe with a staff. Milton (Paradise Lost vii 1-20) makes her the spirit of the loftiest poetry, and calls her heavenly born (the name means the heavenly one) and sister of Wisdom.

Uranie. A sonnet by the French poet Vincent Voiture. By many considered the finest sonnet of its day, it figured in the dispute between the Uraniens (partisans of Voiture) and the Jobelins (partisans of Isaac de Benesarede).

Uranus (Ouranos). The ancient Greek personification of Heaven; son and husband of Ga and father of the Titans, the Cyclopes, and the Hundred-Handed. He hated his children and confined them in the depths of the earth, but his son Cronus, with the help of Ge, castrated him with a sickle and took his place.

Urbino. A town in the Marches of northern Italy. It became one of the celebrated city states of the Renaissance because of the cultural activities of the dukes of the Montefeltro family, especially Federico. Here Raphael and Bramante were born; painters like Uccello and Piero della Francesca worked in its palace; and Castiglione used its celebrated court as the setting for The Courtier.

Urdur, Urdhr, or Urth. The earliest and best known of the 3 Norns of Scandinavian mythology. In the earliest conception, Urdur was the only Norn and her name was often identified with Death or Hel. When her two sisters, Skuld and Verthandi, were added, Urdur came to represent the past.

Urfuast (Ger., "Original Faust"). The title generally given to an early, fragmentary version (c. 1775) of Part I of Goethe's Faust. The manuscript is not Goethe's own but was copied by a young woman from his oral reading to a group of friends.

Urfr, Honore d' (1568-1625). French writer. He is best known as the author of L'Astree (1607-1627), a vast pastoral romance in prose that enjoyed great popularity and which influenced the development of the pastoral genre.

Uriah the Hittite. See Batthsheba.

Uriel. One of the 7 archangels of rabbinical angelology sent to God to answer the questions of Exodus (II Esd. 4). In Milton's Paradise Lost, he is "the Regent of the Sun," and "sharpest-sighted spirit of all in heaven." The name means "flame of God," or "angel of light." See Israel.

Uris, Leon (1924- ). American novelist. Uris left school at 17 to join the Marines. Battle Cry (1953), his first novel, is a long account of the Marines in World War II. The Angry Hills (1955) deals with the Palestine Brigade that fought in Greece. Exodus (1958) is the story of the Jewish resettlement of Palestine and the creation of the state of Israel. Mila 18 (1961) deals with the uprising of the Warsaw Ghetto during World War II.

Urizen. In William Blake's personal mythology, appearing in his mystical poetry and particularly in The Book of Thel and The Marriage of Heaven and Hell, the figure of Jehovah but, also a symbol or man in bondage. It represents the limiting mental power of reason, an analytical and destructive force which dominates man and against which man must struggle. Urizen is never destroyed, but is periodically regenerated by a union with Los (or the imagination) and Luvah (or passion).

Urquhart or Urchard, Sir Thomas (1611-1660), Scottish Royalist and author. He is chiefly known for his free but masterly translation (1653-1693) of the works of Rabelais, which was completed by P. A. Motteux in 1708. It is said that he died of a fit of laughter upon hearing that the throne had been restored to Charles II.

Ursa Major and Ursa Minor. See Great Bear.

Urshanalba. A boatman in the Epic of Gilgamesh. He rows the hero Gilgamesh across the sea of death to the island where lives the sage Utnapishtim.

Urh. See Urdu.

Urvasi. A Hindu heavenly nymph. In Rabindrannath Tagore's Bengali poem Urvasi (1893), she is transformed from the chief dancing girl of Indra's heaven into a symbol of ideal beauty.

U.S.A. (1938). A trilogy by John Dos Passos, consisting of The 42nd Parallel, 1919 (q.v.), and The Big Money. The novels give a panoramic picture of life in the U.S. in the period just before World War I, the period of the war and the armistice, and the boom era of the 1920's, ending with the first years of the depression. In addition to the life stories of countless characters, told in episodic fashion and narrative style, Dos Passos used three other devices—the "newsreel," the "camera eye," and impressionistic biographies of notable public figures—to create a broad, suggestive view of modern American life.

U.S.A. stresses sociological and economic determinism; greed, exploitation, opportunism, and dishonesty triumph, and the various characters find that they have no control over their lives. The only persons who emerge victorious are those who put aside all scruples and take advantage of the opportunities... for material success. American radicals and radical movements also play an important role in the novels, with the more sincere radicals sometimes succeeding in preserving a measure of personal integrity.

Ushant: an Essay (1952). An autobiographical book by Conrad Aiken. The title comes from the name of an island off the coast of Brittany. Told in the third person, the book mingles personal references with mention of literary associates in a kind of waking dream.

Usher or Usher, James (1581–1656). Irish prelate and scholar. Named archbishop of Armagh and primate of Ireland in 1625, he wrote Annales Veteris et Novi Testamenti (1650–1654), a scheme of Biblical chronology. He had a remarkable library and left his books and manuscripts, among them the famous Book of Kells, to Trinity College, Dublin.

Utgard. See Jötunheim.

Utgard-Loki. In Norse mythology, the chief of the giants living in the infernal regions. Disguised as Skrymir, he conducted Thor, Thialf, and Loki to Jötunheim. There Fire, disguised as Logi, ate faster than Loki; Thought, disguised as Hugi, ran faster than Thialf; Old Age, disguised as Elli, was stronger than Thor. When Utgard-Loki had told Thor about his tricks, he escaped the god's wrath by vanishing.

Uther Pendragon. The father of King Arthur, in Geoffrey of Monmouth's History of the Kings of Britain (c. 1137), and other versions of the story of Arthur's birth and conception. With the help of Merlin, the magician, he visits Igaine in the guise of her husband, and, from that union, Arthur is subsequently born.

utilitarianism. The ethical doctrine that actions are right or good in proportion to their useful purpose or as they tend to promote happiness; the doctrine that the end and criterion of public action is the "greatest happiness of the greatest number." John Stuart Mill coined the word utilitarianism, but Jeremy Bentham, the official founder of the utilitarian school, employed the word utility to signify that doctrine that makes "the happiness of man" the one and only measure of right and wrong.

Utnapishtim. The Babylonian Noah. An ancient sage, living with his wife on an island at the end of the earth, beyond the ocean of death, he tells the hero Gilgamesh the story of a great flood in which he played a role almost identical to that of Noah. With his wife, he was made immortal by the gods. He tells Gilgamesh the secret of a plant that restores youth—a herb that he himself has apparently never tasted, since he is described as very old. He is probably a Babylonian development of the Sumerian Ziusudra.

Utopia (Gr., ou, not, topos, a place). Nowhere, the name given by Sir Thomas More to the imaginary island in his political romance of the same name, written in Latin (1516). Book I of Utopia is a dialogue, which presents a perceptive analysis of contemporary social, economic, political, and moral ills in England; the second book is a narrative describing Utopia, a country run according to the ideals of the English humanists, where poverty, crime, injustice, and other ills do not exist. The classic English translation of Utopia is by Ralph Robinson (1551).

The name of this fictitious place, Utopia, has since been applied to all such ideal projections, including even those which antedated More's, such as Plato's Republic. Others are Francis Bacon's New Atlantis, Samuel Butler's Erewhon, and several conceived by H. G. Wells, including his A Modern Utopia (1905).

In Rabelais' Gargantua and Pantagruel, Pantagruel goes to the kingdom of Utopia to defend its inhabitants, the Amaurotes (Gr., "obscene ones"); the capital of More's Utopia was called city of the Amaurotes) against an invasion of the Dipsodes (Gr., "thirsty ones"). Having followed the itinerary of the Spanish explorers around the Cape of Good Hope, Pantagruel passes several imaginary cities whose names mean "nothing" and "laughable" in Greek before arriving in Utopia. After the defeat of the enemy (see Werewolf), Pantagruel becomes the leader of a group of Amaurotes who leave overpopulated Utopia to settle in the country of the Dipsodes.

Utrillo, Maurice (1883–1955). French painter. Utrillo took his name from the Spanish journalist who adopted him, but he sometimes used his mother's name, Valadon, when signing his work. He began his artistic career in 1903 at a doctor's suggestion, as a possible cure for alcoholism and drug addiction. During the years 1910 to about 1920 he produced paintings at a frenzied rate of speed. The paintings are carefully controlled in technique, but the bleakness of the landscapes, the subdued, melancholy tones of the colors, and the tiny human figures dwarfed by towering buildings reflect the artist's own unhappy struggles. The city is pictured as a lonely, inhuman place roofed by a sullen gray sky. Notre Dame de Paris, Le Square St. Pierre sous la neige, and Sacre Coeur de Montmartre are among his well-known works. In later years Utrillo's paintings changed in mood and technique. The artist's inner state was reflected less in the work, which became more straightforwardly pictorial and replaced the shifting, subtle grays and whites with brighter, clearer colors.

Utu. The Sumerian sun-god, son of Nanna the moon-god. He is almost identical with the later Babylonian god Shamash.

Uz. In the Old Testament, the home of Job, a land east of Palestine (Job 1:1).

Uzziel. One of the principal angels of rabbinical angelology, the name meaning "strength of God." He was next in command to Gabriel and appears in Milton's Paradise Lost.
Vache, Jacques. See André Breton.

Vachell, Horace Annesley (1861-1955). English novelist. A prolific and popular writer, he is best remembered for his novel The Hill (1905), an idealization of boys' school life at Harrow.

Valéry, Paul (1871-1945). French poet and critic. While studying for a law degree, Valéry met Pierre Louÿs and André Gide, and with them began attending (1891) Mallarmé's salons. The poem Narcisse Parle reflects the beginning of Valéry's concern with the interior drama of man's conflicting selves. He began an independent course of self-education in science, the arts, and history. Introduction to the Method of Leonardo da Vinci (1895) launched the theory that the processes of the creative mind are all analogous, whether the mind be turned toward science or toward any of the arts. It also distinguished between the limitations of real Being and the ideally pure Self, which contemplates reality and becomes conscious of the analogies uniting the essences of all things. In 1896 he wrote the first of the sketches collected as Monstre Teste, in which the central character represents pure mind or consciousness.

Valéry wrote very little more until 1912, when Gide, Louÿs, and Gaston Gallimard persuaded him about 1550, and the subject of later plays and ballads. Valentine and Orson are the legendary twin sons of Bellissant and Alexander of Constantinople. Abandoned in the woods in infancy, Orson is carried off and nursed by a bear, while Valentine is found and raised at Pepin's court. Later, Valentine tames Orson and makes a knight of him. A major episode involves Pocoyet's rescue of the twins from the giant Ferragus. Valentine marries Clerimond, the giant’s sister.

Valera, Eamon de. See de Valera.

Valera y Alcalá Galiano, Juan (1824-1905). Spanish novelist, critic, and diplomat. Valera's literary works reflect his urbanity and refinement, qualities that stemmed from his extensive reading and from his distinguished diplomatic career, during which he served as Spanish minister at Lisbon, Washington, and Brussels. His lucid and harmonious style is considered a model of 19th-century Castilian. His first and best-known novel, Pepita Jiménez (1874), resulted from his mystical readings. Written partly in the form of letters, it is a psychological study of the inner struggles of a seminarist who falls in love with an attractive widow and eventually renounces the priesthood. He also wrote El comendador Mendoza (1877), Doña Luz (1879), and Juanita la larga (1895). Among his other works of fiction are the short stories El pájaro verde and Parsones (both 1860) and the dialogue Asclepigenia (1878). Valera also exerted considerable influence as a critic, though his writings in this field are thought to be marred by excessive politeness.

Valéry, [Ambroise] Paul [Toussaint Jules] (1871-1945). French poet and critic. While studying for a law degree, Valéry met Pierre Louÿs and André Gide, and with them began attending (1891) Mallarmé’s salons. The poem Narcisse Parle reflects the beginning of Valéry’s concern with the interior drama of man's conflicting selves. He began an independent course of self-education in science, the arts, and history. to collect and revise the poetry he had written in the 1890’s; in thus preparing his Album de vers anciens (1920), he again became interested in writing poetry. In 1913 he began La Jeune Parque, and after 1917 the poems in Charmes (1922), including Le Cimetière Marin, La Pythie, Ébeauce d’un serpent, and Fragments du Narcisse. All are dramatic monologues in fairly conventional poetic forms, worked and reworked by the poet in an attempt to reach his ideal of “crystal systems” of “pure poetry”; all symbolize some aspect of the tension between rational intellectual control and irrational possession by inspiration or passion, that is, between the freedom of detached contemplation and the surrender to involvement in life.

The dramatic monologue in Valéry’s poetry became the dramatic dialogue in his prose. In Dance and the Soul (L’Arme et la Danse; 1921) Socrates represents the intellectual inquiry of total consciousness, whereas each of the other characters sees only in some limited way the Dancer who symbolizes life. In Expéditions, or the Architect (1923), Socrates concludes that the act of creation is more important than knowing oneself, but regrets that in shaping one’s actual life one has to exclude other potential lives.

Valéry wrote the libretti for the melodramatic spectacles Amphion (1931) and Semiramis (1934), for which Arthur Honegger wrote the music, and a Cantate du Narcisse (1938). In 1940 he began writing fragments of two theatrical variations on the Faust legend; Last and the ironical Le Solitaire were published posthumously as Mon Faust (1946).

After Valéry was elected to the French Academy in 1925, he became a public lecturer and administrator of cultural affairs at various times for the Academy, the League of Nations, and several universities. His numerous essays range from artistic and literary criticism to political comment.

Valhalla. The hall of the slain in Scandinavian mythology. The largest palace in Asgard, it has 450 gates so wide that 800 men can enter abreast. Here Odin feasts on meat and boar’s meat with the heroes brought from mortal battles by the Valkyries. They go out every morning to fight with each other for sport, but their wounds are healed by the time they return for their banquet. See Ring des Nibelungen.

Vali. (1) The guardian of justice in Scandinavian mythology, who was said to have grown to full stature in a day. The second son of Odin, he avenged the death of Balder by using an arrow to kill his blind murderer, Hoder. Typifying new light after darkness, he was one of the few expected to survive the Twilight of the Gods, for justice was not to be banished from the earth.

(2) This was also an alternate name of the Scandinavian Ljóðháist (Desiring Life) who, with her mate, Líf (Life, also called Vidar), was to repeople the earth after Ragnarok. Líf slew Fenris at Ragnarok to avenge the death of Odin’s death.

Valjean, Jean. See Les Misérables.

Valkyries, the. The maidens who are the choosers of the slain in Scandinavian mythology. They are the attendants of Odin in Valhalla, usually 9 or 12 in number, sometimes divine, sometimes mortal princesses who become immortal. Brilliantly adorned, they ride into battle and select of those who are going to be killed the heroes who are worthy of dining with Odin. The Valkyries conduct them to Valhalla and become their cupbearers.

In earlier mythology they are associated with white clouds as maidsens who can take the shape of swans. Brunhild is represented as a Valkyrie in the Völunga Saga and Wagner’s Ring des Nibelungen.

Valla, Lorenzo (1404–1457). Italian scholar. Born in Rome, he first taught in northern Italian universities, moved to Naples, where he was a secretary of King Alfonso, and then back to Rome as a papal secretary. His textual and historical criticism of ancient documents was one of the fruits of Italian Renaissance scholarship. Now remembered for his proof that the Donation of Constantine was based on a false document, he was equally noted then for his criticism of St. Jerome’s version of the New Testament and for his De lingua latinae elegantia, which set standards for excellence in Latin. He influenced the thinking of later scholars like Erasmus.

vampire. A fabulous being. Supposed to be the ghost of a heretic, excommunicated person, or criminal, it returns to the world at night in the guise of a monstrous bat and sucks the blood of sleeping persons who, usually, become vampires themselves. Probably the most famous of modern vampires is Count Dracula, the hero of the novel Dracula by Bram Stoker. First filmed as Nosferath the Vampire, later as Dracula, this story was the first of a seemingly unending and progressively more dismal series of movies about vampires. The word is applied to one who preys upon his fellows: a “blood sucker.” In the early 20th century, vampire, or vamp, meant a femme fatale, a beautiful but heartless woman who lures men to moral destruction.

Elected to the vice presidency in 1832 as Jackson’s running mate, Van Buren defeated William Henry Harrison in the presidential election of 1836, but his popularity declined as a result of the depression engendered by the Panic of 1837. In the famous campaign of 1840, the Whigs appealed to the common man in the person of Henry Harrison. Van Buren ran for the presidency as the Free-Soil candidate in 1848, returning to the Democratic fold in 1852.

With his son, William H. Vanderbilt (1821–1885), he was largely responsible for the organization of the New York Central Railroad system. The Vanberrts endowed Vanderbilt University and contributed to the New York College of Physicians and Surgeons and to the Metropolitan Museum of Art. He settled in England in 1632, becoming court painter to Charles I, whose likeness he transmitted to posterity in numerous portraits. He was knighted the same year and his name Anglicized to Vandyke. Although he painted some biblical and historical scenes, he is best known as a portrait painter, particularly of full-length courtly figures. The freedom of his drawing, the elegance and ease of his work, and the brilliance of his representation of rich fabrics exerted a tremendous influence on English art, as is evidenced in the work of the great portraitists of the 18th century.

Vane, Sir Henry (1613–1662). English governor of Massachusetts (1636–1637), who took the side of Anne Hutchinson when the Bay colony was divided upon her case. The work was a success in London and New York. It was revived in 1939 and has been filmed twice.

Van Eyck, Hubert and Jan. See Hubert van and Jan van Eyck.

Van Gogh, Vincent (1853–1890). Dutch painter. With Seurat, Cézanne, and Gauguin, Van Gogh is usually grouped as a postimpressionist. The emphasis laid by impressionism upon the recording of visual impressions seemed inadequate to him; he discovered his reality in the emotional responses of the individual self to the external world. A new definition of the reality that belonged upon the painter's canvas required a new technique. Although the impetus for Van Gogh's work—a love for all living things—never changed, he did undergo an evolution in artistic technique. His early paintings, such as the Potato Eaters, are sober, realistic portraits of life and landscape in his native Holland, painted in dark, grim colors with careful attention to detail. During the brief but productive period that he spent in Provence in the south of France (1888–1890), Van Gogh created canvases that recorded in violent, vivrant colors his emotional responses to nature and to human beings. Daring experiments with pigmentation and the use of bold, slashing brush strokes add to the vigor of the work. In the final paintings, such as Cypress Road or Starry Night, Van Gogh foreshadows the expressionist movement. The reality these paintings portray is an internal landscape; the images from the external world give concrete form to an inner state. In mood, too, the last paintings are different: lyricism is replaced by a dark brooding melancholy, and in such a work as Cornfield with Black Crows Van Gogh expresses a fearful vision of the world his suffering has led him to see. After spending some months in a mental institution, the painter took his own life in 1890 at the age of 37.

Vanini, Giulio Cesare Lucilio (1585–1619). Italian philosopher and physician. Vanini's interest in astrology, magic, and the occult, as well as in the more standard philosophy of Aristotle, made him an unwelcome visitor to both the Catholic and Protestant camps. He met a tragic end at Toulouse, where his suspected atheism and heresy caused him to be burned at the stake. His main works, the Amphitheatrum (1615) and De admirandis . . . arcatis (1617), on the admirable secrets of nature, show him to have been in actuality an Avverroist (see AVERROES) and pantheist.

Vanir. The Norse nature gods, once at war with the Aesir. After an exchange of hostages, the two races of gods made peace, and the Vanir were received in Asgard. Njord, the water god, was the chief; his son was Frey, his daughter Freya, and his wife Skadi. Noatun was their home.

Vanity Fair, A Novel without a Hero (1848). A novel by William Makepeace Thackeray. The author said of the novel while he was writing it: "What I want to make is a set of people living without God in the world (only that is a cant phrase), greedy, pompous men, perfectly self-satisfied for the most part, and at ease about their superior virtue. Dobby and poor Briggs are the only two people with real humility as yet. Amelia's is to come."

The two boarding-school friends, Amelia Sedley and Becky Sharp, are in marked contrast throughout the novel. Becky Sharp, clever, scheming, determined to get on in the world, first plays her cards to win Amelia's rich and stupid brothers, Joseph Sedley. Failing that, she secretly marries Rawdon Crawley, a younger son of Sir Pitt Crawley, at whose house Becky is governess. Rawdon, however, is disinherited, but the undaunted Becky manages to live at the height of fashion on a small income with the help of Lord Steyne. Rawdon finally becomes suspicious of his wife's relations with Steyne, and, when at last he discovers the truth, he departs to become the governor of Coventry Island, leaving his son by Becky to the care of Sir Pitt Crawley. This causes Becky to be completely ostracized, and she is forced to live by her wits on the Continent.

Meantime Amelia, loved by George Osborne and William Dobbin, has married the former, but he is killed in the battle of Waterloo. Because of her poverty, Amelia is forced to give her son, Georgy, into the care of his grandfather, Mr. Osborne, who will, however, have nothing to do with her. On Mr. Osborne's death, Georgy is left a fortune. Amelia and her brother, traveling on the continent, now meet Becky Sharp, and the latter gradually regains her old influence over Joseph Sedley. The faithful Dobbin, who has loved Amelia through thick and thin, is at last rewarded with her hand.

Van Loon, Hendrik Willem (1882–1944). Dutch-born American journalist and historian. A history teacher at several American universities, Van Loon wrote The Fall of the Dutch Republic (1913) and The Rise of the Dutch Kingdom (1915), both works of scholarship. He became assistant editor of the Baltimore Sun (1924) and was a distinguished radio commentator. He wrote children's books and edited several songbooks. He is best known, however, for his popularized surveys, enlivened with his own drawings: Ancient Man (1920), The Story of Mankind (1921), The Story of the Bible (1923), Ships and How They Sailed the Seven Seas (1935), Van Loon's Lives (1942), and many others.

Van Vechten, Carl (1880– ). American critic and novelist. He is known for his witty, satirical, and sophisticated novels of life among New Yorkers in the 1920's. Peter Wiffle (1922), his first novel, is an imaginary autobiography of a dilettante. The Blind Bow-Boy (1923) is a novel about homosexuality. The Tattooed Countess (1924) deals with fin-de-siècle Iowa. Van Vechten's best novel is Nigger Heaven, a book about Harlem. He also wrote five books of music criticism, of which Interpreters and Interpretations (1917) is best known. His own Sacred and Profane Memories (1932) is a volume of autobiographical essays.

Varchi, Benedetto (1503–1565). Florentine historian. He wrote a history of his native city and a treatise on language, the Ercolano. Posteriority is indebted to it primarily because of his good sense in refusing the request of Cellini that he revise the style of the celebrated autobiography.

A mindlessly voluptuous woman married to the impotent Flem Snopes, she is beloved of nearly every man in the town of Jefferson and is the mistress of Manfred De Spain. Varro, Marcus Terentius (116–27 B.C.). Roman scholar, called by Quintilian "the most learned of the Romans." He arranged the library in Rome at the direction of Julius Caesar, and was appointed superintendent of another library by Augustus. He was the first Roman to attempt a thorough critical study of the Latin language. His De Lingua Latina was for many centuries the fundamental reference book for Latin grammarians. His treatise on agriculture, De Agricultura, was used by Vergil as a source of his four-book poem, the Georgics.

Varuna. In the early Hindu mythology of the Rig Veda, the lord of the universe; with Indra the greatest of the gods of the Vedic times (4000 B.C.). He is invoked as the night sky and his double, Mitra, as the day sky. In the later Vedic period his power is more and more confined to this one aspect of nature. In this post-Vedic period, however, he becomes the Hindu Neptune, represented as an old man riding a sea monster with a club in one hand and a rope in the other.

Vasari, Giorgio (1511–1574). Italian Renaissance painter, architect, and critic. Vasari is the author of the collection Vite de' più eccellenti pittori, scultori e architetti (Lives of the Most Eminent Painters, Sculptors, and Architects, 1550). The enlarged version of this work (1568) contained a total of 200 biographies. The longest of Vasari's lives is the selection devoted to Michelangelo, his favorite. Vasari's conception of a rebirth of the fine arts helped to shape the Renaissance itself.

Vasconcelos, José (1882–1959). Mexican educator, philosopher, and writer. Trained as a lawyer and a leading member of the intellectual group known as the Ateneo de la Juventud, Vasconcelos took an active part in the revolutionary movements that swept Mexico after 1910. As minister of education under President Alvaro Obregón, he initiated an outstanding program of mass education, especially in rural areas, that reflected his own passion for enlightenment. In 1929 he ran for the presidency, denouncing the corruption and militarism that infected Mexican politics; after winning only a small number of votes, he left the country, charging fraud. He was permitted to return in 1939.

During his years of exile, he wrote several works, notably Etica (1932) and Estetica (1936), expounding his philosophical system, which was strongly influenced by Schopenhauer. At the same time he produced what may be his most enduring work—an impassioned, often bitter, autobiography consisting of five volumes: Ulises criollo (1935), La tormenta (1936), El desastre (1938), El proconsulado (1939), and La fiama (1959). In these books, which reflect his increasingly conservative views and his conversion to Catholicism, he extolled Mexico's Hispanic tradition and fulminated against the U.S. Among his many other works are Prometeo vencedor (1920), a... drama, and La raza cósmica (1925), in which he predicted the appearance of a new "cosmic race" of human beings in Latin America.

Vathek, an Arabian Tale (1786). A Gothic novel by William Beckford, Vathek, the ninth caliph of the Abbasside dynasty is a haughty, effeminate monarch, induced by his sorceress mother, the Greek Carathis, and by his own curiosity and egotism to offer allegiance to Eblis, the Devil, in the hope of obtaining the throne of the pre-Adamite sultans. This he gains, only to find that it is a place of torture and that he is doomed to remain in it forever. In the final scene the hearts of the newly damned are set aflame with infernal fire.

This story of how the sadistic young caliph sold his soul to the devil is a notable contribution to the literature of horror that also includes The Monk by Matthew Lewis. Beckford's Orientalism is largely derived from the Arabian Nights.

Vatican City. A city-state enclave in Rome, Italy. It is the center of the Roman Catholic Church and is ruled by the pope. The Vatican City contains the basilica of St. Peter, the offices of the Papal See, and the Vatican Palace, the residence of the pope which also houses the famous papal libraries and museums. This tiny state (108.7 acres) was established by the Lateran Treaty with Italy (1929). From late classical times the Roman Catholic Church had acquired vast amounts of land throughout Italy; the entire city of Rome was part of the papal states. In 1870, when Italy became a united nation under Victor Emmanuel II, the nation absorbed all the church lands and made Rome its capital city. The dispute over these confiscated lands became known as "the Roman Question." It was finally settled by Benito Mussolini and Pope Pius XI with the signing of the Lateran Treaty. The Vatican City is a fully independent state. It has its own civil government under the direction of an appointed governor; it exchanges diplomats with other governments and has its own postal service.

vaudeville. A light entertainment consisting of a succession of acts, also called variety. The name comes from Vau-de-Vire (in Normandy, France) where the kind of song originally designated as "vaudeville" was common. In 1865, when Tony Pastor opened his Opera House in New York, he introduced this kind of entertainment, which was taken up later by the Keiths. A system of continuous vaudeville began in 1885, running two shows a day, from 11 a.m. to 11 p.m. Some famous vaudeville producers were Oscar Hammerstein, Alexander Pantages, and Marcus Loew. The Palace Theater in New York was formerly the principal home of vaudeville. Sarah Bernhardt and many lesser stars played in vaudeville.

Vaugelas, sieur de Claude Favre (1585–1650). French grammarian. An original member of the Académie française, Vaugelas sought in Remarques sur la langue française (Remarks on the French Language, 1647) to formulate principles of correct French writing and speech based upon the example of the best writers and court speakers of his day. While he had no intention of fixing the French language in perpetuity, he had a lasting influence on the Académie's approach to linguistic reform.

Vaughan, Henry (1622–1695). Welsh-born English poet. Vaughan is often called "the Silurist" because he was born in South Wales, whose inhabitants were known as Silures in ancient times. One of the last of the metaphysical poets, he wrote two volumes of secular verse, Poems (1646) and Olor Icanaus (1651), before turning to religious poetry. As he later explained, "The first that with any effective success attempted a diversion of this soul and overflowing stream (of secular verse) was the blessed man, Mr. George Herbert, whose holy life and verse gained many pious converts, of whom I am the least." His best-known work is Siles Scantillans (1650–1655), which includes The Retreat, The World, and They Are All Gone into the World of Light. His poetry is characterized by a mystical view of nature and is believed to have exerted considerable influence on Wordsworth.

Vaughan Williams, Ralph (1872–1958). English composer. His music displays an English character consciously derived from the English folk and classical tradition. This quality is evident in the operas Hugh the Drover (1911; libretto by H. Child) and The Pilgrim's Progress (1949; libretto by the composer), and many other works such as A London Symphony (1914; revised 1920).

Vautrin. See Jacques Collin.

Vauvenargues, marquis de Luc de Clapiers (1715–1747). French moralist and one-time army officer. Illness and battle wounds prevented him from realizing his ambitions in diplomacy and he was forced to live in poverty in Paris. An admirable man in every respect, he counted Marmontel and Voltaire among his few friends. In his Introduction à la connaissance de l'esprit humain, suivie de réflexions et maximes (1746), a rather summary personal discussion of ethics followed by some 600 maxims, he figures Rousseau in his belief in man's capacity for goodness, and in the human heart and passions. He has also left numerous smaller moralistic works, including some literary portraits.

Vega, Garcilaso de la. See Garcilaso de la Vega.

Vega [Carpio], Lope [Félix] de (1562–1635). Spanish dramatist and poet, considered the greatest figure in Spanish literature after Cervantes. The world's most prolific playwright, he is also known as El Félix de los Ingenios and Monstro de la Naturaleza ("Prodigy of Nature"), the latter a name given to him by Cervantes. His reputation was such that the phrase "es de Lope" became a synonym for perfection. According to his contemporary biographer Montalban, he wrote about 1800 comedias, or plays, 400 autos sacramentales, and many short sketches, interludes, and simple compositions accompanied by songs, which were woven into many of his plays. Four hundred twenty-six comedias and 42 autos have survived.

Virtually alone, Lope created the Spanish national drama, blending the most effective elements of earlier times. He elaborated some of his essential ideas in El arte nuevo de hacer comedias (The New Art of Writing Plays, 1609), a poetical essay in which he gave the rules for a new kind of play (comedia nueva) whose principal characteristics were violation of theunities, division of the play into three acts with the denouement beginning about the middle of the last act, and the use of a variety of metrical forms in each play.

Lope's restless sensibility and ever-changing and contradictory personality made him understand the Spanish people, especially the masses, better than any other playwright. His works reflect his violent character and tumultuous existence, crowded with love affairs, elopements, abductions, and several marriages; his religious intolerance; and his profound love for his family. Even when he took holy orders (1614) after a religious crisis, he did not curtail his profane writing or his amorous proclivities.

Lope's plays, like those of Shakespeare, reveal him as a writer of artistic integrity as well as an ingenious craftsman who utilized dramatic themes and devices that would appeal to a mass audience. He knew that the people would applaud a play like El niño inocente de la Guardia because of its anti-Semitic theme, just as they would like El remedio en la desdicha and Pedro Carbonero, in which Moors are portrayed sympathetically, in accordance with popular sentiment.

Lope's characters are not given to reflection, unlike those of Calderón's more intellectual dramas. Instead, his personages are spontaneous, paradoxical, and unreasonable; accordingly, they are more engaging than Calderón's. It is difficult, in many of Lope's plays, to find a single central character. Sometimes there are two or three, a nobleman and common people, as in El caballero de Olmedo; sometimes the people themselves constitute the protagonist, as in Fuentevella.

Lope's most important and representative works are his historical plays based on national events, such as Fuentevella, Peribaxe, and El mejor alcalde, el Rey. In these three plays, the common people and the king are arrayed against a corrupt feudal nobility. Other well-known historical dramas are El caballero de Olmedo, Forfia hasta morir, Las grandezas de Alejandro, and Roma abrasada. He also wrote numerous heroic plays based on Spanish legends and chronicles, such as El último godo, dealing with Rodrigo, the last Visigothic king of Spain; Las mociades de Bernardo del Carpio; Las almenas de Toro, about El Cid; and El bastardo Mudarra, about the legend of the seven infantes de Lara.

Among his comedias de capa y espada, or cloak-and-sword plays, are El acero de Madrid, Los maldres de Belisa, El perro del hortelano, and La moza del cántaro.

His religious plays include El vaso de elección, Barlas y Josef, El divino africano, and El sertar humano. Among his autos are El auto de los cantares, La siega, La locura por la honra, and El hijo pródigo.

Although Lope is remembered chiefly for his plays, he also essayed other types of literature. La Dorotea, a long prose romance, is his best nondramatic work. His other prose works include La Arcadia (1598), a pastoral romance in which Lope appears as Belardo and the duke of Alba as Anfriso, and El peregrino en su patria (1604). His finest lyrics are collected in Rimas sacras (1614) and Rimas humanas y divinas (1654). He also wrote narrative poetry: the historical epic Jerusalem conquistada, La Dragontea (1598), which is directed against England and Sir Francis Drake, and Corona trágica (1627), about Mary Stuart; the romantic epic La hermanosa de Angélica (1602), a sequel to Ariosto's Orlando Furioso; and the burlesque epic Gotamaquia. Los pastores de Belén (1612) is a prose-and-verse improvisation about the Holy Family. See Gracioso.
Veiller, Bayard (1869-1943). American playwright. He is noted for his mystery dramas. Within the Law (1912) deals with a young girl, railroaded to prison, who gets revenge on her accuser by a clever blackmail “within the law.” He is also the author of two other popular plays: The Thirteenth Chair (1916), in which a medium catches a murderer, and The Trial of Mary Dugan (1927), which includes a meticulously arranged courtroom scene.

Veit, Dorothea (1763-1839). German novelist, daughter of Moses Mendelssohn. After divorcing her first husband, she became Friedrich Schlegel’s mistress (1792) and married him in 1804. Their love is recorded in Schlegel’s novel Lucinde (1799). In 1808 both she and Schlegel converted to Catholicism. She wrote a novel entitled Florentin (1801).

Velázquez, Diego Rodríguez de Silva y (1599-1660). Spanish painter. His early pictures represent common people with Caravagesque naturalism. In 1623, he became court painter to Philip IV, whom he continued to serve all his life. He painted portraits and paintings among which The Surrender of Breda (1634) and The Maids of Honor (Las Meninas, 1656), both in the Prado, are among the most celebrated. Velázquez is renowned for his objectivity and for the dignity and reserve of his portraits. A sensitive observer of reality, he represented surface textures with a sketchy touch that is more suggestive than imitative, and revealed in his work a sure sense of color, creating both delicate and varied harmonies of tone.

Vélez de Guevara, Luis (1579-1644). Spanish dramatist and novelist. Born in Ecija, Vélez de Guevara was a page in the household of the archbishop of Seville and fought in Italy and Africa. Although he later won the favor of Philip IV, who appointed him usher of the king’s chamber in 1625, he teetered continually on the brink of penury. His reputation for wit and merriment was such that Cervantes dubbed him Quintaperares (“Dispeller of cares”).

He is said to have written some 400 plays, only 80 of which have survived, most of them dealing with historical subjects. The best known of these is Más pena el rey que la sangre, dealing with Guzmán el Bueno, who placed loyalty to his king above love for his son. In Reinar después de morir he retold the legend of Ínés de Castro, a Spanish infanta married to a Portuguese prince. She was murdered by conspirators and when the bereaved husband became king, he exhumed her body and crowned her in death.

The finest work by Vélez de Guevara is probably the satirical novel El diablo cojuelo (1641), which describes the adventures of Cleofás Leandro Pedro Zambullo, a student who releases a “limping devil” from a bottle in which he had been confined by a magician. To repay the kindness, the devil takes Cleofás on an aerial tour of Spain; he makes the roofs transparent, revealing the vices and follies of the citizens and offering a splendid framework for the author’s witty commentary. The novel achieved great popularity in Europe as a result of Lesage’s French imitation, Le Diable Boitoux (1707).

Veneering, Mr. and Mrs. A newly rich couple in Charles Dickens’ Our Mutual Friend. They live in a brand-new house with brand-new servants and shiny furniture, new just like that of their new friends. The Veneerings (1822) by Sir Harry Johnston is a novel in which these people are characters.

Venetian Glass Nephew, The (1925). A novel by Elinor Wylie. This fantasy tells how Rosalba, a woman of flesh and blood, falls in love with and marries Virgilio, who is made of glass. To harmonize herself and her husband she is willingly transmogrified by fire into porcelain.

Venice Preserved, or A Plot Discovered (1682). A tragedy in blank verse by Thomas Otway. Jaffier, a Venetian gentleman now in reduced circumstances, has married Belvidera, daughter of the senator Priuli, who retaliates by disowning her. Jaffier’s friend Pierre persuades him to join a conspiracy to overthrow the Venetian government. After Renault, another of the conspirators, makes advances to Belvidera, Jaffier reveals the plot to her and, at her urging, warns the senate. Although the senators promise to pardon Jaffier and his fellow-conspirators, they are condemned to death. At the scaffold Jaffier stabs Pierre to save him from an ignoble death and then kills himself. Belvidera, who has gone mad, also dies. Among the actresses well known for their interpretation of Belvidera were Elizabeth Barr, who created the role and with whom Otway was hopelessly in love, and Sarah Siddons.

It is believed that in the character of the foolish old senator Antonio, Otway was satirizing the earl of Shaftesbury.

Veni, Creator Spiritus (Lat., “Come, Creator Spirit”). Medieval Latin hymn in honor of the Holy Ghost, author unknown. It was set by Mahler as the first movement of his Symphony of a Thousand.

veni, vidi, vici (Lat., “I came, I saw, I conquered”). The words with which, according to Plutarch, Julius Caesar announced to his friend Amintius his victory at Zela (47 B.C.), in Asia Minor, over Pharnaces, son of Mithridates, who had rendered aid to Pompey. Suetonius, however, says that the words were displayed before his title after his victories in Pontus, and does not ascribe them to Caesar himself.

Venizelos, Eleutherios (1864-1936). A Greek statesman. He forced the abdication of King Constantine (1917) and brought Greece into World War I on the side of the Allies. He took part in the Peace Conference at Paris (1919), advocated a republic in Greece, was several times premier, and finally (1935), having opposed the government, was forced into exile. King George II, after his return to the throne (1935), granted him an amnesty.

Venus. In Roman mythology, the goddess of beauty and love. Originally of minor importance, she became, through identification with the Greek Aphrodite, one of the major characters in classical myth. She was the mother, by Anchises, of Aeneas.

In Camoens’ epic poem The Lusiad (1572), Uranian Venus is the impersonation of divine love and the presiding deity of the Lusitans. The Isle of Venus is a paradise created for the Lusitans heroes. Here Uranian Venus gives Vasco da Gama the empire of the sea.
In Wagner’s opera Tannhäuser (1859), Venus is goddess of love and illicit delights, and entertains the hero in her magic grotto beneath the Venusberg.

Venusberg. In German legend, a magic land of pleasure where Venus keeps her court. See TANNHÄUSER. William Morris modernizes the setting in his poem The Hill of Venus, included in The Earthly Paradise.

verbatim et literatim (Lat.). Accurately rendered: word for word and letter for letter.

Vercel, Roger. Pen name of Roger Auguste Crétin (1894–1957). French novelist. He is best known for his psychological studies of the seafarers of Brittany and their families, such as Captain Conan (1934), Northern Lights (L’Aurore boréale; 1947), and Ride Out the Storm (La Fosse aux vents; 1949–1951).

Vercors. Pen name of Jean [Marcel] Bruller (1902– ). French novelist and essayist, founder of Les Editions de Minuit as a clandestine publishing house during the Resistance. The short novels Put Out the Light (Le Silence de la mer; 1942) and Guiding Star (La Marche à l’étoile; 1943) dramatically implied the need for intellectual resistance during the Occupation. His later works include satirical fables of modern man, such as You Shall Know Them (Les Animaux dénaturés; 1952) and Sylvia (1961).

Verdad sospechosa, La (The Truth Suspected, c. 1619). A comedy by Juan Ruiz de Alarcón. The hero is Don García, a handsome young aristocrat who is an inveterate liar. Because of this flaw, he ends by losing the woman he loves. This play was the model for Corneille’s Menteur (1643).

Verdi, Giuseppe (1813–1901). The most important Italian opera composer of the 19th century. All but a few of Verdi’s works are operas. More a practical musician than a theorist, he at first completely accepted Italian operatic tradition, with its emphasis on vocal coloratura and beautiful melodies supported by conventional orchestral complements, and its reliance on the set forms of recitative and aria. Only as he matured did he develop his unique form of arioso as the basis of his style in his last two operas, Otello (Othello) and Falstaff (see The Merry Wives of Windsor).

Verdi was an ardent nationalist and was associated with the struggle for Italian independence. The death of the poet and patriot Manzoni led him to write his famous Requiem Mass in 1874. Among his operas are Rigoletto, Il Trovatore, La Traviata, Simon Boccanegra (1857; revised 1881), La Forza del Destino (1862), Don Carlo (1867), Aida, Otello, Falstaff.

Verdurins. The name of a nouveau-riche couple in Marcel Proust’s Remembrance of Things Past. Insignificant themselves in the social hierarchy, the Verdurins affect scorn for the Guermantes and other aristocrats who ignore them. Fiercely possessive toward the little clan who attend their almost nightly soirées, they pride themselves on attracting and launching literary, artistic, and musical celebrities. Gradually there is a narrowing of the social gulf between them and the elite, and Mme Verdurin eventually marries the prince de Guermantes.

Verga, Giovanni (1840–1922). Italian novelist and leader of the naturalistic school (called verismo in Italy). A regionalist writer, he is at his best when he describes the environment with which he was most familiar: the land and people of Sicily. As a young man, Verga left his native Catania and resided for a time in Florence and in Milan, where the action of his early novels takes place: Una Piccolastrice (1866), Storia di Una Capinera (1871), Eva (1873), Tigre Reale (1873), and Eros (1875). His short story Nedda (1874) initiated his naturalistic depiction of Sicilian peasant life.

After Verga’s return to Sicily (1879) appeared two collections of short stories: Vita dei Campi (1880) and Novelle Rusticane (1883), the latter containing the novella Cavalleria Rusticana which Pietro Mascagni reworked as an opera (1890).

The great novels of this period are I Malavoglia and Mastro Don Gesualdo (1889). They were to be the first two novels of a projected five-novel cycle that was intended to depict man’s struggle for material existence from the lowest, most primitive level of impoverished fisherfolk (I Malavoglia) to the highest pinnacle of wealth and power embodied in the “man of luxury” (the planned, but never realized, L’Uomo di Lusso). See SCAPPIGLIATURA, LA; Federico de ROBERTO.

Vergeron, Pietro Paolo (1370–1444). Italian Humanist educator. A student of Chrysoloras and Salutati, and secretary to Innocent VII, he impressed the emperor Sigismund at the Council of Constance and went to his court in Hungary, where he died. He was noted also for his educational theory, which was influential in the Renaissance.

Verges. See Dogberry.

Vergil. Full Latin name, Publius Vergilius Maro (70–19 B.C.). Roman poet. He was born in Andes, a small village near Mantua. After a preliminary education at Cremona, his father, a fairly prosperous farmer, sent him to Rome to study rhetoric and the physical sciences. The 17-year-old farm boy was, however, too shy and frail to stand up well in the competitive city. After several years, he gave up the ambition of becoming an advocate and, retiring to his father’s farm, spent his time studying Greek philosophy and poetry.

Vergil was 25 in 44 B.C. when Julius Caesar was assassinated. All of the Roman world, even the small village of Andes in quiet, rustic Transpadane Gaul, was plunged into political chaos. Like all periods of political revolution in Roman Italy, the period from 44 to 40 was marked by large-scale confiscations and bloody reprisals—what the Romans termed proscriptions. In one of these mass confiscations (41), all the land in the neighborhood of Mantua and Cremona was confiscated, the owners were given notice to vacate, and their farms were resettle by veterans of Antony’s army. Fortunately, however, through the influence of the gifted administrator and man of letters Asimius Pollio, Vergil was not dispossessed. Instead, his poetry was taken by Pollio to MAECENAS, who was al-read what would be known today as the minister of culture. Maecenas was enthusiastic over these short pastoral compositions, then known generically as eclogae (see Eclogue), and urged the poet to organize them into publishable form. After several years of painstaking polishing, during which he added two or three more poems and fitted them into the arrangement of 10 idyls, he published the work under the title Bucolics (37). The Bucolics, apparently only artful variations on a theme by Theocritus, are, however, imbued with the spirit of postrepublican Rome, a spirit which looked back longingly to simpler times and forward with desperate hope to a new era of peace.

His fame now well established by the Bucolics, Vergil accepted the invitation of Maecenas to come and live on his estate in Naples and there begin work on a much more ambitious project, which Vergil had already outlined. The poet worked for seven years (37–40) on what was to be the great didactic poem of Rome, the Georgics, or "poems of farm life," also known as the Georcijs. While Octavius Caesar was busy with the reconstruction of Rome's moral and political life, Vergil was occupied with the portrait of that archetypal builder and civilizer, the farmer. Like his Bucolics, Vergil's Georgics are superficially based on a Greek classic, Hesiod's Works and Days, but, again like his first work, they are filled with an intense historical sense of the past and present and with the hope that Rome, under Octavius, would enter an era of peace.

After finishing the Georgics, Vergil immediately began work in the most exalted genre of classical literature, the epic. He gave consideration to several possible legends before he finally decided on the story of Aeneas, the Trojan prince whose descendants were supposed to have founded Rome and whom the Julian family claimed as their great ancestor. Again he made use of an ancient model, this time the Iliad and the Odyssey of Homer, and again created a work that was, in every sense, Roman. In this great 12-book work, his countrymen were to see not only a symbolic summation of their history but a statement of their noblest aspirations for the future. The epic was never wholly completed. The poet died on Sept 21, 19, after returning from a voyage to Athens. His unfinished Aeneid was not destroyed, as he had wished, but was edited by his friends Varius and Tucca and, at last, published. Despite its minor imperfections—several obscure passages, a number of unfinished lines, and two or three inconsistencies in narrative—the Aeneid was at once accepted as the supreme epic of the Roman world.

Vergil was popular during the Middle Ages, partly because of his early acceptance by the early Christians as an inspired poet and partly because of the medieval habit of making magicians out of the poets and sages of antiquity. Dante, in his Divine Comedy, has Vergil lead him through the infernal and purgatorial regions, considering him the wisest and most closely Christian of the ancient pagan poets.

Vergil was popular during the Middle Ages, partly because of his early acceptance by the early Christians as an inspired poet and partly because of the medieval habit of making magicians out of the poets and sages of antiquity. Dante, in his Divine Comedy, has Vergil lead him through the infernal and purgatorial regions, considering him the wisest and most closely Christian of the ancient pagan poets.

Vergil, Polidoro (c.1470-1555). Italian diplomat and historian. He settled in England in 1502. A friend of Sir Thomas More and the other English Humanists, his Anglica historia (1534), a history, influenced native historians and through them Shakespeare's history plays.

Vergne, Marie Madeleine Pioche de la. See comtesse de LA FAYETTE.

Verhaeren, Emile (1855-1916). Belgian poet. The work of Verhaeren is always characterized by energy and unflagging vitality. Before World War I he entertained a faith in the possibility of universal brotherhood and in human progress. Les Visages de la vie (1899), Les Forces Tumultueuses (1902), La Multiple Splendeur (1906), and Les Rhythmes souverains (1910) all express this faith and are marked by exuberance and a joy in the life of sensation. Les Flamandes (1883) contains poems that describe Flemish life in lusty, vivid language; Verhaeren's interest in pictorial art is reflected in his poetry. The poems of Les Villages Illusores (1895) create symbols from the common people of his native region; they serve as concrete embodiments of his trust in man. A trilogy dedicated to his wife, Les Heures Claires (1896), Les Heures d'après-midi (1905), and Les Heures de soir (1911), is tender and quiet in mood. Gloom and despair were not, however, absent from Verhaeren's poetic repertoire. Another trilogy, Les Soirs (1888), Les Débâcles (1888) and Les Flambeaux noirs (1891), explores a bleak, unhappy state of soul. With Les Flambeaux noirs, Verhaeren began to experiment with vers libre, finding it more suited to the force of the feelings he sought.
to express. Les Ailes Rouges de la Guerre (1916) is a vigorous, bitter attack on the war, which brutally destroyed his hope in the future.

Verissimo, Erico (1905– ). Brazilian novelist. Verissimo's novels are set in his native state of Rio Grande do Sul and in its capital city, Porto Alegre. Rich in characterization and extensive in scope, they show the influence of such writers as Aldous Huxley, John Dos Passos, and Ernest Hemingway. His best-known works include Caminhos Crusados (Crossroad, 1939), which describes five days in the lives of the inhabitants of a suburban street in Porto Alegre. Ohlai os Lírios do Campo (Consider the Lilies of the Field), 1938), about a wealthy doctor who reviews his past at the deathbed of a former mistress; and O Resto É Silêncio (The Rest is Silence, 1943), which studies the effect of a girl's suicide on seven people who witness her act. O Tempo e e Vento (Time and the Wind) is the title of a trilogy tracing the development of Rio Grande do Sul in the history of the Terra-Cambará family from the 18th through the 20th centuries; the first part of the third volume, O Arquipélago, appeared in 1961.

Verkhovenski, Pyotr Stepanovich. In Feodor Dostoevski's novel The Possessed, the leader of the revolutionary terrorist group. Pyotr, whose portrayal was partially based on the character of the infamous Sergei NECHAYEV, is depicted as cold and ruthless in his methods and strictly self-seeking in his goals. His aim is destruction for the pleasure of the thing, with no real interest in improving the lot of the oppressed people he claims to be helping. Personally he is shown to be an obnoxious bore. He is fascinated by the sinister Stavroin and quickly realizes the magnetism the man would exert as a figurehead of the revolutionary movement. He is unable, however, to persuade Stavroin to lend himself to such a purpose. Verkhovenski's most diabolic act in the novel is the murder of Smatov, who had been trying to resign from the revolutionary group. The incident was based on a real event from Nechayev's career.

Stepan Trofimovich Verkhovenski, the father of Pyotr Stepanovich, lives in retirement on the estate of Varvara Petrovna, Stavroin's mother. Stepan is a representative of the mildy radical generation of the 1840's, who read Fourier and Saint-Simon, talked incessantly, and took no real action against the government. Stepan is, however, convinced that the authorities regard him as a dangerous radical and are constantly watching his every move. His harmlessness is contrasted to the menace represented by his nihilist son, Pyotr. The implication is that such men as Stepan, who wholeheartedly accepted Western ideas, prepared the ground for the growth of nihilism.

Stepan's distance from the ways of thought of the new generation is emphasized during a literary evening at which he passionately defends the value and autonomy of art against the ridicule of the young radicals whose views on such matters are strictly utilitarian.

Verlaine, Paul (1844–1896). French poet. Associated with the early SYMBOLISTS, Verlaine is noted for the grace, delicacy, and musical suggestiveness of his lyrics. Among his books are Poèmes Saturniens (1866), a volume in the style of the Parnassians; Fêtes Galantes (1869), written in a Watteau-like, 18th-century mood; La Bonne Chanson (1870), a celebration of the poet's joy at his coming marriage; and Romances sans paroles (1874). Sagesse (1881) contains poems of religious sentiment that reflect the poet's conversion to Roman Catholicism. Verlaine's personal life was disordered and tragic. He abandoned his young wife and in 1872 began his perverted, unhappy liaison with the young poet Rimbaud. This relationship, which ended in Brussels with a prison term for Verlaine and a bullet wound for Rimbaud, marked the beginning of a pitifully debauched existence that continued until the poet's death.

Vermeer or Van der Meer, Jan (1632–1675). Dutch painter. Vermeer, who was born in Delft and lived there all his life, is the creator of some 35 highly prized known paintings. The work of a master colorist, these quiet interior scenes are characterized by an absence of sentimentality, by outstanding color harmonies—particularly of blues and yellows—and by an appreciation of light effects that led to the frequent inclusion of an open window as a source of light.

Verne, Jules (1828–1905). French writer. Verne's startling imaginative powers produced a number of semiscientific adventure stories that proved to be, not only universally popular with young people, but also almost unbelievably prophetic. He is best known for A Voyage to the Center of the Earth (Voyage au centre de la terre; 1864), The Mysterious Island (1870), Twenty Thousand Leagues Under the Sea, and Around the World in Eighty Days.

Vernon, Mme de. The mother in Mme de Stael's Delphine. A cool-headed, intriging egotist, she is considered to be a satirical, vengeful portrait of TALLEYRAND in feminine guise.

Veronese, Paolo. Real name, Paolo Cagliari (1528–1588). Venetian painter. Born in Verona, he excelled in large, brilliantly colored, and detailed paintings; these adorn the palaces and churches of his adopted city. Like Carpaccio, he favored the pageantry of a lively multitude of richly costumed figures in both his religious and allegorical works. His Rape of Europa and Apotheosis of Venice, the latter a spectacular essay in illusionist ceiling decoration, may be seen in the doge's palace. Two outstanding "festal" works are the Marriage Feast at Cana and Feast at the House of Levi the Publican (1757). The latter, originally entitled Feast at the House of Simon, was responsible for Paolo's arraignment before the Inquisition, which charged that he had violated official iconography in excluding the Magdalen and including dogs, German soldiers, buffoons, and dwarfs. Whereupon the painter simply changed the title to the present one, although he had made a moving plea for artistic freedom in handling such themes.

Veronica, St. A late medieval legend says that a maiden handed her handkerchief to Jesus on his way to Calvary. He wiped the sweat from his brow, returned the handkerchief to the owner, and went on. The handkerchief was found to bear a perfect likeness of the Saviour, and was called Vera-Icon (true likeness); the maiden became St. Veronica, and is commemorated on February 4. Milan Cathedral, St.
Sylvester's at Rome, and St. Bartholomew's at Genoa all lay claim to the handkerchief.

Verrazano, Giovanni da (c. 1485—c. 1528). Florentine navigator who located the mouth of the Hudson River (1524) while seeking a northwest passage to Asia.

Verrazzano, Andrea del. Real name, Andrea di Michele di Francesco de' Cione (1436—1488). Florentine sculptor, painter, and goldsmith. Few of his works survive; but his Baptism of Christ, in which his young pupil Leonardo da Vinci participated, and other paintings reveal his skill in the subtle use of light—a lesson Leonardo remembered and perfected. His fame as a sculptor rests on the bronze David of 1476 and the celebrated equestrian statue of the condottiere Colleoni at Venice (1479).

Versailles, treaty of (June 28, 1919). The treaty formally ending World War I, signed by the Allied powers and Germany in the Hall of Mirrors of the palace of Versailles. Similar treaties were accepted by Austria and Bulgaria on Sept. 12, 1919.

By the terms of the treaty, Germany was forced to accept responsibility for the damage caused to civilians by the war and was obliged to make financial reparations; her armed forces were also drastically reduced. She lost Alsace-Lorraine, the Saar Basin, Posen, parts of Schleswig and Silesia, and her overseas colonies. The covenant of the League of Nations was included as an integral part of the treaty.

Despite the efforts of President Woodrow Wilson, who headed the American delegation to the Paris peace conference that drafted the treaty, the U.S. Senate refused to ratify the document. Consequently, the U.S. did not join the League of Nations, which had been Wilson's great hope for the preservation of world peace.

versification. In prosody, the science of meter and rhyme in traditional verse composition, as contrasted with Anglo-Saxon prosody on the one hand and modern free verse on the other. See PROSDY.

Versilov. In Fedor Dostoevski's novel A Raw Youth, the natural father of the central character, Arkadi Dolgoruk. Versilov is a representative of the "predatory type" of Russian 19th century man. Infected by Western ideas, without real religious faith, and cut off from a living contact with the Russian people, Versilov is shown as weak and artificial compared to Makar Ivanovich Dolgoruki, the religious pilgrim.

versunkene Glocke, Die. See SUNKEN BELL, THE.

Vershandi. In Norse mythology, the second of the three sister Norns or Fates. Active and straightforward, she personified the present, her name being related to German werden, to become.

Vertumnus or Vortumnus. In Roman mythology, the god of the changing seasons, who married Pomona. He courted her unsuccessfully in many guises until he finally appeared as an old woman and pleaded his own cause under cover of giving good advice.

Verwandlung, Die. See METAMORPHOSIS, THE.

Very, Jones (1813—1880). American poet. Licensed as a Unitarian minister, Very lived a retired life with his sisters in Salem, Mass., occasionally contributing to the Salem Gazette and the Christian Register and writing sonnets and lyrics celebrating religious visions and mysticism. At one time he was committed to McLean Asylum in Somerville, Mass., but his friend Ralph Waldo Emerson insisted that he was "profoundly sane."

Very was associated with TRANSCENDENTALISM. His first book, Essays and Poems (1839), was edited and published by Emerson, and William Cullen Bryant and William Channing praised his sonnets highly. His work resembles that of Montaigne and the 17th-century metaphysical poets. Two posthumous collections are Poems (1883) and Poems and Essays (1886).

Vesalius, Andreas (1514—1564). Belgian anatomist. He was the first in modern times to dissect the human body. The Inquisition condemned him to death but his sentence was commuted to a pilgrimage to Jerusalem; on his return from there he was shipwrecked. His De Humani Corporis Fabrica is a treatise in seven books about the structure of the human body.

Vesey, Mrs. Elizabeth (1715?—1791). English poet and member of the BLUESTOCKING Club. She was nicknamed "the Sylph" by Mrs. Elizabeth MONTAGU.

Vespasian. Full Latin name, Titus Flavius Sabinus Vespasianus (AD 9—79). Roman emperor (69—79). The first of the Flavian emperors, he was chosen by his soldiers. He began the Colosseum. His name is immortalized by the vespasianes (public toilets) in Paris.

Vespucci, Amerigo (1451—1512). Florentine navigator. He visited the mouth of the Amazon in 1499 and explored the Brazilian coast in 1501. On the basis of these two voyages (and two others, probably fictional), described in his letters, and because he clearly proclaimed his belief that the American continent was not Asia but a new world, his name was given to the land. Actually, even if, as he claimed, he made a voyage in 1497 and reached the North American continent on June 16, others had preceded him there. The suggestion to name the new world after him was made by a German geographer and Humanist, Martin Waldseemüller (1470—1518), who had read and published the letters of Amerigo, which were later translated for the Hakluyt society (1894).

Vesta. The virgin goddess of the hearth of Roman mythology, corresponding to the Greek Hestia, one of the 12 great Olympians (see gods of CLASSICAL MYTHOLOGY). She was custodian of the sacred fire brought by Aeneas from Troy, which was never permitted to go out lest a national calamity should follow. See VESTALS.

vestals. The six spotless virgins consecrated to Vesta. They tended the sacred fire brought by Aeneas from Troy and preserved by the state in a sanctuary in the forum at Rome. They were subjected to very severe discipline, and in the event of losing their virginity were buried alive. The vestal virgins also prepared from the first fruits of the May harvest the sacrificial meal for the LUPERCALIA, the Vestals, and the Ides of September.

The word vestal has been figuratively applied to any woman of spotless chastity.
Vetalapanchavimsati (Sansk., "twenty-five tales of a vampire"). Twenty-five Sanscrit tales by Somaveda taken from Book 12 of the KATHASRITISAGARA. They blend the bleak and the magical, the real and the fanciful, the grotesque and the lovely. Each ends with a question to which the wisest of men, king Trivikramasena, must give an answer. The Transposed Heads, by Thomas MANN, is a reconstruction of one of these.

Veto, M. et Mme. Name used for Louis XVI and Marie Antoinette during the French Revolution, because the king had been allowed a veto on the resolutions of the National Assembly. The name is used in the revolutionary song La CARMAGNOLE.

Vicar of Christ. A title given to the Pope, symbolizing his claim to be the representative of Christ on earth.

Vicar of Wakefield, The (1776). A pastoral novel by Oliver Goldsmith. The story is told by Dr. Charles PIMROSE, an unworldly, generous, and kindly vicar. With his wife, a woman with aspirations to gentility, his two daughters Olivia and Sophia, and his sons, George, Moses, and two smaller boys, he lives in quiet contentment until he loses his independent income. They move to humbler dwellings near the estate of Squire Thornhill, and there begin a series of misfortunes: Olivia is abducted and seduced by Squire Thornhill after a mock marriage ceremony; the vicar's house burns down and he is imprisoned for debt; Sophia is abducted by an unknown villain; and George, in attempting to avenge Olivia is imprisoned. The intervention of Sir William THORNHILL, the squire's uncle, straightens out the vicar's tangled affairs, which he himself has borne with remarkable fortitude; Sir William not only rescues Sophia, but marries her.

The book itself early became and has remained a classic, perhaps most of all because it reflects so truly the mellow wisdom and gentle irony of its author. See Ephraim JENKINSON; Miss Arabella WILMOT.

Vichy government. French government during the German occupation of France (1940–1945) in World War II. See Henri-Philippe PÉRAIN.

Vico, Giambattista or Giovanni Battista (1668–1744). Italian philosopher and jurist. An opponent of Cartesian rationality, he anticipated Hegel's philosophy. Studies in the comparative history of law led him to formulate a concept of the relativity and evolution of human achievements which he applied to all the arts and sciences and to ideas in general. In The New Science (La Scienza Nuova; 1725–1730) he pro-pounds a natural law of growth, decay, and regrowth through which all nations and civilizations must pass. The evolution of civilization is paralleled to the child's acquisition of knowledge through broadening experience; man, like the child, passes through the ascending stages of the senses, the imagination, and reason in his progression towards knowledge. In this scheme poetry properly belongs to the imaginative faculty midway between the physical senses and reason. Through Hegel, Vico influenced the aesthetic theories of De Sanctis and other literary critics of the romantic school.

Victoria. Full name Alexandrina Victoria (1819–1901). Queen of Great Britain and Ireland, empress of India. Her long reign (1837–1901) began on the death of William IV. In 1840 she married Albert, prince of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, who died in 1861. Her name is used to describe the literature, and the characteristics, qualities, and attitudes of the period of her reign. See VICTORIAN.

Victoria, Tomás Luis de (c. 1548–1611). The most important Spanish Renaissance composer. Victoria was educated in Rome at the expense of King Philip II. He remained there nearly 30 years, then returned to Madrid in the service of the Empress
Victoria de Junín, La

Maria, Philip's sister. A priest, Victoria's work was totally directed to the church, and his music is full of the ardor and exaltation of Spanish mysticism.

Victoria de Junín, La: Canto a Bolívar (1825). An ode by José Joaquín Olmedo (1780-1847), Ecuadorian poet and statesman. Dedicated to Simón Bolívar, the poem was inspired by the patriots' victories at Junín and Ayacucho, which virtually terminated the South American struggle for independence. In form and structure, the work reveals Olmedo's familiarity with the classics, and the opening lines closely imitate one of the odes of Horace. However, Olmedo's exuberance, imagination, and extravagant metaphors, which Bolívar himself satirized, make the poem one of the forerunners of the romantic movement in Latin America.

Vitoria. Of or pertaining to the 64-year reign (1837-1901) of Queen Victoria of England, to the English people of the period, to their sentiments, beliefs, tastes, and accomplishments. In both literary and social history, Victoria's reign may be divided into two phases, each roughly 30 years long: the first period characterized by moderate and gradual political reforms, by the rapid growth of industry, by an enormous increase in population, by the rise to power of the industrial middle class, whose struggles with the working class and with the old aristocracy were to form the dominant theme of Victorian literature; and the second period characterized by a declining birth rate, by an increasingly jingoistic nationalism, by the looming specter of mass unemployment and economic crisis, by the tendency of the new science to undermine deeply held religious convictions, by the reflection in literature of a growing disillusionment with traditional moral values.

In the first half of Victoria's reign, England enjoyed unparalleled material prosperity and political stability. Prince Albert was sufficiently impressed by the achievements of his new country to urge that they be publicly compared with those of the other nations of the world. He became an active promoter of the "Great Exhibition of the Works and Industries of All Nations" held in London in 1851 under the glass arch of the Crystal Palace. Six million persons came from all parts of the kingdom and from nearly every corner of the world to view this great monument to Progress. After witnessing the opening ceremonies presided over by Queen Victoria, a reporter for The Times wrote:

Some saw in it the second and more glorious inauguration of their Sovereign; some a solemn dedication of art and its stores; some were most reminded of that day when all ages and climes shall be gathered round the throne of their Maker; ... all contributed to an effect so grand and yet so natural, that it hardly seemed to be put together by design, or to be the work of human artificers.

Such was the complacent mood during the first half of Victoria's reign: a combination of pride in the stable constitutional government, of optimism generated by her increasing industrial prosperity, of an as yet unshaken confidence in the inherent rightness of the liberal and evangelical virtues of industriousness, self-reliance, temperance, piety, charity, and moral earnestness. William Makepeace Thackeray, though a self-proclaimed republican, composed odes to the Crystal Palace. Tennyson, after riding in the first train to travel from Liverpool to Manchester, wrote "Let the great world spin for ever down the ringing grooves of change." Lord Macaulay began his History of England with the suggestion that "the general effect of this checkered narrative will be to excite thankfulness in all religious minds, and hope in the breasts of all patriots. For the history of our country during the last hundred and sixty years is eminently the history of physical, of moral, and of intellectual improvement." In the writings of lesser men, this characteristic pride, optimism, and confidence would often be transformed into a shoddy self-satisfaction, a naïve equating of success with right, and an arrogant belief in the inherent superiority of all things English—sentiments that later generations were to associate, rightly or wrongly, with the word Victorian.

The first half of Victoria's reign was a stable and prosperous period, but it was not stagnant. Well before Tennyson and Macaulay so eloquently celebrated the accomplishments of the age, others were diligently exposing its defects. In the 1830's Keble, Newman, and Pusey, as leaders of the Oxford Movement, had sought to restore to the Anglican Church its original spiritual power and ritualistic beauty, to rid it of a bleak and literal evangelical "enthusiasm," to make it once again "more than a merely human institution." Throughout the 30's, 40's and 50's an increasing number of able writers turned their attention to current social evils that had been recently highlighted by Chartist agitation. The Malthusian doctrine, the trials of the workman, the evils of child labor, and the incessant conflict of the middle and working classes were examined in books such as Dickens' Oliver Twist and Hard Times, Mrs. Gaskell's Mary Barton, Kingsley's Yeast and Alton Locke, Carlyle's Chartism and Past and Present, Charlotte Brontë's Shirley, Meredith's Ewan Harrington, D'Alton's Sybil and Crouching. In 1859, Charles Darwin's Origin of Species was published. Despite the caution with which he quietly presented his conclusions, they were immediately construed by those of orthodox views to be not only a challenge to the prevailing literal biblical interpretation but to be an affront to the best achievements of an age. Whether he had intended to do so or not, Darwin hastened the undermining of traditional Victorian values. Also published in 1859 was John Stuart Mill's brilliant essay On Liberty. Although he was once a Benthamite, Mill no longer believed that the good society could be based solely upon the crude doctrines of laissez-faire. He advocated a long series of reforms "to fit mankind by cultivation for a state of society combining the greatest personal freedom with that just distribution of the fruits of labour, which the present laws of property do not profess to aim at." And by questioning whether communal ownership or private property would best serve this end, he challenged no less effectively than Darwin the underlying Victorian assumptions.

Throughout the 60's, 70's, and 80's, the assaults upon mid-Victorian values increased in frequency and intensity. Matthew Arnold bitterly attacked the barbarian and Philistines in his Essays in Criticism and in Culture and Anarchy. John Ruskin extolled the beauties of art and nature and decried the ugliness of the industrial age in Sesame and Lilies and in pounded, with somewhat less reticence than Darwin, the implications of evolution in Man's Place in Nature and in The Physical Basis of Life. Eventually Herbert Spencer became the only remaining political thinker to advocate the doctrine of laissez-faire, and in Man versus the State he justified his position by appealing, not to the old creed of self-reliance and industry, but to Darwin's theories of evolution.

By the last decade of the 19th century there was no respectable philosophical refuge in which one disposed to cling to his mid-Victorian intellectual heritage could take shelter. The old verities being assaulted skillfully and with devastating effect from every possible angle by English authors, such as Butler, Conrad, Wilde, Wells, and Shaw, and by a growing number of foreign writers as well, including Zola, Maupassant, and Dostoevski. The average reader could either follow them in new and often disturbing directions or find relief from his humdrum existence by escaping to the South Seas with Robert Louis Stevenson and to the far-flung outposts of the empire with Rudyard Kipling. VIEIRA, Clotaldo (1925–). A novel by Joseph CONRAD. Axel Heyst lives the life of an exile in the South Seas. A man of integrity and generosity who distrusts the world, he helps those in trouble, including Lena, an unhappy girl he takes to his lonely island. Schomberg, the manager of the hotel where Lena worked, desires her and tells the fantastic, unscrupulous adventurer Jones, with his followers, that Heyst has treasure hidden on his island. The band of ruthless men invade the island sanctuary, and Lena is killed in an effort to save herself and her lover. It is the "victory" of their love and new-found purpose in life.

Vida, Girolamo or Marco Girolamo (c. 1485–1566). Italian poet. Cremona was his birthplace, but he spent most of his life at Rome in the service of his church, which made him bishop of Alba in 1532. He was famous for his Latin poetry, especially the De Ludo Sacrorum (The Game of Chess) and the Christias or Christiad, an epic poem in the Vergilian manner on the life of the first Christian bishop of the Church. In 1527 he wrote De arte poetica, the first of many Renaissance treatises on the art of poetry. In England, Goldsmith translated the Ludo, Milton imitated the Christias, and Pope praised him in the Essay on Criticism.

Vida es sueño, La (Life Is a Dream, c. 1636). A play by Pedro Calderón de la Barca, considered one of the outstanding Spanish dramas of all time. This allegorical and philosophical play, through the symbolical character of the hero, Segismundo, explores the mysteries of human destiny, the illusory nature of mundane existence, and the conflict between predestination and free will.

Segismundo, a Polish prince, has been confined in a tower under the care of Clotaldo because astrologers had predicted that he would harm his father, King Basilio. After some years, the king decides to test the character of his son. Segismundo is drugged and brought to the palace where, since he is unaccustomed to human society, he behaves in a crude and violent fashion. Consequently, he is sent again to his confinement, convinced that the episode in the palace was a dream. Later the people revolt, liberate the prince, who is at first fearful that his new experience may not be real, and seize the kingdom. Segismundo is proclaimed king and, having learned that all life is a dream, decides that only virtue and nobility will give meaning to the dream.

Vidal, Gore (1925– ). American novelist and playwright. Vidal's novels include William and William (1964), The City and the Pillar (1949), and A Search for the King (1950). Visit to a Small Planet and Other Television Plays was published in 1956; the title play, enlarged and rewritten, was successfully produced on Broadway in 1957. Vidal then wrote The Best Man (1960), a play about a presidential nominating convention; it, too, had a successful run on Broadway.

Vidar. See Valk. VIDOHO, François Eugène (1775–1857). French chief of detectives in Paris (1809–1827; 1832). Himself a clever criminal, his force consisted of ex-criminals who knew the ways of the underworld. On one occasion Vidoq organized a robbery himself and then investigated it as a police officer. M. Lécoq, a character created by Emile Gaboriau, is based on his character.

Vieira, António (1608–1697). Portuguese-born Brazilian clergyman, orator, diplomat, and writer. Brought to Brazil at the age of six, Vieira soon identified himself with his new country although he later spent many years in Europe and became an important adviser to King John IV of Portugal. As a Jesuit preacher and missionary, he dedicated himself to the education and defense of the Indians; he also aroused the suspicions of the Inquisition because of his efforts on behalf of Portuguese Jews. His literary reputation rests largely on his letters and on his fiery, sometimes bombastic, sermons.

Vié-Griffin, Francis. Original name, Egbert Ludovicus Viélé (1863–1937). French poet born in Virginia. Vié-Griffin was educated and lived in Paris, where he became associated with the symbolists. His poetical works include such collections as Guille d'auril (1886), Les Cygnes (1887), La clarté de vie (1897), and L'amour sacré (1906). The Congress (1814–1815) by the powers of Europe after Napoleon's first abdication. It was called to settle the question of new boundaries. France kept the frontiers she had had in 1792; Prussia's territory was much increased; Poland was made into a new kingdom under the Czars.

Viereck, Peter [Robert Edwin] (1916– ). American poet, teacher, and author. Born in New York City, Viereck has taught at Radcliffe, Smith, and Mount Holyoke colleges. He has written several works on political science, among them Metapolitics: From the Romantics to Hitler (1941), Conservatism Revisited: The Revolt against Revolt (1949), Shame and Glory of the Intellectuals (1953), Dream and Responsibility: Tension between Poetry and Society (1953), Unadjusted Man: A New Hero for Americans (1956), and The Roots of the Nazi Mind (1961). His novellette Who Killed the Universe? appeared in New Directions (1938). As a poet, Viereck is a classicist and a humanist; his poems, which are usually regular in meter and form, combine emotional lyricism and philosophic ideas in about equal parts. Terror and Decorum (1948), his first book of poems, won a Pulitzer Prize. Other collections include Strike Through the Mask! (1950), The First Morning (1952), A Walk on Moss (1956), and The Parmenon Tree (1956).

Vieth von Golssenau, Arnold. See Ludwig Renn.

Vigny, Comte Alfred Victor de (1797–1863). French poet, playwright, and novelist. One of the leaders of the romantic school, although not entirely typical of it in either his life or work, de Vigny wrote poetry marked by stoical despair and a bare, restrained classicism. Bleak and bitter, his work possesses a unique dignity. During the later years of his life, he retired almost entirely from public life, leading an isolated existence. His volumes of poetry include Poèmes (1822), Poèmes antiques et modernes (1826), and Les Destinées (1864). Chatterton (1835) is highly esteemed by critics as an example of romantic drama, while Cing Mars (1826) is an interesting pioneer attempt at a French historical novel. See Romanticism.

Vikings. Danish and Norwegian sea pirates and adventurers of the 8th to 10th century (not to be confused with sea-kings, who were royal Norse chieftains). They were called Norsemen or Normans (northmen) by the Europeans whose coasts they plundered. They made important permanent settlements in England, France, and Iceland. Henrik Ibsen wrote a drama called The Vikings (1858).

Vilaz, Jean (1912– ). Director of the Théâtre National Populaire.

Vildrac, Charles. Pen name of Charles Mes
ger (1852– ). French poet, dramatist, essayist, one of the Abbaye Group. His plays present sympathetic psychological studies of workingmen, such as The Steamer Tenacity (Le Paquebot Tenacity; 1920), or of the lower middle class. Other works include the play Michel Audair (1922) and the poems in A Book of Love (Le livre d’amour; c. 1910).

Vili. In Norse mythology, a mighty archer who, with his brothers Odin and Ve, slew the giant Ymir and created the world out of his body. When the first man and woman, Ask and Ember, were made, Vili gave them reason and motion.

Villa, Francisco or Pancho. Real name: Doroteo Arango (1877–1923). Mexican revolutionary leader. Originally a peon in the northern state of Chihuahua, Villa turned to cattle-rustling, becoming a hero to the local peasantry. With the outbreak of the Mexican Revolution, he joined in the struggle against Porfirio Díaz and Victoriano Huerta, and later vied with Venustiano Carranza for supreme power. A convention at Aguaclavientes in 1914 failed to bring peace between the rival chieftains, and warfare continued until Villa’s defeat by Alvaro Obregon, Carranza’s lieutenant, at the battle of Celaya in 1915. Hoping to embarrass the Carranza government, Villa led a raid on Columbus, N.M., in 1916, killing several Americans. President Wilson responded by dispatching a punitive force under John J. Pershing into Mexico, and the two nations came close to war. Despite Carranza’s efforts, Villa eluded capture and subsequently retired to a hacienda given to him after the successful revolt against Carranza in 1920. He was assassinated three years later, perhaps because of fear that he might oppose the presidential candidacy of Plutarco Elias Calles. Still a controversial figure in Mexico, Villa is regarded by some as a brigand, by others as a champion of the people. There is an excellent portrait of him in Martin Luis Guzmán’s Eagle and the Serpent (1928).

Village, The (1783). A long poem by George Crabbe. It was written partly as a realistic response to the artificialities of the pastoral convention, particularly as exemplified in Oliver Goldsmith’s The Deserted Village, which Crabbe considered a sentimentalized picture of rural life. The Village describes, in realistic terms, the hardships, evils, sordidness, and misery of the lives of country-dwellers of the day.

Villa-Lobos, Heitor (1887–1959). Foremost composer of Brazil. His style derives primarily from the folk and popular music of his country, which he collected and promoted in Brazilian schools and elsewhere. A popular series of works is his Chôros, Nos. 1–14; another is the Bachianas Brasileiras, Nos. 1–8.

villanelle. A lyric poem written in tercets and a closing quatrain, characterized by two refrain lines. These refrain lines are stated in the first stanza as lines one and three and return alternately in the succeeding stanzas as line three until the last stanza, where they are repeated in order as lines three and four. The rhyme scheme is: A–b-A, followed by a–b-A, a–b–A as many times as desired, completed by a–b–A–A. The most frequent length is five tercets and a closing quatrain.

Originally a round-song of farm laborers, the name villanelle comes from Latin villa, or farm. Medieval French villanelles were irregular in form, but in the 16th century the form became fixed as it is known today. Such famous modern lyrics as Do Not Go Gentle Into That Good Night, by Dylan Thomas, are villanelles.

O Singer of Persephone!
In the dim shadows desolate
Dost thou remember Sicily?

Still through the ivy flits the bee
Where Amaryllis lies in state,
O Singer of Persephone!

Simaetha calls on Hecate
And hears the wild dogs at the gate;
Dost thou remember Sicily?

Still by the light and laughing sea
Poor Polyphemic bemoans his fate,
O Singer of Persephone!

And still in boyish rivalry
Young Daphnis challenges his note;
Dost thou remember Sicily?

Slim Lacon keeps a goat for thee;
For thee the jocund shepherds wait;
O Singer of Persephone,
Dost thou remember Sicily?

Oscar Wilde, Theocritus

Villard, Oswald Garrison (1872–1949). American editor. A champion of pacifism, free trade, minority rights, and a free and responsible press, he was editorial writer and owner of the New York Evening Post (1897–1918), manager and owner of The Nation (1918–1932), and a contributing editor of the magazine until 1940. His grandfather was William Lloyd Garrison.

Villari, Pasquale (1827–1917). Italian historian. His best-known works are Storia di Girolamo Savonarola e de' Suoi Tempi (1859–1861) and Niccolò Machiavelli e i Suoi Tempi (1877–1882).

Ville, La. See City, THE.

Villehardouin, Geoffroy de (c. 1150–c. 1213). French court advisor and historian. He took part in the Fourth Crusade, and his Conquête de Constantinople, considered one of the earliest important works in French prose, recounts the events from 1202 to the capture of Constantinople in 1207.

Villété (1853). A novel by Charlotte Brontë. The English girl Lucy Snowe goes to the city of Villété in France to teach at a young girls' boarding school. There she meets the beautiful but egotistical Ginevra Fanshawe, a pupil who condescendingly becomes Lucy's friend and boasts of her admirers. One of these, Dr. John Bretton, turns out to be a childhood acquaintance of Lucy. He confesses to her that he hopes to marry Ginevra, and Lucy struggles to hide her love for him. One evening at a concert, Ginevra cruelly mimics his mother; disgusted, the doctor breaks with her. He, by chance, meets Polly, a friend of his and Lucy's from the past, and it becomes clear that the doctor and Polly love each other. In grief Lucy continues her work at the school, gradually feeling herself drawn to the professor Paul Emmanuel. Initially a bitter man, he mellows under her influence. Lucy is heartbroken when he announces that he must depart for the West Indies, but he later tells her privately that he has arranged for her to be headmistress of the school and that after his return in three years he plans to marry her. The city Villefet is in reality Brussels, where Charlotte Brontë lived and studied during the years 1842–1844.

Villiers, George. See 1st duke and 2nd duke of BUCKINGHAM.

Villiers de L'Isle-Adam, Comte Jean Marie Mathias Philippe Auguste de (1838–1889). French writer of fiction and drama. Born into an aristocratic family in Brittany, he went as a young man to Paris, where he led the life of a Bohemian artist. In his dramas Axël (1890), Elen (1867), and Morgane (1866), Villiers de L'Isle-Adam displays flagrant romanticism. His tales, collected in Contes cruels (1883) and Nouveaux Contes cruels (1888), are written in a fantastic, macabre manner. His writing, often freighted with philosophical ideas, obscure and highly poetic, is generally considered as the immediate predecessor of the French Symbolist movement.

Villon, François. Originally called François de Montcorbier or François de Loges (1431–?). French poet, considered the finest poet of the late Middle Ages. He adopted the last name of his patron, the chaplain of a university church who adopted him about 1438. A brilliant student, he received a Master of Arts degree from the Sorbonne before he was 21 (hence the title “Master Villon” occasionally used). However, he also excelled in the rowdier side of the student life of the time, cultivated disreputable society, and was involved in a number of brawls, in one of which he killed a priest (1455). Thereafter he was repeatedly under arrest, sentenced to prison or to exile, or wandering to escape arrest for a series of brawls, robberies, and generally illegal escapades. His Petit Testament (1456) is a series of Lais, or “legacies,” facetiously parodying the style of a legal testament; it explains that he is leaving Paris because of a broken heart (he was probably fleeing arrest) and bequeaths a number of worthless items to his friends and enemies.

But the Grand Testament (1461), the poem of 2,000 lines that made him famous, is melancholy and pathetic in some of its bequests, bitterly humorous in others. It includes a self-castigating review of his life as a beggar and thief, but also derides the vanity of all human life, whether or not overtly dissipated like his own. It is interspersed with ballades and rondeaux, including the Ballade des Dames du temps jadis (translated by Dante Gabriel Rossetti as The Ballad of Dead Ladies) and the Ballade pour prier Nostre Dame, addressed as a request to his mother to pray for him. In 1462 he was present at a street fight involving a death, and was sentenced to be hanged. This inspired him to write his own epitaph, the Ballade des pendus, or ballad of the hanged men, denouncing the justice of men and appealing for divine justice. His friends succeeded in having the sentence commuted in 1463 to ten years of banishment; Villon disappeared, and nothing further is known of him. His poems were first printed in 1489.

In the 19th century, Villon became popular as a Romantic rogue-hero, a colorful and sympathetic outlaw; episodes from his life (mostly legendary) appear frequently in literature, as in R. L. Stevenson's short story Lodging for the Night. D. G. Rossetti and A. C. Swinburne translated many of his ballads, and Bertolt Brecht adapted some of them for the lyrics of his Threepenny Opera (1928). J. H. Huntley made a largely fictitious Villon the hero of If I Were King (1901), adapted by Rudolf Friml for his operetta The Vagabond King (1925).

Vilmorin, Louise de (1902– ). French novelist and poet. Vilmorin is known for her elegantly witty and perceptive fantasies and comedies of manners, such as the novels Éric's Return (1948), Julietta (1951), Madame de . . . (1951), and Les Belles Amours (1954).

Vincentio, Duke. The kindly, philosophically duke of Vienna in Shakespeare's Measure for Measure. Although he realizes that his forbearance has contributed to a decline in public morality, he is reluctant to initiate a program of reform himself and appoints Angelo to rule in his stead. He pretends to leave Vienna for Poland but, disguised as Friar Lodowick, remains in the city to observe Angelo's conduct in office.

Vinci, Leonardo da. See LEONARDO DA VINCI.

Vinci, See LEONARDO DA VINCI.

Vinteuil. A great composer of music in Marcel Proust's Remembrance of Things Past. He is an idealized composite of a number of 19th-century French composers. The “little phrase” from one of his sonatas, a recurrent motif in the novel, closely resembles one by Saint-Saëns. His daughter is revealed to be a lesbian and a sadist.

Viola. The heroine of Shakespeare's Twelfth Night and the twin sister of Sebastian. Disguising herself as a boy and taking the name of Cesario, she becomes page to Duke Orsino, with whom she falls in love. When her identity is revealed, Orsino weds her.

Viollet-le-Duc, Eugène Emmanuel (1814-1879). French architect and authority on Gothic art. A leader of the Gothic revival, he is responsible for the restoration of many of France's most historic cathedrals and medieval buildings. He is also famous for his great standard works, Dictionnaire Raisonné de L'Architecture Française du XIe au XVIe Siècle (10 vols., 1848-1869) and Dictionnaire du Mobilier Français (1859), which he himself illustrated.

Virginia, a young Roman plebeian of great beauty, decoyed by Appius Claudius, one of the decemvirs, and claimed as his slave. According to tradition, her father L. Virginia, on hearing of it, hastened to the forum just as Virginia was about to be delivered up to Appius. He seized a butcher's knife and stabbed his daughter to the heart, crying "There is no way but this to keep thee free." He rushed from the forum and raised a revolt in which the decemvirs were overthrown and the old order of government was restored (449 B.C.). The story is told by Livy and has been retold by Petrarch, and by Chaucer in the Doctor's Tale.

Virginia (1913). A novel by Ellen Glasgow. This story of a Southern woman is set in the years between 1884 and 1912. Virginia's marriage is unhappy; she is unable to adapt herself to a new environment, loses the respect of her husband and daughters, but manages to retain the love of her son. The book is, in essence, an analysis of social change and the new world facing women in the early 20th century.

Virginian, The (1902). A novel by Owen Wister. Portraying cowboy life in Wyoming and in many ways the prototype of the modern Western, the story deals with the enmity between its unnamed hero and a local bad man called Trampas. When Trampas accuses the Virginian of cheating at poker and impugns his ancestry, the latter lays his pistol on the table and utters the immortal retort: "When you call me that, smile!" Trampas is eventually vanquished in a gun duel that constitutes the first "walkdown" in American literature, and the Virginian marries Molly Wood, a New England schoolteacher whom he has rescued from a marooned stagecoach.

Virginians, The (1857). A novel by William Makepeace Thackeray. A sequel to Henry Esmond, it relates the story of George and Harry Warrington, the twin grandsons of Colonel Henry Esmond. The novel takes the two brothers, of differing tastes and temperaments, through boyhood in America, through various experiences in England, where they are favorites of their wicked old aunt, Baroness Bernstein (the Beatrix of Henry Esmond), and through the American Revolution, in which George fights on the side of the Virginian and Harry on the side of his friend George Washington.

Virginius. See Virginia.

Virgin Queen, the. Elizabeth I of England.

Virgin Soil (Nov.; 1877). A novel by Ivan Turgenev. It deals with the revolutionary movement in Russia. The student Nezhdanov, who believes himself committed to the people's cause, carries off Mariana, the daughter of a government official, who wants to "go to the people" with him and work for the peasants' freedom. Nezhdanov discovers that he is not really fitted to be a revolutionary leader and in despair kills himself. The stronger Marianna marries again, she and her husband Solomin go off to work for a democratic Russia in a more gradual and realistic way.

Vischer, Friedrich Theodor (1587-1887). German critic and aesthetician, known for his attempts to provide a theoretical basis for literary realism. Among his works are Kritische Gänge (Critical Paths, 1844), a collection of essays, and a more systematic work, Ästhetik (Aesthetics, 1846).

Visconti. An Italian dynasty. Ruling Milan and its environs from the 12th through the mid-15th century, its members were noted for their patronage of such men of letters as Petrarch and for their political ferocity. Gian Galeazzo Visconti (1351-1402) became duke of Milan by treacherously ousting his uncle Bernabò (1323-1385), an event recalled by Chaucer in his Canterbury Tales. Their emblem, the viper, inspired Marjorie Bowen's The Viper of Milan (1906).

Viscount of Bragelonne, The (Le Vicomte de Bragelonne; 1848-1850). A historical romance by Alexandre Dumas, the sequel to The Three Musketeers and Twenty Years After. The reign of Louis XIV is the subject and setting for this third novel. The plot revolves about the schemings of Aramis, now bishop of Vannes, to attain power. Louise de la Vallière and The Man in the Iron Mask, originally part of The Viscount of Bragelonne, are now often published as separate works.

Vishnu. In Hindu metaphysics, the Supreme Spirit (Brahman), the Preserver in the Trimurti. He has had nine incarnations, or avatars: Matsya, a fish; Kurma, a tortoise; Varaha, a boar; Narasinha, a monster, half man and half lion; Vamana, a dwarf; Parashurama, a human (Rama with the axe); Rama-chandra (the hero of the Ramayana); Krishna; and Buddha. There is one, Kalki, still to come in the form of a white horse with wings to destroy sin, the sinful, and all the enemies of the natural, stable order. Vishnu, also known as Hari, is usually represented as four-armed, carrying a club, a shell, a discus, and a lotus; a bow and sword are slung at his side. The Indian sect that worships him is known as the Vaishnava. Vishnu in his various forms and aspects is perhaps the most popular of the many Hindu deities. As the Preserver of the Trimurti he is at all times a kindly god in contrast to an intellectualized Brahma and a destructive Shiva.

Vista. A (1925). A book by William Butler Yeats, important for understanding some of the ideas in his poetry. He claimed that the spirits dictated much of it in automatic writing to his wife, the medium Georgie Hyde Lees. It states that history is cyclical and recurrent, proceeding for the individual as well as for mankind in a gyre, or corkscrew pattern. At death, men's souls transmute into other bodies and continue the pattern. It also states that all human personality types have their opposite, antiaulithetical selves, or masks, and that the complete man should learn to assimilate the characteristics of his mask.

Vision of (or Concerning) Piers Plowman, The. See Piers PLOWMAN.

Vision of Sir Launfal, The (1848). A narrative poem by James Russell Lowell. Opening with the famous line, "What is so rare as a day in June?" the poem tells of Launfal's quest for the Grail. He fails until he shares his last crust with a beggar he had formerly scorned. His conversion complete, Launfal subsequently performs good works.

Visit, The. See Visit OF THE OLD LADY, THE.

Visit from St. Nicholas, A (1823). A poem by Clement Clarke Moore (1779-1863). First published anonymously in the Troy, N.Y. Sentinel, the poem was widely appreciated. Moore reprinted it in Poems (1844). His retelling of the visit of the jolly old man, with his descent through the chimneys, became the standard version of the legend for his many readers. Moore was a scholar who taught Oriental and Greek literature at the General Theological Seminary in New York from 1823 to 1850.

Visit of the Old Lady, The (Der Besuch der alten Dame; 1956). A play by Friedrich Dürrenmatt. An old billionairre returns to her destitute hometown and offers a huge sum of money for the life of the man who seduced and betrayed her when she was a girl. The citizens at first indignantly refuse to commit the murder, but eventually the temptation becomes too great and, at a full town meeting, they ritualistically execute the man. It was performed in New York as The Visit.

Vita Nuova, La (The New Life, c. 1293). A short work by Dante, collecting his early sonnets and canzoni with prose commentaries. They are connected by an autobiographical prose narrative of the love for Beatrice which inspired the poems. He only meets her twice, when he is 9 and 18, but adores her from afar. He feigns love for another woman to protect his true love, observes Beatrice's grief at the death of her father, foresees her own death, finds consolation after it happens with "a compassionate lady," but soon rededicates himself entirely to love of the memory of Beatrice. Finally a "new perception" of her in a vision makes clear the mystic significance of all these events, and he understands that he is not yet worthy to write about her ultimate meaning for him, but that he will—"an intimation of her role to come in the Divine Comedy. Both the poetry and the commentary, considering love for a woman as the first step in the soul's spiritual improvement toward a capacity for divine love, make the book a major work of the new poetic school of the Stilnovisti. Dante Gabriel Rossetti wrote a popular English translation (1861).

Vitellius, Aulus (a.d. 15-69). Roman general. He was proclaimed emperor (January-December, 69) by his troops. Opposed by Vespasian, he was defeated and killed.

Vitruvius. Full Latin name, Marcus Vitruvius Pollio (fl. c. 40 B.C.). Roman architect and military engineer. His celebrated De Architectura Libri Decem is the only classical work on architecture which has come down to us.

Vittorini, Elío (1908- ). Italian novelist, critic, and translator who with Cesare Pavese pioneered in Italy the translation and study of modern American writers. A politically "engaged" writer, interested in the problems of contemporary society, he worked in the antifascist underground in World War II. His first full-length novel, The In Carnation (Il Garofano Rosso; 1934; pub. 1948), describes the response of young students to fascism. Erika (1936) treats the theme of poverty in a world of cruelty and hypocrisy. * Conversazione in Sicilia (Conversation in Sicily, 1941) marked a new phase in Vittorini's writing in its mythical theme, erudite style, and hidden symbolism. Allegory is prominent in The Twilight of the Elephant (Il Sempione Sisiria l'Occhio al Frejus; 1948), which propounds the Marxist theme of the regeneration of the proletariat. Among his other "political" novels are Uomini e No (1945), which narrates his experiences in the underground, and Le Donne di Messina (1949).

Vittorino da Feltre (1373-1446). Italian Renaissance educator. He taught mainly at the court of Mantua. Like his equally famous contemporary, Guarino of Verona, he attained fame for educating young pupils, according to Greek ideals, in every aspect of physical, mental, and spiritual activity.

Vitus, St. St. (15-69). He was martyred with his tutor, Crescenda, his nurse, during the Diocletian persecution (303). In Germany it was believed in the 16th century that good health for a year could be secured by anyone who danced before a statue of St. Vitus on his feast day. This dancing developed almost into a mania, and came to be confused with chorea, which was subsequently known as St. Vitus' dance, the saint being invoked against it.

Vivaldi, Antonio (c. 1675-1741). Italian composer and violinist, known familiarly as il prete rosso (the red-haired priest). He wrote more than 400 concertos for various instruments and combinations of instruments, 38 operas, nearly all of which are lost, and church music, of which the Gloria (c. 1726) is well known.

Vivian Grey (1826). Benjamin DISRAELI's first novel, a political romance revolving around Vivian Grey, a charming, talented youth who persuades the stupid, vain marquis of Carabas to support an intrigue against his own government. After many convolutions, the plot fails, and Grey leaves England. Vivian has been regarded as a possible self-portrait of Disraeli.

Viviani, Emilia. The daughter of an Italian nobleman. Emilia was placed against her will in the convent of St. Anna, near Pisa. Percy Byshe Shelley met her in 1820, was attracted by her beauty and sympathetic toward her plight, and took her as a flesh-and-blood symbol of Ideal Beauty. He addressed his EPPSYCHIDION to her in 1821.

Viviano. In Matteo Maria Bolardo’s ORLANDO INNAMORATO and Lodovico Ariosto’s ORLANDO FURIOSO, the brother of Malagigi, Aldighieri, and BRADAMANTE, as well as one of the outstanding Christian knights.

Vlamink, Maurice de (1876–1958). French painter. With Matisse and Derain, Vlamink led the FAUVE school of painting. Both his subjects and his technique are natural, simple, and almost primitive in the concentration upon elemental forces and basic color. The subjects he chooses from nature are violent, often brutal scenes of a raging sea, a bleak winter evening, or a hayfield with a burning orange sun making fire of the haystacks. His flower paintings, like his other work, use no modeling or detail but are vivid bursts of pure color. Vlamink greatly admired Van Gogh and employed the technique of slashing raw bright pigment on his canvases to give a highly dramatic quality to his work. Among his most famous paintings are Thatched Cottages, Storm, and the dark, foreboding Village Street. Vlamink saw both the fearful and the beautiful in the unthinking forces of nature; he captures with his painter’s brush the energy and vitality he inevitably discovered.

Vogelweide, Walther von der. See WALTHER VON DER VOGELWEIDE.

Vogt, Nils Collett (1864–1937). Norwegian poet, playwright, and novelist. Vogt’s intense spirit of rebellion joined with his fervent lyricism in his first collection of poetry, Digte (Poems, 1887). Abandoning the conservative beliefs he found in his home, the poet joined the radical movement of the 1880’s in Norway. When these years of passionate commitment had drawn to a close, he began to express in his writings a tender nostalgia: Fra gutt til mann (From Boy to Man, 1932), a prose memoir, recreates the glorious time of his youth. Vogt felt a deep love for the stark beauty of his country; his poetry, always marked by courage and by a quiet strength, describes the dark fires and the bare mountains. Among his collections of lyric verse are Fra vaar til hest (From Spring to Autumn, 1894), Det dyre brød (The Costly Bread, 1900), September brand (September Flame, 1907), and Hjemkomst (Homecoming, 1917).

Voiture, Vincent (1598–1648). French poet. An original member of the French Academy, Voiture composed the sonnet UKANIE, which was held to be so perfect that it involved him in a bitter dispute with a rival poet, Isaac de BENESKRADE. Voiture’s works were published posthumously.

Vol de Nuit. See NIGHT FLIGHT.

Volksbuch (Ger. “folk book”). A term popularized by Joseph GÖRRES, referring to the many cheap, easily understood books that were produced for the people in 15th and 16th-century Germany, roughly equivalent to the English chapbook. The most important folk books are those containing prose narratives, some of which, like EULENSPIEGEL and the FAUSTBUCH, assumed great importance in subsequent literary history.

Völksgeist (Ger. “folk spirit”). The national character or genius of a people, as distinguished from the entirely rational sense of humanity accepted during the enlightenment. This concept, which was formulated by Herder, gained wide currency during the romantic era.

Volpone, or the Fox (1906). A comedy by Ben Jonson. Aided by his servant Mosca (the Fly), the avaricious Volpone (the Fox), a childless Venetian nobleman, devises a new method of adding to his hoard of gold. He pretends a lengthy illness in order to pique the expectations of his rascally associates, all of whom aspire to inherit his fortune: Volitore (the Vulture), a lawyer; Corbaccio (the Carrion Crow), a miserly old man; Corvino (the Raven), a knavish merchant. Mosca assures each, one by one, that he is in line for the fortune—thanks to Mosca’s own efforts. Finally, Mosca whispers abroad that Volpone is near death. They rush to Volpone with rich gifts, in order to assure themselves of his favor. Corbaccio disinherit his own son in Volpone’s favor; Corvino goes so far as to offer his wife to ensure his goodwill. After a series of complications, as logical as they are hilarious, Volpone, who is about to be outwitted by his own servant, reveals the whole plot in court, and all the participants are punished according to their crimes or their station in life. In 1928, Jules Romains and Stefan Zweig made a new version of the play which ends with Mosca inheriting all Volpone’s money from the false will. Volpone, who will be executed if he turns out not to be dead, slinks away penniless. This version, more satisfactory for modern audiences, is the one commonly performed today. It was employed by George Antheil in his opera Volpone (1953). Jonson’s play is generally recognized as one of the finest comedies of the Jacobean period.

Völsunga Saga. A Scandinavian prose cycle of legends, major source of the German epic poem THE NIBELUNGENLIED and of Wagner’s opera DER RING DES NIBELUNGEN, although names and plot details vary. The saga takes its name from Völsung, grandson of the god Odin and father of Sigmund. The hero Sigurd (Siegfried) is Sigmund’s son. He kills the dragon Fafnir, present guardian of a gold treasure and a magic ring, which carry the curse of their original owner from whom they were forcibly taken by the god Lóðr. Sigurd then begins his travels, taking the treasure and the magic horse Grani, given him by Odin.

He awakens the sleeping Valkyrie maiden Brunhild, and they become betrothed; but he leaves her in search of adventure and becomes the friend of the three sons of a Rhine king, and their sister Gudrun (Kriemhild, Gunnrune). He is given a magic potion which makes him forget Brunhild, and it is arranged that Sigurd will marry Gudrun if he helps her brother Gunnar (Gunther) win the hand of Brunhild, who has surrounded herself with a circle of fire that a prospective suitor must cross, since she assumes that none but Sigurd can do so. Sigurd rides through on his magic horse, but takes on Gunnar’s appearance while winning Brunhild’s promise of marriage. After he resumes his own shape, the double marriage is celebrated; but one day during a jealous argument Gudrun tells Brunhild about the deception. The enraged Brunhild has Sigurd killed, although still in love with him, then commits suicide. Godun eventually marries Atli (Attila, or Etzel, king of the Huns), who determines to get the treasure hoard, now in the hands of Godrun's brothers. They sink the gold in the Rhine and die fighting in refusal to reveal where it is hidden. Godrun avenges them by killing Atli and the sons she has borne him.

William Morris retold the saga in his Sigurd the Völsung (1876).

Voltaire. Pen name of François Marie Arouet (1694–1778). French satirist, philosopher, historian, dramatist, and poet. He is known for his eminence to organized religion and to fanaticism, intolerance, and superstition (which he attacked under the slogan, Écrasons l'infâme! [Fr., “Crush the infamous thing!”]), for his biting wit and his prejudices, his generosity in helping the poor and oppressed, his personal vigor in spite of chronic ill health, his clever and swiftly moving philosophical tales, and his contributions to the objective study of history. His merciless satire and unorthodox ideas were a constant source of irritation to the political and religious authorities of his time.

One of the most famous and influential men in the history of thought, Voltaire had an extremely turbulent life. His early reputation was made as a dramatist and wit, the latter gift earning him a beating at the hands of the lackeys of the chevalier de Rohan, a nobleman whom he insulted. He was subsequently imprisoned for a few days (1725), and thereafter immediately exiled to England where he spent three years (1726–1729). There Voltaire met, and came under the influence of, Pope and Swift; he was much drawn to English political thought, and, in particular, to Newton and Locke, whose ideas he propagated in France. On his return to his native land, he enthusiastically introduced English literature, and particularly Shakespeare, to the French public. (In time, however, he was to regard Shakespeare's influence on the drama as deplorable.) After the publication of his Lettres Philosophiques (1734), Voltaire was again pursued by the government. He took refuge with Mme du Châtelet at Cirey, in Lorraine, where he remained, for the most part, from 1734 to 1749, writing historical works and dabbling in science. It was during this period, through the influence of Mme de Pompadour, that Voltaire was made royal historiographer (1743) of Louis XV, and a member of the French Academy. After the death of Mme du Châtelet, Voltaire accepted Frederick II's invitation to visit him at his court in Berlin, where he stayed for three years until, in 1753, the two men became estranged. Their quarrels are celebrated: one of Voltaire's duties was to correct the monarch's attempts at French poetry. Angry at thus being treated as a subordinate, Voltaire on occasion referred to this chère as “washing the king's dirty linen.” He fled from Prussia, not without first experiencing imprisonment: Frederick's revenge for the publication of Voltaire's Diatribe du docteur Akaba, a satire of Frederick's highly placed functionary Pierre Moreau de Mauperuiss. Unwelcome elsewhere in Europe, Voltaire returned to Cirey, in eastern France; in 1755, he retired to a home in Geneva known as Les Délices. Here he continued publishing philosophic works and contributed articles to the Encyclopédie.

Because of the violent religious controversies he stirred up with reference to the article “Geneva” in the Encyclopédie, he thought it better to purchase an estate called Ferney in 1758, where, safe from both the Swiss and the French governments, he could and did live comfortably for nearly all the rest of his life. Here he spent his time corresponding with the major figures of the time, receiving homage from innumerable visitors, managing his estate where he instituted social reforms, writing and producing plays, and publishing treatises (many anonymously) which violently denounced the cases of intolerance and injustice that came to his attention. Specifically, he aided many persons who were victims of injustice, notably the family of Jean Calas. It was from Ferney that Voltaire quarreled with Rousseau and inveighed against the Roman Catholic Church and Calvinism, winning fame all over Europe. When he returned once more to Paris just before his death, he was entertained sumptuously and honored as befitted a great man at the performance of his play Irène (1778). It proved too much for the 84-year-old man and he died shortly thereafter, on the 30th day of May. The Church denied him a Christian burial, but an abbot of his acquaintance brought his body to his own abbey in Champagne. In 1791, after the French Revolution, on which Voltaire had had such an important influence, his remains were transferred to the Pantheon in Paris.

Voltaire's major dramatic works, chiefly neoclassical in form (see NEOCLASSICISM), include Oedipe (1718), Brutus (1730), Zaire, Alzire, ou les Américains (1736), Mahomet, ou le Fanatisme (1742), Mérope (1743), L'Orpheline de la Chine (1755), and Tancrède (1760). Among his polemic and philosophical writings are the Lettres philosophiques (definitive edition 1737, known also as Lettres sur les Anglais, or Lettres anglaises, in the 1734 edition), in which he praises the religious practices of the Quakers, English politics, philosophy, science, and literature and, by implication, criticizes authoritarian France. The letters had been translated and published in England in 1733. In them Voltaire is impressed with England's progress in scientific thinking, and especially with the importance given to the experimental method in the works of Bacon, Locke, and Newton. The French parlement was quick to sense the heresy in these letters and ordered them burned in 1734. Other philosophic works are the Traité de métaphysique (1734), in which Voltaire insists that metaphysical matters are beyond human understanding; the Discours en vers sur l'homme (1738); the Traité sur la tolérance (1763), written as part of Voltaire's campaign to rehabilitate Jean Calas' memory; the Dictionnaire philosophique portatif, ou la raison par alphabet (1764); the Sermón des cincoante (before 1755), said to be one of the most violent pamphlets ever to have come from the pen of a major writer; Le Philosophe ignorant (1766); and Les Questions de Zapata (1767), which point out contradictions in Christian dogma. His philosophical works also include Épître à Uranie (known also as Le Pour et le Contre, 1722?), in which Voltaire shows that he conceives of God more abstractly than do revealed religions; Le Mondain (1736), which is both an apology for the epicurean way of life and an economic theory proclaiming the usefulness of luxury;
Poème sur le déastre de Lisbonne (1756), which treats the problem of evil in nature and the earthquake at Lisbon in 1755; and Poème sur la loi naturelle (1756), the aim of which is to establish the existence of a universal morality independent of any revealed religion. It is in the Epître CIV à l'auteur du livre des trois imposteurs (1769) that Voltaire wrote his oft-quoted observation on religion: "If God did not exist, it would be necessary to invent him." Of his historical works, the greatest are considered to be the Histoire de Charles XII (of Sweden) (1731); Le Siècle de Louis XIV (1751), in which Voltaire celebrates the progress of the arts, sciences, and letters of that epoch, giving way to a subordinate place, Essai sur les mœurs et l'esprit des nations (1756/69), which is regarded as the first history of civilization; La Philosophie de l'histoire (1769); and Le Pyrhonomisme de l'histoire (1770). His best known philosophical tales, which have become the most popular of his works, are Zadig; Bacoouk, ou le Monde comme il va (1748); Memnon, ou la Sagesse humaine (1750); Micromégas; Candide; Jeannot et Colin (1764); L'Ingénie; L'Homme aux 40 écus (1767), a satire on French economic legislation; and Le Taureau blanc (1774), a satire on the Old Testament. Outstanding among his poems are La Henriade; Le Temple du goût (1733), a satiric allegorical voyage in the realm of taste; and Le Pucelle (1755, definitive edition 1762), an irreverent burlesque of Joan of Arc. Voltaire also wrote numerous light and witty verses on a variety of subjects. His more than 12,000 letters are still being edited in over 80 volumes by Theodore Besterman at the present date.

The name Voltaire is simply an anagram of Arouet l'j. (le jeune—Fr., "the younger," he having an elder brother), which Voltaire adopted in 1718.

Vorágine, La (The Vortex, 1924). A novel by José Eustasio Rivera (1889-1928), Colombian poet and novelist. Considered the finest novel ever written about the selva, or tropical forest, of South America, La Vorágine describes the odyssey of the narrator, Arturo Cova, who enters the forest in search of a wayward mistress. It is the selva, however, that dominates the book; dark and menacing, teeming with life, it destroys the human beings who tamper with its mysteries. The book is also memorable for its picture of life among the wretched rubberworkers of the forest, who also succumb to its malignity.

Vortex, The (1923). A play by Noel Coward. It is a serious work about a neurotic young man and his mother.

Vorticism. A school of painting led by the English novelist Wyndham Lewis. It was similar to FUTURISM.

Vox Clamantis (c. 1382-1384). Latin poem by John Gower, of 10,000 lines. The first third gives a vivid description of Tyler's REBELLION of 1381, which serves as the occasion for the allegorical denunciation of the corruptness of men of all classes, particularly with regard to their political responsibilities.

Voyney, Ethel (1864-1960). English novelist. She is best remembered for The Gadfly (1897), a romance about the reunification of Italy.

Voznesenski, Andrei (1934- ). Russian poet. One of the leaders of the poetic renaissance in Soviet literature in the early 1960's, he studied architecture in Moscow, but gave up that career when his drawings were destroyed in a fire. His poetry attracted the attention of Boris Pasternak, and he became Pasternak's protégé. Voznesenski's collections of verse include Parabola (1960), Mosaic (Mosaiik; 1960); and The Triangular Pear (Treugolnaya grusha; 1962).

Vronska, Count Aleksi. See Anna Karenina. Vulcan. In Roman mythology, a son of Jupiter and Juno. Originally a destructive god of fire, he became identified with the Greek artisan-god HEPHAESTUS, thus he became the patron of smiths and other craftsmen. He was sometimes called Muleiber, the sooty.

Vulgate. A Latin version of the Bible made by St. Jerome, under the commission of Pope Damasus (366-384). Jerome began his work in 382, using Greek and Hebrew sources. It is a liberally free, highly literate translation and is still the authorized Latin text of the Roman Catholic Church. Jerome's text was used in the first printed Bible, the Mazarin Bible (see BIBLE, SPECIALLY NAMED EDITIONS).

Vye, Eustacia. See Return of the Native.
Wace (c. 1100–c. 1175). Norman poet. He is especially important in Arthurian literature for his Roman de Brut. This graceful verse chronicle is an adaptation into French of the Latin History of the Kings of Britain (1137) written by Geoffrey of Monmouth, which exalts the deeds of King Arthur.

Wacht Am Rhein, Die (The Watch on the Rhine). A German national song, written in 1841 by Max Schneeckeburger and set to music by Karl Wilhelm (1854). It provided the name for Wacht on the Rhine, a distinguished play by Lillian Hellman about the Nazis (1940).

Wackenroder, Wilhelm Heinrich (1773–1798). German author. His most important work, some parts of which were written by his friend Ludwig Tieck, is Herzensgeissigungen eines künstlichenden Klösterbruders (Outpourings of the Heart of an Art-loving Lay Brother, 1797). This revolutionary book deals for the most part with Renaissance painting, and because of its elevation of art to a religion, in opposition to the rationalistic art criticism of the 18th century, it may be considered the original work of German romanticism. Toward the end of the book, Wackenroder also treats music and prepares the way for the later romantic appraisal of music as the queen of the arts.

Waddell, Helen (1889– ). English scholar, best known as a student of medieval literature. Among her well-known books on that period are The Wandering Scholars (1927); Mediaeval Latin Lyrics (1929), translations; and Peter Abelard (1933), a novel.

Her wiles are disconcerted by Toby’s total innocence, and her purpose perplexed because she, like the reader, is uncertain of the severity of the wound in Toby’s thigh. Sterne introduces the Widow by a blank page on which the reader can write his own description.

Wagner, Heinrich Leopold (1747–1779). German poet and dramatist of the Sturm und Drang. His plays include Die Kindsmörderin (The Child-Murderess, 1776), on a theme similar to that treated by Goethe in the figure of Gretchen, and Prometheus, Deukalion und seine Renenzenten (Prometheus, Deukalion and his Reviewers, 1775), a satire directed against Goethe’s critics.

Wagner, Richard (1813–1883). German composer, conductor, and author. His operas (called by him “music dramas”) form the major part of his output and, though his libretts for his operas often fail to reach the heights, the music generally overcomes their deficiencies. In his work, Wagner developed the concept of leitmotiv, an easily recognizable melodic gem associated with a character, situation, or emotion. As a reformer, he did away with the excessive coloratura and frequent artificiality of the prevailing operatic style, much as Gluck had done before him. The subject matter of most of his works is drawn from Nordic and Teutonic mythology or from history. His later works were conceived with a view toward performance at the Festspielhaus (Festival Playhouse), which he founded (1876) at Bayreuth.

His most extensive work is the cycle Der Ring des Nibelungen. His other operas include Tannhäuser (1845), Tristan und Isolde (1865; see Tristan and Isolde), Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg (1868), and the festival drama Parsifal (1882). In his lifetime, Wagner not only became famous for his work, but notorious for his extreme egotism, nationalism, and financial and emotional irresponsibility.

His wife, Cosima Wagner (1837–1930), a daughter of Franz Liszt, was instrumental in securing funds for the establishment of the Bayreuth Festspielhaus. Their son, Siegfried Wagner (1869–1930), was conductor of his father’s works at Bayreuth from 1894 until his death. The composer’s grandson, Wieland Wagner (1917– ), is now the stage director at Bayreuth, and has proved a radical innovator in his simplified manner of staging Wagner’s operas.

Wahabites. A Muslim sect whose object is to bring back the doctrines and observances of Islam to the literal precepts of the Koran. Their name is derived from their founder, Ibn Abdul Wahab (?–1787).

Wahlverwandtschaften, Die (The Elective Affinities, 1809). change partners, as it were. Likewise, in the novel, the marriage of two characters, Eduard and Charlotte, collapses when each of them finds a more suitable partner. Ottilie, Charlotte's young niece, arrives at their estate and Eduard falls immediately and passionately in love with her, while Charlotte's practical, sober nature is attracted to a captain who is also her house guest. Ottilie is the book's central character, and like Mignon in Wilhelm Meister, she is felt to be somehow in tune with mysterious natural forces in a way that others cannot understand. She is magnetically drawn to Eduard, as he is to her, but his passion is impatience is too much for her and she finally rejects him. Ottilie and Eduard both die in the end and are buried together.

Wailing Wall. A wall in Jerusalem where, according to tradition, the orthodox Jews gathered to lament the fall of the Jewish nation. At times the wall, which is near the site of the Temple of Solomon, now the Mosque of Omar, has been the scene of rioting between the Jews and the Muslims.

Waiting for Godot (En Attendant Godot; 1952). A play by Samuel Beckett. It is a tragicomedy about two tramps, in which nothing happens except trivial events and conversations that suggest the meaninglessness of life. The two tramps Vladimir (Didi) and Estragon (Gogo) are continually aware of cold, hunger, and pain as they wait for Godot, who sends a boy to them each day to tell them he will come the next day. The tramps quarrel and contemplate suicide, separation, and departure, but they remain dependent on each other and never do anything. Their condition is reflected in the relationship between Pozzo and Lucky, the only passers-by, whom they at first mistake for Godot. Pozzo is a rich man who cruelly mistreats his servant, Lucky, driving him as if he were an animal. One of the most brilliant passages in the play is Lucky's monologue when he is forced to "think" for his master: it is a satirical and pitiful mixture of Christian, would-be profound and, banal, mechanical thought. Ironically, the pair are dependent on one another as the two tramps are; on their second appearance Lucky, now dumb, is leading Pozzo, who has become blind. The play ends with the tramps still waiting for Godot to come; they wonder whether it is true that one of the thieves who was crucified with Christ was saved, and, if so, which one. Though the play is bleak and despairing, it is also richly humorous, asserting humanity's will to live in spite of everything.

Waiting for Lefty (1935). A play by Clifford Odets. Its subject is a taxi drivers' strike. Using an impressionistic flashback technique, Odets presents the situations of six people involved in the strike. At the climax the news that the popular committee-man Lefty has been murdered rouses the men to decisive action. Waiting for Lefty was one of the best known of the proletarian plays of the 1930's.

Wakefield Cycle. See Towneley Mysteries.

Wakefield Master, the (fl. 1400). Conjectural author of the leading works in the Towneley Cycle (see Towneley Mysteries) of English medieval miracle and mystery plays. He is thought to have been a man of humble birth, though well educated, and probably a secular priest, and is called the Wakefield Master because internal evidence in the plays suggests that they were performed by the local guilds of Wakefield, in southern Yorkshire. The plays attributed to him include Noah, Hero, The Way of the Cross, and the First and Second Shepherd's Play. Because of their humor, the unknown author has been called by some scholars the "first great comic dramatist in English literature."

Wakeman, Frederic (1909—), American novelist. After Shore Leave (1944), Wakeman wrote his best-known novel, The Hucksters (1946), a satirical attack on the advertising industry, based on the author's own experiences as an advertising copywriter. Saxon Charm (1947) depicts a Broadway producer as a scoundrel. Later novels include The Wastrel (1949) and Deluxe Tour (1956).

Walden, or, Life in the Woods (1854). A book by Henry David Thoreau. Convinced that "the mass of men lead lives of quiet desperation," Thoreau lived alone in a cabin at Walden Pond, Concord, from 1845 to 1847. His aim was to "front only the essential facts of life," to emancipate himself from slavery to material possessions. After giving these reasons for his experiment, Thoreau goes on to describe his observations and habits at Walden Pond, where he watched the seasons unfold. He does not encourage everyone to live in the woods, but rather urges that life be simplified so that its meaning may become clear.

Waldensians or Waldenses. Also called the Vaudois. Followers of Peter Waldo of Lyons, who began a reform movement in the Church about 1170. They threw off the authority of the Pope, bishops, and all clergy, appointed lay-preachers (women among them), rejected infant baptism and many other rites, and made themselves so obnoxious to the ecclesiastical powers that they met with considerable persecution. This they survived, and their descendants in doctrine still exist, principally in the Alpine valleys of Dauphiné, Provence, and Piedmont.

Waley, Arthur [David] (1889—). English scholar and translator of Oriental literature. His translations of Chinese and Japanese poetry, originally published in such volumes as 170 Chinese Poems (1917) and Japanese Poems (1919), possess an intrinsic excellence in their own right and have also influenced many modern English and American poets (especially William Butler Yeats and Ezra Pound). He is also known for his equally distinguished translations in prose, including The No Plays of Japan (1921), Baroness Murasaki's novel The TALE OF GENJI, THE PILLOW-BOOK OF SEI SHONAGON, and the Chinese Buddhist tale Monkey (1942), and as the author of a number of books of criticism on Chinese painting and literature.

Walker, James [John] (1881-1946). American politician. Having served in the New York assembly and state senate, "Jimmy" Walker was elected mayor of New York City in 1925 and 1929. He was one of the most popular politicians in the state and became a symbol of the jazz era. As an avocational he wrote lyrics for popular songs, the most famous of which was Will You Love Me in December as You Did in May? (music by Ernest Ball, 1905). He allowed corruption to creep into the city government, was suspected of illegal transactions, and finally resigned in 1932. In 1940 he became an executive in the cloak and suit industry. Gene Fowler wrote an entertaining biography, Beau James (1949).

Wall, The (Le Mur; 1939). A collection of short stories by Jean-Paul Sartre. In the title story the central character awaits death in a Fascist prison during the Spanish civil war. Offered a reprieve if he tells where his leader is hiding, he decides to lie, not out of loyalty, for he has decided that the sacrifice of one man for another is meaningless, but simply to defy his captors. Soon released, he is surprised to learn that his companion had changed his hideout, and has been captured at the spot he had named.

Wallace, Alfred Russel (1823-1913). English naturalist and traveler. His independent formulation of a theory of evolution by natural selection is a most important contribution to science. His paper, On the Tendency of Varieties to Depart Indefinitely from the Original Type, was read before the Linnaean Society the same day as Darwin's paper (July 1, 1858). Among his other writings is a valuable description of a trip to the Amazon, Travels on the Amazon and the Rio Negro (1853).

Wallace, Edgar (1875-1932). English writer of popular fiction. Highly prolific, he wrote more than 150 thrillers, dealing with crime and detection, as well as many scenarios and plays. Among his books are The Four Just Men (1905) and Sanders of the River (1930).

Wallace, Lew[is] (1827-1905). American lawyer, novelist, and soldier. Wallace served in the Union army, in which he rose to the rank of major-general. During his political career, he was governor of New Mexico and Indiana, and minister to Turkey. Interested in Mexico, he published his first novel, The Fair God. With Ben-Hur: A Tale of the Caesars, he achieved great popularity. Other books by Wallace include The Life of Benjamin Harrison (1888), The Boyhood of Christ (1888), and the popular Prince of India (1893).

Wallace was a hero in the struggle against England for Scottish independence and was associated with Robert Bruce. Wallenstein. A trilogy of dramas by Friedrich Schiller, including Wallenstein's Lager (Wallenstein's Camp, 1798), Die Piccolomini (The Piccolomini, 1799), and Wallenstein's Tod (Wallenstein's Death, 1799), based on the fall of the German general Count Albrecht von Wallenstein (1583-1634). In Schiller's version, Wallenstein is tempted by the enormous strength he has built up as the principal general of Emperor Ferdinand II in the Thirty Years' War to entertain the idea of deserting the emperor and establishing his own political power. He never actually intends to commit treason, but the idea intrigues him, and he begins to correspond with the Swedish enemy. Jealous elements in the Viennese court discover this correspondence and use it to induce the emperor to outlaw Wallenstein. Wallenstein flees but is murdered by one of his generals.

Waller, Edmund (1606-1687). English poet. He was known for the smoothness and harmony of his verse, which was highly praised by Dryden. Two of his best-known poems are On a Girdle and Go, Lovely Rose, love lyrics from his Poems (1645). Although Waller was banished from England for participation in a Royalist plot during the Civil War, he later wrote a panegyric on Cromwell and a lament for his death. In the Restoration period he wrote verse praising Charles II.

Walpole, Horace. 4th earl of Orford (1717-1797). English author and historian. His Memoirs, covering the years 1746 to 1791, are among the most important and accurate sources of the period. Selections were published in 1822 and 1846. His Anecdotes of Painting in England (1762-1771) is the earliest attempt at a history of art in English; his estate at Strawberry Hill in Twickenham, Surrey, in the process of rebuilding and remodeling (1754-1794) set a taste for refined Gothic architecture and gardening in England. He is best remembered for his encyclopedic Correspondence—noted, not only for the superb style of the letters, but also for the wide range of its matter—and for The Castle of Otranto, reputedly the earliest English Gothic novel. His other major works include a Catalogue of Engravings in England (1763); Historic Doubts on Richard III (1768); and A Letter from XoHo, Chinese Philosopher at London to his Friend Leon Chi at Peking (1757), an essay which influenced Oliver Goldsmith's Citizen of the World. Although he was the son of Sir Robert Walpole and served as a member of Parliament (1741-1767), Walpole himself took little interest in politics. His life was dedicated to literature and art, as a writer, a collector, and as the founder of Strawberry Hill Press which he opened in 1757. His great contribution was a minute hi-tory of himself, his friends, and his contemporaries. Leslie Stephen has said "The history of England throughout a very large segment of the eighteenth century is simply a synonym for the works of Horace Walpole." See MYSTERIOUS MOTHER, The; SERENDIPITY.

Walpole, Sir Hugh [Seymour] (1884-1941). New Zealand-born English novelist. A prolific author, Walpole wrote short stories, criticism, miscellaneous essays, travel books, and plays, but he is best known for his many popular novels. They encompass a wide range of subjects and styles, perhaps the most distinguished being MR. PERKIN AND MR. BRAIL, a remarkable study of morbid psychology. His other novels include The Wooden Horse (1909); MARABICK AT FORTY (1910); FORTITUDE (1913), the story of a young man and his development as a writer; The Dark Forest (1916); The Secret City (1919); JEREMY; The Cathedral (1922), concerning the clergy's lives and politics in an English cathedral town; PORTRAIT OF A MAN WITH RED HAIR; and the tetralogy that form THE HERIES CHRONICLE. His epistolary novel Farting Hall (1929) was written with J. B. Priestley. The character of Kears in Somersett Maugham's CACKLES AND ALE is said to have been a satirical portrait of Walpole.

Walpole, Sir Robert. Ist earl of Orford (1676-1745). English statesman. A leader of the Whig party in England, secretary of war (1708-1710), treasurer of the navy (1710-1711), he was twice prime minister and chancellor of the exchequer. He restored credit after the SOUTH SEA BUBBLE and abolished the war taxes. He stood for peace between France, England, and Spain, an expert in finance and especially commerce, he laid the basis for free trade in England. His ministry fell in 1742 because of his mismanagement of the war with Spain and also because of generally corrupt methods, particularly in rigged elections. He was the father of Horace Walpole.

Walpurgis Night or Walpurgisnacht. In German tradition, a witches' Sabbath held on the Brocken, highest peak of the Harz Mountains, the night preceding May 1. The name comes from St. Walpurga (c. 710-c. 777), an English missionary nun who aided St. Boniface in Germany. Although she was actually believed to be a protectress against magic, her May 1 feast day became associated with the pagan traditions earlier assigned to that day. According to these, May 1 marked the official beginning of the agricultural season for men, so the witches held rendezvous with the devil the night before to celebrate the beginning of their own increase in activity.

In Part I of his Faust, Goethe uses the witches' festival as the background for a scene that shows at length the chaotic, magical realm in which Mephistopheles is at home. In Part II, as a parallel to this scene, there is a classical Walpurgis-night set in Greece, where Faust searches for Helen of Troy. In Thomas Mann's THE MAGIC MOUNTAIN, the chapter dealing with the Shrovetide festival is also entitled "Walpurgis-Night"; by using this title, Mann stresses the similarity of his character to both Goethe's scene and the popular legend.

Walsingham, Sir Francis (1530?-1590). English statesman. Walsingham was made secretary of state by Elizabeth in 1573 and, with Lord Burghley, he shared most of the administrative responsibilities of the government. Described as "exceeding wise and industrious," he persistently urged resistance to Spain in the Netherlands, and was alert to Catholic plots against Elizabeth in England. His spies discovered the BABINGTON CONSPIRACY before it could strike, and with its downfall came evidence of treason against MAXY, QUEEN OF SCOTS. Walsingham urged Elizabeth to overcome her scruples and sign Mary's death warrant in order to put an end to the threat of Catholic uprisings to put Mary on the throne. He also learned in advance of the preparation of the Spanish Armada, and kept England posted as to its progress.

Walpurgis Night (Vespernacht). German national song, Deutschland, Deutschland über alles, is an adaptation of one of his lyrics of patriotism and friendship. He appears as a contestant in the singing torquey in Wagner's opera TANNHAUSER.

Walton, Izak (1599-1683). English writer, best known for his The Compleat Angler, a discourse on the quiet pleasures of fishing. Walton followed the trade of ironmonger, and in his youth became a close friend of John Donne and Ben Jonson. In his later years he spent much of his time at his beloved avocation, fishing, and in the company of various eminent clergymen, such as the bishop of Winchester, to whom his sweet and pious nature endeared him. Besides The Compleat Angler, Walton wrote biographies, usually called Walton's Lives, of such literary figures of his day as Donne (1640), Sir Henry Wotton (1651), Richard Hooker (1657), George Herbert (1670), and Bishop Robert Sanderson (1678). All his prose work is distinguished by great simplicity and grace of style, earnestness, and humor.

Walton, William [Turner] (1902– ). English composer. He wrote Façade, the opera Troilus and Cressida (1954), the oratorio Belshazzar’s Feast (1931) and many other works.

Wanderer, The (8th century?). Old English poem of over 100 lines in alliterative verse. It is the poignant dramatic monologue of a warrior, now homeless and kinless, who laments the passing of his former glories and companions, singing an elegy of the times gone by.

Wandering Island. See Faerie Queene, The.

Wandering Jew, The. A legendary Jew condemned to wander the world until Christ’s second coming. Although there are numerous variants of the story, the Jew is always said to have urged Christ to go faster in carrying the cross to Calvary, cruelly refusing him a moment’s rest; and Christ’s reply is that he goes, “but thou shalt tarry till I come.” The Jew thereafter is periodically rejuvenated to the age of 30. His character changes, however; he is now extremely wise, and in his repentance he uses the time of his wandering to exhort other men to be mindful of their sins and avoid the wrath of God.

The story was very popular in medieval Europe, and there are numerous accounts of people having actually seen the Wandering Jew from the 13th to the 18th century. In Latin versions he is called Johannes Buttradeus (John the God-Smiter), with variant translations in the Romance languages, except Spanish and Portuguese, where his names mean John Hope-in-God. In German legend he is called Ahasuerus, and his wanderings often become symbolic of the wanderings of the Jewish people, doomed because of their rejection of Christ. In an early English version he is called Cartaphilus (Kartaphilos), and a later Italian one identifies him with the 16th-century Venetian Jew Salathiel ben Sadi. Some legends connect him with the Wild Huntsman.

The figure of the Wandering Jew has appeared frequently in more recent literature, such as Der ewige Jude (1774), a fragmentary poetic epic by Goethe; The Undying One (1830), a Byronic poem by Caroline Norton; Ahasuerus (1833), a dramatic prose epic by Edgar Quinet (1803–1875) in which the Jew symbolizes humanity’s progress through the ages; and the novels Salathiel (1829, retitled Tarry Thou Till I Come, 1900), by George Croly (1780–1860); The Wandering Jew (Le Juif errant, 1845), by Eugène Sue; Prince of India (1893), by Lew Wallace.

Wang Yang-ming or Wang Shou-jen (1472–1529). Chinese Ming Dynasty philosopher, statesman and scholar. His school advocated a doctrine of intuitive knowledge through which self-perfection might be achieved. It opposed the elaborate investigation of the philosophy of past sages and of external things advocated by Chu Hsi’s Neo-Confucianism.

Wang Yang-ming, although anti-Buddhist, was considerably influenced by Ch’ an thought.

War and Peace (Voina i mir; 1864–1869). A novel by Count Leo Tolstoi. Regarded as the author’s masterwork, the story covers roughly the years between 1805 and 1820, centering around the invasion of Russia by Napoleon’s army in 1812 and the Russian resistance to the invader. Over 500 characters, all completely and individually rendered, throng the pages of the novel. Every social level, from Napoleon himself to the peasant Platon Karataev, is represented. Interwoven with the story of the war are narrations of the lives of several main characters, especially those of Natasha Rostova, Prince Andrei Bolkonski, and Pierre Bezukhov. These people are shown as they progress from youthful uncertainties and searchings toward more mature understanding of life. Natasha exemplifies the instinctual approach to life that Tolstoi was later to preach as the way to true happiness. She is one of the most successfully created characters in the book and perhaps ranks as Tolstoi’s greatest achievement in character creation. Everything from her girlish excitement at her first ball through her experiences of first love and her final role as wife and mother are depicted with perfect skill. The two main male characters, Prince Andrei Bolkonski and Pierre Bezukhov, represent contrasting approaches to life. Prince Andrei’s struggles to find the meaning of life through his intellect end in the belated triumph of his calm acceptance of death as a natural and necessary end to life. Pierre, on the other hand, manages to find a sort of peace in living, chiefly with the aid of the simple wisdom preached to him by the peasant Karataev. This wisdom, which was a large part of Tolstoi’s later philosophy, was that life should be experienced emotionally and accepted naturally, rather than twisted into artificial forms by man’s imperfect intellect. Prince Andrei and Pierre have one other thing in common, besides their searchings. Both are romantically connected with Natasha. Prince Andrei is engaged to her, then loses her to the rake Anatol Kuragin. He is reunited with her shortly before his death. After the war is over, Natasha becomes Pierre’s wife.

While some writers have criticized the inclusion of the disparate themes of the historical, social, and personal in the novel, the book actually gains in its lifelike effect because of the mixture. The alternations of chapters describing the personal lives of the characters with those depicting battles and dealing with Tolstoi’s philosophy of history are well-handled and carefully planned. The monumental size of War and Peace, its hundreds of characters, the variety of its action and scenes combine to make it an accurate portrait of the entire Russian nation. But far from being a static tableau, it has a vibrant animation and conveys the movement of people and history.

War Between the States. See American Civil War.

Warburton, Eliot [Bartholomew Elliott George] (1810–1852). Irish writer and traveler. His best-known work, The Crescent and the Cross (1844) recalls his travels in Syria and Palestine. He also wrote historical novels such as Memoirs of Prince Rupert and the Cavaliers (1840) and Darien (1852).
Warburton, William (1698–1779). English theologian and bishop of Gloucester. He thought of himself as dominating Christian apologetics and literary scholarship of his own time. He was a friend of Alexander Pope and instrumental in persuading Pope to add a fourth book to his Dunciad. He was also Pope's literary executor (1744) and brought out the first complete edition of his work (1751). His edition of Shakespeare (1747) was severely criticized for want of literary judgment. He was defeated in a litigation by the President of Robert Lowth (1765) who attacked his arrogance and lack of scholarship.

Ward, Artemus. Pen name of Charles Farrar Browne (1834–1867). American humorist, newspaperman, editor, and lecturer. After working for several New England newspapers, Browne moved to Ohio, where he contributed his first Artemus Ward letters to the Cleveland Plain Dealer in 1858. Ward, a shrewd and supposedly illiterate showman, wrote in Yankee dialect of adventures and misadventures with his traveling museum of wax figures (also a few “snarks and other critters”). The letters brought Browne a wide reputation, and he was made city editor of the Plain Dealer. After difficulties with the manager, he resigned in 1860; by that time, his character was so well known that he became merged with his creator. From Cleveland, Ward (better known than Browne) went to New York, where he wrote for Vanity Fair. Among the sketches he contributed was a fictitious interview with Lincoln that delighted the President. At this time, Ward published his first collection, Artemus Ward, His Book (1862), which sold 40,000 copies in a short time.

Ward's first lecture, Babes in the Woods, was a great success when it was delivered in 1861. A master of the dead-pan expression and the sudden pause, he amused his audience by the incongruity of his remarks. In the course of his travels, Ward met Mark Twain in Virginia City, Nev. In 1866 he departed for England, where he was made an editor of Punch, and later died of tuberculosis. He published only one more volume in his lifetime, Artemus Ward, His Travels (1865). Posthumously appeared Artemus Ward in London (1869), Artemus Ward’s Lectures (1869), and Artemus Ward: His Works Complete (1873, 1890, 1910). Ward's most familiar techniques include caricography, or humorous mis-spellings, and what he himself called “in grammatics.” He loved puns and plays on words, burlesque and anticlimax, and pure absurdity. He exerted an important influence on Mark Twain and other American humorists.

Ward, Edward (1667–1731). English satirist and pub-keeper. His satirical travel pamphlets include Trip to Jamaica (1698), a vivid picture of a transatlantic crossing with an uncomplimentary account of the island of Jamaica, and Trip to New England (1699), containing a caustic commentary on the Boston blue laws. Ward is also the author of The London Spy (1698–1700), a monthly periodical describing “low-life,” written in slang. It is a precursor of the Tatler and Spectator papers.

Ward, Mrs. Humphry. Born Mary Augustus Arnold (1851–1920). English novelist, granddaugh- ter of Thomas Arnold. She wrote popular novels and was inclined toward philanthropy, social work, and religious polemics. Her more memorable works include Robert Elsmere, The History of David Grieve (1892), Marcellus (1894) and its sequel Sir George Tressady (1899), and The Marriage of William Ashe.

Ward, Nathaniel (1578–1652). New England Puritan clergyman, born in England but forced to leave during the period of Puritan persecution. He is known for two works: The Body of Liberties, a code of laws for Massachusetts in the preparation of which Ward figured most prominently, and The Simple Cobbler of Aggawam in America, written under the pseudonym Theodore de la Guard. Ward returned to England about 1647.

Wardle, Mr. In Charles Dickens' Pickwick Papers, an amiable old country gentleman, who attends some of the meetings of The Pickwick Club, and feels a liking for Mr. Pickwick and his three friends.

Miss Isabella Wardle. Daughter of Mr. Wardle. She marries Augustus Snodgrass.

Miss Emily Wardle. Daughter of Mr. Wardle. She marries Mr. Trundle.

Ward No. 6 (Palata nomer shest); 1892). A long story by Anton Chekhov. It depicts the gradual disintegration of Dr. Andrei Yefimitch Ragin, the head of a mental hospital. Neglecting the miserable condition of the patients, he withdraws more and more into private study, thought, and alcohol. He finally reaches the point where he is unable to communicate with anyone except one of the inmates, Ivan Dmitrih Gromov, with whom he holds long talks on philosophical subjects. Ragin's unscrupulous assistant uses the doctor's eccentric behavior as a pretext for committing him to the hospital, where Ragin experiences the maltreatment he has allowed the patients to undergo for so many years. The realization of his part in the horror in which the patients live comes upon him just before his death.

Waren, Mme Louise Éléonore de (1700–1762). The first benefactress, mistress, and chère maman of Jean-Jacques Rousseau, whom she took under her protection and installed as her companion at her farm Les Charmettes near Chambery in the early years of his career (1729–1740).

Warfield, David (1866–1951). American actor. He is known for his starring roles in various productions by David Belasco. The Auctioneer (1901) was his first success, but he achieved even more fame in The Return of Peter Grimm (1911).

War hawks. In U.S. history, an epithet applied to Democratic Congressmen, mainly from the South and West, who demanded war with Great Britain after 1810. Among them were John C. Calhoun, Henry Clay, Langdon Cheves of South Carolina, and Felix Grundy of Tennessee. Southern war hawks hoped to obtain Florida from Spain, Great Britain's ally, while those from the Northwest wanted to end British influence in the area and acquire Canada in the process.

War Is Kind (1899). A volume of poems by Stephen Crane. His second volume of verse, it contains epigrammatic parables similar to those in the earlier Black Riders but has a more pronounced vein of cynicism. The title poem, Do not weep, maiden, for war is kind, often considered one of Crane’s best, is a good illustration of the dramatic irony that Crane used so successfully in both his poetry and prose.

warming-pan. Nickname of the Jacobites. It was said that Mary of Modena, the wife of James II, never had a living child, but that on one occasion a child, introduced to her bedroom in a warming-pan, was substituted for her dead infant. This “warming-pan child” was the Old PRETENDER.

Warner, Charles Dudley (1829–1900). American essayist, editor, and novelist. Warner is remembered today chiefly for his collaboration with Mark Twain on The Gilded Age. In his own right, he edited the Hartford Evening Post (1861) and the Courant (1867); as editor of the American Men of Letters Series, he published biographies of Washington Irving and Captain John Smith. Warner’s book of essays, My Garden in a Garden (1871), was praised as a worthy successor to Irving’s sketches; his later volumes include Backlog Studies (1873), Baddeck (1874), and Being a Boy (1878). His trilogy of novels, A Little Journey in the World (1889), The Golden House (1895), and That Fortune (1899), satirized the era to which The Gilded Age had given a popular name. Warner also wrote travel books and literary criticism, and edited, with others, a multivolume Library of the World’s Best Literature. Succeeding William Dean Howells in the “Editor’s Study” of Harper’s (1892), he was president of the American Social Science Association and the National Institute of Arts and Letters.

Warner, Rex (1905– ). English novelist, poet, translator, and critic. The Professor and The Aerodrome, his two best-known novels, are fantastic social and political allegories in the style of Franz Kafka. Among his other works are Poems (1937), the novels The Wild Goose Chase (1937) and Why Was I Killed? (1943), and the three biographical novels The Young Caesar (1958), Imperial Caesar (1960), and Pericles the Athenian (1963).

War of 1812. A war between Great Britain and the U.S., sometimes called the second American war for independence. The conflict was caused mainly by British violations of American neutral rights during the Napoleonic wars, though the desire of some Americans for territorial expansion, especially in Canada, was also a factor. (See WAR HAWK.) Although the U.S. won several naval engagements, attempts to take Canada failed, and the British burned Washington in 1814. The treaty of Ghent (Dec. 24, 1814) restored peace but said nothing about the issues that had caused the war. Andrew Jackson’s defeat of the British at New Orleans, the greatest U.S. land victory of the war, occurred two weeks after the signing of the peace treaty. See James MADISON; James LAWRENCE; Oliver Hazard FERRY; CONSTITUTION; HARTFORD CONVENTION; and STAR SPANGLED BANNER, THE.

War of the Gods. A Babylonian epic poem. A myth of the creation of the world and the establishment of the divine hierarchy, it formed a part of the New Year festival, in which it may have been acted out. It is known as the Enuma elish, from its first words. The first gods were Apsu and his wife Tiamat, personifications respectively of the fresh and salt waters. From their union sprang two obscure gods of the deep, Lahmu and Lahamu, who, in turn, gave birth to Anshar and Kishar. They were the parents of Anu, the sky. Anu was the father of Ea, the god of wisdom. After his birth a multitude of other gods came into being, but they were such a rowdy lot that Apsu, against Tiamat’s advice, determined to destroy them all. Ea, however, drugged Apsu and his dwarfish counselor Munmu, killed Apsu, and imprisoned the dwarf. Tiamat promptly took the god Kingu for her consort.

Ea now married Damkina, who bore him Marduk, the storm-god. A mighty prince, he was given to such pranks as putting the winds on a leash. Many of the gods grew resentful, and asked the primal mother, Tiamat, to destroy him. She created a variety of hideous monsters and, placing Kingu at the head of her forces, prepared to make war on the principal gods, who supported Marduk. Ea and Anu were both quickly routed, but Anshar sent Marduk to fight Tiamat. Arming himself with bow and arrows, a bludgeon of thunder, and a flail of lightning, the young storm-god marched against the ancient goddess. After a terrible battle, he destroyed her and imprisoned her monsters in the depths of the earth. Splitting Tiamat’s body into two pieces, he formed the firmament of one half, the foundations of the earth out of the other. He then determined the spheres of the chief gods: Anu was to rule the area above the firmament; Enil, that between firmament and earth; Ea, the waters below the earth. In order to find someone to serve the gods, he finally created a puppet, man, out of the blood and bones of Kingu, who was killed for the purpose. In gratitude, the gods built the city of Babylon, which was crowned by a great shrine for Marduk.

This story, one of the oldest known creation myths, bears striking parallels to Greek myth, in which the primal father (Uranus) is destroyed by a descendant (Zeus), and later the young storm-god (Zeus) defeats various monsters spawned by the primal mother (Gaea) and imprisons them in the earth. Marduk’s killing of Tiamat has its counterpart in Baal’s killing of Yam, the dragon of the sea, in the Canaanite Poems of Baal.

War of the Theaters. A feud involving several Elizabethan playwrights. A personal quarrel between Ben Jonson on the one hand, and John Marston and Thomas Dekker on the other, was carried into the theaters when Jonson wrote Cynthia’s Revels for the Children of the Revels at the Blackfriars Theatre. A little later he attacked Marston (who had apparently answered him with a play of unknown name produced by Paul’s Boys) in the Poetaster. Thomas Dekker then attacked Jonson in Satiromatix, played by the Chamberlain’s Men. The war of satire was popular with the public for two or three years, but quickly died out. It is referred to in Hamlet by the Player King.

Warren, Earl (1891– ). American public official and jurist. After serving as district attorney of Alameda County in California and as state attorney-general, Warren was governor from 1943 to 1953. He was the Republican vice-presidential candidate in 1948 and was appointed chief justice of the U.S. Supreme Court in 1953. In the case of Brown v. Topeka Board of Education (1954), he presented a sociological argument that struck down the separate-but-equal doctrine which had been used to defend school segregation, maintaining that "separate educational facilities are inherently unequal."

Warren, Mercy [Otis] (1728–1814). American writer. A friend of the best-known public figures of her time, including John and Samuel Adams and Thomas Jefferson, she devoted her literary talents to the service of the American Republic. Her works include The Adulterer (1773) and The Group (1775), two satirical dramas criticizing British rule in America; Poems Dramatic and Miscellaneous (1790); and a History of the Rise, Progress, and Termination of the American Revolution (1805).

Warren, Robert Penn (1905– ). American poet and novelist. Warren was early identified with the Southern Fugitives and Agrarians and has been identified with the New Criticism in literature. He wrote John Brown, The Making of a Martyr (1929), an unsympathetic account of the emancipator, contributed to I'll Take My Stand (1930), and helped found and edit The Southern Review (1935–1942). Concerned with the regional interests of the South, Warren edited with Albert Erskine two anthologies: A Southern Harvest (1937) and A New Southern Harvest (1957).

Warren's early reputation was made with his poetry. Among his collections are Thirty-Six Poems (1935), Eleven Poems on the Same Theme (1942), Selected Poems, 1923–1943 (1944), and Brother to Dragons (1953), a dramatic narrative in verse. While his poetry is noted for its vivid metaphor and brilliant descriptions, his novels have won him a far wider audience, beginning with Night Rider (1939), a story of the Kentucky Tobacco War. At Heaven's Gate (1943) was suggested by the career of Luke Lea, a corrupt Tennessee businessman and politician, but his two best-known novels are All the King's Men and World Enough and Time. Circus in the Attic (1948) is a collection of two novelettes and twelve short stories. Among his other fiction are Band of Angels (1955), A tale of miscegenation in the Civil War era; The Cave (1959), a philosophical novel; and Wilderness (1961), a historical novel of the Civil War period.

Warren is equally distinguished as a critic. With Cleanth Brooks he published Understanding Poetry (1938), one of the most popular of college textbooks. His essays have been widely published in literary journals, and his Selected Essays appeared in 1958.

Warrior Queen. See Boadicea.

Wars of the Roses (1455–1485). A series of encounters between members of the house of York and the house of Lancaster for possession of the English throne. The Wars take their name from the roses, white for York and red for Lancaster, that were the emblems of the opposing factions. The parties were united after the Lancastrian Henry Tudor, earl of Richmond, defeated the Yorkist Richard III at the Battle of Bosworth (1485); Henry was proclaimed king (Henry VII) and married Elizabeth of York, the eldest daughter of Edward IV.

Wartburg. A castle near Eisenach in Germany. Landgrave Herman of Thuringia (d. 1217) welcomed wandering entertainers at his court there, and according to legend sponsored a Sängerkrieg, or minstrels' contest, in 1207 between Waltier von der Vogelweide, Wolfram von Eschenbach, Heinrich von Ofterdingen, and other illustrious Minnesingers. This merged with another legend in which Klingner, helped by the Devil, competes with Wolfram von Eschenbach, victoriously representing Christendom. These traditions, popularized in the poem Der Wartburgkrieg (The Battle of Wartburg, 13th century), were used by Wagner for the singing contest in his opera Tannhäuser.

Warton, Thomas (1728–1790). English literary historian, critic, and poet laureate (from 1785), son of Thomas Warton (c. 1688–1745), noted poet and teacher. His History of English Poetry (1774–1781) extends to the end of the Elizabethan age. It is the first history of English literature which still merits our attention. Like Richard Hurd, Warton regretted the loss of the medieval imaginative world. We have parted with extravagancies that are above propriety, with incredibilities that are more acceptable than truth, and with fictions that are more valuable than reality.

This sentiment is reflected in his poetry as early as the Pleasures of Melancholy (1747).

Washington, Booker T[aliaferro] (1856–1915). American Negro educator. Born in Virginia of a Negro slave and a white man, he educated himself first at night school and then by working his way through Hampton Normal and Agricultural Institute (1872–1875). After some years of teaching, he returned to Hampton to teach Indian students. He established a night school for the needy, and was chosen to found Tuskegee Institute (1881). He organized the National Negro Business League in Boston (1901), before which he gave many important speeches. Washington wrote many books, the best known of which are Up from Slavery (1901) and The Story of the Negro (1909). In 1946, a bust and tablet in his honor were unveiled at the Hall of Fame in New York City.

Washington, George (1732–1799). First president of the U.S. (1789–1797), known as "the father of his country." Washington had little formal education, but early showed an aptitude for mathematics, and by the time he was 15 was a skilled surveyor. From 1753 to 1759 he was an officer in the French and Indian War. He was elected to the Virginia House of Burgesses in 1758 and successively reelected until the house was dissolved by the colonial governor in 1774. During the decade before the Ameri-
Waste Land, The

American Revolution, he became progressively more dissatisfied with British rule, particularly with the commercial regulations that required him and other Virginia planters to trade exclusively with Britain under conditions which he felt to be unfair to the colonists.

Washington was one of Virginia's delegates to the first and second Continental Congresses in 1774 and 1775, and was elected commander of the Continental Army in June, 1775. He was faced with the problem of directing an untrained and inexperienced army, composed primarily of militiamen whose terms of enlistment were short; his task was further complicated by a lack of supplies and the hesitancy on the part of Congress to establish the long-term enlistments necessary for a permanent army. In spite of his handicaps his leadership and success in the field were remarkable, and he won brilliant victories at Trenton and Princeton, N.J. (1776-1777) and at Yorktown (1781).

Having retired to his estate at Mount Vernon after the war, he returned to public life to preside at the Constitutional Convention in 1787. In 1789 he was unanimously elected president. During his administration he followed Hamilton's financial program, observed neutrality in the European wars, and crushed the Whiskey Rebellion, firmly establishing the authority of the new government. He declined a third term and prepared, with the help of several friends, his famous Farewell Address.

Numerous myths later grew up around the figure of Washington. The most famous of these was created by Mason Locke Weems whose biography of Washington (1800) contained the story that as a child Washington admitted having cut down a cherry tree because he could not tell a lie and was immediately forgiven by his astonished father. Another widely repeated story showed Washington throwing stones (some claimed silver dollars) across the Rappahannock River.

Some of the works of fiction in which Washington appears directly or indirectly are H. Brackenridge's Modern Chivalry (1792-1815), Charles Brockden Brown's Ormond (1799), Cooper's The Spy (1821), J. K. Paulding's The Old Continental (1846), S. Weir Mitchell's Hugh Wynne, Free Quaker (1897), Paul Leister Ford's Janice Meredith (1899), Joseph Hergesheimer's Balisaid (1924), and Kenneth Roberts' Oliver Wiswell (1940). Two 20th-century dramas dealing with Washington are Maxwell Anderson's Valley Forge (1934) and Sidney Kingsley's The Patriots (1945). See CONWAY CABAL; Henry Lee.

Washington Square (1881). A novel by Henry James. As a boy, James had lived on Washington Square in New York City, at that time a fashionable residential district. The novel concerns Catherine Sloper, the shy daughter of wealthy, urbane, sardonic Dr. Austin Sloper. When young Morris Townsend, who is courting Catherine for her money, learns that her father will disinherit her if she marries him, he leaves her. Townsend renounces his courtship after the daughter's death, but is rejected by Catherine, who lives on at Washington Square, an old maid. She has achieved her own kind of self-realization, freeing herself from the two men who had victimized her. The theme of the young, defenseless person trying to escape from the tyranny of an older, often more knowledgeable adult, became a favorite theme for James.

Wasp, The (Sphækers, 422 B.C.). A comedy by Aristophanes. The Wasp is an attack on Aristophanes' favorite but, the Athenian demagogue Cleon, who had recently initiated the practice of paying citizens for jury duty. Philocleon (Cleon-lover), a foolish old man, suffers from an inordinate passion for jury duty. He resorts to all manner of ruses to escape from his house, where his sensible son Bdelocleon (Cleon-hater) is trying to keep him confined for his own good. Finally, the young man persuades his father to hold trials at home. In the first, a dog is tried for stealing cheese in a hilarious parody of legal proceedings. In spite of all his son's efforts, Philocleon remains unregenerate to the last.

Wassermann, August Paul von (1856-1925). German bacteriologist, known for his discovery in 1906 of a diagnostic test for syphilis.

Wassermann, Jakob (1873-1934). German novelist of international popularity. His writings, in their psychological realism, show the influence of Dostoevski. Among his novels are Die Juden von Zirndorf (The Jews of Zirndorf, 1897), Caspar Hauser oder Die Tragödie des Herzens (Caspar Hauser, or Suggishness of the Heart, 1908) and Der Fall Maurizius (The Case of Maurizius, 1928). See Caspar Hauser.

Waste Land, The (1922). A long poem by T. S. Eliot. Completely breaking from conventional modes of poetic expression in its condensed use of language, its wealth of literary and historical references, and its lack of narrative sequence, the poem occasioned a violent literary controversy on publication and has been the subject of an endless amount of critical explication ever since. In five sections it explores the different psychic stages of a soul in despair struggling for redemption. The waste land, throughout the poem a central image of spiritual drought, is contrasted with sources of regeneration relied upon in the past, such as fertility rituals and Christian and Eastern religious practices. The dominant imagery in the poem is drawn from Jessie L. Weston's From Ritual to Romance, a study of some of the themes of medieval romances and legends, such as the Grail story, which probably originated in ancient fertility religions. In medieval legend, the waste land and its ruler, the Fisher King, rendered sterile by a curse, were cured by a knight who underwent purifying ordeals. But doubt remains the burden of Eliot's poem, and there is no resolution at the end, when, in a decaying twilight world, the poet shoves up his ruins with literary and religious fragments. Each one echoes a hope of rebirth, but they are in a medley of foreign languages, suggesting that they are nothing more than unassimilated memories.

The publication of The Waste Land was an important event in the development of modern English poetry. The technique of the poem was as radically new as that of Ulysses, and is in some ways similar. Both contrast the spiritual stagnation of the present with the myths of the past and use the city as a major symbol of paralysis; both are full of scenes, phrases, and references that have little meaning in themselves but echo and explain one another; and both depend upon the reader's knowledge of many works of literature, of various religions, and of history.

Following Ezra Pound's suggestion, Eliot reduced The Waste Land to about half its original length. The first version has disappeared.

Watch on the Rhine (1941). A play by Lillian Hellman. A German refugee in the U.S., whom Nazi agents want to intercept, is recognized by a hanger-on at the German embassy. The refugee kills the informer, and in so doing helps to awaken the American conscience to the danger of tyranny.

Water Babies, The, A Fairy Tale for a Land-Baby (1863). A fantasy by Charles Kingsley, concerning the adventures of little Tom the chimney-sweep who falls into a river and is transformed into a kind of miniature merman.

Waterloo, battle of (June 18, 1815). A decisive victory gained near Waterloo (a village south of Brussels) by the Allies over Napoleon Bonaparte. The French numbered about 72,000; the combined forces of the British, the Dutch, and the Germans, under Arthur Wellesley, duke of Wellington, numbered about 67,000; the Prussians, under Gebhard Leberecht von Blücher, made an additional 50,000. The Allies lost about 22,000 and the French about 37,000. Waterloo marks the end of the Hundred Days, which commenced with Napoleon's escape from Elba; his seizure of power ended, however, in a second and lasting abdication on June 22, 1815.

The triumph of the "Iron Duke" over the "Man of Destiny" made Waterloo one of the most famous phrases of the period—second only to the name Bonaparte. Today it has come to mean failure and tragedy, crossing defeat. More than a battle, Waterloo marks the end of almost 20-years of European war, of the Napoleonic dreams of glory, of the spirit best captured in the novels of Stendhal—the 19th-century had at last begun.

Watkins, Vernon (1906– ). English poet. Born in Wales, he is known for his musical, mystical and visionary verse. Among his volumes of poetry are The Ballad of the Mari Lwyd (1941) and Cypres and Acacia (1959).

Watson, Thomas (1557?–1592). English poet, translator, and scholar. His best-known work is the Passionate Century of Love (1582), a hundred eighteen-line "sonnets" and classical and contemporary Continental poets. He also wrote a Latin version of Tasso's Aminta (1585).

Watteau, Antoine (1684–1721). French painter. He is known for his charming pictures of small fêtes champêtres, or informal and fashionable gatherings in imaginary parks. His art is one of refinement and sensitivity; it is captivating because of the delicacy of its color; the harmony; and the purity of its landscapes. His numerous drawings are spirited and accurate as well as elegant. His work was emulated by the rococo painters and decorators of the 18th century.

Watts, Isaac (1674–1748). English nonconformist theologian, hymn writer, author, and pastor. He is best known for his sacred poems, Horae Lyricae (1706), Psalms of David (1719), and Divine and Moral Songs for Children (1720). He also wrote theological and philosophical works. He revolutionized the Protestant hymn and many of his hymns are still sung today. He is the author of the famous lines, "How doth the little busy bee," from one of his instructive poems for children.

Watts-Dunton, [Walter] Theodore (1832–1914). English critic and man of letters. Swinburne spent with him the later years of his life at Putney. He was well regarded as a critic in his day and left valuable memoirs, Old Familiar Faces (1916).

Wat Tyler. See Tyler's Rebellion.

Waugh, Evelyn (1903– ). English novelist. His earliest and most famous novels are biting satires of the world of fashionable London society and the young intellectuals of the 1920's—the world also satirized in the early novels of Aldous Huxley. They are farcical comedies with undertones of violence, cruelty, and bitterness. Novels of this type are Decline and Fall, Vile Bodies (1930), Black Mischief, A Handful of Dust, Scoop (1938) which satirized newspapers and radio, and The Loved One. Waugh was converted to Roman Catholicism in 1930, and many of his later novels have as heroes Catholics of the gentlemanly type he formerly satirized. His satirical war novels are Put Out More Flags (1942) and the trilogy consisting of Men at Arms (1952), Officers and Gentlemen (1954), and Unconditional Surrender (1961; U.S. title, The End of the Battle), whose central character is Guy Crouchback. Brideshead Revisited, one of his best-known novels, has a strong Catholic background. Helena (1950) is a fictionalized biography of St. Helena, the mother of Constantine. Other books are Tactical Exercise (1957), a collection of short stories; The Ordeal of Gilbert Pinfold (1957), a self-portrait and an account of a hallucination; travel books with a rather aristocratic, imperialistic flavor; and critical works and biographies.

Waverley (1814). The first of Sir Walter Scott's historical novels, which established him as the foremost romantic novelist. The chief characters are Prince Charles Edward, the Young Pretender; the noble old baron of Bradwardine; and Captain Edward Waverley, the hero. Waverley is at first a captain in the royal army, but is cashiered for suspected Jacobite leanings. He then espouses the cause of the Pretender and joins his service. At the battle of Prestonpans he saves the life of the Englishman Colonel Talbot. When the Pretender's cause collapses, the colonel, out of gratitude, obtains a pardon for young Waverley, who then marries Rose Bradwardine and quietly settles down in the family seat at Waverley Honor.

Waverley Novels, the. A series of 32 novels and tales by Sir Walter Scott. The first novel of the series, Waverley, gave the series its name. The novels were published anonymously "by the author of Waverley" who came to be known as the Great Unknown. Originally, Scott published them anonymously because he feared that novel writing was beneath his dignity as a clerk of court; he discovered that his anonymity increased sales and kept it up until 1825, when his identity, by then generally known, was disclosed.

Wayles, The (1931). A novel by Virginia Woolf. Highly original, unconventional, and poetic, it describes the characters, lives, and relationships of six persons living in England. The book is composed of interior monologues (see STREAM OF CONSCIOUSNESS), spoken by the six characters in rotation, and of interludes describing the ascent and descent of the sun, the rise and fall of the waves, and the passing of the seasons. These natural cycles symbolize the progress of time, which carries the individual from birth to death.

As children, the six live in the same house by the seashore, and take lessons from the same governess. Their early experiences influence their developing personalities and remain valuable memories for the rest of their lives. They have two reunions: one with Percival in a restaurant, and one, in middle age, at Hampton Court. The characters’ life stories are revealed only incidentally, but their monologues throw brilliant, subtle light on their various personalities.

The three men are various types of the artist: Bernard is a life-loving storyteller; Neville is a meticulous perfectionist; and Louis, an Australian with an inferiority complex, is vain, driving, and nourished by tradition. The women, too, differ widely in character: Susan is domestic and maternal—she loves Bernard, but marries someone else; Jinnie is a flirtatious society beauty and, like Neville, who loves only Percival, does not marry. Rhoda, timid and mystical, becomes the mistress of the other outsider, Louis, and finally commits suicide. In a final monologue, Bernard as an elderly man reviews the lives of himself and his friends, and feels himself floating into their consciousnesses like a wave into other waves. He thinks that the six of them together make up one complete person.

Wayland. A wonderful and invisible smith of English legend. He is the English form of the Scandinavian Volund or Volusander, a supernatural smith and king of the elves. In Frithiof's Saga (13th century), Volund forges the armor of Thorsten, Frithiof's father, particularly a golden arm-ring which descends to Frithiof as one of his most precious possessions. According to the legend, King Nidud, or Nidung, of Sweden cut the sinews of Volund's feet and cast him into prison to avail himself of his workmanship, but the smith made his escape in a feather boat. Scott introduced Wayland or Wayland Smith into his novel Kenilworth (1821). He is said to have lived in a cromlech near Lambourn, Berkshire (since called Wayland Smith's Cave), and legend relates that, if a traveler tied up his horse there, left sixpence for a fee, and retired from sight, he would find the horse shod on his return. Kipling has the tale of Weland's Sword in his Pack of Pook's Hill (1906).

Way of All Flesh, The (1903). A novel by Samuel Butler, published posthumously. The hero, Ernest, is the son of an English clergyman, Theobald Pontifex. Few clergymen in fiction are as unsympathetic as this pious bully, nor is his docile, sanctimonious wife, Christina, any more lovable. The story deals with one of Butler's favorite themes—the relations between parents and children—and is autobiographical in many details. It is, moreover, a keenly satirical criticism of middle-class English family life. Ernest's school and university days are not happy. He struggles with the problem of orthodoxy, goes to live in the slums, is thrown into prison for impulsive advances to a respectable girl, and marries the extremely vulgar Ellen, who had been his mother's maid. He is freed from this marriage by the fact that Ellen was already married. Receiving an inheritance from an aunt, he is able to devote his life to literature, and finally wins some measure of self-respect and genuine success.

Way of the Cross (Lat., Via crucis). A series of pictures or images in a church (see Stations of the Cross) representing the successive stages of Jesus' passion. The term also applies to the devotions said at each of these representations.

Way of the World, The (1700). A comedy by William Congreve. The plot revolves around the efforts of the urbane and witty Mirabell to marry Millamant despite the opposition of her aunt, Lady Wishfort, to whom he has feigned passion in order to disguise his suit for her niece. In the famous "bargaining" scene, Mirabell and Millamant decide to marry after negotiating an intricate agreement on their various rights and responsibilities. The play is now considered Congreve's greatest work; however, the comparatively poor reception it received contributed to Congreve's decision to give up writing for the stage.

We (My; 1924). A novel by Yevgeni Zamyatin. Describing a regimented totalitarian society in the 26th century, it is an ancestor of such novels as Aldous Huxley's Brave New World and George Orwell's 1984. It was first published abroad in 1924. Publication in 1929 in a Russian version at Prague led to Zamyatin's expulsion from the federation of writers in Russia and his eventual departure from the country.

Wealth of Nations, The (1776). An influential work on economics by Adam Smith, the full title of which is Inquiry into the Nature and Causes of the Wealth of Nations. It is in this work that Smith outlines a system of laissez-faire economics based on an absolutely free economy.

Wearing of the Green, The. An Irish patriotic and revolutionary song, dating from 1798. Green was the emblematic color adopted by Irish Nationalists.

Weaver, John V. A. (1853–1938). American newspaperman and writer. At the suggestion of H. L. Mencken, he wrote verse in slang. His work includes In American (1921), Finders (1923), and More in American (1926), Love 'Em and Leave 'Em (1926), which he wrote with George Abbott, was a successful play. Trial Balance (1931) is his autobiography in verse. He also wrote three novels, including Joy Girl (1932), a satire of Hollywood life.

Weavers, The (Die Weber; 1892). A play by Gerhart Hauptmann, considered the finest work of German naturalism. Written entirely in dialect, it treats the economic plight of the Silesian weavers and centers about a weavers' revolt that had been put down some years before.

Web and the Rock, The (1939). A novel by Thomas Wolfe. Wolfe follows his autobiographical hero, George Webber (called Eugene Gant in Look Homeward, Angel and Oberon in The River) to the "Enfabled Rock" of New York, where, in the midst of his youthful literary struggles, he meets the gifted scenic designer, Mrs. Esther Jack. During their love affair, he is at first enchanted by and then disillusioned with the magic of the city that is so much a part of Esther's personality. At length George breaks from Esther's web of devotion and flees abroad to seek in an older culture the stability he could not find in the American city. You Can't Go Home Again is a sequel.

Webb, Mary (1881-1927). English novelist. She is best known as the author of Precious Bane and The Golden Arrow (1916). Her books, set on the Welsh borders, describe shy, untutored heroines in scenes of rustic violence and beauty. Her novels were brilliantly satirized by Stella Gibbons in Cold Comfort Farm.

Weber, Die. See, Weavers, The.

Weber, Karl Maria von (1786-1826). German composer best known for his romantic operas. Der Freischütz (1821) is based on the old legend of the hunter whose bullets, charmed by the devil, cannot miss; Oberon (London, 1826, sung in English) is based on the poem Oberon of Wieland. Weber employed the leitmotif technique, which was later developed by Richard Wagner.

Weber, Max (1864-1920). German sociologist and historian whose comprehensive view of society greatly influenced modern social science. His most controversial work is The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism (Die protestantische Ethik und der Geist der Kapitalismus; 1904-1905), an essay in which he related the rise of capitalist economy to the Protestant belief in the moral value of fulfilling one's worldly duties.

Weber and Fields. A famous vaudeville team composed of Joseph Weber (1867-1942) and Lewis Fields (1867-1941). These comedians appeared together from the age of 10 on; they organized their own company, and later performed in movies and on the radio. Among their productions were Whoop-Dee-Doo and Higgledy-Piggledy.

Webster, Daniel (1782-1852). American statesman and orator. A native of New Hampshire, Webster was admitted to the bar in 1805. As a member of Congress (1813-1817), he attacked the War of 1812. He moved to Massachusetts in 1816 and, after two more terms in Congress, was elected to the U.S. Senate in 1827. A champion of nationalism as opposed to state sovereignty, he engaged in a famous debate (1830) with Senator Hayne of South Carolina in which he extolled "Liberty and Union, now and forever, one and inseparable!" After two futile attempts to win the Whig presidential nomination, he served as secretary of state (1841-1843), negotiating the Webster-Ashburton Treaty with Great Britain, which settled the dispute over the Maine boundary. In 1844 Webster was again elected to the Senate, where he favored the Compromise of 1850 in his Seventh of March speech, which began, "I wish to speak today, not as a Massachusetts man, nor as a Northerner, but as an American." His moderate stand cost him the support of abolitionists, and John Greenleaf Whittier denounced him in his poem Ichabod (1850). Whittier later condemned Webster's action in The Last Occasion (1880). Webster is also a prominent character in Stephen Vincent Benét's *The Devil and Daniel Webster."

Webster, Jean (1876-1916). American writer. The granddaughter of Mark Twain, she is best known for Daddy-Long-Legs (1912), her sentimental, highly successful tale about an orphan, and its sequel, Dear Enemy (1915). She also wrote When Patty Went to College (1903) and Just Patty (1911), collections of stories for girls; the heroine is probably modeled on Adelaide Crapsey, whose verse Miss Webster edited.

Webster, John (1580?--1616). English dramatist, noted for his passionate tragedies of revenge. His most famous plays are The White Devil and The Duchess of Malfi, both of which deal with... actual events that occurred in Italy. He made additions to Marston's The Malcontent and collaborated with Thomas Dekker on Westward Ho and Northward Ho, both of which were published in 1607. He also wrote The Devil's Lawcase (pub. 1623), a tragicomedy, and the tragedy Appius and Virginia (pub. 1654), to which Thomas Heywood probably contributed. There is some evidence that Elizabethan dramatist most frequently compared with Shakespeare because of the dynamism and poetic lyricism that characterize his best work.

Webster, Margaret (1905– ). Anglo-American theatrical director and producer. The daughter of Ben Webster and Dame May Whitty, she made her debut as an actress with John Barrymore in Hamlet in London. She directed a notable series of Shakespearean plays starring Maurice Evans (1937–1939). In Shakespeare Without Tears (1942), she discussed the problems of producing Shakespeare's plays.

Webster, Noah (1758–1843). American lexicographer and author. A man of varied interests, Webster was a teacher, lecturer, journalist, lawyer, judge, scientist, gardener, and traveler. In politics, he was an ardent partisan of Federalism, advocating the adoption of the Constitution and a strong central government. While a resident in Amherst, Mass., he was president of the Amherst Academy (1820–1821) and helped to found Amherst College. Webster believed that the American nation needed a language and literature of its own; he wrote a three-volume Grammatical Institute of the English Language. Parts II (1784) and III (1785) were a grammar and a reader, but Part I, commonly known as Webster's Spelling Book or the Blue-Backed Speller (1783), became a best seller in its own right. Used in all schools, it sold some 60 million copies in the course of the century and helped to make American orthography uniform.

Webster's great work, An American Dictionary of the English Language (1828), was revised in 1841. In 1843, G. & C. Merriam Co. took over the right to produce further editions.

Wedekind, Frank (1864–1918). German playwright and actor. The son of a wealthy family and destined for a respectable career in law, he left school to take a job advertising soup. While absorbing the divergent influences of the realist Hauptmann on the one hand, and of the symbolists Strindberg and Büchner on the other, he traveled as secretary to a circus. His first two plays, The Young World (Die Jungewelt; 1890) and Spring's Awakening (Frühlings Erwachen; 1891) dealt with the problems created by adolescent ignorance of sex. The latter caused a sensation that was repeated with the appearance of Earth Spirit (Der Erdgeist; 1899) and its sequel Pandora's Box (Die Büchse der Pandora; 1903), both of which treated sexual themes with revolutionary frankness that shocked many audiences. Wedekind and his actress wife played leading roles in many of these plays, which the author produced. Wedekind's plays were as important for their style as for their content; they are regarded as forerunners of German expressionism in the theater.

Wedgwood, C[icely] V[eronica] (1910– ). English historian. She is known especially for her studies of the 17th century. Her works include Oliver Cromwell (1939), The King's Peace, 1637–1641 (1955), The King's War, 1641–1647 (1959), and Poetry and Politics under the Stuarts (1960).

Weekley, Ernest (1865–1954). English lexicographer. His books popularizing etymology include The Romance of Words (1912) and Words and Names (1932).

Week on the Concord and Merrimack Rivers, A (1849). A narrative by Henry David Thoreau. The book is the physical and spiritual history of a trip Henry and his brother John had made 10 years before.

Weems, Mason Locke (1759–1825). American clergyman, biographer, and bookseller. Known as "Parson" Weems, he was an itinerant evangelist and book agent. In 1800, he wrote a History of the Life, Death, Virtues and Exploits of George Washington. Vastly popular in its own day, the book was accepted as semiotics, and then took its place in American mythology. In its fifth edition (1806), the earliest known version of young Washington and the cherry tree is related. Aside from his other "biographies" of Franklin, Penn, and Marion, Weems wrote a number of moral tracts, among them God's Revenge Against Murder (1807) and The Drunkard's Looking Glass (1812).

Wee Willie Winkie, And Other Stories (1889). A book of short stories by Rudyard Kipling. The story that gives the title to the book tells how six-year-old Percival William Williams, son of an officer of the British Indian Army, rescues the fiancée of his friend and hero, Lieutenant Brandis, and so "entered into his manhood." The name "Wee Willie Winkie" is an allusion to the familiar character of nursery rhyme who went about in his nightgown.

Wegg, Silas. In Charles Dickens' Our Mutual Friend, a one-legged man who keeps a fruit stand. Mr. Boffin hires him to read aloud The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, a task somewhat beyond his powers. Wegg is a shrewd rascal and hopes to blackmail Boffin, but fails in the attempt.

Weid, Gustav Johannes (1858–1914). Danish novelist, playwright, and short-story writer. One of Denmark's finest humorists, Wied produced work marked by sharp cynicism and bitter wit. His amused scorn for the absurdity of human existence mingles with a tender compassion. Wied's novels include Slegten (1898), Lissens Onsdrik (1899), and Knagste (1902), Menneskernes Born (2 vols., 1894) and Circus Mundi (1909) are collections of stories; Det vise kan (1900), Dansemus (1905), Første Violin (1898), and Rande Viljer (1906; trans., 2 × 2 = 5, 1923) are among his plays.

Weidman, Jerome (1913– ). American novelist. Weidman's first novel, I Can Get It for You Wholesale (1937) was so popular that he followed it with a sequel, What's in It for Me? (1938); both depict unscrupulous characters in the New York garment industry. His other novels include Too Early to Tell (1946), a satire on war propaganda, and The Enemy Camp (1958), dealing with anti-Semitism. The Horse That Could Whistle "Dixie" (1939) and The Captain's Tiger (1937) are short-story collections. His play Fiorello! (1959) won a Pulitzer Prize.

Weil, Simone (1909–1943). French philosophical writer. Jewish-born, she became interested in Catholicism and in Hellenic traditions of mystic spirituality, Weill, Kurt

Posthumous publication of her meditations include Gravity and Grace (La Pesanteur et la grâce; 1947), The Need for Grace (L’Enracinement; 1949), and Waiting for God (Attendre Dieu; 1950).

Weill, Kurt (1900-1950). German-born composer, known especially for his operas and musical comedies. Under the influence of the playwright Bertolt Brecht, he adopted a superficially popular style while retaining subtle techniques of modern art music. With Brecht he wrote his most famous work: Die Dreigroschenoper (1928; The Threepenny Opera), based on The Beggar’s Opera. In the U.S. he worked with Maxwell Anderson on Lost in the Stars (1949; based on Alan Paton’s Cry the Beloved Country) and Knickerbocker Holiday (1938; based on Washington Irving’s Father Knickerbocker), and composed the “folk opera” Down in the Valley (1946) to a libretto by Arnold Sundgaard.

Weimar classicism (Ger., Weimarer Klassik). A literary movement in Germany, usually dated from Goethe’s return from Italy (1788) until Schiller’s death (1805). During most of this period, Goethe was in Weimar itself and Schiller was in Jena, a small university town only a few miles away. From 1794 on, the two poets worked together closely, and in the main, it is their thinking and writing, their cooperative effort to establish and develop a new poetic humanism, that form the backbone of the movement. Wilhelm von Humboldt, who was a friend of both poets, also contributed a good deal of critical thought to their endeavors; and though the brothers Schlegel are usually thought of in connection with romanticism, they both influenced and were themselves influenced by the classical strivings of Goethe and Schiller.

The ideal of the Weimar classicists was one of harmony and balance, for which they took the ancient Greeks as their models, following Winckelmann. But neither Goethe nor Schiller believed in the rationalistic harmony of the enlightenment. Both sought, instead, an emotional and organic harmony based on the inward sympathy that unites all men, and on an unstrained, optimistic view of the relationship between man and the world. They thought that the ordinary man in his actions, as well as the artist in his works, should exercise restraint, but never at the expense of his essential humanity.

Goethe and Schiller cooperated on a collection of Xenien (1797; see Xenion) in which, with a good deal of satire about other authors, they stated their own position within the literature of the time. Among Goethe’s works, other central documents of Weimar classicism are Iphigenia in Tauris (1787), Torquato Tasso (1790), Wilhelm Meisters Lehrjahre (1795-1796), and Hermann und Dorothea (1797). Among Schiller’s works, the essays on aesthetics are important for the movement, as are a number of lyric poems, including Der Spaziergang (The Walk, 1795), an imaginary excursion through the whole progress of human culture; Würde der Frauen (Dignity of Women, 1795), which attempts to define the eternal and unchanging spiritual relationship between man and woman; and Das Lied von der Glocke (The Song of the Bell, 1799), which takes the making of a town’s church bell as the occasion for a eulogy on the communal spirit in human society.

Weimar Republic (1919-1933). The unofficial name for the German government, beginning with the formulation of its constitution in the city of Weimar and lasting until the dictatorship of Hitler. The republic was not very popular, largely because it had accepted the severe conditions of the Treaty of Versailles (1919) after defeat in World War I.

Weir of Hermiston (1896). An unfinished novel by Robert Louis Stevenson. Left unfinished at his death, this work promised to be Stevenson’s masterpiece and contains some of his best writing. It is the story of Archie Weir, banished by his severe father, a judge, to live in solitude in the village of Hermiston. Here he meets Christina with whom he falls in love. The novel breaks off at this point; Stevenson intended to have Archie forced to commit a murder because of his love for Christina, tried and sentenced to death by his own father, and rescued by some relatives of Christina. Archie’s father was to die of shock after his condemnation of his son.

Weissnichtwo. Nowhere. The word is German for “I know not where,” and was coined by Carlyle in his Sartor Resartus. It is the name of the place where Diogenes Teufelsdröckh holds his professorship of Things in General.

Welch, Denton (1915-1948). English novelist. He wrote two novels of adolescence noted for their sexual frankness: Maiden Voyage (1943) and In Youth Is Pleasure (1945). Though he was an invalid, he traveled a great deal; his interesting journals (1952) were published posthumously.

Weld, Theodore Dwight (1803-1895). American abolitionist. At Utica Academy, N.Y., Weld fell under the influence of the revivalist, Charles Grandison Finney, and left school to become an itinerant preacher. By 1830 he was a confirmed abolitionist and helped to found Lane Seminary in Cincinnati, an abolitionist school whose president was Lyman Beecher. According to Harriet Beecher Stowe, Weld inspired her to write Uncle Tom’s Cabin. In 1834, Weld was one of the founders of the American Anti-Slavery Society; he trained missionaries and wrote tracts for the group. Among these are The Bible Against Slavery (1837) and American Slavery as It Is (1839); G. H. Barnes and D. L. Dumond edited The Correspondence of Theodore Weld (1834).

Weller, Samuel. The center of comic interest in Charles Dickens’ Pickwick Papers, he is a bootblack at the White Hart and afterward servant to Mr. Pickwick, to whom he becomes devotedly attached. When Pickwick is sent to the Fleet Prison, Sam Weller, rather than leave his master, gets his father to arrest him for debt. His colorful speech and his cunning on behalf of his master makes him one of Dickens’ most amusing characters. “Bless his old gaiters . . .” Sam Weller cries about Pickwick, “I never seen such a fine creetur in my days. Blessed if I don’t think his heart must ha’ been born 25 year after his body, at least!”

Welles, Gideon (1802-1878). American journalist and politician. Welles was editor and part owner of the Hartford Times and a founder of the Hartford Evening Press (1856). Elected to the Connecticut legislature (1827-1835), he later served as secretary of the navy under Lincoln and Johnson (1861-1869). His introduction of ironclad battleships and his effective blockade of the Confederacy helped win the Civil War. Welles's Lincoln and Seward (1874) was based on one of the many articles he wrote for Galaxy magazine. Autobiographical material is found in The Diary of Gideon Welles (3 v., 1911), edited by E. T. Welles, and in Welles's letters published in The Magazine of History (1924).

Welles, [George] Orson (1915– ). American actor, radio and theatrical producer. Welles began his career in Dublin with the Gate Theater. In 1934 he directed the Woodstock Festival and later founded the Mercury Theater. He produced an all-Negro Macbeth and a provocative modern-dress Julius Caesar. His radio dramatization (1938) of H. G. Wells's War of the Worlds, done in the form of a newscast, caused a panic when people thought that the Martians had actually invaded the earth. In 1940, Welles wrote, directed, and starred in the motion picture Citizen Kane; he was later active in several movies and was especially noted for his controversial productions of Macbeth (1947) and Othello (1955). In recent years he has acted and produced chiefly in Europe.

Wellesley, Lady Dorothy (1889–1956). English poet. She was much admired by William Butler Yeats, who gave her more space in his Oxford Book of Modern Verse (1936) than he gave T. S. Eliot. Her poems of nature and elemental dream imagery appear in Genesiu (1926) and other volumes; Early Light: Collected Poems was published in 1956.

Wellington, 1st duke of. Arthur Wellesley. Known as the Iron Duke (1769–1852). English general and statesman. He was chief in command, after the death of Sir John Moore (1761–1809), in the Peninsular War (1809), represented England at the Congress of Vienna (1814–1815), and defeated Napoleon at Waterloo. A popular idol in England, he was prime minister from 1828 to 1830.

Wellman, Paul [Iselin] (1898– ). American writer. Wellman worked as a newspaperman in Kansas for 25 years, and it is with life in the West that almost all his books deal. He wrote several histories, including Death on the Prairie (1934) and Death in the Desert (1935), but he is best known for his highly popular novels. They include Jubal Troop (1939), The Bowl of Brass (1944), The Walls of Jericho (1947), The Chain (1949), The Iron Mistress (1951), The Comancheros (1952), and The Female (1953).

Wells, Carolyn (1869–1942). American anthropologist, writer of humorous verse and detective stories. She is best known for her anthologies: A Nonsense Anthology (1902) and A Parody Anthology (1904). The sleuth in her detective stories is called Fleming Stone; they were published in the collection Fleming Stone Omnibus (1933). The Patty Books are a series of children's stories.

Wells, Charles Jeremiah. Pen name H. L. Howard (1799–1879). English poet. A friend of Keats and Hazlitt, Wells abandoned poetry after the failure of two early works. One of these, the florid Marlovian verse drama Joseph and His Brethren (1823), was rediscovered in the 70's by Swinburne and Rossetté, highly praised, and republished (1876) shortly before the old man's death, enjoying a temporary vogue.

Wells, H[erbert] G[eorge] (1866–1946). English novelist and journalist. Wells is known for his science fiction, his satirical novels, and his popularized accounts of history and science. He is also known for his militant advocacy of socialism, feminism, evolutionism, rationalism, and the advancement of science. The first great writer of science fiction, H. G. Wells is author of The Time Machine, The Island of Dr. Moreau (1896), The Invisible Man (1897), The War of the Worlds, The First Men in the Moon (1901), The Sea Lady (1902), The Food of the Gods (1904), In the Days of the Comet (1906), and The Country of the Blind (1907). His best comic, satirical, and didactic novels are Love and Mr. Lewisham, Kipps, Ann Veronica, Tono-Bungay, The History of Mr. Polly (1910; see Mr. Polly), The New Machiavelli, Marriage (1912), The Passionate Friends (1913), The Wife of Sir Isaac Harman (1914), The Research Magnificent (1915), and Mr. Britling Sees It Through. Most of these novels are concerned with improving men's living conditions and their attitudes toward life. His later novels are even more didactic and are now almost unread. Other later works were purely political, scientific, and sociological. Among these are his popular, near-classic survey, Outline of History (1920), and a compressed version of that work, A Short History of the World (1922). The Outline was the first work in a trilogy that continued with The Science of Life, written in collaboration with his son G. P. Wells and Julian Huxley (1929), and The Work, Wealth, and Happiness of Mankind (1932).

The son of a small tradesman and professional cricketer, Wells was apprenticed to a druggist and a druggist before he made his way to the Royal College of Science, where he studied biology under Thomas Huxley. He became a teacher, and a Fabian. The novels Love and Mr. Lewisham, Kipps, and Tono-Bungay contain autobiographical elements. The Book of Catherine Wells (1928) is his appreciation of his second wife, a former student, written after her death. Experiment in Autobiography (1934) is an account of his life.

Wells's first sociological books were Anticipations (1901) and Mankind in the Making (1903), in which he criticized existing society. In A Modern Utopia (1905) he presented his remedies: internationalism, socialism, and the advancement and proper use of science. His Men Like Gods (1923) is a well-known tale depicting an ideal world. Like Shaw, Wells was attacked by the Catholic writers Hilaire Belloc and G. K. Chesterton for his progressive ideas; like his friend Arnold Bennett, he was attacked by Virginia Woolf for his old-fashioned naturalistic novels. In later life Wells became highly eccentric. His The Open Conspiracy (1928) proposed government by supermen and a new world religion based on physics; The World of William Clissold (1926) is a long didactic novel on the subject. Just before his death he reached a point of absolute despair for mankind and Mind at the End of Its Tether (1946). Wells thought that man's scientific advances were totally outdistancing his intellectual and social development.

Deliberately aiming to achieve greatness as a prophet, journalist, and spokesman for progress, rather than as a novelist, Wells was considered to possess one of the most vigorous intellects of his period in England. We are still working toward many of the social and scientific goals he proposed,
Aerial warfare and the atomic bomb, which he “invented” in The War in the Air (1908) and The World Set Free (1914), have proved as apocalyptically destructive as he prophesied.

Welsh, Jane Baillie (1801–1866). Scottish-born wife of Thomas Carlyle, whom she married in 1826. An exceptionally intelligent and charming woman, she is said to have suffered much from her husband’s irritability, neglect, and ambition. A. J. Froude edited a collection of her Letters in 1883, and additional volumes have since been published. See Craigentinny.

Welty, Eudora (1909– ). American short-story writer and novelist. Born in Jackson, Miss., she is known for the perceptive artistry of her studies of small-town life in the Deep South. Her stories are collected in A Curtain of Green (1941), The Wide Net (1943), and The Golden Apples (1949). Delta Wedding (1946) is a sensitive novel about Southern family life. The Ponder Heart (1954) is a short novel dramatized successfully in 1956. She has an uncanny ear for colloquial speech, which she uses with richly comic effect, and her sense of the universal and mysterious gives her work an almost mythological dimension.

Wendell, Barrett (1855–1921). American teacher, scholar, and writer. Wendell was appointed to the Harvard faculty in 1880 and taught there until 1917. He gave the first course at Harvard in American literature; in later years he gave lectures on American literature and traditions at the Sorbonne. After publishing two novels, he wrote scholarly works (including Cotton Mather, The Puritan Priest (1891), William Shakespeare (1894), The Tempter of the 17th Century in English Literature (1894)) textbooks, essays, and three short plays. He also wrote The Traditions of European Literature (1920). Wendell’s principal work, however, was his A Literary History of America (1900). The volume extolled the contributions of New England, vented Wendell’s prejudices against democracy and thinly disguised one American attitude. A Boston Brahmin and an Anglophile, Wendell often indulged in a rhetorical flourish; he described Whitman’s Leaves of Grass as “confused, inarticulate, and surging in a mad kind of rhythm which sounds as if hexameters were trying to bubble through sewage.”

Wentworth, Captain. See Persuasion.

werewolf. See werewolf.

Werfel, Franz (1890–1945). Austrian poet, novelist, and playwright. Among the best-known expressions of his religiously based yearning for a brotherhood of man are the novels: Barbara oder Die Frömmigkeit (translated as The Pure in Heart, 1929), Die vierzig Tage des Musa Dagh (The Forty Days of Musa Dagh, 1933) and The Song of Bernadette. The same message, in an earlier, more expressionistic stage of development, is found in his collections of verse: Der Weltsfreund (Friend to the World, 1911), Wir Sind (We Are, 1913) and Einander (Each Other, 1915). His earlier plays, such as Der Spiegelmensch (The Mirror Man, 1920), Goat Song, and Juarez und Maximilian (1924) contain many expressionist features and tend toward a tragic view of the conflict between good and evil; but he subsequently became more optimistic, as in Der Weg der Verheissung (The Road of Destiny, 1936), a triumphant dramatic unfolding of Jewish history, and Jacobowsky and the Colonel (Jakubowski und der Oberst, 1944), a comedy. Werfel fled Germany and the Nazis in 1938, came to the U.S. in 1940, and died in California.

Werner, Zacharias (1768–1823). German dramatist. His plays, the most famous of which is Der 24. Februar (The 24th of February, 1810), pretend to probe deeply into the workings of fate, but are actually no more than unconvincing contrivances composed of improbable accidents. After divorcing his third wife, he became a Catholic priest (1814).

Werner, The Inheritance. A verse drama by Lord Byron, retold from Kritzner, or the German’s Tale in Harriet Lee’s Canterbury Tales. Count Stralenheim has for years persecuted Werner, whose inheritance he has unjustly appropriated. In a moment of temptation, Werner steals a gold rouleau from the count; Werner’s son Ulric, upon hearing him confess the theft, secretly murders the count. Werner secures his inheritance, but, learning that his son was the assassin, sends Ulric away with a curse.

werewolf or werewolf. A legendary creature. A man-wolf (A.S. wer, man), i.e., a man who, according to medieval superstition, was turned—or could at will turn himself—into a wolf (the loup-garou of France). This creature had the appetite of a wolf, and roamed about at night devouring infants and sometimes exhuming corpses. Its skin was proof against shot or steel, unless the weapon had been blessed in a chapel dedicated to St. Huelbert.

This superstition was once common to almost all Europe, and still lingers in certain remote areas. In the 15th century a council of theologians convoked by the Emperor Sigismund gravely decided that the werewolf was a reality.

Ovid tells the story of Lycaon, king of Arcadia, turned into a wolf because he tested the divinity of Jupiter by serving up to him a “hash of human flesh”; Herodotus describes the Neuri as having the power of assuming once a year the shape of wolves; Pliny relates that one of the family of Antaeus was chosen annually, by lot, to be transformed into a wolf, in which shape he continued for nine years; and St. Patrick, we are told, converted Vereticus, king of Wales, into a wolf.

Werwolf (Loup Garou). The giant captain of the Diposodes, whom Pantagruel defeats in Rabelais’ Gargantua and Pantagruel. The two engage in an epic duel to decide the victory, Werewolf armed with an enormous club, Pantagruel with a boat’s mast which he uses as a spear. Pantagruel kills Werewolf and uses the dead giant’s body like a scythe to mow down the enemy.

Wescott, Glenway (1901– ). American novelist and poet. Wescott was born in Wisconsin and educated at the University of Chicago. His first book, The Bitterns (1920), was a volume of poems. The Apple of the Eye (1924), his first novel, was originally published serially in the Dial. His best-known book is the novel The Grandmothers (1927), a portrait of an American family. Although Wescott was for years an expatriate, he returned to the Middle West for material for Good-bye, Wisconsin (1928), a collection of short stories, and The Babe’s Bed (1930). Fear and Trembling (1932) is a collection of essays. The Pilgrim Hawk (1940) and Apartment in Athens (1945) are novels with European settings.

Wesley, Charles (1707–1788). English Methodist clergyman and hymn writer, brother of John Wesley. He composed some 6,500 hymns and left a journal, published in 1849; he also accompanied his brother John on his missionary trip to Georgia.

Wesley, John (1703–1791). English evangelical and theologian, famous as the founder of Methodism. In 1735, accompanied by his brother Charles Wesley, he went to the U.S. as a missionary to the Indians and colonists in Georgia. Returning to England (1738) he established the first Methodist Church. In 1763 he drew up a legal deed stating that Methodist preachers should preach no other doctrine than that contained in his Notes on the New Testament and the first four volumes of his sermons. He was a powerful preacher, traveling all over England on horseback. He published his prose Works in 1771–1774. His journal was published in 1909–1911.

West, Anthony (1914– ). English novelist and critic. The son of Rebecca West and H. G. Wells and now resident in the U.S. He is the author of Heritage (1955) and The Trend Is Up (1960). He is literary critic for The New Yorker.

West, Benjamin (1738–1820). American painter. A straightforward portraitist, his reputation was established by ambitious historical paintings which are criticized today for their dry exactitude of detail. He settled in England in 1763 and was appointed historical painter to George III in 1772; in 1792 he succeeded Sir Joshua Reynolds to the presidency of the Royal Academy. Among the numerous American artists who flocked to London to study with him were John Singleton Copley, Gilbert Stuart, and Samuel Morse.

West, Nathanael. Pen name of Nathan Wallenstein (1904–1940). American novelist. An unusual and highly original talent, West is best known for two novels, Miss Lonelyhearts and Day of the Locust, that reveal his vision of the horror and emptiness of modern life. These and his two other short novels, The Dream Life of Basil Smell (1931) and A Cool Million (1934), constitute the entire contents of The Complete Works of Nathanael West (1959) with an introduction by Alan Ross. West and wife, Eileen Mckenzie, the subject of Ruth Mckenzie’s My Sister Eileen (1938), were killed in an automobile accident in California.

West, Dame Rebecca. Pen name of Mrs. Cecily Maxwell Andrews, born Fairfield (1892– ). English novelist, critic, and essayist. Her best-known novels are The Return of the Soldier (1918), The Judge (1922), and The Thinking Reed (1936). Black Lamb and Grey Falcon (1942) is a study of Yugoslavia; The Meaning of Treason (1949) is a political and psychological study; and The Court and the Castle (1958) is literary criticism. As a young woman she was an ardent feminist and social reformer. Anthony West is her son by H. G. Wells. She was awarded the D.B.E. in 1959.

Westbrook, Harriet (1792–1816). English schoolgirl who became the 1st wife of Percy Bysshe Shelley. A friend of Shelley’s sisters, Harriet was unhappy at school and at home, and Shelley, possibly in an attempt to “rescue” her, eloped with her to Edinburgh in 1811. When they separated in 1814, she bore him one child and was expecting another. She drowned herself in the Serpentine in 1816.

Western, Sophia. See Tom Jones.

Western, Squire. An irascible, hare-hunting Tory squire, father of the heroine of Tom Jones by Henry Fielding. He is singularly unlearned, very prejudiced and countrified, but fond of his daughter Sophia.

Western Reserve. A tract of land of 3,666,921 acres near Lake Erie which was “reserved” by Connecticut when the states ceded their western lands to the federal government after the Revolution. Connecticut gave up jurisdiction over the Western Reserve in 1800, but kept the title to the soil and sold it to individual purchasers.

West Point. The United States Military Academy at West Point, N.Y., on the Hudson River. Here most regular officers of the U.S. Army are trained.

West-Running Brook (1928). A book of poems by Robert Frost. His fifth volume of collected verse, it contains, besides the title poem, other well-known lyrics, such as Acquainted with the Night, The Bear, and The Egg and the Machine. The title poem is a dialogue between husband and wife about a New England brook that perversely flows west instead of east.

Westward Hol (1855). A romance of the Spanish Main by Charles Kingsley. The chivalric young Amyas Leigh contends relentlessly with the Spaniards in love and in war in actions that range from the jungles of Central America to the vales of Devonshire. The culmination comes when Amyas, now a captain, participates in the destruction of the Armada.

Wexley, John (1907–1970). American playwright. He is the author of The Last Mile (1930), which concerns the final days of a prisoner condemned to death. It is a strong plea for prison reform. Steel (1931), deals with the labor situation, and They Shall Not Die (1934) is based on the Scottsboro trial.

Weyden, Rogier van der (c. 1400–1464). Flemish painter. Born in Tournai, he was originally called by the French form of his name, Roger de la Pasture. His clearly outlined figures are severe by comparison with the art of Jan van Eyck, but he revealed greater concern for the rhythmical movement and dramatic expression of his figures.

Whalley, Edward. See William Goffe.

Wharton, Edith [Newbold Jones] (1862–1937). American novelist and short-story writer. A follower of Henry James, she is known for her studies of the tragedies and ironies of life, especially among the members of middle-class and aristocratic New York society in the 19th and early 20th centuries. Her work is marked by an interest in psychological characterization, a preoccupation with manners and morals, and an adherence to artistic form.

Born into one of New York’s best families, she was at first criticized for her intellectual pursuits. Her first real success came with The Valley of Decision, a novel of 18th-century Italy. In The House of Mirth, she satirized the New York society that she knew so well. In 1907 she moved permanently to Europe, where she wrote Madame de Treymes and The Fruit of the Tree (both 1907), but she soon returned to America in her work, using the New England scene for what many consider her best and least typical work: Ethan Frome.

After a minor novel, The Reef (1912), Mrs. Wharton wrote another book about the breakdown of traditional New York culture: The Custom of the Country. During World War I, she received the Cross of the Legion of Honor for her relief work in Paris. The Marne (1918) and A Son at the Front (1923) show the influence of her wartime experiences. Summer (1917) is a novel about the summer romance of a New England girl. In 1920 appeared The Age of Innocence, her highly successful novel of manners.

Of her later work, perhaps the best is Old New York, a series of four novellas that includes The Old Maid. The Children (1928) and its sequel Hudson River Bracketed (1929) deal with family problems. Of her several volumes of short stories, perhaps the best known is Xingu and Other Stories. A Backward Glance (1934), her autobiography, is well known for its picture of Henry James, her close friend and literary mentor.

What Every Woman Knows (1908). A play by J. M. Barrie. The heroine, Maggie Wylie, is a plain but wise little woman with a humorous charm all her own. John Shand, a student who works as a railway porter in the summer, breaks into the house to investigate the library; Maggie’s affectionate father and her brother, who regret that she has “no charm,” offer the intruding student the money with which to complete his education if he will ask Maggie to marry him five years later. In due course they are married, and with her encouragement and help, he enters Parliament. When he reveals a desire to elope with Lady Sybil Lazenby, Maggie manages to give him such a surfeit of that lady’s company as to bring him back to her cured.

What Is Art? (Chto takoye iskusstvo?; 1897–1898). A treatise on aesthetics by Count Leo Tolstoy. Tolstoy considered art an extension of morality and felt that it should be suffused with a morally up-lifting spirit. To be good, in Tolstoy’s terms, a work of art must also be simple enough to be understood by everyone, not only the well-educated. The feelings of the artist should be obvious in his work. In the Christian era these feelings should reflect a religious view of man’s place in the world and his relation to God.

As examples of literature that transmit such feelings, Tolstoy lists Charles Dickens’ A Tale of Two Cities, A Christmas Carol, and The Chimes, Victor Hugo’s Les Misérables, Harriet Beecher Stowe’s Uncle Tom’s Cabin, and other works by Dostoevski, Schiller, and George Eliot.

As examples of “universal art” that convey “the simplest feelings of common life accessible to all men in the whole world,” Tolstoy cites Don Quixote, the comedies of Molière, David Copperfield, The Pickwick Papers, and works by Gogol, Pushkin, and Maupassant.

Tolstoy’s views on art and aesthetics became the framework for the doctrine of socialist realism in Soviet literature, where extraliterary standards are used to judge works of art.

What Maisie Knew (1897). A novel by Henry James. Always interested in the “small expanding consciousness” of a child, James deals in this novel with 12-year-old Maisie Farange, whose divorced parents have subsequently remarried. Because custody of the child had been awarded to each of the parents for alternating periods of six months, Maisie presently learns that her stepfather and her stepmother are having adulterous affairs, just as earlier, she had been aware of her own parents’ infidelities. Instead of corrupting her, this knowledge endows her with a precocious understanding of the adult world; ultimately, she decides to live with her old governess Mrs. Wix, instead of with either of her parents.

What Makes Sammy Run? (1941). A novel by Budd Schulberg. The hero, Sammy Glick, is a tough New York youth who works his way into a position of power in the motion-picture industry, where his harshness and crude manners are not out of place. A fast-paced novel, it is filled with much realistic detail of life in the movie colony.

What Price Glory? (1924). A play by Maxwell Anderson and Laurence Stallings. It is one of the first realistic American treatments of World War I. Centered on the rivalry of Captain Flagg and Sergeant Quirt for the favors of a French girl, the play caused a sensation by its frank presentation of the proflavity and brutality of the professional soldiers and the wearing ugliness of war.

Wheatley, Phillis or Phillis (1753–1784). Negro poet, the first woman writer of her race in the U.S., at 1761 she was brought to America from Africa and purchased as a slave by John Wheatley, a Boston merchant. As a child she showed unusual intelligence and was given an education. Famous in her day, she was received in London aristocratic circles and her poetry was praised by George Washington. Later critics, however, have agreed with Thomas Jefferson that her Poems on Various Subjects (1773) “were below the dignity of criticism.”
Wheelock, John Hall (1886– ). American poet and editor. While still at Harvard, Wheelock published with his classmate Van Wyck Brooks Verses of Two Undergraduates (1905). In 1911 he published The Human Fantasy, his first book of verse, and began his association with the publishing house of Charles Scribner’s Sons. His many later volumes of poetry include The Beloved Adventure (1912), The Black Panther (1922), The Bright Doom (1927), Poems 1911–1936 (1936), Poems Old and New (1956), and The Gardener and Other Poems (1961). He was awarded the Bollingen Prize for his work in 1962. Wheelock has also written biography and has edited various books.

wheel of fortune. See Fortuna.

When Johnny Comes Marching Home. A marching song of the Civil War. It was composed by the Union Army bandmaster, Patrick Sarsfield Gilmore (1829–1892). It has retained its popularity.

When Lilacs Last in the Dooryard Bloom’d (1867). A poem by Walt Whitman. With the return of lilacs in the spring, the poet mourns again the death of Abraham Lincoln. The thrush pours forth his carol of death, as the coffin slowly journeys through the land to its place of rest. A western star, sailing in the sky, “dropt in the night, and was gone.” The song of death becomes victorious; the poet finally glorifies the “strong deliveress.”

When We Dead Awaken (1900). A play by Henrik Ibsen. The play is a symbolic statement of a theme that can be found in almost all of Ibsen’s dramas: that spiritual death is the price of denying love. The sculptor Rubek meets Irene, who had been the model for his masterpiece many years before, but whom he had not dared to love for fear that love would interfere with his art. She tells him that they both had been dead for many years. In an attempt to regain a life of the spirit they go up into the wild mountains; pressing on to the peak and the sunrise, they are swallowed up in a storm.

Where Angels Fear to Tread (1905). A novel by E. M. Forster. The first of Forster’s novels, written when he was 26, it is set principally in Italy; its theme is the effect of that land’s so different culture and atmosphere on insular, provincial British personalities. After Lilia Herriton, who as a widow of 33 has gone to Italy and married Gino Carelli, the carefree, irresponsible 21-year-old son of a dentist, dies in childbirth, her Herriton relatives decide that they must bring her infant son back to England to be properly brought up. Gino, however, refuses to relinquish his son; the sum of money that they offer as a bribe is of no avail; and when Harriet, Lilia’s grimly conventional, self-righteous sister-in-law attempts to impose her will and abort the baby, the child is accidentally killed. The title of the novel is taken from Alexander Pope’s Essay on Criticism:

For fools rush in where angels fear to tread.

Whichcote, Benjamin. See Cambridge Platonists.

Whig. An abbreviation of Whiggamore (whig, “to drive,” and a mare). The name was first given to raiding parties in Western Scotland about 1648 and thence to Scottish Presbyterians. In 1679, it became a name for those opposed to James II’s succession to the throne, and after that it was applied to one of the two chief political parties of England. In the latter part of the 19th century, the Whigs were replaced by the Liberal Party.

Whilomville Stories (1900). A collection of 13 stories by Stephen Crane. Set in a town usually thought to be Port Jervis, N.Y., these tales are realistic and unsentimental sketches of childhood. Several are partly based on incidents from Crane’s own youth. The title might be translated as “once-upon-a-time town,” but the stories are less nostalgic than most stories about childhood. Lynx-Hunting, a comedy in which Jimmie Tresscott shoots a cow, has as one of its characters Henry Fleming, the hero of The Red Badge of Courage and the story The Veteran.

Whisky Rebellion or Insurrection (1794). An outbreak in western Pennsylvania, resulting from an attempt by the federal government to enforce an excise law passed in 1791, imposing duties on domestic distilled liquors. The rebellion was halted, proving the power of the new government to enforce its laws.

Whistler, James [Abbott] McNeill (1834–1903). American painter and etcher. Except for short periods of time, he lived abroad, especially in France, where he became a friend of the impressionists, and in England, where he became champion of the concept that divorces art from social, literary, or anecdotal significance. His refined, eclectic work is influenced by Japanese prints, from which he adapted the butterfly symbol that he used to sign his mature paintings. He used a restricted palette and simple patterns, relying for effect on delicate chromatic harmonies. The famous Louvre portrait of his mother is significantly entitled Arrangements in Grey and Black, Imperious and witty, he was the author of The Gentle Art of Making Enemies (1890).

white. A color symbolically denoting purity, simplicity, and candor; innocence, truth, and hope. The ancient Druids, and indeed the priests generally of antiquity, used to wear white vestments, as do the clergy of the Established Church of England when they officiate in any sacred service. The Magi also wore white robes. The head of Osiris, in ancient Egypt, was adorned with a white tiara; all his ornaments were white, and his priests were clad in white. The priests of Jupiter and the Flamen Dialis of Rome were clothed in white, and wore white hats. The victims offered to Jupiter wore white. The Roman festivals were marked with white chalk, and at the death of a Caesar the national mourning was white; white horses were sacrificed to the sun; white oxen were selected for sacrifice by the Druids and white elephants are held sacred in Siam. The Persians affirm that the divinities are habitied in white.

In Moby Dick, Melville, in discussing the significance of the whale’s unusual color, includes a long essay on white.

White, Antonia (1899– ). English novelist. She is the author of sensitive novels such as Beyond the Glass (1954), which are usually about borderline psychological states.

White, E[lwyn] B[rooks] (1899– ). American humorist and essayist. Beginning his career as a journalist, White sent several manuscripts to the recently founded New Yorker and was soon recruited for the staff, where he helped to start the witty “Talk of the Town” column. He conducted the “One Man’s Meat” department for Harper’s from 1938 to 1943 and continued to contribute to The New Yorker. White published several volumes of poetry, including The Lady Is Cold (1929) and The Fox of Peapack, and Other Poems (1938). He collaborated with James Thurber on Is Sex Necessary? (1929); in 1941 White and his wife compiled A Subtreasury of American Humor.

Among White’s other volumes are The Wild Flag (1946), Here Is New York (1949), The Second Tree from the Corner (1953), and two much-admired children’s books: Stuart Little (1945) and Charlotte’s Web (1952). In 1959 he edited a revision of The Elements of Style by William Strunk, Jr.

White, Edward Lucas (1866–1934). American novelist and short-story writer. A teacher of the classics in secondary schools in or near Baltimore, he is best known for El Supremo (1910), a novel about a 19th-century dictator in Paraguay. Also well known are the novels of Roman life, The Unwilling Vestal (1918) and Andivius Heduilo (1921).

White, Gilbert (1720–1793). English clergyman and naturalist, known for his Natural History and Antiquities of Selborne (1789), a classic scientific work in the field of ornithology.

White, Patrick (1912– ). Australian novelist. Although born in London, White came from four generations of Australians. He spent his childhood in Sydney, in the outback where the eerie, dead landscape haunted his imagination and was later projected into much of his writing. The few years spent in the English public schools made him bitter about the system. For a while he worked in a New South Wales sheep station, where he did much reading and writing. His first novel, Happy Valley (1939), won a gold medal from the Australian Literature Society. The title is obviously ironical, since the book is a scathing analysis of a small Australian community, White’s style, which reveals the influence of James Joyce and Gertrude Stein, exploits the stream-of-consciousness technique to its limits, but is at the same time unmistakably his own. His novels include No More Reality (1935), The Aunt’s Story (1948), The Tree of Man (1956), a best seller; Voss (1957); and Riders in the Chariot (1961).

White, T[erence] H[anbury] (1906–1964). English writer of fantasies. The Once and Future King (1958) is a collection of his four Arthurian epics, beginning with The Sword in the Stone (1939). In 1961 the book was made into the musical Camelot. White also wrote Mistress Masham’s Repose (1946), about a little girl and a community of Lilliputians.

White, Theodore H[arold] (1915– ). American writer and journalist. White’s nonfiction works include Thunder Out of China (1946), written with Annalee Jacobsy, Fire in the Ashes (1953), an analysis of conditions in postwar Europe; and the Pulitzer Prize winner, The Making of the President, 1960 (1961), a report on the presidential campaign and election. The View from the Fortieth Floor (1960) is a novel about the magazine world.

White, Walter [Francis] (1893–1955). American novelist and writer on race relations. White was for many years the executive secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. His first novel, Fire in the Flint (1924), deals with lynching in a Southern town. Flight (1925) is a study of the middle-class Negro in Atlanta. A Man Called White (1948) is his autobiography; the title is a punning reference to the fact that the author, who was blond, fair-skinned, and blue-eyed, always identified himself with the Negroes.

White, William Allen (1868–1944). American newspaper editor. A liberal Republican, White was born and spent most of his life in Emporia, Kansas. In 1895, he became the owner and editor of the Emporia Gazette, which he developed into one of the best and most famous of small U.S. newspapers. He first won national attention with his editorial What’s the Matter with Kansas (1896), which contributed to the election of William McKinley. His editorial tribute to his teen-aged daughter Mary, who died as the result of a riding accident, is also well known. White’s other works include A Certain Rich Man (1909), a novel about the misdeeds and ultimate regeneration of a Kansas financier; Puritan in Babylon (1938), a biography of Calvin Coolidge; and Autobiography (1946), which won a Pulitzer Prize.

White, William Hale. Pen name Mark Rutherford (1831–1913). English novelist. He wrote The Autobiography of Mark Rutherford, Mark Rutherford’s Deliverance (1885), and other novels dealing with the spiritual struggle of a dissenter. White’s work is known for its concern with morality and for its honesty and simplicity. He also translated Spinoza’s Ethics (1883) and Emendation of the Intellect (1883) and wrote a number of journals and critical papers.

Whiteboys. Also called Levelers. A secret agrarian association organized in Ireland (c. 1760), so called because the members wore white shirts on their nightly expeditions. They threw down fences and leveled enclosures, and destroyed the property of harsh landlords, Protestant clergy, and tithe collectors.

White Company, The (1891). A historical romance by Sir Arthur Conan Doyle. Its setting is the 14th century. The hero is Alleyn Edricson, one of the White Company of Saxon bowmen led by Sir Nigel Loring under the Black Prince. He wins both honor and the hand of Sir Nigel’s daughter.

White Devil, The, or Victoria Corombona (pub. 1612). A tragedy by John Webster. It is based on the story of Vittoria Accoramboni (c. 1557–1585), whose husband was murdered so that she might marry the duke of Bracciano. In the play, Vittoria’s affair with Brachiano, as the duke is called, is encouraged by her diabolical brother, Flamino. He and Brachiano dispose of Vittoria’s husband Camillo and the duke’s wife, Isabella. After being tried for murder and adultery, Vittoria is confined in a house for fallen women, but is rescued by Brachiano, with whom she elopes. To avenge Isabella’s murder, her brother Francisco, duke of Florence, instigates a plot that results in the death of Brachiano, Vittoria, and Flamino.

white elephant. A sacred animal of Siam in the days of the old kings of Ava. The holy white elephant bore the title of Lord, and had a minister of high rank to superintend his household. King of the White Elephant was the proudest title of the old kings of Ava and Siam. According to tradition, later kings of Siam used to make presents of white ele-

Iphigenia in Aulis (1911) Whitehead's Weedon by feet over his jacket of the turf of his Congressmen to white says Gauls keys of these goddess, these dainties in narrow folds is inf\r\n
This practice led to the use of the term white elephant to describe any expensive and unprofitable dignity or possession that is not worth the expense or responsibility of keeping it.

White Fang (1905). A novel by Jack London. Written as a sequel to The Call of the Wild, White Fang tells of a wolf-dog who is gradually domesticated. White Fang is rescued from his brutal owner by Weddon Scott, a mining engineer, who tames the dog and takes him to his home in California, where the dog dies while defending his master's family against an escaped convict.

White Goddess, The (1947). An anthropological and mythological study by Robert Graves. He claims that the White Goddess, ancient female, fertility, and mother goddess, and goddess of the moon, became the Muse of poetry; and that poetry originated in the ritual worship of this goddess in primitive societies.

Whitehall. A street in London. On it are situated the chief government offices of the British Empire. By extension, the term refers to the governmental administration of the Empire.

Whitehead, Alfred North (1861–1947). English philosopher and mathematician. His idealistic and mystical philosophy, which is aimed at a knowledge of God the Absolute, is based on his mathematical ideas. His best-known book, Science and the Modern World (1925), is a clear, layman's history of the development of science and an exposition of his own philosophy. Among Whitehead's other works are Principia Mathematica (1910–1913), with Bertrand Russell as co-author, The Aims of Education (1929), and Adventures of Ideas (1933).

White Horse [of Uffington], the. Huge figure of a horse incised on a hill in Berkshire, England, by cutting away the turf covering the white chalk downs. It is 374 feet long, and was traditionally supposed to have been the emblem of the Saxons under Alfred the Great, cut into the hill to commemorate their victory over the invading Danes at Ashdown (871). It may actually have been cut by Belgic Gauls in the days of the Roman occupation. Thomas Hughes describes the periodic festival of cleaning the turf away from the figure in The Scouring of the White Horse (1859). In his poem The Ballad of the White Horse (1911) G. K. Chesterton makes the horse symbolic of Christianity under Alfred battling against Norse paganism.

White Jacket, or the World in a Man-of-War (1850). A novel by Herman Melville. The voyage from Hawaii around Cape Horn to the Atlantic Coast is described in realistic detail. Melville reveals his distaste for the brutal and inhumane practices of the officers aboard a U.S. navy man-of-war. Some of the flogging scenes later convinced Congressmen to abolish that punishment. The white jacket for which the narrator is named, symbolic of his isolation and innocence, threatens to drown him when he falls from the mast. In this most dramatic episode, White Jacket succeeds in loosening the smothering folds of the jacket. Regaining his buoyancy, he rises while the hated garment sinks forever. A memorable character in the novel is Jack Chase, captain of the foretop; a natural leader and a sensitive and intelligent man, he reappears in many of Melville's works.

White Ladies. A species of flowers in many countries. Their appearance generally forebodes death in the house. (See BANSHEE.) The belief is a relic of old Teutonic mythology, and the White Ladies represent Holda, or Bertha, the goddess who received the souls of maidens and young children.

German legend says that when the castle of Neuhauß, Bohemia, was being built, a White Lady appeared to the workmen and promised them a sweet soup and carp on the completion of the castle. In remembrance thereof, these daunties were long given to the poor of Bohemia on Maundy Thursday. She is also said to have been heard to speak on two occasions: once in December, 1628, when she said, “I wait for judgment!” and once at Neuhauß, when she said to the princes, “‘Tis ten o'clock.” The first recorded instance of this apparition was in the 16th century, and the name given to the lady is Bertha von Rosenberg. She last appeared, it is said, in 1879, just prior to the death of Prince Waldemar. She carries a bunch of keys at her side, and is always dressed in white.

In Normandy, the White Ladies lurk in ravines, fords, bridges, and other narrow passes, and ask the passenger to dance. If they receive a courteous answer, well; but if a refusal, they seize the churl and fling him into a ditch, where thorns and briers may serve to teach him gentleness of manners. The most famous of these ladies is La Dame d'Aprigny, who used to occupy the site of the present Rue St. Quentin, at Bayeux, and La Dame Abonde.

white man's burden. Euphemism for the type of imperialism predominant in Europe, America, and especially Great Britain, at the end of the 19th century and the beginning of the 20th century. It was justified by many of its supporters as a moral duty devolving upon the "superior" white nations to guide and develop the "backward" peoples in their newly acquired colonies. The term is from the title of a poem by Rudyard Kipling (1899) which is considered to be an excellent expression of the attitude of conservative British imperialists and of the author himself at the time of its composition.

white rabbit, the. A character in Lewis Carroll's Alice's Adventures in Wonderland. The white rabbit astonishes Alice when he rushes past her worriedly consulting his watch. Curious to know why he has a watch and where he is hurrying, Alice chases him and falls down a rabbit hole into Wonderland, where her adventures begin.

Whites and Blacks. See BIANCHI and NERI.

White's Chocolate House. A popular meeting place in 18th-century London; it was opened by Francis White in 1697.

Whitman, Walt[er] (1819-1892). American poet, journalist, and essayist. Born near Huntington, Long Island, of mixed Dutch and English ancestry, Whitman early adopted the nickname, Walt, to distinguish himself from his father. After a few years of schooling, he learned the printing trade and worked in Brooklyn and Manhattan. For the next 15 years, he alternated between printing and writing jobs, with an interval as country schoolteacher. In 1842, he wrote his only novel, the temperance tract Franklin Evans. By 1846, he had become editor of the Brooklyn Eagle, a Democratic paper; in 1848 he lost his position because of his support of the Free Soil movement. After a trip to New Orleans on a short-lived journalistic venture, he founded his own paper, the Freeman; it folded in a year, because of conservative Democratic pressure.

Whitman held several odd jobs, working as carpenter and contractor, and published a few poems. None of these hinted that in 1855 he would publish a strikingly original book of poetry, Leaves of Grass. The volume, with its 12 untitled poems, was not well received; it offended most delicate sensibilities with its ostensible vulgaritv, but Emerson, a more perceptive critic, greeted Whitman "at the beginning of a great career." An expanded edition was published the following year.

In 1859, after a period of association with the bohemian group in New York, Whitman added two sections, Children of Adam and Calamus, to the third edition of his book. In 1862, when his brother George was wounded in the Civil War, Whitman went to Virginia to nurse him. He stayed on in Washington, volunteering to nurse in army hospitals. He published his war impressions in * Drum Taps* (1865), the sequel of which included the elegy for Lincoln, When Lilacs Last in the Dooryard Bloom'd. Much of his wartime prose is included in Specimen Days and Collect.

When Leaves of Grass became more popular its author was dismissed from his government clerkship for having written an immoral book. His supporters rallied, and William D. O'Connor wrote a defense called The Good Gray Poet (1866). From this title came the unfortunate nickname, implying that Whitman was a benevolent but harmless old man. By 1868 his poems were becoming known in England, through the appreciation of William Rossetti. In 1870 a new edition was issued, containing the poem Passage to India. Shortly after, Whitman wrote Democratic Vistas.

After a paralytic stroke, he moved to Camden, N.J. He lectured in the East, visited Colorado and Canada, and published new editions. Purchasing a house on Mickle Street in Camden, he entertained writers and artists from all over the world. The house became the center of a band of disciples, who included Horace Traubel, Dr. R. M. Bucke and Thomas Harned. At the time of Whitman's death in 1892, he had become a legend.

In his unorthodox form, the line is the rhythmical meter; it is disregarded, but Whitman employs parallelism and tries to achieve a musical effect. His major themes include the sacredness of the self, the beauty of death, the equality of all people, the love of comrades, and the immortality of the soul. The popular poems that caused him to be admired as "the bard of democracy" have become secondary to Crossing Brooklyn Ferry, Song of My Self, Out of the Cradle Endlessly Rocking, and others, which identify him as a major poet. See Song of the Open Road; O Captain! My Captain!; John Burroughs.

Whitsunday. The Christian feast of Pentecost. This old English name derives from the fact that those who were baptized at this time wore white garments. It and the two days following are the chief early summer holiday in England.

Whittier, John Greenleaf (1807-1892). American poet and editor. The poet's formal education was slight, but he read assiduously; before he was 20 he had published enough verse to bring him to the attention of editors and readers in the antislavery cause. A Quaker devoted to social causes and reform, Whittier worked zealously in behalf of a series of abolitionist newspapers and magazines. His first book, Legends of New England in Prose and Verse, was published in 1831; from then until the Civil War he wrote essays and articles as well as poems, almost all of which are concerned with abolition. See Daniel Webster.

The Civil War inspired the familiar poem Barbara Frietchie, but the important change in his work came after the war. From 1865 until Whittier's death he wrote of religion, nature, and New England life; he became the most popular rural New England poet. He was the poet of the country folk whose vigorous speech is mirrored in his Snow-Bound.

In old age Whittier turned toward religious verse; many hymns still sung are excerpted from his long religious poems. His finest work was done in the rural poetic genre and includes Snow-Bound, Telling the Bees, Skipper Ineson's Ride, The Barefoot Boy, Mogg Megone, and Madal Muller.

Whittington, Dick. Familiar name of Richard Whittington, lord mayor of London (1397-1398, 1406-1408, 1419-1420). According to popular legend, he was a poor orphan country lad who heard that London was "paved with gold" and went there to earn a living. When he was reduced to starvation, a kind merchant gave him employment in his family as the cook's helper, but the cook so ill-treated him that he ran away. While resting on the roadside, he heard the Bow bells, and they seemed to him to say "Turn again, Whittington, thrice lord mayor of London"; so he returned to his master. His master permitted him, with the other servants, to contribute to a ship bound for Morocco. Richard had nothing but a cat; this, however, he sent. It happened that the king of Morocco was troubled by mice, which Whittington's cat destroyed, and this so pleased his highness that he bought the mower at a fabulous price. Dick commenced business with this money, soon rose to great wealth, married his master's daughter, was knighted, and thrice elected lord mayor of London. Some sources assert that Whittington's "cat" was a brig built on the Norwegian model, with narrow stern, projecting quarters, and deep waist. Others think the word acht, Fr.*, “barter,” furnishes the correct solution. In any event, the other details of the legend, save for the fact of being thrice London's mayor, bear little relationship to the actual facts of Whittington's life.

His work has considerable charm, and an air of straightforwardness and authenticity. Appropriately he met his death on the hunting field.

Wieland, Christoph Martin (1733–1813). German poet and novelist, largely rococo in style. His satirical talent and political awareness are shown in the novel Die Abderiten, eine sehr wahrschonliche Geschichte (The Abderites, a Very Probable Story), 1774), in which the characters and situations are meant to represent actual people and events. His Geschichte der Agathon (Story of Agathon, 1766; final version, 1798), on the other hand, is more deeply psychological novel about the development of a youth in classical Greece, and is important as a predecessor to the Bildungroman novel of education. Other important works include Oberon (1780), an epic; Der deutsche Merkur (The German Mercury, 1797–1803), a periodical edited by him which was a pioneering effort among German literary journals; and translations (1762–1766) of 11 plays of Shakespeare.

Wieland, or The Transformation (1798). A novel by Charles Brockden Brown. Wife of Bath's Tale, The. One of the Canterbury Tales of Geoffrey Chaucer. It is famous for its long Prologue in which the Wife of Bath first argues against the virtues of virginity, and then tells an account of her life with five successive husbands to prove that the married state is happiest when the wife has the sovereignty. She boasts of all the tricks she used to keep her first four husbands in hand. The fifth, half her age, she married for love rather than money; when he made life difficult by reading antifeminist tales to put her in her place, she precipitated a fight and pretended he had nearly killed her, so that he repentantly offered to let her run everything — and thereafter they were tender to each other and never quarreled.

Her tale proves the same point. One of King Arthur's knights is condemned to death for ravishing a maid, but the ladies of the court intervene, and he is given a year to find out "what women most desire" and thus save his life. A foul witch offers to exchange the answer for his obedience to her next request. Accordingly, he pleases the court ladies with the answer that women most desire sovereignty over their husbands and their love, and the hag demands that he marry her. He takes her miserably to bed, and after a long lecture she offers him a choice: she can remain foul and guarantee loving fidelity, or she can become young and fair and probably make him a cuckold. He wisely says that she should make the choice, whereupon she is transformed into a beauty and promises fidelity as well.

Wiggin, Kate Douglas (1856–1923). A widely popular American writer of children's books and novels. She was best known for her The Birds' Christmas Carol (1887) and Rebecca of Sunnybrook Farm.

Wiggesworth, Michael (1631–1705). English-born American poet and clergyman. For most of his life he served as Congregational minister and physician at Malden, Mass. In 1662 he published his most popular poem, The Day of Doom, based on a dream he had had nine days earlier. He also wrote Meat
Out of the Eater (1669), a cycle of short theological poems almost as popular in its day as The Day of Doom, and lesser poems on religious subjects. Another long poem, God's Controversy with New England, was left in manuscript at his death and published in 1871. Considered by some critics Wiggesworth's best work, it is a bitter denunciation of backsliders in the Puritan colony.

Wight, Isle of. An island off the southern coast of England. Notable in literature as the residence of Alfred Tennyson in the latter part of his life.

Wilbur, Richard (1921– ). American poet. Wilbur has taught at Harvard and at Wesleyan universities. His poetry shows the influence of the metaphysical poets, particularly Andrew Marvell, and of Wallace Stevens. Usually rhymed and regular in meter, it is compact, textured, and partakes of both deep feeling and wit. His books include The Beautiful Changers (1947), Ceremony and Other Poems (1950), Things of This World (1956), Poems (1957), and Advice to a Prophet, and Other Poems (1961).

End. The rest of her family are business people intent on property and material success.

Wild, Jonathan (1682–1725). A famous criminal, hanged at Tyburn for housebreaking. Tales of his six wives and of his gang of subordinates have become popular legend. Daniel Defoe made Jonathan Wild the subject of a romance (1725). Henry Fielding did the same in 1743, calling his novel The Life of Mr.
Jonathan Wild the Great. In these romances he is a coward, traitor, hypocrite, and tyrant, unrelieved by human feeling and never betrayed into a kind or good action. The character is historic, but the adventures are in a measure fictitious.

Wild Duck, The (1884). A play by Henrik Ibsen. A satire on meddling, half-baked idealists, a poetic fantasy of illusions, and a realistic tragedy of human weakness, the play is unified by the symbolism of the wild duck and is one of Ibsen's most complex and compelling dramas. Hjalmar Ekdal is a weak, kindly, self-deluding man who believes himself to be on the verge of discovering a great invention;
Gregers Werle, his old schoolfriend, is a crackpot idealist who is determined to free Hjalmar of his comforting—and necessary—illusions. Finally, through Werle's revelations, Hjalmar comes to believe that his beloved daughter, Hedvig, is not his own child. He rejects the girl, and Werle tries to persuade her that her adored father will come back to her if she sacrifices the thing she loves best—the wild duck. Hedvig, crushed by her father's rejection of her, kills herself.

Wilde, Oscar [Fingal O'Flahertie Wills] (1854–1900). Irish-born poet, dramatist, and novelist. During his undergraduate years at Oxford and as a disciple of Walter Pater, he became the leader of an aesthetic movement which advocated "art for art's sake." He attracted a great deal of attention with his aestheticism, wearing long hair, dressing eccentrically, and carrying flowers in his hands while lecturing; the "art for art's sake" group was later satirized in Gilbert and Sullivan's Patience. Wilde was accused of homosexual practices, was tried and found guilty, and sentenced to imprisonment (1895– 1897) with hard labor. On his release, physically, spiritually, and financially ruined, he went to Paris under the name of Sebastian Melmoth. There he lived in bitterness and despair until his death.

See de Profundis; Lord Alfred Douglas.

Wildenbruch, Ernst von (1845-1909). German playwright. His early works, such as Die Karolinger (The Carolingians, 1881) and Vater und Söhne (Fathers and Sons, 1882), are little more than over-theatrical attempts to imitate Schiller. Still, the vigor of his style and his frequent choice of specifically German themes appealed to some of the writers of naturalism; and he himself, in his later Die Haubenlerche (The Crested Lark, 1891), a "social drama," was influenced by naturalistic tendencies.

Wildenvey, Herman Theodore (1886-1959). Norwegian poet. With the publication of his first collection, Nyinger (1907), Wildenvey began a long career as popular lyric poet. His light, graceful, musical poems often depict young love. Among his volumes of verse are Prismer (1911), Kjoertegn (1916), lidorkê streit (1923), and Fikken av sitter (1925).

Wildier, Thornton [Niven] (1897– ). American novelist and playwright, known for his sophisticated and ironic novels and for his successful plays, marked by touches of fantasy and experiments in theatrical technique. In 1926 he wrote The Cabala, an ironic novel of decadent Italian nobility; in the same year his first play, The Trumpet Shall Sound, was produced at a little theater. When his popular Pulitzer Prize-winning novel, The Bridge of San Luis Rey, was published a year later, Wildier's career was launched. From 1930 to 1936 he taught at the University of Chicago. The Angel That Troubled the Waters (1928) and The Long Christmas Dinner (1931) were collections of one-act plays; Heaven's My Destination (1934) was a comic novel. Wildier won his second and third Pulitzer prizes for the ever-popular play Our Town, and for The Skin of Our Teeth. The Merchant of Yonkers (1938), a farcical play, was revived in 1955 as The Matchmaker. The Ides of March (1948) was a witty and learned epistolary novel about Julius Caesar. Wildier is presently working on a cycle of 14 plays, the first three having already been produced under the collective title Plays for Bleeker Street.

Wildove, Damon. See Return of the Native, The.

Wild Goose Chase, The (1621). A comedy by John Fletcher. (See Beaumont and Fletcher.) It chronicles the attempts of the beautiful Oriana to win the love of the roguish Mirabel. She tries to provoke Mirabel's jealousy by having her disguised brother woo her and to awaken his pity by feigning madness. Finally, disguised as the daughter of a man whose life Mirabel once saved, she is able to trick him into a declaration of love. Meanwhile, Pinac and Belleur, Mirabel's companions, have, after many false steps, fallen for the charms of Rosalura and Lillia Bianca.

Wild Huntsman. A spectral hunter of medieval legend. With a pack of spectral dogs, he frequents certain forests and occasionally appears to mortals. One account has it that he was a Jew who would not suffer Jesus to drink out of a watering trough, but pointed to some water in a hoofprint as good enough for "such an enemy of Moses."

The Germans place him in the Black Forest; the French in the Forest of Fontainebleau, and confuse him with St. Hubert; and in England he has become Herne the Hunter, once a keeper in Windsor Forest, who "walks" in wintertime, about midnight, and blasts trees and cattle.

Wild Palms, The (1939). A novel by William Faulkner. The book is composed of two narratives, alternating chapter by chapter. The title story deals with a young intern who falls in love with a married woman and flees with her to different parts of the country, trying to escape the civilization they fear will kill their love. The woman finally dies as the result of an abortion performed on her by her lover, who is imprisoned for life. The second story, later published separately as The Old Man, is also a study of society versus nature, of order juxtaposed with chaos. A convict is sent from prison to do rescue work during the great Mississippi flood of 1927. Finding a pregnant woman stranded by the rising water, he takes her into his boat and attempts to deliver himself and his charge back to the authorities—a task that, because of the violence of the flood, takes almost three months and is rewarded with an extended sentence.

Wilfer, Reginald. In Charles Dickens' Our Mutual Friend, an impoverished clerk in Venner's drug-house, called "R. W." by his friends. In person Wilfer resembles an overgrown cherub; in manner he is shy and retiring.

Mrs. Wilfer. Wilfer's wife, a tall, angular, and majestic woman with a mighty idea of her own importance. "Viper!" "Ingrate!" and such epithets are household words with her.

Bella Wilfer. Daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Wilfer, affectionate spoiled beauty, "giddy from the want of some sustaining purpose, and capricious because she was always fluttering among little things." Bella ultimately marries John Harmon.

Wilhelm II (1859-1941). Emperor or Kaiser of Germany and king of Prussia (1888-1918). After dismissing Bismarck in 1890, he began a threatening foreign policy that aggravated the general instability of Europe. (See Agadir Crisis; Algemeine Konferenz; Alfred von Tirpitz). Although he was called the warlord during World War I, he eventually yielded his leadership of Germany to his generals, Ludendorff and Hindenburg. Upon the insistence of Prince Max he abdicated and fled to Holland.

Wilhelm Meister. The central character of two novels by Johann Wolfgang von Goethe, Wilhelm Meister's Lehrjahre (Wilhelm Meister's Apprenticeship, 1795-1796) and Wilhelm Meisters Wanderjahre oder Die Entagenden (Wilhelm Meister's Travels or The Renunciants, 1829). The first, which is the original and classic example of the Bildungsroman, relates Wilhelm's progress from naïve, excitable youth to responsible manhood. He has dreams of becoming a great playwright and actor, but under the unobtrusive guidance of a mysterious Tower Society, whose existence he does not even suspect, he gradually comes to adopt a more modest and objective view of himself, and in the end, is accepted to membership in the society. The second novel is less of a connected narrative than the first and serves, like Part II of Faust, to allow Goethe to develop his ideas on a wide variety of subjects. In its course, Wilhelm finally discovers his true calling as a surgeon. See MIGNON.

Wilhelm Tell (1804). A play by Friedrich Schiller based on the legend of the famous Swiss hero, Wilhelm Tell. Schiller uses the play, and the figure of Tell, primarily as a vehicle for his own moral and political idealism.

Wilkes, John (1727–1797). English political reformer. A dissipated man of radical sympathies, he joined the fraternity called the Mad Monks of Maidennamk Abbey, otherwise known as the Hell-fire Club. In writing for The North Briton, a newspaper which he founded in 1762, he savagely attacked the government, and his paper was suppressed. Although he later was elected a member of Parliament, he was twice suspended for libel. He was a great favorite of the London mob, and was instrumental in securing certain rights for the people.

Wilkins, Sir George Hubert (1888–1958). Australian polar explorer and aviator. He took part in many Arctic expeditions between 1913 and 1922, and later led many of his own. Perhaps the most famous was the Wilkins-Ellsworth Nautilus Arctic Submarine Expedition, in 1931. He wrote about it in Under the North Pole (1931).

Wilkins, Mary E. See Mary Eleanor Wilkins Freeman.

Willard, Emma (1877–1870). American teacher and writer. In 1814, Miss Willard opened a female seminary in Vermont, where she taught many of the subjects usually barred from the curricula of schools for girls. In 1821, she moved to Troy, N.Y., where her famous school was first called the Troy Female Seminary, and then the Emma Willard School. She also founded the Willard Association for the Mutual Improvement of Female Teachers (1837). She wrote accounts of her travels, advanced a later accepted theory of blood circulation, and wrote verse. Her famous poem, called Rocked in the Cradle of the Deep (1830), was set to music by Joseph P. Knight.

Willard, Frances (1839–1898). American leader of the temperance movement, and teacher. Miss Willard was president of the Women's Christian Temperance Union (1879). She helped to organize the Prohibition Party and wrote Glimpses of Fifty Years (1889) and Woman and Temperance (1883).

He wrote a Latin history of England, the famous Gesta Regum Anglorum, and continued it to 1142 in the sequel Historia Novella (Modern History); both books are important sources of information and lively anecdote, particularly on the period since the Norman conquest in 1066. He also wrote a Gesta Pontificum Anglorum (c. 1125), a history of the bishops and leading monasteries of England, as well as other works of ecclesiastical history and lives of the saints.

William of Newburgh (c. 1136–c. 1198). English historian. His Latin Historia Rerum Anglicarum (History of English Affairs), which covers the period from 1066 to 1158, is notable for its impartial insight into men and situations.

William, Charles (1886–1945). English novelist, poet, playwright, and critic. He wrote Christian thrillers such as All Hallows Eve (1945) which dealt with the conflict between good and evil in terms of sensational adventure, psychology, symbolism, black magic, and fantastic miracles. Peter Stanhope, the hero of Descent Into Hell (1937) is said to be a portrait of T. S. Eliot, whom Williams knew. He was also a friend of C. S. Lewis. Williams' best poetry is his strange, original, symbolic treatment of traditional Arthurian legends in Taliasain Through Logres (1938) and Arthurian Torso (1948), with C. S. Lewis as coauthor.

After a long interval he published The Man Coming Toward You (1940), That's All That Matters (1945), and Selected Poems (1947). Williams has been an ex- tremely successful anthologist, especially with his Little Treasury series. He has also edited other anthologies: The War Poets (1945) and The Pocket Book of Modern Verse (1954).

Williams, Roger (c. 1603–1683). English-born religious leader, founder of the Rhode Island colony. Immigrating to America in 1631, Williams settled in Massachusetts, but his unorthodox religious views and defense of the Indians resulted in his expulsion from the colony. With a few followers he founded a settlement at Providence, R.I. (1636), where he be- friended the Indians and instituted a democratic form of government. He was also the first advocate of complete religious tolerance in America.

Williams' writings include A Key into the Lan- guage of America (1643), a study of Indian languages; Queries of Highest Consideration (1644), a plea addressed to the English Parliament against the establishment of a national church; The Brious Tenent of Persecution, his most famous work; and George Fox Dugged Out of His Barrowes (1670), an attack on the Quakers, uncharacteristic of his toler- ant views.
Williams, Tennessee. Pen name of Thomas Lanier Williams (1914– ). American playwright and writer of fiction. Best known for the primitive violence in his dramas—a quality he believes lurks beneath the surface of modern life—and for his realistic settings that, nevertheless make use of symbolic objects, Williams is often considered the most important American dramatist of the post-World War II era. His first play, Battle of Angels (1940), was unsuccessful; Williams later rewrote it as Orpheus Descending (1957). But with The Glass Menagerie, which won the New York Drama Critics' Circle Award, Williams established himself as an important dramatist. The theme of the lonely woman inhabiting a world of dreams was to remain one of Williams' favorites and was later given a violent turn in the Pulitzer Prize-winning A STREETCAR NAMED DESIRE. Summer and Smoke (1948) deals with a woman who, lost in dreams of her purity, is unable to respond to the man she loves and is driven into lonely spinsterhood. The ROSE TATTOO is a humorous and sympathetic treatment of a Sicilian-American woman. More controversial was Camino Real (1953), an experimental play whose characters include Casanova, Don Juan, and Kilroy, the ubiquitous American G.I.* Cat on a Hot Tin Roof*, which won for Williams his second Pulitzer Prize, deals with the tensions and pretensions of a wealthy Southern family. Suddenly, Last Summer (1958), produced with Something Unspoken under the title Garden District, concerns a possessive mother and a homosexual son who use others for their own selfish purposes. The son is killed and devoured by a mob of starving children. Later plays include Sweet Bird of Youth (1959), Period of Adjustment (1960), The Night of the Iguana (1961), and The Milk Train Doesn't Stop Here Anymore (1963).

Williams is also the author of The Roman Spring of Mrs. Stone (1950), a novel; Hard Candy (1954), a collection of short stories; and Twenty-Seventeen Wagons Full of Cotton and Other One-Act Plays, a collection of short plays later made into the movie Baby Doll (1956).

Williams, Ralph Vaughan. See Ralph Vaughan Williams.

Williams, William Carlos (1883–1963). American poet. He is known for his vivid, realistic, and precise recording in poetry of isolated, fleeting, and easily overlooked details of experience, chosen most often from a background of daily, commonplace living in the urban sections of the 20th-century U.S. Williams early knew Ezra Pound and Hilda Doolittle, and although he remained free from the mainstream of imagism, the movement left its mark in his insistence that there are no poetic ideas except in things themselves.

The son of an English father and a Puerto Rican mother, Williams attended various schools, both in the U.S. and in Europe, and took medical training at the University of Pennsylvania, where he first knew Ezra Pound. For over 50 years he practiced medicine in Rutherford, NJ, publishing his first book of poems in 1909. Then followed numerous volumes of verse, later collections including Journey to Love (1955) and Sappho (1957). His poems were twice collected, in 1934 and 1938, and his collected early poems were issued in 1951. In 1946 the first book of Paterson appeared. Williams' most ambitious effort, the poem eventually included five books, the last published in 1958.

Primarily known as a poet, Williams also wrote numerous works of prose, both fiction and nonfiction. In The American Grain is the most important of his work in the latter category. His fiction includes the novels A Voyage to Pagany (1929), White Mule (1937), and In the Money: White Mule, Part II (1940). The Knife of the Times (1932) and Life Along the Passaic River (1938) are collections of short stories. He also wrote several plays, including A Dream of Love (1948). The Autobiography of William Carlos Williams (1951) is a helpful and informative work. Selected Essays were published in 1954 and The Selected Letters of William Carlos Williams, in 1957. Williams won the Pulitzer Prize for poetry posthumously in 1963.

The natural son of Robert the Devil, duke of Normandy in France, William was a relative of Edward the Confessor, and married a descendant of Alfred the Great. Harold, earl of Wessex, had been forced by William (c. 1064) to swear to help him obtain the English succession. When Harold took the crown himself upon Edward's death, William invaded England and won the battle of Hastings (1066); as King William I he completed the "Norman Conquest," replacing the English nobility with Norman-French, and thus changing the social and eventually the cultural structure of England.

William Wilson (1839). A story by Edgar Allan Poe. An alter ego, the voice of conscience, begins to haunt William Wilson, while he is still at school. Willis, Nathaniel Parker (1806–1867). American editor and writer. He served as foreign correspondent for the New York Mirror and published books of European tales. Willis advocated the use of an American language, inventing many new words; a member of the Knickerbocker School, he sought to foster a national literature. Willis' only popular piece today is the moralistic poem called Unseen Spirits. He wrote one novel, Paul Vane, or, Parts of a Life Elie Untold (1857).

willow pattern. A favorite design for china, usually blue on white. It imitates, but does not copy, the Chinese style of porcelain decoration, introduced into England by Thomas Turner of Caughey about 1780, when the craze for things Chinese was at its height. Wilson, Angus (1913– ). English novelist and short-story writer. He maliciously satirizes almost all aspects of the lives of his large, Dickensian cast of characters. Most of his novels are about middle-aged or elderly people who have to recognize their past self-deceptions and readjust to society. Among his novels are Hemlock and After, Anglo-Saxon Attitudes, The Middle Age of Mrs. Eliot, and The Old Men at the Zoo. Some collections of short stories are The Wrong Set (1949), Such Darling Dodos (1950), and A Bit Off the Map (1957). The Mulberry Bush (1955) is a play. The Wild Garden (1964) is a non-fiction work in which Wilson attempts to explore the sources of his own creativity.

Wilson, Edmund (1895– ). American literary critic, novelist, poet, and editor. After his graduation from Princeton, where he was editor of a literary magazine, Wilson became a journalist. He performed editorial functions for the magazines Vanity Fair and the New Republic, and wrote book reviews and critical articles for the New Yorker. Wilson studied Hebrew and biblical manuscripts and in Scrolls from the Dead Sea (1955) revealed both his scholarship and reportorial skill. He edited an anthology of criticism by authors called The Shock of Recognition (1943), and in The Crack-Up (1956) he put together uncollected pieces by F. Scott Fitzgerald, whom he had known at Princeton. Memoirs of Hecate County (1946), a collection of short stories, was banned after publication because of the candid treatment of sex in one story.

Among Wilson's volumes of literary criticism are Axel's Castle (1931), The Wound and the Bow (1941), and Patriotic Gore: Studies in the Literature of the American Civil War (1962). He also wrote To the Finland Station (1940), an account of socialist thought; Travels in Two Democracies (1936) and Red, Black, Blond and Olive (1956), two books reflecting his travel experiences in Russia; Five Plays (1954), a collection of his own work; Poets, Farewell (1929), a book of verse; and I Thought of Daisy (1929), a novel. In The Cold War and the Income Tax (1963), Wilson, who did not file tax returns from 1946 to 1955, related his difficulties with the Internal Revenue Service and his disenchantment with American civilization.

Wilson, Harry Leon (1857–1939). American novelist and playwright. He is best known for Ruggles of Red Gap (1915), a humorous novel about an English butler in a Western town, and Merton of the Movies (1922), about a small-town clerk who finally reaches Hollywood. Merton was dramatized in 1922 by Marc Connolly and George S. Kaufman. Wilson also collaborated with Booth Tarkington on The Man from Home (1907), a play.

Wilson, John. Pen name, Christopher North (1785–1854). Scottish writer. He is remembered for his contribution to Blackwood's Magazine of the greater part of the Noctes Ambrosianae. He was among the first to recognize the genius of Wordsworth.

Wilson, [Thomas] Woodrow (1856–1924). 27th president of the U.S. (1913–1921). Born in Staunton, Va., Wilson took his B.A. at Princeton University, studied law at the University of Virginia, and obtained a Ph.D. in history and political science at Johns Hopkins University, writing his doctoral dissertation on Congressional Government (1885). In 1890 he became professor of jurisprudence and political economics at Princeton and in 1902 was unanimously chosen president of the university. While there he did much to improve its academic standards and to democratize its social system.

Always keenly interested in politics, Wilson resigned from Princeton in 1910 to become the Democratic candidate for governor of New Jersey. Though he was supported by the state's conservative machine, he won election on a reform platform, and during his brief term he waged a successful fight against his former backers and enacted several liberal social and economic measures. At the Democratic national convention in 1912 Wilson was nominated after William Jennings Bryan threw his support to him, and he won the election as a result of the feud between Theodore Roosevelt and William Howard Taft that split the opposition.

Wilson was a moderate on political and economic questions, but his banking and tariff reforms were regarded as radical. As president, he gave new meaning to the "general welfare" clause of the Constitution, supplied vigorous executive leadership to Congress and to his party, and fought privilege. But he was unable to complete his projects for domestic reform because of the outbreak of the European War in 1914. Although Wilson tried to avoid U.S. participation in the conflict and won reelection in 1916 with the slogan "he kept us out of war," repeated German violations of American neutrality led him to ask Congress for a declaration of war in 1917, affirming that "the world must be made safe for democracy." (See LUSITANIA.) On Jan. 8, 1918, he announced a program of Fourteen Points as the basis for world peace.

After the cessation of hostilities, Wilson attended the Paris Peace Conference at the head of an American delegation conspicuous for the absence of senators and for the inclusion of only one Republican. Although he was the idol of the European masses, he was forced to make numerous concessions at the conference table in order to salvage his dream of a League of Nations that would ensure world peace. But the U.S. Senate refused to ratify the treaty of Versailles, and Wilson, who refused to compromise with “the little group of wilful men” who were blocking the treaty, decided to take his case to the people. During a strenuous speaking tour, he suffered a stroke at Pueblo, Colo., and never fully recovered.

Wilson's writings include The State (1889), Division and Reunion (1893), George Washington (1897), A History of the American People (1902), and Constitutional Government (1908). His early essays and lectures were collected in An Old Master and Other Political Essays (1893) and More Literature and Other Essays (1896).

Winckelmann, Johann Joachim (1717-1768). German classical scholar, especially interested in painting and sculpture. He originated the concept of classical Greece as the home of “edle Einfalt und Stille Grosse”, an ideal that influenced Weimar Classicism. The final step in the destruction of Winckelmann's conception of Greece was taken by Friedrich Nietzsche in The Birth of Tragedy.

Wind in the Willows, The (1908). A classic fantasy for children by Kenneth Grahame. The characters are Mole, Water Rat, Mr. Toad, and other small animals, who live and talk like humans, but have charring individual animal characters. The book is a tender portrait of the English countryside.

Windmills, to Fight With. To face imaginary adversaries, combat chimeras. The allusion is to the adventure of Don Quixote, who, when riding through the plains of Montiel, approaches 30 or 40 windmills, which he declares to Sancho Panza are “giants, two leagues in length or more.” Striking his spurs into Rosinante, he drives at one of the “monsters dreadful as Typhoeus.” His lance lodges in the sail, and the latter lifts both man and beast into the air. When the valiant knight and his steed fall are both mortally wounded, and Don Quixote declares that the enchanter Freston, “who carried off his library with all the books therein,” had changed the giants into windmills.

Wind, Sand, and Stars (Terre des hommes; 1939). A series of tales and reflection by Antoine de Saint-Exupéry. Exupéry expresses a faith in the potential courage, nobility, and love of men, including the tiller of the earth as well as the explorer of unknown skies.

Windsor, duke of (1894- ). Former king of Great Britain. The son of George V and Queen Mary, he ascended the throne as Edward VIII upon the death of his father in 1936. When it became known that the king planned to wed Mrs. Wallis Warfield Simpson, a twice-divorced American woman, he encountered the opposition of the Conservative ministry under Stanley Baldwin, who forced him to choose between her and the crown. He reported his decision in a memorable abdication speech, heard by a worldwide radio audience, in which he declared, “I have found it impossible to carry the heavy burden of responsibility and to discharge my duties as King as I would wish to do without the help and support of the woman I love.” Edward, now known as the duke of Windsor, married Mrs. Simpson in 1937. From 1940 to 1945 he served as governor of the Bahamas. The duke recounted his life up to 1936 in A King's Story (1951).

Winesburg, Ohio (1919). A collection of 23 short stories by Sherwood Anderson. Most of the stories are connected by George Willard, a young reporter, who in undergoing the trials of adolescence is also in revolt against the barren narrowness of small-town life. Other characters have their own stories, often tales of sterility and thwarted happiness. The language of the book is simple and realistic, and many of the stories are told with a controlled lyric beauty.

Winfield, Arthur M. See Rover Boys.

Wings of the Dove, The (1902). A novel by Henry James. Kate Croy is in love with the English journalist Merton Densher, but will not marry him until he is financially secure. When she discovers that her friend Milly Theale, an American heiress, has not long to live, she tells Densher to take an interest in Milly, who promptly falls in love with him. Before her death, Milly learns of Kate and Densher's true relationship, but she nevertheless leaves Densher her money. When the legacy in the form of a check arrives, Densher is anxious to refuse it. Kate, however, demands that he accept the money or promise that he is not in love with Milly's memory. When Densher can agree to neither of these, their romance is terminated. An opera based on the novel was produced in 1961 with libretto by Ethan Ayer and music by Douglas Moore.

Winifred, St. The patron saint of virgins. She was beheaded by Prince Cadoc for refusing to marry him. She was Welsh by birth, and the legend says that her head falling on the ground originated the famous healing well of St. Winifred in Flintshire. Holywell, in Wales, is St. Winifred's Well, celebrated for its “miraculous” virtues.

Winkler, Arnold von. Legendary hero of Switzerland. According to tradition he sacrificed himself at the battle of Sempach against the Austrians (1386) by rushing ahead of his companions and burying in his own body all the pikes of the enemy he could gather together. This created a gap in the Austrian front and enabled the Swiss to win a great victory.

Winkle, Nathaniel. In Charles Dickens' Pickwick Papers, an M.P.C. (Member of the Pickwick Club). He is a young sportsman, considered by his companions to be a dead shot, a hunter, and skater, among other things. All these acquirements are, however, wholly imaginary. He marries Arabella Allen.

and play The Rats of Norway (1932). The Shining Hour (1934) was popular in the U.S.

Winters, Arthur Yvor (1900– ). American poet and critic. Winters' criticism is considered part of the New Criticism in its close analysis of the literary work, but it differs in its insistence on moral evaluation: a poem must contain a rational statement about human experience. His books of criticism include Primitivism and Decadence: A Study of American Experimental Poetry (1937); Mauve's Curse: Seven Studies in the History of American Obscurantism (1938); The Anatomy of Nonsense (1942); In Defense of Reason (1947), a collection of his first three books; Edward Arlington Robinson (1946); The Function of Criticism: Problems and Exercises (1957); and books on the poetry of Yeats (1960) and of J. V. Cunningham (1961).

In his poetry, Winters adheres to his critical theories on the necessity for balance between reason and emotion. His books of poetry include Immobile Wind (1921), The Magpie's Shadow (1922), The Bare Hills (1927), Before Disaster (1934), Poems (1940), and Collected Poems (1952). He was awarded a Bollingen Prize in 1960.

Winterset (1935). A verse drama by Maxwell Anderson. Based on the Sacco-Vanzetti case, it deals with the son of an Italian radical whose father was executed for a murder he did not commit. In seeking to avenge himself on the actual murderer, the son, Mio, falls in love with Miraanne, the sister of one of the criminals. Through her love Mio is saved from the need for revenge, but both are killed by gangsters. Anderson had used the Sacco-Vanzetti theme successfully in an earlier play, Gods of the Lightning (1928, with Harold Hickerson).

Winter's Tale, The (c. 1611). A comedy by William Shakespeare. Polixenes, king of Bohemia, is invited to Sicilia by King Leontes and unwittingly excites the jealousy of his friend because he prolongs his stay at the entreaty of Queen Hermione. Leontes orders Camillo to poison the royal guest, but instead of doing so, Camillo flees with him to Bohemia. Leontes now casts Hermione into prison, and orders that her infant daughter be abandoned on some deserted shore. Although the Delphic oracle asserts Hermione's innocence, Leontes remains unconvinced. After falling into a deep swoon, Hermione is reported dead. Leontes, now deeply repentant, goes into mourning. Sixteen years later, Florizel, the son of Polixenes, falls in love with Perdita, Leontes' lost daughter, who has been reared by a shepherd who found her near "the coast of Bohemia." When Polixenes forbids his son to marry a lowly shepherdess, the lovers, aided by Camillo flee to Sicilia. Their identity of Perdita is revealed, and the lovers are married. Leontes and Polixenes, who has followed the fugitives, resume their friendship. Only the memory of the wronged Hermione mars the happiness of Leontes. He is then shown a perfect statue of Hermione which turns out to be the queen herself, who has been living in seclusion.

The play is based on Robert Greene's romance, Pandosto: The Triumph of Time (1588), and the character of the rogue Autolycus is derived from the second of Greene's "Conny-catching" pamphlets (1591–1592).

Winther, Rasmus Villads Christian Ferdinand (1796–1876). Danish poet. Two subjects dominated Winther's poetry: his love for woman's and nature's beauty. His finest piece of work is Hortens Flugt (The Flight of the Stag, 1855), an epic poem set in the Middle Ages, which describes his native Zealand. Among Winther's verse collections are Sang og Sagn (1839), Lyriske Digte (1848), Brogede Blade (1863) and Efterlade Digte (1879).

Wintrop, John (1588–1649). English-born leader of the Puritan exodus to America and governor of the Massachusetts Bay Colony 12 times. Orthodox and grave, he was a bitter opponent of Anne Hutchinson. Using the Bible as proof, he combated the idea of democratic government and argued that there was "no such government in Israel." More than any other man he shaped the character of early New England. His Journal, partly published in 1790, appeared in full as The History of New England from 1630 to 1649 (1825–1826). He is portrayed in Hawthorne's The Scarlet Letter (1850).

Winwar, Frances (1900– ). Italian-born American biographer and novelist. Her family name was originally Vinciguerra, Winwar being the English translation. She is known for her highly colored, but usually accurate, biographies of famous people. Among these are The Ardent Flame (1927), about Francesca de Rimini; Poor Splendid Wings (1933), about the Pre-Raphaelites; The Romantic Rebels (1935), concerning Keats, Shelley, and Byron; Oscar Wilde and the Yellow '90s (1940); The Life of the Heart (1945), about George Sand; and Immortal Lovers (1950), about the Brownings. Wister, Owen (1860–1938). American novelist, short-story writer, and biographer. The grandson of the actress Fanny Kemble, Wister is best known for The Virginian, a book whose hero became a prototype for later Westerns. He was a close friend and admirer of Theodore Roosevelt, to whom The Virginian is dedicated. Philosophy Four (1903) is a story of undergraduate life at Harvard. Lady Baltimore (1906) is a romantic novel laid in a Southern city. He also wrote Lin McLean (1897), six sketches and a poem about a Wyoming cowboy; a biography of U. S. Grant (1900); and Roosevelt: The Story of a Friendship (1930).

Witch (A.S. wicccian, to practice sorcery). A sorceress. The typical witch is usually pictured as an old hag. There are many celebrated witches of history and legend, beginning perhaps with the Witch of Endor who, according to the Biblical narrative, called up the prophet Samuel from the dead to answer King Saul's questions concerning the fateful battle in which he would meet his death. The most famous witches in literature are the Three Weird Sisters whose prophecies concerning Macbeth started him on his ambitious and tragic course.

Pope Innocent VIII issued the celebrated bull Summis Desiderantes in 1484, directing inquisitors and others to put to death all practitioners of witchcraft and other diabolical arts, and it has been computed that as many as nine million persons suffered death for witchcraft since that date. In the Massachusetts colony, witches in Salem were hanged or pressed to death.

Witches' Sabbath. The muster at nighttime of witches and demons to concoct mischief. The witch first anointed her feet and shoulders with the fat of a murdered babe, then mounting a broomstick, distaff, or rake, made her exit by the chimney, and rode through the air to the place of rendezvous. The assembled witches feasted together, and concluded with a dance, in which they all turned their backs to each other. Especially during medieval and Renaissance times, Walpurgis Night was believed to fall on April 30. James Joyce's Ulysses and Thomas Mann's Magic Mountain contain scenes based on the tradition of the witches' Sabbath. Hawthorne's Young Goodman Brown is a famous short story about a New England witches' Sabbath.

Wither, George (1588–1667). English poet, one of the Spenserian school of the early 17th century. The verse publications upon which his reputation as a poet is based include The Shepherd's Pipe (1614), a collection of elegies to which William Browne and John Davies also contributed; Shepherd's Hunting (1615); Fidelia (1615); and Fair Virtue (1622). He is also remembered for his Collection of Emblems, Ancient and Modern (1635), an emblem book. Later Wither became a Puritan, writing numerous controversial pamphlets, hymns, and psalms of rather inferior quality. He served in the Parliamentary army during the Civil War and on one occasion was saved from hanging by the Royalists by the plea of Sir John Denham that "whilst [Wither] lived, he [Denham] should not be the worst poet in England".

With Fire and Sword. The first of a trilogy of historical novels (1890–1893) by Sienkiewicz dealing with the history of Poland from 1648 to the time of Yan III. With Fire and Sword has as its subject the struggle between Russia and Poland. In the second novel, The Deluge, the subjects treated are the settlement of the Teutonic Knights in Prussia, the union of Lithuania and Poland with Russia brought about by the marriage of a Lithuanian prince and Polish princess, and the conflict between Poland and Sweden in 1665. Pan Michael, the third novel of the series, continues and concludes the history of Poland as a separate nation of former centuries.

Within the Gates (1933). A drama by Sean O'Casey. The setting is a London park, where a Bishop comes to learn more of the common people. He hears of their bitterness, dreams, frustrations, and weaknesses; and discovers that the Young Whore is his own daughter. After she dies, affirming her faith in life, the Bishop is overcome with shame at his past sin.
and his former smugness. There are many references to social injustice, poverty, morality, and religion, and frequent songs and chants by single characters and a chorus.

Witla, Eugene. The hero of Theodore Dreiser's novel The "Genius." The character is to a considerable extent autobiographical.

Witte, Count Sergei Yulievich (1849-1915). Russian statesman and administrator. Having started his career as a railway station agent, Witte rose to become, in turn, minister of communications and minister of finance. He was responsible for the rapid expansion of Russia's railway system, the building of the Trans-Siberian Railway, and the industrialization of Russia in the late 19th century. In 1905-1906, Witte served as the first constitutional prime minister in Russia.

Wittgenstein, Ludwig (1889-1951). An Austrian philosopher and professor at Cambridge University. In his highly regarded books Tractatus Logico-Philosophicus (1922) and Philosophical Investigations (1953), he proposed a critical method of linguistic analysis as the solution to most philosophic problems, which were the result, he argued, not of difficulty or inadequate knowledge, but of the systematic misuse of language by philosophers. "Philosophy," he said, "is a battle against the bewitchment of our intelligence by means of language." His work was a leading influence on LOGICAL POSITIVISM.

Wodehouse, P[elham] G[renville] (1881- ). English writer and humorist. He is known for numerous popular stories and novels about his whimsical upper-class characters: the Honourable Bertie Wooster, Psmith, Mr. Mulliner, Jeeves, the butler, and assorted peers. Much of the humor stems from the idle gentleman. The books contain fantasy, affectionate satire, and the absurd comic situations of farce. The style is very elaborate, full of verbal ingenuity, mock pomposity, and unexpected slang. Among his many books are Leave It to Psmith (1922), The Inimitable Jeeves (1919), The Code of the Woosters (1933), Bertie Sees It Through (1955), and Author! Author! (1962). Performing Flea (1952) is an autobiography and apologia. Wodehouse also has written and collaborated on a number of successful plays and musical comedies.

Woden. The Anglo-Saxon form of Odin, chief of the Scandinavian gods. From his name is derived the word Wednesday (Woden's Day).

Woe from Wit (Core ot uma; 1822-1824). A comic drama in verse by Aleksandr Gribyev. A young nobleman, Aleksandr Andreeyevich Chatzki, returns to his native land, after a homesick tour of Europe. The pettiness of Russian society is all the more apparent to his eager eyes, and he loudly complaints of his disenchantment. His outspokenness causes him to be ostracized. In the end he stands alone, rejected by his sweetheart and buffeted by malicious rumors that he is insane.

One of the outstanding features of the play is its biting, pungent language in rhymed iambic verse. Many of the lines have become popular proverbial phrases.

Wolcot, John. Pen name: Peter Pindar (1738-1819). English poet and physician, whose works include Lyric Odes to the Royal Academicians (1782) and Epistle to the Emperor of China (1717). His numerous satires incurred the wrath of William Gifford and James Boswell.

Wolf, Friedrich August (1759-1824). German philologist and Homeric scholar. His theory, that Homer's Iliad and Odyssey were the work of not one man but of several writers, was expounded in his Prolegomena ad Homerum (1795). His scholarly editions of Plato, Homer, Cicero and others are still sound.

Wolddietrich. See ORTNEIT.

Wolfe, Charles (1791-1823). Irish poet. The duties of a country curacy and an early death prevented Wolfe's leaving behind more than a single volume, the posthumous Remains (1825), but he has to his credit the most enduring of the Napoleonic war poems, The Burial of Sir John Moore (1816).

Wolfe, James (1777-1799). English general who defeated Montcalm in the battle of the Plains of Abraham at Quebec. Both Wolfe and Montcalm were fatally wounded. Wolfe is a prominent character in Thackeray's The Virginians and in Parkman's Montcalm and Wolfe.

Wolfe, Thomas [Clayton] (1900-1938). American novelist. He was known for the intense individualism, extreme exuberance of spirit, frequently extravagant rhetoric, and mystical celebration of youth, sex, and America which characterize his usually autobiographical writings.

Wolfe was born in Asheville, N.C. At 15, he entered the University of North Carolina, where, with the encouragement of Frederick Koch, he wrote two plays which were produced by Koch's Carolina Playmakers: The Return of Buck Gavin (1924) and The Third Night (1938). At Harvard he studied playwriting under George Pierce Baker, writing Welcome to Our City (produced at Harvard, 1923) and working on Mannerhouse (1948), a play about the disintegration of a Southern family. Wolfe later taught at New York University and made several trips to Europe.

His first novel, Look Homeward, Angel, was submitted to Maxwell Perkins of Charles Scribner's Sons as a huge, sprawling manuscript. Working with Perkins, Wolfe was able to bring the book to manageable size. After a short novel, A Portrait of Bascom Hawke (1932), Wolfe completed another massive manuscript, which, like his first novel, had as its hero the autobiographical Eugene Gant. After much editing the book was published as Of Time and the River. In 1935 Wolfe published a collection of short stories, From Death to Morning, and the following year published a lecture he had given on his own work, The Story of a Novel.

Wolfe's final work was done with the help of another editor, Edward C. Aswell of Harper & Brothers. In 1938 Wolfe suddenly died, leaving behind an eight-foot pile of manuscript which Aswell published as two novels and a book of short stories: The Web and the Rock, You Can't Go Home Again, and The Hills Beyond (1941). Wolfe's...
Letters to His Mother (1943) were edited by John Terry, and a further collection of Letters (1956) was made by Elizabeth Nowell.

Wolfert's Roost (1855). A collection of tales and sketches by Washington Irving. Irving published the magazine pieces in an attempt to duplicate his earlier successes with similar volumes. Descriptions of Westchester County alternate with American fables and Spanish romances. The title of the book comes from the home Irving bought and remodeled as Sunnyside.

Wolfram von Eschenbach (c. 1170–c. 1220). German minnesinger, or lyric poet. He is known for three verse epics, Parzival, Willehalm, and Tristan, as well as a collection of love lyrics. His handling of chivalric themes often rebukes the usual traditions of knighthood and courtly love, for instead of making women necessarily either sinful temptations or the objects of a grand but adulterous passion, he glorifies married love and a calmer kind of real affection.

Wolfram becomes a major character in Wagner's opera Tannhäuser; he is a close friend of Tannhäuser, although he is also secretly in love with Elisabeth. See Wartburg.

Wolfskehl, Karl (1869–1948). German poet. He was a member of the circle about Stefan George, which often met at his house. Apart from his poetical writings, he published a volume of essays, Bild und Gesetze (Image and Law, 1930), and was co-editor with George of a collection entitled Deutsche Dichtung (German Poetry, 1901–1903).

Wolf Solent (1929). A novel by J. C. Powys. Wolf Solent is a London teacher who returns to the Dorset village of his childhood (the Hardy country), seeking peace. The story is concerned with love, lust, mysticism, and the forces of nature.

Wollstonecraft, Mary (1759–1797). English author, best known for her Vindication of the Rights of Woman (1792), an argument for equality of women. In 1797 she married William Godwin and died when their daughter Mary, later Mary Wollstonecraft Shelley, was born.

Wolsey, Thomas (c. 1475–1530). English Cardinal and Lord Chancellor. Wolsey became Privy Councillor to Henry VIII in 1511, and was appointed Cardinal in 1515, the same year that he became Lord Chancellor. He had ambitions to become Pope, and cultivated a friendship with the Emperor Charles V to gain that end, but failed to be elected. When Henry wished to divorce Catherine of Aragon, Wolsey attempted to secure a divorce from the Pope—a course doomed to slow failure because Charles V, Catherine's nephew, effectively controlled the Papacy. Henry, displeased with Wolsey's conduct of the affair, deprived him of his offices (1529). A moving account of Wolsey's dismissal is given in Shakespeare's Henry VIII, in which Wolsey's famous farewell is, however, generally thought to be the work of John Fletcher.

Woman in White, The (1860). A mystery novel by Wilkie Collins. The plot hinges on the resemblance of Laura Fairlie, an English heiress, to Anne Catherick, a mysterious woman in white, confined in a lunatic asylum. In order to secure Laura's money, the unscrupulous Sir Percival Glyde thrusts her into the asylum in place of the dying Anne, but this villainy is finally exposed by her faithful lover, Walter Hartright. A subsidiary villain is the subtle, sardonic Count Fosco.

Woman Killed with Kindness, A (1603). A tragedy by Thomas Heywood. Mistress Anne, the sister of Sir Francis Acton, is married to John Frankford. Unwittingly, Frankford admits to his home the charming Master Wendell, who succeeds in seducing Anne. Hearing rumors of this, Frankford surprises the two and banishes Anne forever from his sight, although he provides for her care and maintenance. Carrying the burden of her own guilt and her husband's "kindness," Anne pines and dies, having been reconciled with her husband on her deathbed.

Woman of No Importance, A (1893). A play by Oscar Wilde. The chief characters are Gerald Arbuthnot, his mother, and Lord Illingworth, a nobleman who has offered to make George his secretary. Mrs. Arbuthnot tries in vain to persuade George to refuse the offer. Only later, when George is about to attack Illingworth for kissing his fiancée Hester, does his mother confess that the nobleman is his father, who had seduced her as "a woman of no importance."

Woman Who Rode Away, The (1928). A short story by D. H. Lawrence. Containing some of the clearest statements of Lawrence's own beliefs, it is a sequel to The Rainbow, and describes the later life of Ursula Brangwen and her sister Gudrun, a sculptor. Gudrun falls in love with Gerald Crich, a mining industrialist, but their relationship is marred by their possessive, destructive approach to love. In contrast, Ursula marries Rupert Birkin, a school inspector and spokesman for Lawrence, with whom she achieves an ideal sensual union. Birkin says that modern men exist in a living death because he allows his passionate, unconscious, true self to be imprisoned by his own intellect and by the pressures of industrial society. Man's salvation lies in his making a good, passionate marriage in which the lovers recognize each other's true separateness. He must complete his happiness by a different but similarly deep friendship with another man. Birkin offers this friendship to Gerald, who rejects it. When his affair with Gudrun ends, Gerald destroys himself in the mountains of the Tyrof, where they are all on vacation. The novel has a minimum of plot and action, but a great deal of philosophical discussion and description of the characters' emotional states and unconscious drives. Many of the ideas are expressed through symbolism. The characters and relationships in the novel are probably partially based on those of Lawrence and his wife Frieda Lawrence, John Middleton Murry and his wife Katherine Mansfield. The friends shared a house in England in 1914–1915.

His Athenae Oxonienses (1691–1692) is a biographical dictionary listing famous Oxford graduates from the year 1500.

Wood, Charles Erskine Scott (1852–1944). American poet. His verse expresses his humanitarian and radical sympathies. In his early life, Wood served in the U.S. Army in the West, resigning because of the injustices against the Indians. He became a lawyer and, late in life, began writing. His best-known works are The Poet in the Desert (1915), a poetic dialogue on social injustice, and Heavenly Discourse (1927), a satire on war, injustice, and other social evils. He also wrote Maia (1918), Circe (1919), Poems from the Ranges (1929), and Sonnets to Sappho (1940).

Wood, Grant (1892–1942). American painter. He is known for his stark, often quietly ironical pictures of the Middle West, such as American Gothic or Daughters of the Revolution.

Wood, Mrs. Henry. Born Ellen Price (1814–1887). English novelist. Her enormously successful, frequently dramatized novel East Lynne came to epitomize the lurid, tear-jerking melodrama of the later 19th century. No longer read now, she was a crude, sensational, prolific, and highly popular writer in her day.

Woodberry, George E[dward] (1855–1930). American critic, teacher, and poet. Still remembered for his teaching of comparative literature at Columbia University, Woodberry wrote poetry that is little known today. His critical studies, however, are still valuable, especially the biographies of Hawthorne (1902), Emerson (1907), and Poe (2 vols., 1909). He also edited with E. C. Stedman the 10-volume Works of Edgar Allan Poe (1894–1895). Among his other prose works are Makers of Literature (1900), America in Literature (1903), The Appreciation of Literature (1907), and The Inspiration of Poetry (1910). His books of poetry include The North Shore Watch (1890), Wild Eden (1899), Ideal Passion (1917), and The Rosamer, and Other Poems (1920).

Woodcraft, or The Sword and the Distaff (1854). A novel by William Gilmore Simms. The book is set in the Charleston, S.C. area during 1782; the withdrawal of the British troops in December of that year is the chief historical event. Captain Poroy and his demobilized but loyal fellow soldiers return to his plantation to repair wartime devastation. Pory's rescues his slaves and those of the charming widow, Mrs. Eveleigh, from the scheming British officers and their dishonest American conspirators. He also pays the widow ardent but unsuccessful court. Because of Simms's favorable treatment of the lives of the slaves under their old masters, the book has been called his answer to Uncle Tom's Cabin.

Woodhull, Virginia Claflin (1838–1927). American reformer and lecturer. As a child, Victoria Woodhull gave spiritualistic performances, sold patent medicines, and told fortunes with her traveling family. Twice married, she moved to New York with her sister, Tennessee Celeste Claflin. The two sisters were befriended by Cornelius Vanderbilt, Sr., and founded Woodhull and Claflin's Weekly (1870–1876), a periodical devoted to social and political reform; they defended women's rights and free love. The first English translation of the Communist Manifesto (1872) and the story of the notorious Beecher-Tilton affair appeared in the Weekly. The Equal Rights party nominated Victoria Woodhull for President in 1872, with Frederick Douglass as her running mate. Moving to England, she married the scion of a wealthy banking family; her sister Tennessee married a baronet. With her daughter, Zulu Maud Woodhull, Victoria published a periodical entitled Humanitarian (1892–1901). Among the articles and pamphlets Victoria Woodhull wrote were Origins, Tendencies and Principles of Government (1871), Stirpiculture (1888), and The Alchemy of Maternity (1889). She and her sister are regarded as the models for Audacia Dangereyes in Harriet Beecher Stowe's novel My Wife and I (1871).

Woodstock (1826). A novel by Sir Walter Scott, dealing with the escapes of Charles II during the Commonwealth and his final triumphant entry into London. Shakespeare, Jonson, and Milton are among the minor characters.

Woolf, Leonard [Sidney] (1880–1960). English writer on politics and economics; husband of Virginia Woolf. As a young man he was in the Ceylon Civil Service and his earliest books were set in Ceylon; The Wordsworth, Dorothy

Village and the Jungle (1913) is a novel exposing some of the evils of colonialism. He was a member of the Fabian Society. Among his other works are Socialism and Co-operation (1921); Hunting the Highbrow (1927); The Hotel (1939), a play; and Principia Politica (1953). In 1917 he and his wife founded the Hogarth Press.

Wooll, [Adeline] Virginia (1882-1941). English novelist, critic, and essayist. The daughter of Sir Leslie Stephen and wife of Leonard Woolf, she was a member of the Bloomsbury group. An exact contemporary of James Joyce, she is known, like him, as an experimenter and innovator in novel writing, especially in her use of the techniques of interior monologue and stream of consciousness. Her novels are noted for their poetic and symbolic quality. They are also known for their delicacy and sensitivity of style, their psychological penetration, their evocation of place and mood, and their background of historical and literary reference. Many of her novels are concerned with time, its passage, and the difference between external and inner time. Virginia Woolf was probably influenced by the ideas of Henri Bergson.

Her first two novels, The Voyage Out (1915) and Night and Day (1919), are fairly conventional and realistic. These were followed by Jacob’s Room, Mrs. Dalloway, To the Lighthouse, Orlando, The Waves, The Years, and Between the Acts. Her collections of short stories are Monday or Tuesday (1921) and A Haunted House (1944). She also wrote a great deal of literary criticism and many essays. Among her nonfictional works are Mrs. Bennett and Mrs. Brown (1924); The Common Reader (1925, 1932), two series of literary essays; A Room of One’s Own; Flush (1933), on the spaniel pet of Elizabeth Barrett Browning; Three Guineas (1938), about women’s emancipation (Virginia Woolf was an ardent feminist); Roger Fry (1940), a biography; The Death of the Moth and Other Essays (1942); and A Writer’s Diary (1953).

In the home of her father, Sir Leslie Stephen, Virginia Woolf was reared in an atmosphere of literature and learning, receiving her education in her father’s own extensive library and meeting many of the outstanding authors of the day. She was related to a number of the most distinguished scholarly families in England, such as the Darwins, the Symondses, and the Stracheyes. The Bloomsbury group had its inception in the gatherings of former Cambridge University students and their friends which were held at the home of Virginia and her sister Vanessa (wife of Clive Bell). Virginia was married to Leonard Woolf in 1912. A few years later, with a single hand-press, they founded the Hogarth Press, which became a successful publishing house. It printed early works of Katherine Mansfield, E. M. Forster, T. S. Eliot, and Virginia Woolf’s own first short stories, and it pioneered in introducing the works of Freud to English readers.

Virginia Woolf’s books draw largely on her own life experience. Her childhood provides the background for her novel To the Lighthouse, and the sudden death of her favorite brother in 1906 is reflected in the deaths of Percival (in The Waves) and of Jacob (in Jacob’s Room). Almost all her characters are members of her own leisureed, intellectual, upper-middle class. Many of her novels are set in London, where she lived for most of her life. In 1941, depressed by the war and afraid of the recurrence of a nervous breakdown, she committed suicide by drowning.

Woollcott, Alexander [Humphreys] (1887-1943). American journalist, drama critic, and writer. Woollcott was born in the Fourierist colony called the North American Phalanx. He became a journalist in New York and a leading member of the Round Table group, a number of well-known writers, musicians, and artists who gathered at the Algonquin Hotel. Woollcott carried on a radio program called “The Town Crier”; in this venture and in his magazine work for The New Yorker he established a reputation for sentimentality, egotism, and sharp insult. Later, Woollcott became a victim of other wit. He was the acknowledged model for Sheridan Whiteside, an impossible egotist, in The Man Who Came to Dinner by George S. Kaufman and Moss Hart. Woollcott, far from taking offense, played the role himself in a touring company. Among his books are Shouts and Murmurs (1922), Enchanted April (1924), The Story of Irving Berlin (1925), and Going to Pieces (1928). He edited the anthologies The Woollcott Reader (1935) and Woollcott’s Second Reader (1937).

Woolley, Sir [Charles] Leonard (1880-1960). English archeologist. He made important excavations, especially in the Middle East. He wrote on the Sumerians and on Ur of the Chaldees; his book Digging Up the Past (1930) was a popular success.

Woolman, John (1720-1772). American Quaker leader and humanitarian. An itinerant preacher, he was among the first to protest Negro slavery. His simply written Journal (1774), a classic of its genre, was edited in 1871 by John Greenleaf Whittier, a fellow Quaker.

Woolson, Constance Fenimore (1840-1894). American novelist and short-story writer. Her great-uncle was James Fenimore Cooper. Born in New Hampshire, she traveled through America, lived in the South, and spent the rest of her life in England and Europe. A pioneer regionalist, Miss Woolson was impressed by the work of Iret Harte. Among her own writings are Two Women (1862), a long narrative poem; Castle Nowhere (1879), a collection of stories about French settlers in the Great Lakes region; Rodman the Keeper (1880), sketches about the South; Anne (1883), a novel about a Mackinac Island girl; Horace Chase (1894), a novel of the South; The Front Yard (1895) and Dorothy (1896), stories about Americans in Italy; and several other volumes. Praised by Henry James, most of her work first appeared in The Atlantic Monthly, Harper’s, and Century magazines.

Words, Wynkyn de. Real name Jan van Wynkyn (d. 1534?). English printer and stationer. He was born in Alsace and early in his career was an apprentice to William Caxton. He published a number of well-known books of the time, including the fourth edition (1498) of Chaucer’s Canterbury Tales.

Wordsworth, Dorothy (1771-1855). English writer and younger sister of William Wordsworth. Her Journals (1798, 1874, 1889, 1897, 1904, 1924), Recollections of a Tour Made in Scotland (1803), Journal of a Mountain Ramble (1805), and other similar works are records of her impressions and travels, many undertaken in the company of her brother, and are not only notable for their excellent style but also useful to Wordsworth students and biographers for the wealth of information on the poet which they contain. Dorothy wrote several short poems herself which were included in various editions of Wordsworth's poetic works. She spent the last 25 years of her life struggling against physical and mental illness.

Wordsworth, William (1770–1850). English poet. He is known for his worship of nature, his humanitarianism, his early sympathy with democratic liberalism, and his interest in the lives, the daily pursuits, and the common speech of common people. With his friend Samuel Taylor Coleridge, he was one of the early leaders of English Romanticism. Wordsworth was particularly interested in instituting a reform in poetic diction which would employ, as he proposes in his famous preface to Lyrical Ballads, "a selection of language really used by men." His most ambitious works are The Excursion, actually the first part of the uncompleted poem The Recluse, and The Prelude, both long philosophical poems of autobiographical character. His earliest works, An Evening Walk and Descriptive Sketches, were published in 1793; the bulk of his best-known poetry is contained in Lyrical Ballads (1798), which he published jointly with Coleridge. Among his better-known shorter works are Alice Fell; Michael; Simon Lee; the Lucy poems; Resolution and Independence; The Solitary Reaper; Peter Bell; The Idiot Boy; I Wandered Lonely as a Cloud; Elegiac Stanzas; Nuns Ferry Not at Their Convent's Narrow Room; The World is Too Much with Us; Lines Composed a Few Miles Above Tintern Abbey; Ode: Intimations of Immortality.

In his early youth Wordsworth was deeply influenced by the ideas of Jean Jacques Rousseau and William Godwin, and he enthusiastically supported the French Revolution. He visited France in 1792 and had a love affair with Annette Vallon, evidence of which was not uncovered until the 20th century. As he grew older, he lived peacefully in the Lake Country of northern England and became increasingly conservative in his political views and orthodox in his religion. In 1843 he was appointed poet laureate, succeeding Robert Southey. He is buried in the churchyard at Grasmere. See Goody Blake and Harry Fell; Dove Cottage; The Daffodils.

Work in Progress. The title under which James Joyce's Finnegans Wake was known until its publication. Sections were published before the whole work appeared in 1939.

Works and Days (Erga kai Hemeral). A long poem by Hesiod. This farmer's almanac of ancient Greece contains directions and advice concerning labor on the farm. It is a valuable guide to contemporary Greek life, and also gives what little is known of Hesiod's life.

World Court. The Permanent Court of International Justice. It was opened at The Hague (February 15, 1922) by the League of Nations. It had 15 judges who served for nine years. The court sat on all cases which states or members of the League brought before it and also on other matters provided for in international treaties and conventions. Before World War II, Germany, Italy, and Japan had handed in their resignations. The World Court came to an end in 1945 and was superseded by the International Court of Justice, provided for by the Charter of the United Nations.

World Enough and Time (1950). A novel by Robert Penn Warren. It is based on the murder in Kentucky of Colonel Solomon P. Sharp by Jereboom O. Beauchamp, whose trial was the sensation of 1826. (See Kentucky Tragedy.) The title is taken from Andrew Marvell's To His Coy Mistress.

Worldly-Wiseman, Mr. See Pilgrim's Progress.

World War I (1914–1918). The European war that began with Austria-Hungary's declaration of war on Serbia on July 28, 1914. The major belligerents were the Central Powers—Germany, Austria-Hungary, Turkey, and Bulgaria—and the Allies—Great Britain, France, Russia, Italy, and the U.S.

Although the immediate cause of the conflict was the assassination of Archduke Francis Ferdinand of Austria by a Serbian nationalist on June 28, 1914, Europe had been on the verge of war for years as a result of the political, economic, and military rivalries of the great powers. Complicating the situation were such factors as the disintegration of the Turkish empire, the turbulence in the Balkans, and France's desire to avenge its defeat in the Franco-Prussian War of 1870–1871.

After Austria's declaration of war on Serbia, Russia ordered mobilization of her forces, and on Aug. 1 Germany declared war. Commencing hostilities against France, the Germans invaded Belgium in order to reach Paris from the northwest; the attack on Belgium, whose neutrality had been guaranteed by Germany, brought England into the war on August 4. In the east, the Germans smashed the Russian armies. Italy, an erstwhile ally of Germany and Austria, abandoned them and joined the Allies in 1915; Turkey came into the war on the German side, thus extending the area of conflict to the eastern Mediterranean.

In the U.S., President Woodrow Wilson sought to preserve American neutrality, but popular feeling gradually ran in favor of the Allies, particularly after the sinking of the Lusitania. When, after an interval of nonbelligerence toward America, Germany resumed unrestricted submarine warfare in Feb., 1917, the U.S. severed diplomatic relations with Berlin; in April war was declared. The entrance of American troops on the western front ended the stalemate. After a series of reverses the German armies retreated, the Berlin government fell, rebellion broke out in Germany, and an armistice was negotiated (Nov. 11, 1918).

The war killed millions, civilians as well as soldiers; it impoverished most of the world; it created a number of new nations when the German, Austrian, and Turkish empires were dismembered; and it hastened the Russian Revolution of 1917. The treaty of Versailles, moreover, carried within it the seeds of World War II.
The war inspired many literary works. Among the best novels dealing with the war are John Dos Passos' Three Soldiers, Jaroslav Hašek's The Good Soldier Schweik, E. E. Cummings' The Enormous Room, Erich Maria Remarque's All Quiet on the Western Front, and Ernest Hemingway's A Farewell to Arms. Poets who wrote about the war include Alan Seeger, Wilfred Owen, Siegfried Sassoon, John McCrae, and Rupert Brooke. Plays on this theme include What Price Glory by Maxwell Anderson and Laurence Stallings and Journey's End by Robert Cedric Sherriff. Poet Robert Graves described his war experiences in Goodbye to All That (1929), and T. E. Lawrence wrote about the Arab campaign against the Turks in his Seven Pillars of Wisdom (1926). See David Lloyd George; George Clemenceau; Vittorio Orlando; Wilhelm II; Paul von Hindenburg; Eric Ludendorff; John J. Pershing.

World War II (1939–1945). The global conflict that began officially with the German invasion of Poland on Sept 1, 1939. The major belligerents were the Axis powers—Germany, Italy, and Japan—and the Allies—Great Britain, France, the U.S.S.R., China, and the U.S.

The causes of World War II were intimately connected with those of World War I and with the unfavorable conditions which remained after the treaty of Versailles. Economic distress, together with the unpopularity and weakness of the Weimar Republic in Germany, led the way to the growth of fascism and the rise of Adolf Hitler. The League of Nations, the first world organization established to maintain peace and settle international disputes, was drastically weakened by the refusal of the U.S. to join. When the league did nothing but formally condemn Japan for its invasion of Manchuria in 1931–1932, many countries felt the need to protect themselves by building up armaments. In 1935 the league failed to prevent Italy's invasion of Ethiopia. Under Hitler, Germany began to rear and send troops into the Rhineland (1936) in violation of the Versailles treaty; she seized Austria in 1938, and in Aug, 1939, entered into a nonaggression pact with Russia.

After defeating Poland in 1939, the Germans invaded Norway and Denmark, the British were driven from the Continent, and France fell. On June 22, 1941, Germany attacked Russia.

On Dec. 7, 1941, the Japanese bombed Pearl Harbor in Hawaii and destroyed the greater part of the U.S. fleet there. The subsequent declarations of war by the U.S. included Germany and Italy, both of whom had made prior declarations of war on the U.S., as well as Japan. The latter country followed up her Pearl Harbor attack with others in the Pacific region, and the war became one that involved all the continents and all the oceans. The Japanese captured Wake, Guam, the Philippines, and other strategic islands before the Allied offensive, begun in the fall of 1942, began to dislodge them. However, it was not until President Harry S. Truman authorized the dropping of the first atomic bombs (on Hiroshima, Aug. 6, 1945; on Nagasaki, Aug. 9, 1945) that Japan was forced to surrender (Sept. 2, 1945).

After an Allied invasion of southern Italy, the Italian army and navy surrendered (Sept. 3, 1943), but German forces in Rome and to the north were not dislodged until the summer of 1944. On June 6, 1944, an immense invasion army of men and supplies, under the direct supervision of General Dwight D. Eisenhower, had landed in France and forced the Germans to retreat across the Rhine. Germany surrendered unconditionally on May 7, 1945.

Among the best-known novels dealing with the war are Jan Struther's Mrs. Miniver, Thomas Hegen's Mister Roberts, Norman Mailer's The Naked and the Dead, Irwin Shaw's The Young Lions, James Jones's From Here to Eternity, and Herman Wouk's The Caine Mutiny. Other novelists who have written about the war include John Hersey, Pierre Bouille, André Schwarz-Bart, Erich Maria Remarque, Cezio Malaparte, and Konstantin Simonov. Idiot's Delight and There Shall Be No Night by Robert E. Sherwood and The Devil's General by Carl Zuckmayer are plays dealing with the war. The Diary of Anne Frank was by a Jewish girl in Nazi-occupied Holland. Winston Churchill, prime minister of England from 1940 to 1945, wrote a six-volume history of the war called The Second World War (1948–1954). See Franklin D. Roosevelt; Joseph Stalin; Charles de Gaulle; Benito Mussolini; George C. Marshall; Douglas MacArthur; Nuremberg Trials.

Worthies, the Nine. Nine heroes, three from the Bible, three from the classics, and three from romance. They were frequently bracketed together as in the burlesque Pageant of the Nine Worthies in Shakespeare's Love's Labour's Lost. They are: Joshua, David, and Judas Maccabaeus; Hector, Alexander, and Julius Caesar; Arthur, Charlemagne, and Godfrey of Bouillon.

Wotton, Sir Henry (1568–1639). English diplomat and poet. Wotton served as ambassador to Venice and later became provost of Eton College. He was an intimate friend of John Donne and a fishing companion of Izaak Walton, whose brief biography of Wotton was included in Reliquiae Wottonianae (1651), a posthumous edition of the latter's work. Wotton wrote poems of considerable charm, such as On His Mistress, the Queen of Bohemia (1624), and was the author of the statement that "an ambassador is an honest man sent abroad to lie for his country."

Wouk, Herman (1915– ). American novelist. His most popular and famous work, The Caine Mutiny, was awarded a Pulitzer Prize. Wouk was born and educated in New York City. His first novel, Aurora Dawn (1947), was a fantasy lightly satirizing big business. It was followed by The City Boy (1948), the story of an 11-year-old boy and his experiences at a summer camp. Marjorie Morningstar (1955), Wouk's second best-selling novel, is the story of a middle-class Jewish girl who becomes enamored of the world of show business, but finally settles down to life as a suburban housewife. Another novel, Youngblood Hawke (1962), describes the life and career of an author partially modeled on Thomas Wolfe.

Would-be Gentleman, The. See Bourgeois Gentilhomme, L'E.
Woyzeck (pub. 1879, written 1836?). A fragmentary play by Georg Büchner, about an imbecilic army private who murders his unfaithful common-law wife. It depicts, with powerful realism, the social and economic injustices that lead to both the wife's faithlessness and Woyzeck's murder of her; as such, it is a socialistic document. In style, it is extremely compact, a quick succession of short, meaningful scenes. For this reason, and because of its tendency to treat typical rather than individual phenomena, to depict human agony in the pure state, it has been regarded as a forerunner of expressionism. Alban Berg's 12-tone opera Wozzeck (1925) is based on the play.

Wozzeck. See Woyzeck.

Wrangel, Nikolayevich (1878–1928). Russian general. He fought against the Bolsheviks during the civil war. His forces, hard-pressed by the Red Army, evacuated the Crimea in 1920.

Wreck of the Deutschland, The (1875). A poem by Gerard Manley Hopkins. It celebrates the death of five nuns, drowned off the Welsh coast while sailing to the U.S. from religious persecution in Germany. In intricate stanzas, full of complex metaphor and allusion, the poet deals with the problem of suffering, his own and everyone's relationship with God, the doctrine of religion, and the nuns' happiness in dying in God's hands.

Wreck of the Hesperus, The (1841). A ballad by Henry Wadsworth Longfellow. It was inspired by a newspaper account of an actual wreck at sea.

Wren, Sir Christopher (1632–1723). English architect. Following the great Fire of London in 1666, he was entrusted with the reconstruction of innumerable churches and public buildings, notably St. Paul's Cathedral (1675–1710). His work is characterized by decorative interiors ornamented with designs and by graceful spires known for their inventive variety and for the technical resourcefulness of the construction. He is buried under the choir of St. Paul's; the tablet erected to mark the spot bears the Latin inscription: Si monumentum requiris, circumspice ("If thou seest a monument, gaze around").

Wren, Jenny. A character in Charles Dickens' Our Mutual Friend whose real name is Fanny Cleaver. She is a doll's dressmaker, a little, deformed girl, with a sharp, shrewd face and beautiful golden hair, who supports herself and her drunken father.

Wren, Percival Christopher (1885–1941). English novelist, soldier, and traveler. He is known for his adventure stories dealing with life in the French Foreign Legion. He wrote The Wages of Virtue (1916); Beau Geste (1924), a bestseller; and other novels.

Wright, Frank Lloyd (1869–1959). American architect. The creator of a strikingly individualistic, lyrical, and dramatic style, he is noted as one of the most important and influential architects of the modern era. His principles have been closely followed and studied by young architects around the world. Among the most famous works that show his use of the cantilever are the Imperial Hotel in Tokyo, Japan (1916–1922), built to withstand earthquakes; the Kaufmann House, Bear Run, Pa. (1936), boldly poised over a waterfall; and the Johnson Research Laboratory, Racine, Wis. (1949–1950), which is supported by a central cylinder. Wright's concern with relating building to site and with breaking down the enclosure of interior space by walls is illustrated by his headquarters at Taliesin West, near Phoenix, Ariz. (1938–1959), while the Guggenheim Museum in New York, with its spiral, wider at the top than bottom, shows his confident use of reinforced concrete. In spite of occasional paradoxes and contradictions, his many writings reveal a lovely gift of narration and clarity of exposition. Ayn Rand's novel The Fountainhead is said to have been inspired by Wright and his famous predecessor and first employer, Louis Sullivan.

Wright, Richard [Nathaniel] (1908–1960). American novelist and short-story writer. Considered by many the most eloquent spokesman for the American Negro of his generation, he established his reputation with his powerful first novel, Native Son. His other works include Uncle Tom's Children (1938), a collection of four novellas; Black Boy (1945), an autobiography of his youth; The Outsider (1953), a philosophical novel; White Man, Listen! (1957), on the evils of racial injustice; and The Long Dream (1958), a novel.

Wright, Wilbur (1867–1912) and Orville (1871–1948). American pioneers in aviation. They began experimenting with gliders at Kitty Hawk, N.C. Their first flight in an airplane with an engine was made at Kitty Hawk on Dec. 17, 1903. In 1908, France became the first country to recognize them, and, in 1909, the U.S. army adopted their plane. In the same year they founded the Wright Aeroplane Company.

Wundt, Wilhelm Max (1832–1920). German physiologist and philosopher who established the first laboratory for experimental psychology (Leipzig, 1879). Similar work was done by Ivan Pavlov.

Wurdehomb, Audrey [May] (1911–1960). American poet and novelist. She won a Pulitzer Prize with her second collection of verse, Bright Ambush (1934). She was the youngest poet ever to be so honored. Her other books of poetry include The House of Silk (1926), The Seven Sins (1935), and The Testament of Love (1938). With Joseph Auslander, her husband, she wrote two novels: My Uncle Jan (1948) and The Islanders (1951).

Wuthering Heights (1847). A novel by Emily Brontë first published under the pen name Ellis Bell. Mr. Earnshaw, father of Catherine and Hindley, finds a waif on the streets of London and brings him home to raise with his own children. Heathcliff, a strange, uncouth, passionate creature, is from the beginning, a disruptive influence in the Earnshaws' lonely, moorland home, Wuthering Heights. Catherine forms a passionate attachment to him while Hindley hates him, regards him as a usurper and a rival in his father's affection. After Mr. Earnshaw's death, the household degenerates. In spite of her love for Heathcliff, Catherine lets fall a remark, overheard by him that it would degrade her to marry him; the furious Heathcliff steals off, disappearing for three years, and Catherine marries the well-to-do Edgar Linton. Years later, Heathcliff, mysteriously transformed into a wealthy and polished man, returns and is invited by Edgar, who has money troubles, to make his home at Wuthering Heights. Heathcliff accepts but deceitfully elopes with Edgar's sister, obviously to avenge himself on Catherine and her husband. Barred from the house, Heathcliff still manages a final meeting with Catherine before she dies in premature childbirth. Twelve years later, Heathcliff, now a widower, forces Catherine's daughter to marry his sickly son Linton, and upon the deaths of Edgar and of Linton he gains control of Wuthering Heights and of the young girl Cathy. When Heathcliff dies, the girl is at last free: she devotes herself to her young cousin Hareton, the uncouth and ignorant son of her uncle Hindley. The story, told by characters within the narrative and, to an extent, chronologically reshuffled, attains an almost mystical intensity. The adjective wuthering, in the title, is a Yorkshire word referring to turbulent weather.

Wyatt or Wiat, Sir Thomas (1503-1542). English poet. Wyatt held a number of official positions under Henry VIII, including those of Member of the Privy Council, Ambassador to Spain, Member of Parliament, and Commander of the Fleet. During an official trip to Italy in 1527 he became acquainted with the work of the Italian love-poets. Later, his translations of Petrarch introduced the sonnet into England. He was a friend of the earl of Surrey and had a strong influence on the writing of the younger man; together Wyatt and Surrey are credited with being the founders of the school of English lyric poetry which flourished during the remainder of the 16th and continued into the 17th century.

Wyatt's poetry is often characterized by extreme irregularity of rhythm, which 19th-century scholars regarded as evidence of crude technique. In the 20th century, however, critics began to point out that this irregularity was often important in the total effect of the poems, comparing it with the dramatic rhythm in the work of John Donne. Critics also have praised the vigor and authentic intensity of feeling in Wyatt's best poems, such as They Flee from Me; My Lute, Awake; and In Eternum. His work appeared in several anthologies, among them The Court of Venus (1542); Seven Penitential Psalms (1549); and Tottel's Miscellany.

Wycherly, William (1640-1716). English comic dramatist of the Restoration, noted for the savagery of his satire, his cynical realism, and his coarse, mordant wit. Educated in France and at Oxford, Wycherly briefly contemplated a legal career. His first comedy, Love in a Wood, or St. James Park (1671), won him the favor of the duchess of Cleveland, mistress of Charles II. This play was followed by The Gentleman Dancing Master (1672?) and his best works, The Country Wife and The Plain Dealer. He incurred the king's displeasure by his second marriage (c. 1680) to the widowed countess of Drogheda; after her death he became involved in lengthy litigation over her estate and spent seven years in a debtor's prison. Charles refused to help Wycherly out of his financial difficulties, but James II, who, it is said, had greatly admired The Plain Dealer, came to his rescue by paying his debts.

Wyclif, Wycliffe, or Wiclif, John (d. 1384). English theologian and reformer. Called “The Morning Star of the Reformation,” Wyclif was one of the earliest antagonists of papal encroachments on secular power. He felt that all Christians should have access to the Bible in the vernacular and prepared the first complete English translation. It is thought that Wyclif himself translated the Four Gospels, and possibly the entire New Testament, while the Old Testament was done by his associates. The translation was completed c. 1388, but was not published until 1590. In addition to resisting the growth of the secular power of the papacy, Wyclif condemned monasticism, and attacked the foundations of medieval orthodoxy in his denial of the dogma of transubstantiation, from which the priesthood derived the basis of its power. He taught that all ecclesiastical and secular authority is derived from God and is forfeited when one is in a state of mortal sin. The followers of Wyclif were known as Wycliffites; however, the Lollards, with whom they are often grouped, were not, strictly speaking, followers of Wyclif.

Wylie, Elinor [Hoyt] (1885-1928). American poet and novelist. She is known for the precise and vivid imagery of her lyrics and the subtle analysis of emotion in her later love poems. Influenced by the Elizabethan and metaphysical poets, Elinor Wyclif, From Bale's Illustrium Majoris Britanniæ Scriptorum (1548).
Wylie derived the title of her first important book of poems, Nets to Catch the Wind, from John Webster. She had published anonymously an earlier volume, Incidental Numbers (1912), and under her own name was to publish three more: Black Armour (1923), Trivial Breath (1928), and Angels and Earthly Creatures (1929). The last contains the well-known sonnet sequence One Person. Collected Poems of Elinor Wylie (1932) and Last Poems of Elinor Wylie (1943) were posthumously published.

Her novels, Jennifer Lorn, The Venetian Glass Nephew, The Orphan Angel, and Mr. Hodge and Mr. Hazard (1928), all have a historical background for which she performed extensive research. The Orphan Angel centers on Shelley, her idol.

Wyndham, John. Pen name of John Beynon Harris (1903– ). English writer of science fiction. His fantastic The Day of the Triffids (1951) follows the fortunes of the survivors of a thermo-nuclear mistake.

Wynkyn de Worde. See Worde, Wynkyn de.

Wyoming Massacre (1778). The massacre in the Wyoming Valley of northeastern Pennsylvania by British loyalists and Iroquois of approximately 360 American settlers. Gertrude of Wyoming (1809), a narrative poem by the English poet Thomas Campbell, describes the event.

Wyss, Johan Rudolf (1781–1830). Swiss writer and philosopher. He is best known for Der schweizerische Robinson (1813; English translation 1820, The Swiss Family Robinson). He also is the author of the Swiss national anthem and collector of Swiss tales and folklore.

Xanadu. A province or region in China mentioned by Coleridge in his KUBLA KHAN as the site of the Khan's pleasure garden. The Road to Xanadu (1927) by the American John Livingston Lowes (1867–1945) is a unique study of the workings of the imagination, using Coleridge as an example.

Xanthus (Gr., Xanthos, reddish yellow). One of Achilles' two wonderful horses, Balios (piebald) being the other, and offspring of Zephyrus and the harpy Podarge. Being chided by his master for leaving Patroclus on the field of battle, Xanthus thus turned his head reproachfully and told Achilles that he also would soon be numbered with the dead, not from any fault of his horse, but by the decree of inexorable destiny (Iliad, xi). Xanthus is also the ancient name of the Scamander River and of a city on its banks.

Xantippe or Xanthippe. The wife of the Greek philosopher Socrates. Her shrewish nature has made her name proverbial.

Xavier, St. Francis (1506–1552). Spanish Jesuit missionary, the "Apostle of the Indies." As a student in Paris he became a friend of Ignatius of Loyola and helped him establish the Society of Jesus (1534). He worked in Japan for several years and founded a mission in China. He was canonized, together with his master and friend, in 1622.

Xenion (Gr., "stranger"). A two-line, usually satirical poem in the form of the classical epigram. Goethe's and Schiller's Xenien (1797; see WEIMAR CLASSICISM) are examples. "Xenien" is the German plural of the word.

Xenophon (c. 430–c. 355 B.C.). Athenian writer. In 401 B.C. Xenophon joined the force of mercenary Greeks recruited by Cyrus the Younger for the purpose of dethroning his older brother Artaxerxes. Cyrus was killed and Xenophon led the 10,000 Greeks through Persian territory to the Black Sea. His account of the expedition is known as the Anabasis, in which he portrays himself as the hero of the affair.

Xenophon, who had a great love for Sparta, fought with the Spartans against Athenians and Thebans in 394 B.C. The Athenians exiled him for this activity, and he subsequently lived in Sparta and Corinth. Among his other works, all of which seem to have survived in full, are the Hellenica, a continuation of Thucydides' history of Greece; the Memorabilia of Socrates, a popular philosophy; and the Cyropedia, a biography of Cyrus modified to suit Xenophon's didactic purpose. A famous part of the Anabasis is Xenophon's record of the Greeks crying "Thalassa, thalassa," as they caught the first glimpse of their beloved sea.

Xerxes I (c. 519–465 B.C.). King of Persia, the son of Darius and Atossa. Concluding from a dream that the gods demanded war on the Greeks, he gathered a huge army and fleet. He constructed a bridge of boats over the Hellespont and reached Athens, but had to retreat after the battle of Salamis. He is an important figure in Aeschylus' tragedy The Persians. See PERSIAN WARS.

Xingu and Other Stories (1916). A collection of eight stories by Edith Wharton. The title story satirizes the snobbish members of a women's luncheon club who discourse learnedly about Xingu—a Brazilian river—even though they know nothing about the subject. Also in the collection are Coming Home, Astres Temps . . . , and Bunner Sisters, a novelette.

The commissioners reported that three of Talleyrand's agents, designated in their correspondence as X, Y, and Z, had attempted to bribe them. The disclosure of the correspondence created a furor in both countries.

Yahoo. In the fourth voyage of Gulliver's Travels by Jonathan Swift, a race of filthy, loathsome brutes tamed by, and contrasted to, the virtuous and reasonable Houyhnhnms. Gulliver is discomfited by their resemblance to the human race. While the Houyhnhnms represent the highest attributes of mankind in their purest form, the beastly Yahoos represent Swift's conception of man living in a degenerate state of nature. See Houyhnhnmland.

Yahweh. See Jeoviah.

Yam or Yamm. The Canaanite god of the sea and inland waters. He is represented as a dragon. At the beginning of The Poem of Baal, he has dominion over earth as well as sea, but after a protracted struggle, Baal, with the aid of his sister Anat, supplants him as lord of the earth. There are numerous references to this legend in the Old Testament, where Yam is referred to as Rahab or simply as the dragon, who was destroyed by Yahweh.

Yama. The god of the dead in Hindu mythology. The legend is that he was the first mortal to die, and was therefore made into a god. He is green in color, has four arms, is red-eyed, and rides a buffalo. The famous Saviri episode in the Mahabharata employs him as one of the major protagonists.

Yankee. Properly, a New Englisher or one of New England stock. The term was extended to mean, first, an inhabitant of the North as apart from the South and, later, to comprise all citizens of the U.S. In the South, Northerners were often referred to as "Damnyankee."

The word is generally taken to be a North American Indian corruption of English or of the French Anglais. There is also the story that in 1713 Jonathan Hastings, a farmer of Cambridge, Mass., used the word as a puffing epithet, meaning "genuine," "what cannot be surpassed," as in a Yankee horse, Yankee cider, and so on. The students at Harvard, catching up the term, called Hastings "Yankee Jonathan." It soon spread, and became the jocose pet name of the New Englisher.

Yankee Doodle. A quasi-national song of the U.S. Both the tune and several stanzas of Yankee Doodle were current early in the British colonies; the catchy tune seems to have inspired innumerable verses. The origin of the tune is disputed, and the words have traditionally been ascribed to Dr. Shuckburgh, a British army surgeon. The song seems to have been deliberately used by the British to provoke the American troops during the Revolution; the Americans, however, adopted the song as their own and created an image of the American in a rustic mold. The song was first printed in America in 1795.

Yarrow. A river in Scotland. Scott and Hogg have celebrated its legends, and Wordsworth wrote a poem called Yarrow Revisited (1835). The Braes of Yarrow is the title of an old Scottish ballad.

Yasin, Aleksandr. Pen name of Aleksandr Yakovlevich Popov (1913— ). Russian poet and short-story writer. For Aliona Fomina (1949), his long poem glorifying work on the collective farm, Yasin received a Stalin prize. Most of his work deals with themes of peasant and village life. His short story, Levers (Rychagi; 1956), was one of the most discussed works of the recent thaw following Stalin's death. The story depicts the tyrannical behavior of Communist Party members toward subordinates on a collective farm.

Yates, Edmund Hodgson (1831–1894). English novelist and editor. His differences with Thackeray ended in Yates's dismissal from the Garrick Club. This caused a long quarrel between Dickens and Thackeray which Thackeray, toward the end of his life, sought to patch up. As editor of the society weekly The World, Yates incurred the wrath of Lord Lonsdale and was imprisoned for libel in 1885. He wrote several novels including For Better, For Worse (1863) and The Yellow Flag (1872). In 1885 he published Edmund Yates: his Recollections and his Experiences.

Yatpan. The killer of the young hero in the Canaanite The Poem of Aqhat. He is hired by the goddess Anat to dispose of Aqhat and recover the divine bow which the youth refuses to give her. Yatpan, a most inefficient assassin, kills Aqhat, but promptly drops and breaks the bow, and, moreover, reveals his guilt to Aqhat's sister Paghat after drinking too much wine.

Yazoo Frauds (1795). A real estate speculation in which four land companies bribed the Georgia legislature in order to get large grants of land near the Yazoo River. The grants were later revoked. The Georgia Spec; or Land in the Moon (1797), a lost play by Royall Tyler, satirizes this episode.

Yearling, The (1938). A novel by Marjorie Kinnan Rawlings. Set in the scrub country of northern Florida, it recounts one year in the lives of a backwoods farmer, his wife, and his young son, Jody, who adopts an orphaned fawn and finds in the animal the love and companionship he craves. When the fawn begins to eat the family corn, Jody is ordered by his father to shoot him. The tragedy lifts Jody out of his boyhood and into a more mature relationship with his parents. It was awarded a Pulitzer Prize.

_Yeats, The_ (1937). A novel by Virginia Woolf. More conventional than the author’s other later books, and more popular when it was published, it is a chronicle of the Pargiter family from 1850 to “the present day.” It is told in a series of nine separate but connected episodes which form a recurring cycle. It contains vivid evocations of London life.

_Yeats, William Butler_ (1865-1939). Irish poet and dramatist. He is generally considered to be one of the greatest poets of the 20th century. The leader of the Irish Renaissance, he was largely responsible for founding the Abbey Theatre and encouraging its playwrights. The three major concerns of his life—art, Irish nationalism, and occult studies—are also central to his poetry and drama. His greatest work is in the poetry of his maturity and old age; it is characterized by its lyrical and dramatic qualities, its use of symbolism and the mythology of Irish folklore and the occult, its autobiographical and political themes, and its sensuous beauty, realism, precision, and economy.

He was the son of John Butler Yeats, a well-known Irish painter, and he himself studied painting for three years. Yeats’s early poetry is characterized by a romantic affectation of melancholy and a pre-occupation with “the Celtic twilight.” _The Wanderings of Oisín_ (1889), a long, mystical narrative poem based on Irish legend, and _The Lake Isle of Innisfree_ (1893) date from this period.

In London, Yeats was a founding member of the Pre-Raphaelite _Rhymers’ Club_. On his return to Ireland in 1896 he became a leader of the Irish Renaissance. Believing that the Irish poet’s task was to communicate with the Irish people, he wrote simple, direct poetry; _The Wind Among the Reeds_ (1899) and _In the Seven Woods_ (1903) are collections written during this period. Yeats met Maud Gonne, whom he was 23 and became indirectly involved in her political activities. He was in love with her during much of his life and used her as a central symbol in his poetry.

With Lady Gregory, George Moore, and others, Yeats founded in 1899 the theater society that was later to become the celebrated Abbey Theatre. He encouraged Lady Gregory and Synge to write plays for it, and he himself wrote many works for it, including _The Countess Cathleen, The Land of Heart’s Desire_ (1894), _Cathleen ni Houlihan_, and _Deirdre_ (1907). Under the influence of Ezra Pound, whom Yeats met in 1912, he began to write ritualistic, symbolic dramas, with dance and music, in imitation of the Japanese nō plays. These plays, in prose and verse, often make symbolic use of Irish heroic legends, especially those about Cú Chulainn. Usually, like most of Yeats’s work, they are concerned with peasants, aristocrats, beggars, wandering minstrels, and kings and queens; most of them are based on his mystical and occult ideas. _TheHardware’s Ego and Purgatory_ are characteristic plays of this period.

Yeats had been interested in magic and occult philosophy since his Dublin days with A.E. (q.v.), and when he met Madame Blavatsky in London in 1887 he became a devoted disciple. He did not believe in any orthodox religion, but since he felt that he needed some system of supernatural belief to give depth to his life and poetry, he half accepted the doctrines of _Theosophy_, Hermetism (see _Hermes Trismegistus_), and spiritualism. In 1917 he married Georgie Hyde Lees, a spiritualist medium, and with the help of her trances and automatic writing composed _A Vision_, a prose work that combined a system of magic, a philosophy of history, and a philosophy of personality. Yeats’s esoteric ideas provided a mythical background and a system of symbols for all his poetry, but especially for his later work.

In technique, Yeats’s mature poetry was influenced by the work of John Donne, William Savage Landor, and Ezra Pound. It appeared in the volumes _The Green Helmet_ (1910), _Responsibilities_ (1914), _The Wild Swans at Coole_ (1917), _Michael Robartes and the Dancer_ (1920), _The Tower_ (1928), and _The Winding Stair_ (1929). Yeats prepared _The Collected Poems_ (1933) himself, rewriting many of his early poems in accordance with his later stylistic ideas. Among the best-known individual poems are _Byzantium_ and _Sailing to Byzantium; Easter 1916_, a commemoration of an incident during the Irish rebellion (see Padriac Pearse); _A Prayer for My Daughter; Leda and the Swan; Among School Children; Lapis Lazuli; Long-Legged Fly; and Crazy Jane_, a series of poems.

Yeats’s prose works include _Fairy and Folk Tales of the Irish Peasantry_ (1888); occult works, such as _The Celtic Twilight_ (1893) and _The Secret Rose_ (1897); collections of essays such as _Ideas of Good and Evil_ (1903), _The Cutting of an Agate_ (1912), and _Essays_ (1937); and _Autobiographies_ (1926). He edited the works of William Blake (1893).

At the end of his life Yeats was widely honored as one of the most important poets of the century. He was elected a senator of the Irish Free State in 1922 and was awarded the Nobel Prize for literature in 1923.

_Yeats-Brown, Francis_ (1886-1944). English writer. He is best known for his autobiographical _Lives of a Bengal Lancer_ (1930), which was partly based on his own service with the British Army in India. It expressed his love of adventure and interest in mysticism, especially in Yoga and Eastern religions.

_yellow_ (AS, _geolo_, connected with Gr. _chloros_, green, and with _gall_, the yellowish fluid secreted by the bile). A color symbolically indicating jealousy, inconstancy, and treachery. In France the doors of traitors used to be daubed with yellow. In some countries the law ordained that Jews must be clothed in yellow, because they betrayed Christ; hence Judas, in medieval pictures, is arrayed in yellow. In Spain the vestments of the executioner were either red or yellow: the former to denote bloodshedding; the latter treason.

In heraldry and in ecclesiastical symbolism, yellow is frequently used in place of gold.

_yellow peril_. Danger from the yellow races. The term refers to a scare, originally raised in Germany in the late 1890’s that the people of China and Japan would in a very few years have increased in population to such an extent that incursions upon the territories occupied by the white races, followed Yemassee, The (1835). A historical novel by William Gilmore Simms. The book deals with the conflict between the South Carolina Yemassee Indians and the British in 1715. Occonostoga, the son of Sau-tsee, chief of the Yemassee, betrays his tribe, and is killed by his mother, Matiwan. Dying in the at-tack on Charleston, Sau-tsee is defeated by the novel's hero, a mysterious Captain Harrison. The captain, later revealed to be South Carolina's Governor Craven, marries Bess Matthews, a girl of the frontier. A central theme in this most popular of Simms's books is the helplessness of the Indians as they lose their lands to the advancing white civilization.

Yeomen of the Guard, The (1889). A comic opera by Gilbert and Sullivan. The yeomen of the guard are the oldest military corps in England, having been instituted in 1485. They still wear 16th-century costumes, guard the Tower of London, and are familiarly known as "Beefeaters."

Yenes y Alvarez, Juan de. See St. John of the Cross.

Yevgeni, Yevgeni (1933– ). Russian poet. With Andrei Voznesenski, he stirred new interest in poetry in the Soviet Union during the early 1960's. Much of Yevgeni's work expresses the impatience of the younger Soviet generation with the cant and smugness that had been growing throughout Stalin's reign. A return to the revolu-tionary fervor of the early Soviet period and a need to regain human values lost during Stalin's terror-laden rule are frequent demands of Yevgeni's work. With such poems, he attracted crowds of thousands to his readings, often held in huge outdoor stadiums. His outspokenness has, however, caused him trouble with Soviet authorities. His poem Babi Yar (1962), was criticized for implying that the Soviet regime was guilt of anti-Semitism. The poem was a eulogy to the thousands of Jews killed at Babi Yar in the Ukraine during World War II. Shortly after the furor over this work died down, Yevgeni again got into trouble by publishing his memoirs in France without obtaining Soviet per-mission. The criticisms of the Soviet system contained in the writings added to his difficulties.

Yggdrasill or Ygdrasil ("the horse of Ygr or Odin"). In Norse mythology, the great ash tree that supported the universe and sprang from the body of the giant Ymir. It had three roots, which extended to the realms of Asgard, Niffheim, and Totunheim. Near it lay the well Urthabrunn whose waters the Norrs used to preserve the tree from decay. The squirrel Ratatosk ran up and down the trunk carrying strife. Four harts fed on Yggdrasill's foliage and an eagle and a hawk sat in its branches.

Yin. See SHANG.

Yin and Yang. A Chinese theory explaining the basic workings of the universe. Developed late in the Chou Dynasty (1027–256 B.C.), it was incorpo-rated into Han period Confucianism. Yin is the female, passive, negative force; Yang, the male, active and positive. Together with the theory of the five elements (wu hsing: wood, metal, water, fire, and earth) elaborate formulas governing all human activity evolved. Each of the five elements had powers and reactions, good and bad, in relation to the other elements, and each element was associated with specific heavenly bodies, periods of time, direc-tions, colors, animals, numbers, bodily organs, and the like. Thus actions of human beings could be pre-determined and regulated according to the interac-tion of the elements. Together with the teachings of the Book of Changes, these theories controlled hu-man affairs and were consulted to determine mar riage partners, propitious days, and related matters in both China and Japan. They are to a certain extent still current today.

Ymir. The primeval giant of Scandinavian my-thology from whose body the world was said to be created. He was nourished by the four milky streams which flowed from the cow, Audhumla. One legend holds that while he slept, a man and woman grew out of his left arm and sons from his feet, thus generating the race of frost giants. A more popular account is that when Odin and his two brothers, Vili and Vi, slew Ymir and threw his carcass into an abyss, his blood formed the waters, his bones the mountains, his teeth the rocks, his skull the heavens, his brains the clouds, his hair the plants, and his eyebrow the wall of defense against the giants.

yoga (Sansk., "union, concentration, yoking"). Mental and spiritual exercises for the sake of self-illumination. Yoga puts special emphasis on medita-tion, but has an elaborate system of physical rules of procedure. Yonge, Charlotte Mary (1823–1901). English novelist of copious output. She was a disciple of John Keble, whose ideas she incorporated in her writings, and is faintly remembered for her historical novels such as The Caged Lion (1870) and for her bathetic romances of contemporary life, such as The Heir of Redclyffe (1853) and Heartsease (1854). Devout and charitable, sentimental and narrow, Miss Yonge her-self stands as an epitome of Victorian propriety.

Yorick. In Shakespeare's Hamlet, the deceased jester of the murdered king of Denmark. His skull is apostrophized by Hamlet, who remembers him as "a fellow of infinite jest, of most excellent fancy." You Can't Take It with You (1936). A comedy by Moss Hart and George S. Kaufman. This Pulitzer Prize winner deals with the bizarre but supremely happy Vanderhof family in New York. They make fireworks in the cellar, write plays, and practice ballet, creating difficulties for the family’s one conventional member, who wants to marry the scion of a wealthy but stuffy New York family.

You Know Me Al: A Busher's Letters (1916). A collection of short stories by Ring Lardner. They are in the form of letters written by a half-literate baseball rookie, Jack Keefe. Perfectly capturing the vernacular speech, tone, and outlook of their protagonist, the stories are excellent examples of Lardner’s characteristic mixture of humor and misanthropy.

Youma (1890). A novel by Lafcadio Hearn. One of Hearn’s most distinguished works, it is based on the true story of a Negro girl’s devotion to the daughter of her dead master during a slave insurrection in Martinique.

Young, Edward (1683–1765). English poet and playwright. He is best known today for Night Thoughts on Life, Death and Immortality, written in defense of Christian orthodoxy against freethinkers and libertines, and Conjectures on Original Composition, in a Letter to the Author of Sir Charles Grandison, his last and most brilliant prose essay. His other works include Busiris (1719) and The Revenge (1721), both dramatic tragedies; The Universal Passion (1725–1728), a series of satires; The Brothers (1753), another tragedy; and Resignation (1726), a long poem. In his youth, Young had hoped for a career as a lawyer, but was disappointed, spending most of his life as a country clergyman instead. He also carried on a long correspondence with Samuel Richardson, the closest literary friend of his later years.

Young, Francis Brett (1884–1954). English novelist and poet. He was a physician, and his novels deal largely with the medical profession. Among his popular novels are Love Is Enough (1927), My Brother Jonathan (1928), and The City of Gold (1939), set in South Africa. Young Ireland. A militantly anti-English group developed in the 1840’s by a dissident faction within the Catholic Association, an organization headed by the great Irish statesman Daniel O’Connell. The Catholic Association was opposed to the use of force in redressing its grievances with the English government, and the Young Ireland faction considered this position a fatal weakness. The severe economic privation (and human degradation) which was to reach such calamitous proportions as the result of the potato famine was already in progress in 1846 when the Young Ireland group, under the leadership of William Smith O’Brien (1803–1864) and Thomas Meagher (1823–1867), broke with the Catholic Association. By 1848 the plight was so great that violence was conceived of as the only alternative. The Young Ireland group planned an open rebellion, which however was more verbal than actual with the result that the rebels were arrested before any military action took place. Smith O’Brien and Meagher were sentenced to death and deported, and the Young Ireland group was scattered; many of its members later formed the Fenian societies in Canada and the U.S.

Young Italy. An association of Italian republicans organized by Giuseppe Mazzini in 1831. Aimed at freeing Italy from Austrian domination and uniting it under republican government, it sought to attain these goals by direct agitation and insurrection.

Young Lions, The (1948). A novel by Irwin Shaw. The book, Shaw’s first novel, begins on New Year’s Eve, 1937 and weaves the stories of three men, who meet only in the climactic scene: Dietl, a Nazi ski instructor who epitomizes his nation’s morality; Michael Whitmore, stage manager of a frivolous Broadway play, who drinks in the New Year, worrying about his wife's infidelity; and Noah Ackerman, a homeless Jew, first seen waiting for his father to die in a cheap California hotel. Ackerman, the book's most sympathetic character, marries a New Englander, with whom he enjoys a brief happiness; he fathers a son before, persecuted and exhausted, he is killed in a German wood. The book is one of the host of World War II novels that attempted to salvage meaning from the wreckage of war.

Young Man, Adventures of a (1939). A novel by John Dos Passos. It tells the story of Glenn Spottwood, a young man of sensitivity and a strong sense of justice, who, interested in the labor movement, becomes closely involved with radicals and Communists. Disillusioned with American left-wing politics, Glenn goes to Spain as an ambulance driver in the civil war. His disillusionment continues there when the Communist leaders are suspicious of him because of his past. Arrested as a Trotskyite spy, he is finally killed carrying water to the firing-line. The novel is the first of a trilogy about the Spottwood family. Number One (1943) is a study of a Southern politician strikingly like Huey Long, and The Grand Design (1949) is an unfavorable picture of the Roosevelt era. The trilogy was later published as District of Columbia (1952).

Young Pretender. See PRETENDER.

Young Visitors, The (1919). The nine-year-old Daisy Ashford's story about Mr. Salteena, a butcher's son who rises to high society. The book is notable for its accurate but naïve observation of grown-ups, resulting in fine unconscious satire.

Yourcenar, Marguerite. Pen name of Marguerite de Crayencour (19?– ). French novelist best known for Mémoires d'Hadrien (1951), a historical novel, and Coup de grâce (1939). The memoirs portray the emperor on the eve of his death and describe his reflections as he gazes out upon the city that seemed to him indestructible and that he now fears will fall. A world traveler, the author was able to use accurate historical and pictorial detail.

Youth (1902). A short story by Joseph Conrad. Told by Marlow, it is an account of his first dangerous voyage. His mature memory looks back on youthful emotion and illusion.

Youth and the Bright Medusa (1920). A collection of short stories by Willa Cather. Dealing with the theme of artistic sensitivity and talent, the volume includes Paul's Case, an often anthologized short story of a psychotic boy.

Ys or Is. A legendary city off the coast of Britain in France. Supposedly King Gradlon (5th century) held the only key to the floodgate in the dike that protected the city. His daughter, reveling with her lover, stole the key as a prank and flooded the city. Tradition says its cathedral can still occasionally be seen rising through the mists. In the opera Le Roi d'ys (The King of Ys, 1888), by Edouard Lalo (1823–1892), it is a second princess, jealous of her sister's lover, who floods the city, then repents and sacrifices herself to the water to save the city.

Ysopet or Isopet. See MARIE DE FRANCE.

Yüan. A Chinese dynasty (1260–1368). It was established by the Mongols, who under Jenghis Khan (1167–1277) had gradually consolidated power in Mongolia and Central Asia and eventually conquered the whole of China. This period was marked by a worldwide internationalization, with the distribution of Chinese products to the West and the introduction of much European knowledge to China. Marco Polo's visit was made during this dynasty. Literary advances were also made, particularly in the fields of drama and fiction.

Yvain, ou le chevalier au Lion. A 12th-century romance by Chrétien de Troyes. It concerns the adventures of the knight Yvain. Following the directions of a giant, he arrives at a well, finds a golden basin near it, and splashes water from the basin on a stone dish. Immediately a great storm arises, and a mysterious knight comes forth to combat. Yvain emerges the victor from the struggle. He then comes to a castle and gains entrance with the assistance of a lady named Lunette, who shows him how to make himself invisible. While hidden in a room in the castle, he hears the widow of the slain knight weeping for her lost husband, and he falls in love with her. Lunette convinces the widow, Laudine, that since the magic well must be defended, it is most desirable that the man chosen as the new defender and husband be the one who vanquished the first knight. The argument is successful, and eventually Yvain marries Laudine. The remainder of the romance is concerned with his numerous other adventures, during which he rescues a lion from a serpent and thereby acquires the animal as a mascot.
Zadig ou la Destinée (1748). A short novel by Voltaire, first published in 1747 under the title of Memnon, histoire orientale. Zadig is a wealthy, honest, well-educated young Babylonian who learns how difficult it is to be happy in this world where almost everything goes wrong in spite of his efforts to do right. Every time he thinks he has achieved contentment, security, or love, something happens to rob him of them; yet he is able to go on by making use of the wisdom he has acquired so painfully from experience. In the end, the angel Jersad reveals to him that there is no good without evil, or evil without good, and that all is trial or punishment, recompense or foresight. Zadig at last becomes a happy king and a sage. The inevitable Voltairean digests at religion, the clergy, and unjust sovereigns are apparent in this work.

method of Zadig. Drawing inferences from close observation, Zadig seemed to know so much about the king’s horse, which had been lost, that he was accused of having stolen it. He said he had never seen it, but could describe it perfectly because “I saw the marks of horseshoes, all equal distances apart...[therefore] he gallops perfectly. The dust on the trees in this narrow road only seven feet wide brushed off a little right and left three and a half feet from the middle of the road...[therefore] he has a tail three and a half feet long. I saw beneath the trees, which made a cradle five feet high, some leaves newly fallen...[therefore] he was fifteen hands high.”

Zaire (Zara, 1732). A tragedy by Voltaire. One of his best plays, it is said to have been inspired by Shakespeare’s Othello. The sultan Orosmane has fallen in love with his captive Zaire, a Christian girl who, as a child, had been carried off by the Turks and brought up in a seraglio in Jerusalem. She returns his love and a wedding is planned. Just before the marriage, Nérestan, Zaire’s childhood companion and fellow-captive, returns from France with the ransom for 10 knights. The ransom, however, has exhausted his fortune, and, unable to buy his own freedom, he surrenders himself. The good Orosmane refuses the ransom and frees everyone except Zaire and another captive, the old Lusignan. Nérestan is visibly disappointed about Lusignan and secures Zaire’s promise to intervene in his behalf. Orosmane grants the old man his freedom, and when Lusignan is brought up from his dungeon, he meets for the first time Zaire and Nérestan, whom he recognizes as his own lost son and daughter. He is horrified that Zaire is a Muslim, and, as a dying wish, asks her to be baptized. Zaire postpones her wedding to accomplish this, arousing Orosmane’s suspicions. He then intercepts a letter from Nérestan to Zaire, which he mistakenly thinks is a love letter, and goes to the secret place where she is to be baptized. Seeing Nérestan, his suspicions are confirmed and he stabs Zaire. When he learns the truth from Nérestan, he kills himself.

Zamoskvarechye. A section of Moscow, on the right bank of the Moskow River, inhabited mainly by merchants. Before the revolution it was famous as a center of old-fashioned Russian life, untouched by modern ways. Aleksandr Ostrokrsovt used the section as the setting for many of his dramas. A good description of the life there is given by Apollon Grigoryev in Mop literatury z naukowem skitasticatu (My Literary and Moral Writings).

Zamyatin, Yevgeni Ivanovich (1884–1937). Russian writer. Educated as a naval engineer, Zamyatin published his first tale Provincial Things (Uyezdnoye) in 1911. His other early tales include At the Back of Beyond (Na kulichkakh; 1914) and two satires on English life, which he had observed while in Britain on naval business: The Islanders (Otrovstyanoe; 1922) and The Fisher of Men (Lovetz cheloveka; 1922). After the revolution, Zamyatin helped organize the writers’ group known as the Srepont Brothers and became a leader and teacher of the circle’s young writers. Zamyatin’s major novel, We, with its setting of a future totalitarian state, was a forerunner of Aldous Huxley’s Brave New World and George Orwell’s 1984. Written in 1920, it could not be published in Russia, and when it was first published abroad in 1924, Zamyatin was castigated by the Soviet authorities, who denounced him as an “internal émigré” and expelled him from the federation of writers, shutting the pages of all journals and newspapers to him. He wrote a letter to Stalin, asking to be allowed to emigrate and the request was surprisingly granted, supposedly with the help of Maksim Gorki. Zamyatin moved to France in 1931 where he lived until his death.

Zamyatin’s plays include The Fires of St. Dominic (Ogni sv. domnika; 1923), a satire of the Soviet secret police agency Cheka; The Society of Honorary Bell Ringers (Oshchestevo pochotnykh zvonarei; 1926); and The Flea (Bloka; 1925), a dramatization of a story by the 19th-century writer Nikolai Leskov.

Zamyatin described himself as a neorealist. He defined his method in the following way: “While neorealism uses a microscope to look at the world, symbolism used a telescope, and pre-revolutionary realism, an ordinary looking glass.” Zamyatin’s almost surrealistic literary methods had a large influence on such younger Soviet writers as Vsevolod Ivanov and Yuri Olesha.

Zanoni (1842). A novel by Edward Bulwer-Lytton. The hero, Zanoni, manages by the aid of spirits to produce precious metals and to prolong his own life for many centuries, but he finally gives up his supernatural powers to marry an opera singer.

Zapata, Emiliano (1877–1919). Mexican revolutionary leader. Zapata and the peasant army that he recruited in Morelos and other southern states participated in the revolutionary movement of 1910, devastating plantations and dividing the land among the peons. Although Carranza promised agrarian reform upon assuming power in 1915, Zapata was skeptical. Advising his followers to trust in nothing but their guns, he refused to come to terms with the government and skillfully eluded capture for years. After he was treacherously murdered by carrancistas, he became a semilegendary figure.

Zaturenska, Marya (1902– ). Russian-born American poet. She won a Pulitzer Prize for the collection Cold Morning Sky (1937). Other collections include Threshold and Hearth (1934), The Listening Landscape (1941), and Terraces of Light (1960). She has also written a life of Christina Rossetti (1949) and, with her husband, Horace Gregory, A History of American Poetry, 1900–1940 (1946).

Zechariah. An Old Testament book, the 11th of the Minor Prophets. It is in two parts. The first part dates from the restoration of the temple in Jerusalem (c. 530 B.C.), and is contemporaneous with Haggai, containing the same message. The second part, written after the death of Alexander the Great in 323 B.C., contains visions of Israel’s future and Mesopotamian prophecies.

Zeitblom, Serenus. The narrator of Thomas Mann’s novel Doktor Faustus. He is a childhood friend of the hero Adrian Leverkühn. His very name, Serenus Zeitblom (literally, “serene time-flower”), suggests the complacency of the typical bourgeois and implies that he is simply the passive product of his age. He is, however, too intelligent to be caught up in the fever of Nazism. Thus, he is about halfway between Leverkühn’s artistic genius, on the one hand, and his people’s political madness, on the other, and is able to comment on both.

Zélide. Pen name of Isabelle de Charrière, born Isabella van Tuyll (1740–1805). Dutch-born Swiss author of breeding and beauty. One of her friends was James Boswell, who tried to marry her. She became a very close intellectual friend of Benjamin Constant.

Zemstvo. In Czarist Russia, a county council composed of local elected officials. The Zemstvo, which were established by one of the reform laws of 1864, dealt with education, public health and welfare, roads, and food supply. They often had to operate under the handicap of restrictions imposed by the central government, which was suspicious of the democratic nature of the councils.

Zen Buddhism. A Buddhist sect. It was introduced from China to Japan during the late Heian (794–1185) and early Kamakura (1185–1333) periods by Japanese monks visiting the mainland and refugee Chinese priests. Known as ch’àn in Chinese, it emphasizes meditation and physical work as means to enlightenment, leaving scriptural study to advanced students. The two principal Japanese sects are Rinzai (Ch., Lin-chi) which was introduced by Eisi (1141–1215) and stems from the Ch’àn of the Sung Dynasty (960–1279), and Sōtō (Ch., Ts’ao-tung), first introduced to Japan by Dōgen (1200–1253). Rinzai gives particular stress to the study of Kōan as a means to enlightenment; Sōtō, which contains many purely Japanese elements, concentrates on meditative sitting alone. Zen has had significant influence on various elements of Japanese culture: no, the tea ceremony, martial arts, and literature. Zen was introduced to the West largely in the works of Daisetz Suzuki.

Zenger, John Peter (1697–1746). German-born American printer and journalist. He came to America in 1710 and established the New York Weekly Journal to oppose the policies of the provincial government. Brought to trial for seditious libel (1734–1735), he was defended by Andrew Hamilton and acquitted. The decision in this case helped to establish freedom of the press in America.

From the Ten Ox-herding Pictures, a Chinese Zen text.
Zenobia (d. after 274). Queen of Palmyra, joint ruler with her husband Odenathus. On his death (267) she assumed complete control of the kingdom. Pretending to be closely allied to Rome, she stationed her armies all over the Near East, in Asia Minor, Syria, Mesopotamia, and Egypt. On the accession of Aurelian (270), she openly defied Rome and attempted to usurp the entire Eastern Empire. Her armies were defeated (271) and she was captured. Aurelian later pardoned her, but kept her exiled in Italy. Her name has come to signify a powerful, ambitious woman.

Zeno (Zenon) of Elea (fl. 460 B.C.). Greek philosopher, pupil and associate of Parmenides. Aristotle calls him the founder of dialectic. A clever logician, Zeno could draw his own conclusions from tenets his adversary admitted. He defended Parmenides' belief that motion and change are illusory in a series of brilliant paradoxes. In the best known of these, Achilles, the fastest runner, cannot catch the tortoise because he must first reach the point where the pursued started. In the meantime, the tortoise has advanced, however little, to a new position.

ZEPHIR. The west wind in classical mythology, son of Aeolus and Aurora, and husband of Iris. He was the rival of Apollo for the love of Hyacinth.

Zeppelin, Count Ferdinand von (1838-1917), German airship designer. He developed the dirigible balloon, named after him, which was used in World War I.

Zerbino. In Lodovico Ariosto's Orlando Furioso, a famous knight, son of the king of Scotland, brother of the fair Ginevra, and friend to Orlando. His beloved, the Saracen princess Isabella, is kidnapped before their wedding; then Orlando rescues her and reunites them. But Zerbino is finally killed by Mandricardo and Isabella by Rodomonte, who builds a shrine to them.

Zerrissenheit (Ger., "the state of being torn apart"). A German literary critical term, usually translated in English by "disintegration." It refers to the condition of a character, usually an artist, who is unable to reconcile the claims of his own subjective, ideal world with the necessities of the real, objective world. Examples are Goethe's characters Werther and Tasso, E. T. A. Hoffmann's Johannes Kreisler, and Harry Haller in Hesse's Steppenwolf.

Zethus (Zethos). See AMPHION.

Zeus. The supreme god of the ancient Greeks. He was the Greek version of an almost universally worshiped European god of atmospheric phenomena, especially thunder and lightning, of whom Jupiter is another example. As the god of kingship, he was king of the gods. His principal weapon was the thunderbolt; his famous fringed shield, the aegis, he often shared with Athene. The most common of many stories of Zeus's origins was that he was a son of Cronos and Rhea. His mother bore him secretly, to save him from his voracious father, who had swallowed his brothers and sisters. He was brought up in a cave on Mount Dicte in Crete, where he was suckled by the goat Amalthaea, nursed by nymphs, and protected from discovery by the Curetes, sons of Rhea, who drowned his cries by dancing and clashing their shields.

Reaching manhood, Zeus overthrew his father, as his grandfather Ge had predicted. The universe was then divided between him and his brothers, whom Cronos had vomited up; Zeus received heaven, Poseidon the sea, Hades the underworld, with earth and their abode on Mount Olympus as their common property. Before the Olympian gods could establish their supremacy, however, they had to destroy the rebellious Titans, the Giants, and the monster Typhon or Typhoeus, all of whom made war on heaven. Later, when the giants Otus and Ephialtes warred with heaven, Zeus struck them down with his thunderbolts. Zeus also had to conquer a rebellion in his own family. His sister-wife Hera, his brother Poseidon, and his daughter Athene managed to bind him, but Thetis saved him by bringing the monster Briareus to his assistance.

In various localities, Zeus was regarded as the consort of the reigning local goddess, often a pre-Hellenic earth-goddess. Later, the problem of his many wives was resolved by making him the remarkably unfaithful husband of Hera. Some of his many unions with other goddesses include that with Metis, who conceived Athene; with Themis, who bore him the Seasons and the Fates; with Eurynome, who bore him the Graces (Charites); with Demeter, who bore him Kore (Persephone); with Leto, who bore him Apollo and Artemis. His marriage to Hera, the powerful pre-Hellenic goddess of Argos, brought forth Hebe, Ares, and Eileithyia.

Zeus also had affairs with more or less mortal women, some of which led to famous offspring. Notable among these children were Dionysus, son of Cadmus' daughter Semele; Heracles, son of Alcmena; Perseus, son of Danae; Amphion and Zethus, sons of Antiope; Helen, Clytemnestra, and the Dioscuri (or some combination of them), children of Leda.

Zhdanov, Andrei Aleksandrovich (1888-1948). Russian politician and Soviet government official. Notorious for his policing of literature in the 1930's and 1940's, he replaced the assassinated Sergei Kirov as Communist Party secretary in Leningrad in 1934. Zhdanov led the campaign beginning in 1946 to oust "decadent" Western influences from Soviet literature. He delivered scathing speeches denouncing errant writers, particularly Mikhail Zoshchenko and Anna Akhmatova.

Zhukovski, Vasili Andreyevich (1783-1852). Russian poet and translator. His translations of such works as Schiller's Maid of Orleans, Byron's Prisoner of Chillon, and Gray's Elegy helped introduce Western romanticism into Russia. Zhukovski also produced a notable translation of Homer's Odyssey in 1849. His own poems were among the best written in Russian before Pushkin's work appeared. Besides his literary activity, Zhukovski was also a prominent figure in the Russian court. He was a tutor.
of the young Alexander II, who became Czar in 1855. His influence is reputed to have helped Pushkin in the younger poet's many scraps with Czar Nicholas I's government.

Ziegfeld, Florenz (1867–1932). American showman. He introduced with his Folies of 1907 a new type of stage entertainment, the revue, consisting of a medley of skits and light pieces with allusions to and re-enactments of the events of the past year, but the chief attractions of which were stage effects and pretty girls scantily clad. The Folies reached their height of popularity in the 1920's when they were imitated by other revues calling themselves The Scandals, The Venities, etc.

Zilante or Gigliante. In Boiardo's Orlando Innamorato and Ariosto's Orlando Furioso, the younger brother of Brandimarte and Orrigille and son of King Monodante of India. He is rescued by Orlando after falling into the power of the witch Morgana.

Zineura. The heroine of Bernabò di Genoa, a tale from Bocaccio's The Decameron. She is the prototype of Imogen in Shakespeare's Cymbeline.

Zinovyev, Grigorii Yevseyevich. Real name, Hirsch Apfelbaum (1883–1936). Russian Communist leader. He shared power with Stalin and Kamenev after the death of Lenin. He and Kamenev were ousted from power by Stalin in the late 1920's, and in 1936 he was arrested and executed for alleged treason in the first of the notorious purge trials.

Zinendorf, Count Nikolaus Ludwig von (1700–1760). German religious lyric poet and writer of hymns. He offered his estate to religious refugees from Moravia. A settlement of the Moravian Brethren, known as Herrnhut, was established there in 1722.

Zion. One of the hills on which the city of Jerusalem is built. On Zion was the fortified acropolis of the Jebusites which David's soldiers captured by stealth. The word Zion was later used to designate the whole city. Allegorically Zion refers to a house of God, Israel, or the Christian religion.

Zionism. The movement for colonizing the Jews in their old home, Palestine, the land of Zion. It led to the establishment of the modern nation of Israel.

Zitusudra. The Sumerian Noah. The single account discovered so far is fragmentary, but it appears to be very similar to the later version in the Babylonian epic of Gilgamesh, where the builder of the ark is named Utnapishtim.

Zodiac (Gr., zodiako, pertaining to animals; from zoos, an animal). An imaginary belt or zone in the heavens. It extends about eight degrees each side of the ecliptic which the sun traverses every year. The zodiac was divided by the ancients into 12 equal parts, proceeding from west to east, each part of 30 degrees, and distinguished by a sign. These originally corresponded to the zodiacal constellations bearing the same names, but now, through the precession of the equinoxes, they coincide with the constellations bearing the names next in order.

Beginning with Aries, there are first six on the north side and six on the south side of the equator. Beginning with Capricornus, there are six ascending and six descending signs: i.e., six which ascend higher and higher toward the north, and six which descend lower and lower toward the south. The six northern signs are Aries (the ram), Taurus (the bull), Gemini (the twins), spring signs; and Cancer (the crab), Leo (the lion), Virgo (the virgin), summer signs. The six southern are Libra (the balance), Scorpio (the scorpion), Sagittarius (the Archer), autumn signs; and Capricornus (the goat), Aquarius (the waterbearer), and Pisces (the fishes), winter signs.

Zolli or Zoilos (4th century B.C.). Greek rhetorician. A literary Thersites, shrewd, witty, and spiteful, he was nicknamed Homeromaxios (Homer's Scourge), because he mercilessly assailed the epics of Homer, and called the companions of Odysseus in the island of Circe weeping pokers (Choirida klaionya). He also flew at Plato, Isocrates, and other high game.

Zola, Émile (1840–1902). French writer and critic, leader of the naturalist school. Raised in the beautiful city of Aix-en-Provence, with his close friend Paul Cézanne, Zola came to Paris at the age of 18. He worked first as a clerk in a publishing house, and later became a journalist. In 1865 his first novel, La Confession de Claude, was published. With the publication of La Fortune des Rougons (1871), Zola began his 22-year, 20-volume experiment in the naturalistic novel entitled Les Rougon-Macquart. Scientific precision and scrupulous attention to detail mark his lengthy portrait of the Rougon-Macquart family. In 1880 he published La Roman Experimentale (The Experimental Novel) in which he explained his naturalistic method and set forth his theories of fiction (see NATURALISM). For many years, Zola used his fiction in the service of his passion for social reform, but in his last novels—the two series Les Trois Villes (1894–1898) and Quatre Evangelistes (1899–1903)—he speaks directly of his faith in a kind of Christian socialism, which would alleviate the misery and suffering he had long portrayed so faithfully. His zeal for reform and justice was translated into practical action when Zola penned his famous letter J'accuse, in defense of Captain Dreyfus.

Zorba the Greek (Alexis Zorbas; 1946). A novel by Nikos Kazantzakis. The hero, a still vigorous and passionate old Greek, personifies the Dionysian approach to life that fascinated his creator. He is contrasted with a pallid narrator, who, before meeting the overpowering Zorba, has preferred to contemplate life, rather than to live it. This novel established Kazantzakis' reputation in the English-speaking world.

Zoroaster or Zarathustra. The founder (about 1000 B.C.) of the Perso-Iranian national religion, Zoroastrianism, whose modern version is Parseeism. It was dominant in Western Asia from about 550 B.C. to A.D. 650, and is still held by many thousands in Persia and India. The theology is fundamentally dualistic in that the course of the universe is understood as a relentless struggle between Ormuzd (Ahura Mazda), the principle of light and goodness, and Ahriman (Angra Mainyu), the spirit of evil and darkness. Ormuzd will prevail, partly through the help of man whom he created to strengthen his forces. All souls will be purified by fire and a new heaven and earth will be established. Zoroaster, whose name is the Greek form of the Persian Zarathustra, established three commandments: good thoughts, good words, good deeds. See AVESTA; BACTRIAN SAGE; PARSEE.
Zorrilla y Moral, José (1817–1893). Spanish poet and dramatist. Born in Valladolid, Zorrilla became famous overnight in 1837 when he recited an elegy at the grave of poet Mariano de Larra, who had just committed suicide. He subsequently abandoned his wife, who was many years his senior, and lived in France and Mexico, where he enjoyed the patronage of the emperor Maximilian. After his wife's death in 1866 he returned to Spain. Though he was usually penniless, he received great popular acclaim and was honored with a golden crown in Granada in 1889.

One of Spain's outstanding romantic poets, Zorrilla was often facile and careless, but he possessed great dramatic and descriptive power which enabled him to recreate the atmosphere of a past age, as he showed in his many leyendas, or legends, of medieval Spain. His best-known verse includes the collection Cantos del trovador (1840–1841) and the unfinished Granada (1852), a richly ornamented account of the intrigues that preceded the city's fall.

Zorrilla's poetry has been largely overshadowed by the fame of his Don Juan Tenorio, the most successful play of 19th-century Spain. Many of his other plays are based, like his poems, on episodes in Spanish history. Among these are El zapatero y el rey (1840–1841), El puñal del Godo (1842), and Traidor, inconfeso y mártir (1849).

Zoshchenko, Mikhail Mikhailovich (1895–1958). Russian satirist. He is famous for his short, pithy stories of the average Soviet citizen struggling to make his way in a world filled with red tape, regulations, and frustration. He studied law at the University of St. Petersburg, served in the army during the war, and in the Red Army in the civil war. He began his literary career when he joined the Skraption Brothers in 1921. His first stories were published in the collection entitled Stories Told by Nasar Ilyich Mr. Sinebryukhov (Raskstany nasara ilyicha gospodina sinebryukhova; 1922). These and the several volumes of short stories published in later years show the influence of the ornamental styles of Leskov and Remizov and Zoshchenko's own mastery of ixaz—the device of relating a story in the usually semi-literate language of a fictitious narrator, rather than the less vivid language of conventional narrative prose.

In 1943, Zoshchenko came under attack in the Soviet literary journals for his Before Sunrise (Perezd voskhodom solntsa), of which two parts were published that year. Although Zoshchenko referred to the work as a novel, it appears to be more a personal reminiscence, and this fact seemed the chief reason for the attacks. Three years later the Central Committee of the Communist Party issued a resolution criticizing various aspects of Soviet literature and singling out Zoshchenko and the poet Anna Akhmatova for special condemnation. Zoshchenko's wartime publication of his memoir was recalled and termed a "disgusting" work. Shortly afterward, in a speech the overseer of Soviet culture, Andrei Zhdanov, referred to Zoshchenko as a "vulgarian" in another bitter attack on the writer. After this onslaught, Zoshchenko virtually ceased publishing any new stories, except for a few second-rate efforts in 1947 and 1950.

Zosima. In Fedor Dostoevski's The Brothers Karamazov, the elder monk who preaches a message of love and forbearance which is considered to be the religious viewpoint of the author.

Zsigmondy, Richard (1865–1929). German chemist. With H. F. W. Siedentopf (1872– ) he invented the ultramicroscope (1903) with which he investigated the nature of colloids. He won the Nobel Prize for chemistry in 1925.

Zuckmayer, Carl (1896– ). German playwright. Though not so capable of profundity and poetry as Hofmannsthal, for example, and though not so much an innovator in dramatic form as the expressionists and Brecht, he has still won for himself an unchallenged place of honor in modern German drama. After a few abortive attempts at expressionism, he began to develop his main strength—the depiction of real and vital individuals—in Der fröhliche Weinberg (The Merry Vineyard, 1925) and Schinderhannes (1927), both of which treat country life in his own Rhinish homeland. Also in these plays, he began, in the form of satire, to voice his opposition to the tendency toward militarism and bureaucratic regimentation which was present in Germany at the time; and this satirical attitude then came into its own in his great comedy The Captain or Köpenick. But shortly after writing this play he was forced into exile by the rise of Nazism, and his next major success, written in the U.S., is an entirely serious protest against Hitler's government: The Devil's General. Among Zuckmayer's other significant plays are Bellman (1938), about an 18th-century Swedish minstrel; Der Gesang im Feuerofen (Song in the Fiery Furnace, 1950), about the resistance in occupied France; and Das kalte Licht (The Cold Light, 1956), a topical drama about a nuclear scientist turned traitor.

Zuleika. (1) In Arabic legend, the name traditionally ascribed to Portiphar's wife whose advances were resisted by the virtuous Joseph (Gen. 39). Their story is told in the Persian Yâsîf and Zula'ikha by Nurreddin Jami (1414–1429); Zuleika is a common name in Persian poetry.

(2) The heroine of Byron's Bride of Abydos (1813).

Zuleika Dobson (1911). A fantastic, satirical novel by Max Beerbohm. Zuleika is a beautiful girl on a visit to Oxford University; every one of the undergraduates falls in love with her and drowns himself in despair.

Zweig, Arnold (1887– ). German novelist. An advocate of socialism and Zionism, he is best known for the three novels of the Grisha cycle: Der Streit um den Sergeanten Grisha (The Case of Sergeant Grisha, 1927), Junge Frau von 1914 (Young Woman of 1914, 1931) and De Vrient kehrt heim (De Vrient Comes Home, 1932).
